PUBLISHER'S PREFACE

You hold in your hands a work unique in the history of the vibrant faith community that has sponsored its publication. This volume marks another, perhaps inevitable, step in the searching for and unfolding of truth that is a hallmark of the Reformation and the Advent movement.

Commentaries on the Bible, from many faith traditions and perspectives, have been an important part of serious Bible study for centuries. Seventh-day Adventists have always placed the Bible alone as authoritative above all human opinion on what it says. At the same time, we have been blessed by the insights of many scholars through various Bible commentaries from these faith traditions, even while holding some significant differences in interpretation on several of the grandest and most vital themes of Scripture.

In the 1950s, the publication of the multivolume, verse-by-verse Seventh-day Adventist Bible Commentary met with an enthusiastic reception within the Adventist world far beyond all initial expectations. Its influence on biblical understanding in our community of faith has been profound. It has served the church well for more than sixty years.

In 2008, Andrews University was honored to be asked to produce another major landmark in the history of Adventist engagement with Scripture. The Andrews Study Bible, originally produced in the New King James Version (2010) and now also in the New International Version (2019), contains thousands of study notes written by prominent and thoughtful Adventist scholars. It also includes a unique linked reference system highlighting the greatest themes of the Bible. It was published with sponsorship and funding by the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists and has been identified as the most comprehensive one-volume Bible study resource in the Adventist world.

Led by Niels-Erik Andreasen, then president of Andrews University, planning began almost immediately after the release of the Andrews Study Bible to next produce a concise, full-featured Bible commentary as a companion to the Andrews Study Bible. With sponsorship and funding again from the General Conference, Andrews University authorized a worldwide team of some sixty scholars and Bible teachers, under the leadership of Ángel Manuel Rodríguez, to produce this landmark work which you now hold in your hands. As former director of the General Conference Biblical Research Institute, Dr. Rodríguez was uniquely qualified for this work because of his expertise in biblical studies, his personal acquaintance with scores of scholars, and his worldwide reputation for faithfulness in effectively communicating the message and mission of the Bible as understood by Seventh-day Adventists.

It is our intent that the Andrews Bible Commentary complement the Andrews Study Bible. We believe that together these two great works form a complete, ready-reference resource for every believer.

The earnest desire of the publishers is that the Andrews Bible Commentary may inspire your deeper engagement with God's word and increase your fervent expectation of the Advent Hope.

INTRODUCTION

The Andrews Bible Commentary is a concise exposition of Scripture written by Adventist scholars as a companion to the Andrews Study Bible. It is a valuable Bible study tool for lay readers, pastors, students, and teachers living in expectation of the Advent Hope. It is a confessional commentary only in the sense that the authors are Adventists, who carefully listened to the biblical text to unfold its significance and meaning for its readers, paying particular attention to the topic of biblical hope. The methodology used in the exposition of the biblical text is the historical-grammatical method. In preparing the comments on the biblical text, contributors to the Andrews Bible Commentary have made use of a wide range of literature, including other commentaries. This literature has helped to enrich and sharpen our understanding of the biblical text. While the format does not allow space to engage with the writings of other scholars, essential questions of current interest about the meaning of the text are addressed.

Special Features

There are a number of important features in this work that together make this a unique commentary on the Bible and that will hopefully facilitate its usefulness for general reading and comprehension.

Unique Emphasis. The key distinctive feature of the Andrews Bible Commentary is its emphasis on the biblical topic of hope. The first article unveils some of the main theological dimensions of biblical hope, and the commentaries identify its presence and significance in each biblical book from a theological and historical perspective. This overarching topic, as well as others, provides theological unity to the commentary.

Articles. A number of articles will prepare readers to use the commentary. There is a rich collection of helpful articles at the front of the work that helps provide background material before the reader engages with the biblical books themselves. Each block of biblical books (e.g., the Pentateuch, the historical books) is introduced by an article that provides a general overview of the content of the books that constitute that particular block. The articles help the readers to see what holds those books together historically and theologically. Some of the articles provide a general discussion of some of the historical background for both the Old and New Testaments.

Essays. Short essays on topics of relevance to the textual commentary are placed close to the biblical passages to which the topics are relevant. In addition to dealing with what appear to be problematic passages, these essays also develop or clarify significant theological issues and analyze important doctrinal passages in conjunction with other biblical texts.

Introduction to Biblical Books. In the introduction to the commentary for each book, the reader will find background information that is useful and, in some cases, indispensable for a proper understanding of the book. These introductory materials deal with questions related to authorship, date of composition, the book's historical setting, and some of its main theological themes, as well as some of the literary features that characterize the book.

Block Commentary. With a few exceptions, the commentary generally does not provide a detailed exegesis of each biblical passage. The exposition is organized according to the blocks of passages or sections that constitute a unity by themselves. The comments show how each section is related to the other, identify the flow of the message of the text, develop some of the main theological concepts running throughout the biblical book, and clarify the meaning of the block of material. There are also personal applications of the message of the text to the present life of the believer. Sometimes it is necessary to linger a little longer on a particular passage by discussing the meaning of a biblical term or grammatical issues that have an impact on the interpretation of the passage.

Use of Ellen G. White. The readers will find occasional quotes from the writings of Ellen White or references in parenthesis to some of her writings. Adventists believe that she received from the Lord the gift of prophecy, through which He led the development of the Seventh-day Adventist Church and its institutions. Her writings contain significant theological insights on biblical topics, and the authors were encouraged to use them when contextually pertinent. The commentary, however, is based on the meaning of the biblical text and not on her writings. She is not part of the biblical canon and her writings, as she herself indicated, are to be judged by the Scriptures.

How to Use the Commentary

The Andrews Bible Commentary should function as a guide in the personal study of the Bible. In other words, the main interest of the reader should be to gain a better understanding of the Bible. Consequently, the Bible should be the starting point of the study. If the reader is interested in studying a particular book, it would be well to prayerfully read the entire book before consulting the commentary. In this way the mind of the reader will be imbued with the thoughts from the Bible, making it easier to follow and even evaluate the exposition of the text provided in the commentary. If a person is interested in reading the biblical text and the commentary together, it would be better to read first the particular section of the Bible and then the commentary on that block of material. Priority should always be given to the biblical text.

Since backgrounds are so important in the interpretation of the Bible, it is useful to read the articles and even the introduction to particular books in order to gain a broad perspective of the times when the biblical writers and their audiences lived. Such information will provide a better understanding of the biblical text by placing it within a particular historical moment in the divine-human interaction. The essays found throughout the commentary can also be helpful in supplementing personal study of the Bible. Readers interested in a particular biblical subject can find some of the essays useful as introductions to the topic. Reading a specific essay may also help them realize the need to delve deeper into the subject through a more detailed personal study of the Bible.

Since this commentary does not repeat the information found in the Andrews Study Bible, readers will find it valuable to deepen their knowledge by consulting it at the same time. The combination of these two tools will provide a wealth of information that will enrich and broaden the reader's understanding of the exposition of the biblical text.

Gratitude

A project like this would not have been possible without the involvement of many individuals. The idea of producing a one-volume Bible commentary written by Adventist scholars originated in conversations between John McVay, president of Walla Walla University in College Place, Washington, and Greg King, dean of the School of Religion at Southern Adventist University in Collegedale, Tennessee. When Niels-Erik Andreasen, then president of Andrews University, showed an interest in the project, they both considered Andrews University Press to be the ideal publisher. John and Greg initially became associate editors of the commentary, but their multiple responsibilities made it impossible for them to provide leadership to the project. We are grateful to them for their contribution. The writers of the commentary for the biblical books come from around the world, representing, in a sense, the worldwide nature of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. They wrote while carrying heavy teaching or administrative responsibilities, and the final result is the volume that you have in your hands. We are grateful to them for their sacrifice and enthusiasm and for their willingness to be part of this project.

We appreciate the strong support of the administrations of Andrews University and the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists, both of which provided specific funding allocations to make this project possible. We also are particularly grateful to the board and staff of Andrews University Press for entrusting to us the privilege of serving as editors in the production of the commentary and for their patience as they had to wait a little longer than anticipated for the closure of the project. The involvement of the staff of Andrews University Press—Ronald Knott, L. S. Baker Jr., and Deborah Everhart—significantly enhanced the final form of the commentary by providing valuable evaluations of the manuscripts and suggesting important changes. It has been a pleasure for us to work with them.

Finally, we are grateful to the Lord, who gave us the Bible and who, through the work of the Spirit, guides us in its interpretation. What we offer to the readers is a beginning in their study of the Bible, and we pray that the Lord will assist them in gaining a deeper knowledge of the love of Christ for us as revealed in His Word.

HOPE AND THE ADVENT OF GOD

Hope may not be the center of a biblical theology, but it certainly belongs to the inner circle of that theology. In this Bible commentary, we seek to highlight the presence of this concept throughout the biblical text and underscore its potential impact on the thinking and life of human beings. The almost hopeless condition of human existence, or at least the disorientation that characterizes it, makes this task indispensable. In what follows, we offer some of the main aspects of biblical hope. The biblical terminology for hope emphasizes the elements of expectation and trust and is grounded in the fact that human existence is rooted in time—past, present, and future. The presence of the concept of hope in the biblical text is not limited to the use of certain vocabulary, and it is found in varying contexts, including narratives, rituals, and exhortations. If hope is primarily living in expectation and in anticipation of the future and what it will bring, then we are by nature creatures of hope; hope is at the very core of being human. According to the Scriptures, true hope is found only in God and in His Son.

HOPE IN THE OLD TESTAMENT

As humans came from the hands of the Creator, they were placed within the flow of time—within the sixth day of the Creation week anticipating the coming of the seventh day (Gen. 1:27, 31; 2:1). They were created standing before the future, and therefore they existed in the expectation of what that future would be like. This expectation was free from apprehension and fear because its realization was in the loving hands of the Creator. Elements of that future were made clear to Adam and Eve. So, for instance, they would rule the natural world and multiply themselves, filling the earth with their descendants (Gen. 1:26, 28). This future was masterminded by the Lord and offered to them as a gift. They simply were to look forward in expectation to its realization. They accepted it as part of their self-realization.

But the future could also present them with an element of danger, a threat to their harmonious experience and inner peace. Evil found its way into the Garden through a corrupting power represented by the serpent (Gen. 3:1; Is. 14:12–15; Ezek. 28:13–16; Rev. 12:7–9). Adam and Eve were offered an alternate future, and surprisingly, they accepted it. They were offered a future existence free from the alleged restraints imposed on them by God, in which it would be possible for them to obtain a new mode of existence—becoming like God (Gen. 3:1–3). This was an exhilarating expectation, something they had never before thought about. The “promise” of the serpent instilled in them a new hope. But it was a false hope—the “hope” of a hopeless future. Consequently, fear of the future crept into the human heart, and since then it has remained there, defining human existence to a large extent.

When humans found themselves in fear and without a future, and therefore without hope, God intervened and out of grace offered them a new future and a renewed hope. This new hope was grounded on the divine promise of the coming/advent of the Seed of the woman, who would permanently overcome the evil power represented by the deceptive serpent (Gen. 3:15; Gal. 3:16). Since then, hope has been grounded on God's promises to the human race and their expected fulfillment within history in a context of conflict. Hope, then, presupposes a need that should be supplied. The patriarchal narratives reaffirm the universal hope of restoration and blessing by extending it to all the nations of the earth through the descendants of Abraham (Gen. 12:1–3). Biblical hope is by nature universal (cf. Is. 42:4; 51:9).

HOPE AND CONFLICT

The moral and spiritual corruption of the human race is the basis for both divine judgment and the offer of hope. The judgment of a universal flood was announced together with a hope of salvation (Gen. 6:11–14). But the hope of survival was available only inside Noah's ark to those who would trust in the Lord. Hope was realized in the midst of judgment in the survival of a faithful remnant awaiting the fulfillment of God's promises. This pattern of spiritual decay, divine judgment, and trust in a hopeful promise of salvation is found throughout the OT. It reached its pinnacle in the preexilic rebellion of the people of God against the covenant Lord through idolatry and social injustices. The moment finally came when divine judgment was inevitable—Israel and later Judah would go into exile (e.g., Jer. 4:5–9; 6:1–5; Amos 9:1–6). Although this divine pronouncement was the end of hope for His people (Ezek. 37:11), the Lord graciously announced yet another new future (Jer. 29:11), a hope of salvation for a faithful remnant (e.g., Is. 10:20–23; Jer. 31:17; Amos 9:8, 13–15). The attempts of the enemy of God to destroy His people were frustrated by the divine preservation of a remnant through whom the Lord was to fulfill His saving will.

Even when the nations, moved by their own expansionistic desires, threatened God's people with extinction or oppression, it was hope based on faith in the Lord that sustained His servants (e.g., 2 Kin. 18:17–19:37). Under those and similar circumstances, hope and faith were severely tested, but the divine call was to trust in God. The conflict within which hope was usually present required the individual to pray for and anticipate deliverance (Pss. 33:18–19; 130:7–8), healing (Is. 40:31), and salvation (e.g., Pss. 14:7; 39:7–8; Is. 51:5), to trust in the Lord when facing trials (Pss. 27:14; 34:18–22; 130:5), and to rely on His loving-kindness in the midst of hopelessness (Ps. 147:11). In the final analysis God, and no one else, was the hope of His people (Pss. 39:7; 71:5). It is in the context of the suffering of the innocent that the strength of hope surfaces in the midst of struggle and it is finally victorious (Ps. 25:19–21). Job's suffering was so intense that he could foresee only death—the end of hope (Job 7:6–10). But even in that almost hopeless situation, he was able to affirm his yahel (“trust” or “hope”) in God despite being “slain” by Him (Job 13:15; cf. Is. 8:17). This is a hope that is firmly grounded on the reliability of God (cf. Ps. 33:20–22; Jer. 14:22).

This hope is also related to the future of the nation. The OT looks forward to the Day of the Lord, a time when the nations will gather to fight against Israel but the Lord will permanently defeat them, bringing deliverance and salvation to His people (e.g., Joel 3:1–2, 12). This hope nurtured the life of God's people in the OT and enabled them to look forward to the future in full confidence. They knew that the future was in the hands of the Lord and that their hope would be actualized in the advent of the Lord (Is. 25:9).

HOPE AND GOD'S SANCTUARY/TEMPLE

Hope in a divine intervention that would bring salvation to God's people was expressed through the Israelite sacrificial and priestly systems. God instituted the sanctuary services in order to deal with the spiritual needs and challenges of His people. The sacrificial system was a means by which God's people worshiped Him, expressed gratitude to Him, sought His presence (Pss. 27:6; 107:22; 116:17), and asked for forgiveness of sin, hoping in faith that it would be granted to them (Ps. 65:3–5; cf. Lev. 4:20, 26, 31). The sanctuary/temple was a place where the sinner could find hope because the hope of Israel dwelt there (cf. Jer. 14:8; 17:13). The hope of the people was manifested through the vows they made to the Lord in anticipation of the fulfillment of a divine promise (Pss. 66:13–14; 116:17–19). The fulfillment of God's promises strengthened the faith and hope of the people because it revealed that God is trustworthy. By dwelling among them in the sanctuary/temple, He was near to them to bless and sustain them and to provide for them a means of atonement (Ps. 24:3–5; cf. Lev. 4:13–21).

Human sin, like that of Adam and Eve, could separate the Israelites from God, leaving them in a state of hopelessness. The relationship, broken or altered by sin, was restored through the sacrificial victims that died in place of the repentant sinners, bearing their sin (Lev. 17:11). The daily ministry of the priest in the Holy Place assured the people that atoning blood was available for the forgiveness of their sins. The annual Day of Atonement ministry of the high priest pointed to a future time when God, through His work of judgment, would cleanse the world from sin and impurity, thus restoring it to its original condition (Lev. 16:29–33; Dan. 8:13–14; Zech. 3:1–9). Thus God illustrated for them what He would do through the coming Savior who would die for them, bearing their sins and being their High Priest and the Mediator of reconciliation and judgment (Is. 52:13–53:12).

HOPE AND THE WORK OF THE PROPHETS

The prophets' messages of judgment and salvation pointed to a proclamation of a new future that was to be apprehended by the people as a reliable word of hope coming from the Lord. The promise of the Son, through whom the divine promise of salvation was to be realized, was reaffirmed (Is. 7:14; 11:1–5). The prophets announced a new future shaped by a new covenant (Jer. 31:31–34) that would bring with it a new heaven and a new earth (Is. 65:17; 66:22), the transformation of nature (e.g., Is. 11:6–9; 65:25) and social life, and the final victory over God's enemies, including death itself (e.g., Is. 25:7–8; 26:19; Dan. 12:2).

The realization of this hope would be possible through the coming/advent of the Lord in power and glory (Is. 35). This hope reminded God's people that the present configuration of what they saw and experienced was not final. Something greater and better was coming, and it was theirs in their present existence in the form of a divine promise.

HOPE AND THE MESSIAH

The institution of kingship was requested by the Israelites as a result of their concern about the future (1 Sam. 8:3–5). In the absence of a strong hope in the Lord, humans usually attempt to take their future into their own hands. But the Lord took this institution and adjusted and incorporated it into His plan for the human race. Most of the kings of the OT decided to create their own view of the future by setting aside the divine plan for them, the hope that God had offered His people. The result was the collapse of the nation and the Babylonian Exile. But the divine ideal of kingship, according to which the king was God's servant, was embodied in the person of David, who became a symbol or a type of the future Messiah ("Anointed One"; e.g., Ezek. 34:23). He would be a descendant of Abraham through the tribe of Judah (Gen. 49:8–11; cf. Gen. 17:16; Num. 24:17), God's Son in a unique way (Ps. 2:6–8; cf. Is. 7:14), His Anointed One (Ps. 2:2; cf. Dan. 9:25–26), who would sit on the throne of David (Is. 9:6–7). Micah indicated that from Bethlehem would come the Ruler of Israel (Mic. 5:2). He would be the victorious King who would reign forever over God's people and to whom the nations of the earth would be subjected (Dan. 7:13–14). He would bring war to an end (Is. 2:4; Zech. 9:10). But this most majestic King would also be a priest who would solve the serious problem of sin. He would do this by giving His life for His people, thus effecting full and final atonement. By dying in their place, He would save them from sin and from their estrangement from God (Is. 52:13–53:12; cf. 61:1). He would be installed not only as King but also as Mediator in the eschatological sanctuary (Dan. 9:24; cf. Ex. 30:26–29).

The OT closes filled with hope. In our mind's eye, we can perhaps see God's people looking up, reaching up, straining every nerve in eager anticipation of the glorious realization of their hope in the coming messianic King.

HOPE IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

In the NT, the messianic expectations of the OT find their fulfillment: the arrival of the Seed of the woman (Matt. 1:22–23; Gal. 4:4; Rev. 12:5). Jesus was the promised messianic King (John 20:31), the sacrificial victim who died in place of sinners (2 Cor. 5:21), the High Priest prefigured in the sanctuary services now ministering for us in the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 8:1–6), and the ultimate Prophet of hope (e.g., John 14:1–4; Acts 3:19–23; cf. Deut. 18:15–19). The life, ministry, death, resurrection, and mediation of Jesus infuse human existence with unprecedented meaning and hope. The community of faith that He created was grounded on the saving message and efficacy of the cross while anticipating with great expectation the consummation of salvation at the Second Coming of the Lord. Existence in the present was understood by the church to be characterized by a longing or yearning for the real physical presence of the Lord at His advent in glory. This sense of expectation determined everything they did, and it had a direct impact on their daily lives.

PROMISE AND HOPE

As in the OT, hope now found its point of departure in the trustworthiness and reliability of God (Heb. 10:23). The fact that the salvific promises of God, recorded in the OT, have become a reality in Christ demonstrated in a unique way that God was able to deliver what He promised (Acts 26:6; 28:20). The permanent interlocking of promise and hope is determined by their common divine origin and contributes to enrich the content of each other. They both reach us through Scripture. Theologically speaking, we can suggest that before hope actualizes itself in human history, it exists in the form of a divine promise. The Scripture, as the bearer of God's promises, becomes our source of hope in the shape of a promise and links hope to our faith and confidence in God (Rom. 15:4; Gal. 5:5).

If hope grounds itself in the reliability of God's promises, then Christian hope is the most reliable hope humans can find because God, in an unparalleled way, demonstrated through the ministry, death, and resurrection of Jesus that He fulfilled His most audacious promise to us: salvation through the sacrificial death of His Son. The NT establishes a firm connection between the saving death of Jesus and the hope of His Second Coming (Titus 2:13-14). That connection provides a historical and theological foundation for Christian hope that flows from the reliability of the promises of God and the trustworthiness of His character (cf. Heb. 6:17-19). Such a hope is a gift of divine grace to those who desperately need it (2 Thess. 2:16). The absence of this hope in the human heart leaves human existence in a state of hopelessness (Eph. 2:12).

THE CERTAINTY OF HOPE

The expectation of the return of the Lord in glory, and everything that it entails, was never conceived by Christians as wishful thinking devoid of certainty or as an illusion. The Christian hope is a "living hope" in the sense that it is related to the resurrection of Jesus (1 Pet. 1:3). The linkage of hope with Jesus is so strong that hope is identified with Him. He is "our hope" (1 Tim. 1:1). The God of hope in the OT is now Jesus the Christ (the Anointed One). The implications of this aspect of hope are extremely significant and theologically rich. Hope is not something that at the present time exists only in the human mind as a dream and as an expectation. The Christian hope is a reality outside us that in the near future will irrupt with power into our time and space, radically changing the present human condition and its habitat. For now, it is in heaven (Col. 1:5), but it is there as an objective reality.

What we are saying is that what we expect, what we eagerly wait for, is already a reality in Jesus Christ. In other words, the NT provides for us a Christological understanding of hope. Our hope is embodied in the person of Christ. Perhaps a few examples will illustrate the idea.

- The Christian hope looks forward to the resurrection of the dead at the Second Coming (Acts 24:15), but the resurrection already took place in one human being, the Son of God (Acts 2:32). He came out of the tomb alive and in the process defeated the power of death. The resurrection of Jesus anticipated and assures our future resurrection (1 Thess. 4:14, 16).
- Jesus ascended to heaven, to the heavenly sanctuary, as our precursor, and we look forward to the moment when we will also ascend to heaven (Acts 1:9–11; 1 Thess. 4:17; Heb. 6:20).
- Jesus was born in union with God and never broke that union, and we look forward to the moment when our union with God will be fully manifested in the presence of our Savior (John 17:22).
- We hope for our glorification at the return of our Lord (Rom. 5:2), totally assured that it will happen because God resurrected Jesus and glorified Him (Rom. 8:17; 1 Pet. 1:21). He is now our “hope of glory” (Col. 1:27).
- Christ was installed as King of the universe, and He has promised that we will reign with Him in glory (Rev. 3:21).
- The content of the apostolic hope includes eternal life (Titus 1:2; 3:7). Although at the present time we have it by faith, the fullness of that life is hidden with Christ in God, and when Christ our Life appears, we will appear with Him in glory (Col. 3:3–4).
- We look forward to a new creation, but Jesus already introduced this new creation to those who are in Him. In the future the new creation will be revealed in power and glory (2 Cor. 5:17; 1 Pet. 1:3; 2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:1).

The content of our hope is an objective reality in Christ and in the work that He has done and is still doing for us. He is, in a very real and concrete way, our only hope (1 Tim. 1:1) and our living hope (1 Pet. 1:3). Biblical hope does not belong to the field of human dreams or wishes but is firmly grounded in the work and person of the Son of God. The cross of Christ created a new future for the human race that is ours through His work of mediation before the Father in the heavenly temple.

HOPE AND THE CHRISTIAN LIFE

Hope is by nature oriented toward the future as the place from which God will unveil it to us within our history. But this hope makes a difference in the present conditions of human existence. Biblical hope does not detach itself from the realities of the present; it boldly addresses them. It does this at a personal and collective level and in the social interaction of believers with the world at large. This idea is communicated in the NT by associating the concept of hope with other important aspects of the Christian life.

Hope, Faith, and Love

In 1 Corinthians 13:13 Paul refers to the endurance of faith, hope, and love—and love is the greatest of these. Hope is not incompatible with love and faith but coexists with both of them in the Christian life (1 Thess. 1:3). It may be right to say that the three are inseparable because, on the one hand, hope orients faith toward the future and challenges it to persevere, and on the other hand, love challenges hope to action in the present. Hope does not allow love to become so obsessed with its immediate object as to forget the consummation of salvation. But love takes the future eschatological existence, characterized by freedom from selfishness and suffering, and makes its presence felt in the here and now in selfless care for others (Heb. 6:10–11). The model for this type of life is Jesus Himself, who constantly proclaimed the coming of the kingdom of God as an eschatological expectation while at the same time caring for the poor and needy (e.g., Matt. 4:23). Elements of the eschatological expectation were made present in His ministry in order to illustrate the quality of life in God's kingdom. Like faith and hope, agape-love—a totally unselfish commitment to the service of God and others—is not natural to humans. It was poured into the human heart through the Spirit, and this assures us that our hope will not disappoint us; it will be fulfilled (Rom. 5:5).

Hope and Spiritual Growth

The expectation of the soon return of Christ conjoins hope and holiness in an unbroken bond of unity. Thus it is indicated that hope should be constantly influencing the life of believers (1 John 3:3). Hope is so deeply woven into the core of the life of believers that it sanctifies them while they are eagerly waiting for its realization. John defines this hope as the expectation of being like Jesus and seeing Him at the advent (1 John 3:2). The implication is that in order to see the Pure One, we should also be pure (Matt. 5:8). Hope impacts the present and begins, through the Spirit, to transform us into the likeness of the Son of God. We are becoming now what we will become at the end, when we will be changed (1 Cor. 15:52) and when we will see Him (1 John 3:2). Therefore the connection between hope and holiness is not only about our spiritual life but also about the ethical significance of the Christian hope (1 Thess. 5:5–8). Peter, in his discussion of the Second Coming of the Lord, refers to the importance of living holy and godly lives as we look forward to the Day of the Lord (2 Pet. 3:11). The ethical and moral lives of those who have placed their hope in Jesus reflect that of their Master. They humbly submit themselves to God's will as revealed in His law and particularly in His Son.

Hope and Perseverance

Hope also impacts the quality of our inner life, our character, by giving us consistency of action and courage to endure. Hope exists in the context of conflict and can be challenged by a hostile environment, but it is precisely in that setting that hope inspires endurance (1 Thess. 1:3). What we eagerly wait for—the return of Jesus in glory—is such a wonderful event that it moves us to be patient and to endure. The Greek word hupomonē (“endurance, perseverance”) expresses the idea of remaining faithful to the Lord, holding on to hope by resisting oppression, affliction, and temptation while waiting for His intervention (Rom. 5:3; 2 Thess. 1:4; Rev. 14:12). The strength of hope is such that it could make us immovable in our commitment to the Lord and to the hope that He has set before us (Col. 1:23). The inner strength that hope provides for believers testifies about its reality and its significance in their present pilgrimage.

Hope and Joy

If hopelessness brings with it fear and anguish, the Christian hope fills the life of believers with joy. Paul exhorts believers to exult in the hope of the glory of God (Rom. 5:2) and to live joyfully in hope (Rom. 12:12). There is an inexpressible something about the Christian hope such that when believers meditate on this hope and anticipate its fulfillment, they are filled with joy. Hope brings elements of the future into the present, and we begin to experience now the joy that will be ours when we see our Lord coming in glory. Joy in the Bible is what defines the nature of eternal life in the presence of God, and that will permanently replace suffering, sorrow, and the oppression of death (Jude 24; Rev. 19:7; 21:3–40; cf. Is. 35; Jer. 31:13). Hope looks forward to that moment and gives us a foretaste of it in the present.

Hope and Mission

The richness and beauty of the Christian hope cannot be selfishly embraced as the exclusive possession of a few. Hope is universal because the human need for it is also universal. Humans are by nature without hope in a world of sin and death (Eph. 2:12), but God in His grace wants everyone to enjoy fullness of hope. Those who have received by grace and through the work of the Spirit the hope of the consummation of eternal salvation at the advent are impelled by that hope to proclaim it to the world. They have been chosen by God to reveal the glorious riches of the mystery among the Gentiles (nations): “Christ in you, the hope of glory” (Col. 1:27). The Christian hope instills in the heart the urgency of sharing it with those who are drifting in an ocean of hopelessness. Believers are called to be constantly prepared to give a defense of the hope within us to anyone who asks (1 Pet. 3:15). But this is to be done with kindness and respect in order for hope to be winsome.

CONCLUSION

The eschatological expectation of the return of Christ in glory, promised in the OT through the prophecies of the advent of God to establish His universal kingdom, continues to enrich the lives of millions around the world who are constantly anticipating this most glorious event. This hope has radically altered their lives, filling it with meaning and transforming them into messengers of hope. For them, the constant human search for a hope that could bring healing to the human heart filled with fear and anxiety has ended. They are pilgrims of hope in whom the richness of this hope has been embodied in acts of love and kindness modeled after the One who is in fact their hope, Jesus Christ.

They eagerly wait for the moment when they will see God. The full realization of that hope begins at the moment of the advent of Christ. They anticipate the moment when the Day of the Lord, announced by the prophets of the OT, will irrupt into our time and space with unparalleled majesty and glory. Then they will see their Savior and Lord dressed in the majesty of His divinity (Matt. 16:27; 24:30). The event will be of a global nature, filling every segment of our space with the glory of the presence of the Son of God (Rev. 1:7). He will come in judgment against the forces of evil that denied the value of the hope, and they will be forced to witness its realization (Rev. 6:15–17). But He also will come to consummate the redemption He accomplished on the cross of Calvary (Heb. 9:28). He will descend accompanied by the angelic host and by the powerful sound of the trumpet, calling to life those who went into the darkness of the tomb firmly holding on to the blessed hope (1 Thess. 4:14–17). His people will be transformed by the power of His presence and will be permanently removed from the sphere of death and suffering (1 Cor. 15:51–55; Rev. 21:4–5). The universal gathering will occur, and they will be reunited with the risen Lord to be with Him and their loved ones through eternal ages (Matt. 24:30–31; John 14:1–3; 1 Thess. 4:17). We can only continue to anticipate with great expectation and joy what such a life will be like.

REVELATION AND INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE

God communicates with His created beings through speech. Immediately after He is first introduced to us in the Scriptures, we hear His voice freely expressing Himself through the spoken word. God's speech or word reveals His inner thoughts, plans, attitudes, feelings, and emotions. God created humans in His own image and endowed them with the ability to speak and therefore to engage Him in dialogue using their own language skills. Speech is the primary means of communication among humans and contributes to the actualization of their social nature. The God who speaks is a social being, the Creator, who wants to be known.

The doctrine of revelation and inspiration is an exposition of the way God has made Himself known to His creatures. With respect to the Scriptures, revelation has been traditionally understood as the process by which God, through the Holy Spirit, reaches the minds of some individuals, called prophets, and mysteriously shares with them a specific message. Inspiration is usually understood as the work of the prophet in sharing with others that revelation through the spoken or written word.

GENERAL AND SPECIAL REVELATION

Theologians distinguish between a special revelation, preserved in the Holy Scriptures, and a general revelation of God outside the Bible, accessible to all but limited in scope. The distinction is important in that it shows that God wants to be known and is constantly doing what He can to achieve His purpose. He does not want to be the unknown God.

General Revelation

General revelation assumes that God uses other avenues in addition to the spoken word to reveal Himself. He reaches out to humans wherever they happen to be, in and through different means, but particularly through His actions. Probably the most impressive activity of God, apart from the act of redemption, is His work of creation. Only the most powerful, intelligent, and wise God could have brought into existence the majestic cosmos that we are barely beginning to understand. His creation is a vehicle through which He reveals to human beings His glory (Ps. 19:1), His wisdom (Prov. 3:19), and His eternal power and divine attributes (Rom. 1:20). This divine revelation is accessible to all who are willing to listen to its testimony. But due to its present damaged condition, creation cannot display the full expression of the loving character of God and His identity.

God also reveals Himself to humans through their intuitive awareness of the divine. This awareness is sometimes suppressed by the fall of humans from the divine ideal (Gen. 3), but it remains there reminding us that our very life is a witness to the existence of a divine being. Belief in God or some supernatural being is a universal phenomenon. We are by nature religious beings seeking to satisfy our need for God in different ways, and this need is evident even in the denial of Him. We still have a vague sense of what is good, even if we ultimately embrace what is wrong. The inner voice of our very nature tells us about God in spite of humanity's attempts to silence it through philosophical arguments and so-called scientific facts. This revelation of God is also general in that it does not reveal the full nature and works of God.

History could also be considered a means of divine, general revelation in the sense that humans may be able to detect in it God's activity on their behalf. Divine providence is perceptible to humans as they analyze their experiences in life. It is God who provides rain to both the righteous and unrighteous (Matt. 5:45), and He provides life, breath, and providential interaction for the purpose of drawing people to seek Him in return (Acts 17:25–27). God continues to be active in human affairs, and we continue to benefit from His work within history and experience.

General revelation is limited in its content, and because of the damaging presence of evil in the world, it may be misunderstood or even totally ignored. By itself it does not have salvific power. Consequently, the Lord provided for His people a special revelation through which He revealed His character and His purposes to the human race.

Special Revelation

God's special revelation was given to humans through prophets and apostles but reached its ultimate expression in the incarnation of the Son of God. It has been preserved for the human race in the Holy Scriptures. God revealed Himself to prophets and apostles in various ways (Heb. 1:1). At times He spoke to them in dreams, as was the case of Solomon while in Gibeon (1 Kin. 3:5), and also through visions while the prophets were awake, causing them to see what no one else could see (Gen. 15:1; Dan. 8:1; cf. Num. 12:6). In some cases God appeared to His prophets and spoke to them (theophanies; Gen. 17:1; Ex. 3:2–4). Quite often He simply spoke to them and they heard His voice or the voice of His messenger (auditions; e.g., Gen. 22:1). Through these means God shared with the prophets certain information that was meaningful to them and to their audiences. Revelation is not only an encounter with God but also an encounter in which God provides information in the form of promises and judgments that reveal Himself and His plan for the salvation of humanity. The information was to be shared with God's people through oral messages delivered in private or public settings.

The most important revelation of God was made available to humans when God became a human being and lived among us (John 1:14). Christ became the new expression of God's word in a unique modality—in human form. God's self-revelation to the prophets was limited to what the prophets could receive from Him. In God's Son we have God Himself speaking to us. The Son did not bring to us a revelation from God; He was God's most sublime revelation of Himself. In the final analysis, only God is able to tell us who He is, and He did it through the incarnated Word. In Him we come to understand the past, the present, and the future of humanity. In Him we see a loving God who created and then redeemed us at a very high cost to Himself—a sacrificial death. It is through the love revealed to us through the death of the Son that the sin problem, the cosmic conflict itself, will find ultimate and final closure.

The revelation of God to the prophets pointed forward to Christ, and the revelation to the apostles pointed back to Him. The body of that revelation has been preserved for us in written form, the Holy Scriptures. It is the most reliable revelation of God that we have, and consequently, it is good for us to listen to it. Through the power of the Holy Spirit, the written word is still alive, and through it God continues to speak to us with power and conviction in order to make Himself known to us and to invite us to choose Him in the context of a cosmic conflict.

SELF-TESTIMONY OF THE BIBLE

The Bible itself speaks about its origin and nature, and we should seek to understand this information as much as possible. Two of the most important passages that discuss the nature of biblical inspiration are 2 Timothy 3:16–17 and 2 Peter 1:19–21. We should examine these two passages and others as we proceed to understand the biblical teaching about revelation and inspiration.

Revelation and Inspiration: Definitions

It may surprise some to realize that, strictly speaking, the Bible does not separate revelation and inspiration—the reception of the message (revelation) and the moment the prophet embodies it in language to deliver it in oral form or to preserve it in written form (inspiration). The act of revelation includes within itself the activity of the human mind in the embodiment of it in words. Peter states that prophecy—a term he uses to emphasize that the Scriptures were written by prophets—comes from God and continues to be under the guidance of God when the prophets share it with others (2 Pet. 1). This does not mean that we should use only one word (i.e., either “revelation” or “inspiration”) when dealing with the topic. It is indeed good to distinguish between revelation and inspiration to facilitate the analysis and discussion of the theme, but we should always be aware of the fact that they are in reality inseparable. Perhaps it would be better to speak about the divine process of revelation-inspiration.

Origin: God

The Scriptures clearly identify God as the originator of the content of biblical revelation. Peter makes it clear that the Scriptures are not the results of human will; that is to say, they do not originate as an impulse or even an intuition of the human mind, but they come from God (2 Pet. 1:21). Paul establishes this point as well in 2 Timothy 3:16. The significant term used here is the Greek theopneustos (“God-breathed,” from theos [“God”] and pneo [“to breathe”]). What does “God-breathed” mean? No one knows what it specifically designates, but we can comment on its metaphorical meaning, which in fact sheds very little light on the revelation-inspiration process. The term reminds us of the activity of God during the creation of humans and the cosmos. It was through the breath of God that Adam became a living being (Gen. 2:7) and all the hosts of heaven were formed (Ps. 33:6). Metaphorically speaking, Paul seems to be using the term “God-breathed” to articulate the conviction that the Scriptures are the result of God’s creative power. The creative power God employed when creating the world is the same power He used in the creation of the Scriptures. This is a unique way of stating that the Scriptures originated or came into being through divine activity. God is their ultimate author.

The conviction that the Bible is the “word of God” is found throughout its pages. The prophets testified that the word of the Lord came to them (e.g., Jer. 1:11–13; Joel 1:1; Mic. 1:1), and at times they introduced or concluded their messages by stating that the Lord had spoken (Is. 7:7; Amos 1:3; Hag. 1:7). We also find them calling people to hear the word of the Lord (e.g., Ezek. 6:3; Amos 3:1). The prophets understood that the very source of what they were communicating to the people and their leaders was God, and it was not the result of their religious, social, or political preferences. The Lord Himself stated that He would punish anyone who would not listen to (i.e., obey) His words that would be spoken in His name by the Prophet (i.e., Christ) who was like Moses (Deut. 18:18–19; Acts 3:22; Heb. 3:2). The word comes from the Lord and is authoritative, and the prophet communicates it to others on behalf of the Lord.

We find in the NT the same emphasis on the divine origin of the revelation that the apostles communicated to others. The “word” is now the teachings of Jesus (Mark 4:33; John 5:24; 8:31) and the person of Jesus, who is “the Word of God” (Rev. 19:13). The word of Jesus is as authoritative as the OT (John 2:22). He told the Jewish leaders that they could not listen to Him or understand Him because He was from God and they were not (John 8:43, 47). The word of Jesus is then summarized in the message of the gospel of salvation (Acts 15:7) that Jesus brought to the human race and that was to be proclaimed by the church (Acts 10:36–43). His teachings and His own person are the revelation of God to humanity. Paul, who was not at first one of the disciples of Jesus, received the gospel through a revelation from God (Gal. 1:12–13). In fact, it would be proper to say that all of the apostles received the gospel as a revelation coming from the incarnated God, Jesus Christ.

Extent of the Inspired Scriptures

Paul states that all Scripture is God-breathed and inspired (2 Tim. 3:16). Most probably the primary reference of the phrase “all Scripture” is to the totality of the Scriptures that form the OT (cf. 1 Tim. 5:18). All of it originated from God and was given to the prophets under divine inspiration. Paul’s statement means that in the content of the Bible, there is no gradation or hierarchy of inspiration, with some documents being less inspired than others; they are all inspired by God. It also demonstrates that any attempt to search the Scriptures in order to identify what is inspired and what is not is to search in vain. In that sense, the biblical understanding of inspiration is plenary—it applies to everything in the Bible. Humans are not to identify what is inspired in the Bible because the Lord explicitly stated that all of it is inspired.

The claim that “all Scripture” is inspired by God also applies to the writings of the apostles preserved in the NT. What they taught was what the Lord had commanded them to teach (1 Cor. 14:37). As apostles, their exposition of the gospel was an inspired oral or written expression of it, and consequently, it was authoritative (cf. 2 Thess. 2:15). The Spirit of the Lord was operative in their experience as they wrote the Gospels and the letters of the NT, and as apostles they were aware of this phenomenon. Paul wrote to the Thessalonians that they had accepted and believed the message that they had heard from the apostles not as a merely human word but as the word of God (1 Thess. 2:13; cf. 1 Cor. 2:12–13; 14:37). Like the prophets of the OT, they proclaimed to the people the word of God. We also find the explicit statement that the apostles proclaimed the gospel “by the Holy Spirit” (1 Pet. 1:12). Peter himself considered the writings of Paul to belong to the inspired Scriptures (2 Pet. 3:16). This should not surprise us for, as we saw, the apostles received their message from the Lord through divine revelation. This idea is clearly expressed by John when he writes that he received the content of the book of Revelation through a revelation from God through Jesus Christ (Rev. 1:1–2).

The Human Element

The process of revelation-inspiration includes the involvement of humans chosen by God, as Peter indicates (2 Pet. 1:21). The prophets and prophetesses received the messages from the Lord and then, still under the guidance of the Spirit, communicated to others the content of the revelation in a trustworthy way. The implication is that in the production of the Scriptures we find the human and the divine working together. However, the content of Scripture did not originate with humans. They were the spokespersons of God, and as such they embodied the content of the revelation in their language and expressions. God guided them in using their literary skills and linguistic expertise as they were wording the revelation received. Thus, they spoke in their own language as God’s representatives and were not simply His public address system. God did not override their individuality through mystical experience.

The presence of the human element in the revelation-inspiration process is demonstrable in several ways. In the OT, the prophets wrote in Hebrew or in Aramaic because these were the languages they and their audiences knew. Some of them were excellent storytellers, and the Lord used their skills to preserve His message in the form of biblical historical narratives. He also gave messages to prophets and used them to write down the revelation in poetic form or as proverbs and other types of sayings. There were prophets skilled in the composition of psalms, and God used them to write the psalms now preserved in the Holy Scriptures. The writing style of the prophets is identifiable through the study of their books.

In the NT, the Lord used the Greek language to preserve in written form the messages He gave to the apostles, and their writings show their knowledge of Greek grammar, syntax, and vocabulary. The presence of four Gospels in the NT, each one written from a particular point of view and style, shows the human element in the revelation and inspiration process. One Gospel could not contain the fullness of the revelation brought to us by Jesus. Many of the epistles of the NT reveal the excellent rhetorical skills of the apostles, while others are less elegant and complex. One of the obvious conclusions that we can derive from this discussion is that God did not dictate to the prophets and the apostles the content of Scripture, except when He instructed them to quote Him directly. We will return to this topic later.

REVELATION-INSPIRATION AND THE EXPERIENCE OF THE PROPHET

The revelation-inspiration process is fundamentally a mystery not totally revealed to us, but there are some aspects of it that we can and should seek to understand based on the study of the Bible. As we approach the Scriptures we find different ways in which God communicated with the prophets and apostles.

Modes of Divine Revelation-Inspiration

The first way, which we have already mentioned, is a direct communication from God through dreams, visions, auditions, and theophanies. In most of these cases God directly accessed the minds of the prophets and shared with them some specific information. In such cases, the supernatural element of the revelation-inspiration process is at the forefront of the experience of the prophet. Among believers this is the most common understanding of the way God communicated with the prophets during the revelation-inspiration process. The experience of the prophets was a deeply emotional one throughout the whole process. Even at the moment of the call, it was common for them to feel unworthy of the call (Jer. 1:4–10) or even threatened by the majesty of God (Is. 6:5). At times the revelation from God overwhelmed them (e.g., Ezek. 3:15) and emotions came to expression in bodily reactions: John fell as though dead (Rev. 1:17) and wept (Rev. 5:4); Daniel was terrified and fell prostrate on his face (Dan. 8:17). There were also strong emotional experiences when delivering the message to the person or to the people. The indifference of the people to the message was painful to the prophets, who knew very well what the future would bring to the people (e.g., Jer. 4:19; Hab. 3:16). In a sense, part of the call of the prophet was an invitation to feel emotions analogous to those that God experiences as He views the experience and the reaction of humans to His message of judgment and salvation.

The second way God revealed His message to the prophets and apostles was through research. He impressed in their minds the need to collect historical information and to organize it in certain ways in order for Him to communicate a specific message to His people. Because this information was available to them, the Lord guided them in finding and using it. The best example of this phenomenon is found in Luke 1:1–4, where Luke describes in detail the reason why he wrote his Gospel. There are several important details in these verses that deserve brief attention. First, others before Luke wrote on the ministry and teachings of Jesus. This means that from very early in the apostolic church there was a serious interest in preserving the teachings and narrative of the life of Jesus for future generations. Second, Luke mentions that there were eyewitnesses who preserved in some form (orally or in written form) aspects of the story of Jesus. Third, Luke seems to have benefitted in his writing from what others had written and from the testimony and teachings of eyewitnesses.

Luke did his research to the best of his abilities under the guidance of the Spirit. We can without any hesitation apply to the experience of Luke what Peter said about prophets: Luke was a holy man of God who spoke/wrote as he was led by the Holy Spirit (2 Pet. 1:21). The revelation-inspiration process is from beginning to end the result of the activity of the Spirit as He works through the person of the prophets. In the case of Luke we have evidence from the NT that he carefully copied down the words of Jesus, preserving them for future generations in his own Gospel. This can be seen not only in the way he appears to have carefully incorporated material from Mark's and Matthew's earlier Gospels into his own, but also in his use of other sayings of Jesus in circulation at the time (e.g., 1 Cor. 11:24–25). Paul recounts one of these early sayings of Jesus along with an OT quotation (Deut. 25:4) in 1 Timothy 5:18. The quotation of Jesus was recorded by Luke (Luke 10:7). Since it is unlikely that Luke's Gospel existed at this early stage in the history of the church, this indicates Luke's careful use of sayings of Jesus that were known among early Christians, as indicated by Paul in this letter to Timothy. This passage also reveals that Christians placed the same level of authority on the words of Jesus as they did on the OT.

The third way God revealed His message to the prophets was by leading them in the selection of material already available to them that was then incorporated in their inspired writings. A few examples may suffice. In Proverbs we find a small collection of proverbs written by Agur, who was probably a non-Israelite (Prov. 30:1–33). The whole of Proverbs 31, or at least vv. 1–9, was written by the mother of King Lemuel, a non-Israelite king. Were these persons inspired by the Lord when composing the proverbs? Collections of proverbs similar to the ones we find in the biblical books were very common throughout the ANE and Egypt and there is evidence indicating that the biblical writers may have copied from some of them. Although we do not consider the original authors to have been inspired by God, we can ascertain that the biblical writers were moved by the Spirit to select and incorporate these writings into their inspired collection of proverbs. Thus the Spirit guided the prophet in the selection of proverbs from outside Israel that summarized concepts compatible with the will of God for His people. In such cases, revelation and inspiration are inseparable and consist of a process of selection of materials done under the direct influence of the Spirit.

The Scripture as the End Product

The end product of revelation-inspiration is the written word of God. It is during this process that the human element is most active. What went on within the person of the prophets as the Lord communicated with them and during the preservation of that revelation in written form has been a matter of discussion among Bible students. There are two extreme views. The first view is usually called the dictation theory of inspiration. According to it, God to a large extent dictated His message to the prophets and they wrote it down. Therefore, the Scripture is in a very literal form the word of God. We argue that this is not the case because, as mentioned above, the biblical books show the distinct writing abilities and styles of their authors.

The second view on revelation-inspiration is called encounter revelation, and it is the prevailing view among liberal scholars. It teaches that when the Lord approached the prophets, they experienced His presence in a deep and personal way. This experience was so sublime that the revelation itself was an encounter with God that transcended words. Therefore, God did not reveal to the prophets anything except Himself. There was no exchange of information about who He was or about His will and plans for His people. In other words, there is nothing in the Scriptures that comes to us from God. What we have in the Bible is the feeble attempt of the prophets to explain to us what the experience they had with God meant to them in their own cultural context. Therefore the content of the Scriptures is culturally determined and conditioned. It is a book like any other book. This also is not a satisfactory understanding. We have shown above that God's revelation to His prophets was cognitive; that is to say, during the divine-human encounter God spoke to the prophets and gave them a body of knowledge about Him, His will, and His plans for the human race. The end product of the revelation-inspiration process is called in the Bible the "word of God" or "the word of truth" (2 Tim. 2:15).

Since God shared information with the prophets, it is proper to conclude that in the revelation-inspiration process God accessed their minds and placed there the thoughts, concepts, or ideas that He wanted them to communicate to His people. This was an act of divine condescension in that God's thoughts were being adapted to the human way of thinking and speaking in order to make them intelligible to His creatures. The Infinite Mind was contacting and communicating with a finite mind. As we have shown above, in the revelation-inspiration process the prophets embodied the divine thoughts in human words, using their own words. Since Peter indicates that the prophets spoke as they were led by the Spirit (2 Pet. 1:21), we conclude that He continued to accompany and guide them as they incarnated the divine message in human words. God was interested in preserving the integrity and trustworthiness of the message He gave to the prophets. There are some cases in the Bible where, after the prophets received a message from the Lord, He asked them, "What do you see?" (i.e., He asked them to tell what they saw using their own words). And after they summarized what they saw, the Lord responded that they had seen accurately (Jer. 1:11–12). In such instances, God was verifying that the divine message that the prophets were to pass on to others in human words would be trustworthy. The words of the prophet became the word of God.

Working under the biblical assumptions that God did not dictate His message to the prophets and that He did not abandon them when they wrote it down, we can affirm that the guidance of the Spirit assisted the prophets in using their language skills, spoken or written, to the best of their abilities. Since the words were those of the prophets, we cannot affirm that the words were inspired, but we can affirm that the message from God, expressed through their words, was passed on to others in a trustworthy and reliable form. This was possible because they spoke through the guidance of the Holy Spirit (2 Pet. 1:21).

The special connection between God, the Spirit, and the prophets should not be interpreted to mean that a prophet reached a state of divine perfection in the reception and preservation of the messages from God. We have cases in the Bible where a prophet received a revelation from God but did not understand it. In the case of Daniel, the Lord sent an angel to explain to him a prophecy that he did not understand (Dan. 8:27; 9:22). Peter was confused as a result of a vision he had (Acts 10:17), but he gained a clear understanding during the three days that it took him to get to the house of Cornelius (Acts 10:19, 28). In this case, an angel was not sent to explain the vision to him. Since the prophets remained human beings, it should not surprise us to find in the Bible some minor and inconsequential discrepancies. Their inconsequential nature does not undermine the trustworthiness of the Bible. The Scriptures continue to be the inspired word of God and the infallible revelation of His will.

PURPOSE OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES

The revelation of God preserved in the Holy Scriptures unveils to its readers a drama of love and sacrifice of cosmic dimensions. The drama is about the Creator God, who was unwilling to abandon His creatures to themselves in spite of their rebellion against Him. From among the heavenly beings created by God, a cherub rebelled against a loving Creator and charged Him with selfishness and arbitrariness in the administration of the universe (Gen. 3:1–5; Job 1:9–11; Is. 14:13–15; Ezek. 28:13–19). The conflict in heaven was so intense that rebellious angels had to be cast out from the presence of God to pursue their own selfish interests (Rev. 12:7–10). When humans joined the rebellion (Gen. 3:6–13), God out of His grace offered them the possibility of returning to an alliance with Him (3:15).

Other parts of the Scriptures are about the cosmic conflict as it has played out within human history, in which every person is a participant. In the Scriptures we find a cosmic disclosure of the true character of God and His final victory over the forces of evil. Beginning with Genesis, God introduces in human history the hope of a coming Redeemer who will demonstrate to the cosmos that the charges of the fallen cherub were totally unfounded. Divine love, grace, and mercy were constantly manifested in the lives of the patriarchs and in God's dealing with Israel and the nations of the world in the midst of a conflict that threatened the spiritual life of God's people and even their own existence. The prophets proclaimed to the people the coming of the Redeemer, who would give His life for God's people by dying as a sacrificial victim for them (e.g., Is. 52:12—53:12).

The ministry and person of the Son of God, who became human in order to manifest to the cosmos the deepness and unfathomable nature of the love of God (John 1:14; 3:16), represents the center of the Scriptures. In Him the prophetic proclamation found its fulfillment. He became human and offered His life as an unblemished sacrifice for sinners (1 Pet. 1:19). He took on Himself what was theirs in order for them to receive as a gift of grace what was His (2 Cor. 5:21; 8:9). The cross of Christ displayed the inscrutable nature of His loving character in an unparalleled way, thus unmasking the evilness of all rebellious powers in the universe. The sacrificial love of God took Him to the realm of death, to a dark tomb, from which He came out alive!

It is part of the function of the Bible to tell us that during the Christian era the conflict will still go on but that the consummation of the salvation brought to us through Christ will result in the final extermination of evil powers (Rev. 13:1–8). It also tells us that God is willing to use human beings who join in the proclamation of God's redeeming love to the world manifested on the cross of Christ (Matt. 28:10–20). These are individuals who were transformed by the power of the Spirit of the Lord and now manifest in their own lives the love of God in selfless service to others. They constitute the church of Christ. The church will suffer while on earth, and toward the end the conflict will intensify (Rev. 13:13–18), but the victory belongs to Christ and His faithful people (17:14). The ultimate resolution of the cosmic conflict will occur when every creature in the universe unites in acknowledging the goodness of God and praising His loving character (Phil. 2:11; Rev. 15:3–4).

It is the purpose of the Scriptures to announce the coming of a new world free from suffering, death, and the presence of evil, where God's redeemed will rejoice forever (Is. 35:10; Rev. 21:1–4). The focus of the Bible is on the sacrificial death of the Son of God, through whom all of this was made possible. Since the most fundamental purpose of the Scriptures is to introduce us to such a loving God, manifested in the person and ministry of His Son, we should indeed study the word of God to come to know Him better and to be transformed into His likeness.

FORMATION OF THE BIBLICAL CANON

The work of the Spirit of the Lord in the edification of God's people did not end with the revelation of God's message through the prophets and its communication in oral or written form. The preservation of that revelation for future generations was as important as the revelation itself in that it kept alive the divine plan for humanity in the form of a messianic hope of cosmic proportions. The most effective way of transmitting God's message to other generations throughout the ages has been by faithful copying and recopying of God's revealed word. Many books were written during both the OT and NT times, but not all of them became part of the biblical canon. What made the biblical books unique, and what forces set them apart to constitute them into the Holy Scriptures?

The history of the formation of the biblical canon is complex and difficult, and at times it distracts the researcher from what is probably the most important and perhaps obvious aspect of the canon, namely, its gratuitous nature. It was from the very first steps—from the moment when the divine word reached the first prophet—a gift from God to His people and through them, particularly through the Messiah, to the world. It is a gift in which the gift and the Giver are inseparable.

THE CANON OF SCRIPTURE

We will provide an introduction to the topic of the biblical canon that will highlight some of the most important biblical and historical evidence used to trace its history. While it would be impossible, within the confines of this introduction, to elaborate in a detailed manner on most of the information provided, the general contours of the formation of the canon should be clear to the reader.

Definitions and Concepts

The English word canon is derived from the Greek noun kanōn, meaning “reed,” “measuring rod,” or “rule.” It is a loan word from the Hebrew noun qaneh, which also means “reed,” “rod,” or “measuring unit” (see 1 Kin. 14:15; Job 40:21). The term designates a standard to be followed when measuring, leading to the meaning of a rule or guide. The term kanōn was well known and utilized in Hellenistic Greek. In fact, the ancient world was full of “canons” that guided different aspects of human activity. In Galatians 6:16, Paul utilizes the term in the sense of a measure of Christian conduct that can be verified. However, in Scripture it does not designate the biblical canon itself. The term kanōn was used in a variety of ways in the earliest days of Christianity. Around A.D. 96, Clement of Rome used it in reference to the Christian “tradition.” Nearly a century later, Clement of Alexandria (ca. 150–215) referred to the canon of faith. It was not until the middle of the fourth century and onward that kanōn was used to designate the collection of sacred writings of both the OT and the NT.

The biblical canon is recognized by Christians to be authoritative for the church in terms of faith, practice, and mission. What constituted these books into a collection of authoritative books, a canon? The biblical answer is surprisingly simple but most effective: the books that now constitute the canon were considered authoritative by the community of believers (Israel and the Christian church) because of their divine origin. Their authority is deeply grounded in their nature as a gift from God that reaches us through divine revelation and inspiration. The self-authentication of these books is affirmed in both the OT and the NT. Consequently, their authority rests not upon the alleged fact that some person or group of individuals included them in the canon but upon the fact that they were recognized by their religious community as having authority because of their divine origin; that is, their gratuitous nature. It was as a result of that conviction that the books were preserved in the canon. The books were recognized as canonical and holy because of their intrinsic nature, not merely because they were declared to be such.

HISTORY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT CANON

The Biblical Evidence

The concept of a canon has its roots in the Bible itself. The OT provides valuable information concerning the existence of authoritative written documents that were recognized as coming from the Lord through His prophets. We begin at Mount Sinai, where God first gave His covenant instructions to His people audibly (Ex. 19:1–20:21). Afterward, Moses was specifically commanded to write down all of these principles, which provided a written narrative framework for them (cf. Ex. 17:14; 24:3–4; Num. 33:2). It was written in the book of the covenant and read to the people, who responded by affirming that they would obey everything the Lord had commanded (Ex. 24:7). Here we have the indispensable elements of a religious authoritative document: God spoke (divine origin), the revelation was preserved in written form (the book of the covenant), and the people acknowledged the authority of the document and promised to order their lives on the basis of its content. The written word was to be read on a regular basis to the people so that they would obey all the words of the law (Deut. 31:12).

The canonical authority of the law and Moses’s instructions, as preserved in the Pentateuch, are recognized again and again throughout the OT, beginning with Joshua (Josh. 1:8), as well as in Judges (Judg. 1:20), the book of Kings (1 Kin. 2:3; 2 Kin. 14:6; 23:3), and others (2 Chr. 25:4; 34:32; 35:12; Ezra 3:2; 6:18; Neh. 8:1, 14; Dan. 9:11, 13; Mal. 4:4). The Pentateuch is foundational for the rest of the OT (see “Introduction to the Pentateuch,” p. 120). A particularly interesting case is found in Nehemiah 8:9, in which Ezra read the law to the exiles who had returned from Babylon to Jerusalem, showing that its authority was recognized by all. The covenant relationship between God and His people was determined by their adherence to the word of the Lord preserved in written form. This collection was considered to be not of human origin but based on God's self-revelation.

Some scholars have noted that many of the books of the OT are interconnected, and have pointed to their essential unity. This is particularly true with the Pentateuch, which clearly connects Genesis and Exodus as the continuation of the same narrative. Exodus concludes with the construction of the sanctuary and God taking residence inside it, and Leviticus begins with God speaking to Moses from the tabernacle. After the covenant law is given and the sanctuary with its services is established, Numbers continues the narrative from Sinai to the promised land. Deuteronomy recapitulates the experiences of Israel in the wilderness, emphasizing the need for Israel to obey the covenant law in Canaan and concluding with the death of Moses. It is most logical to conclude that the connections between these books are the work of the author of the Pentateuch and serve to indicate that in this collection of books the readers found an authoritative revelation of God for them.

The book of Joshua is directly related to Deuteronomy by reporting the death of Moses and the new role of Joshua (Deut. 34:1–11), whose leadership is portrayed in the book that bears his name. In fact, Joshua is directly linked to Genesis and Exodus by referring to the bones of Joseph (Josh. 24:32), mentioned for the first time in Genesis 50:24–26 (cf. Ex. 13:19). Judges begins with a reference to the death of Joshua (Judg. 1:1), narrated in Joshua 24:29. While Joshua concludes by summarizing the faithfulness of the people during the time of Joshua and the elders who followed him (Josh. 24:31), Judges begins by affirming the faithfulness of the people (Judg. 1:1–26), followed by their spiritually unstable relationship with the Lord during the time of the Judges. Ruth is connected to the book of Judges by the very first phrase of the book: "In the days when the judges ruled" (Ruth 1:1). It closes with a genealogy that introduces David (Ruth 4:16–22), thus preparing the way for the monarchy and the important role of David in the book of Samuel. The book of Kings is an obvious continuation of the history of the monarchy, beginning with the ascension of Solomon and concluding with the fall and captivity of Judah during the Exile. The book of Chronicles retells or recapitulates the story of the monarchy from a particular God-centered perspective and connects it to universal history by taking the reader back to Genesis and the creation of Adam—an excellent way of closing the canon. It concludes with a reference to the work of Cyrus on behalf of God's people, as announced by Isaiah (Isa. 44:28). The book of Ezra begins the way 2 Chronicles closes, with a reference to Cyrus (2 Chron. 36:22; Ezra 1:1) and the people returning from exile. Esther provides a door of access to the life in exile and God's care for His people.

When we examine the prophetic books, we find them deeply connected to the history of God's people. In their introductions practically all of the authors relate their ministry to specific kings in Israel and Judah. The books are all part of the overarching story that finds its beginning in the Pentateuch. The prophets received revelations from God for His people within very specific historical moments. Some of them were acquainted with the ministry of other prophets and acknowledged their authority (e.g., Is. 8:16–20; 34:16; Jer. 26:17–18; 28:8–9; Dan. 9:2; cf. 2 Chr. 20:20).

Everything in the OT is related to that overarching story. For instance, the book of Proverbs is connected to Solomon and Hezekiah; Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs are also connected to Solomon. The biblical canon places these books within the history of God's people at a particular point. Even Job is connected to the patriarchal period. The book of Psalms is inseparable from the temple, and many of the psalms are connected to the experiences of different individuals in Israel, particularly David. The book itself groups the psalms in thematic blocks related to the history of God's people (see Psalms: Introduction).

What we find in the OT is a collection of books that are deeply interconnected, not only to each other but particularly to the Pentateuch, and that tell a history of the interaction of God and His people. It is not just history, but history narrated from the perspective of God revealed to and written by His prophets. It is an authoritative narrative that reveals the disastrous results of the violation of God's covenant law, embedded at the same time in a glorious messianic promise of hope. Who put this divine narrative together? It could be argued that later editors put it together, but the biblical evidence, if taken seriously, points in a different direction. The interlocking of the books is the result of the authors themselves who, under divine inspiration, were guiding God's people from beginning to end and moving from one historical moment to the next, thus affirming God's constant presence among His people. Who put the books together as a collection to constitute them into one canon?

Historical Evidence

As we close the OT, we are left with a large number of books recognized by God's people as authoritative because they contain a revelation from God. It could be that before the Exile some people may have had questions about the prophetic ministry of some of the prophets (e.g., Jeremiah), but after the Exile, seeing all their prophecies fulfilled, there was no room left for any further doubts. We do not know the specific order in which all these books were organized—for example, the place of the wisdom books within the collection. For this, we look for extrabiblical information.

The earliest datable extrabiblical reference pointing to a particular order of books is found in the prologue of the apocryphal book of Jesus Ben Sirach (Ecclesiasticus; ca. 195 B.C.). His grandson translated it from Hebrew into Greek (ca. 132 B.C.) and added to it a prologue in which he mentions three times the three main parts of the OT books: the Law, the Prophets, and the rest of the books of the fathers. In other words, it appears to point to a threefold division of the OT. The "Law" would be the Pentateuch, the "Prophets" most probably the historical and prophetic books, and the other books would designate the rest of the OT. What is particularly important in this case is that Ben Sirach is not defining the order or the content of the canon for the first time but using what was apparently well known. A similar collection, although perhaps more controversial, is mentioned in 2 Maccabees 2:13–15 (ca. 104–63 B.C.).

Evidence coming from the Dead Sea Scrolls found in Qumran is very informative and important. First, complete scrolls and fragments of all the books in the Hebrew canon, except Esther, were found there (although Esther is quoted in other Dead Sea Scrolls). This is significant since the majority of the scrolls are dated between the third century B.C. and A.D. 73. Therefore, virtually all books generally connected to the Jewish canon of the OT already existed as copies in the second to first centuries B.C., and commentaries had been written on some of them, confirming their authority. Second, the Qumran library contained many other books, but the evidence indicates that those books did not have the same authority as those that constitute the canon. Third, the Qumran community seems to have been familiar with the threefold division that was mentioned in the prologue of Ben Sirach in the second century B.C., called the books of Moses and the books of the prophets and David. This same classification is found in Luke 24:44 and implied in Matthew 23:35 (see also Luke 11:51).

Mention should be made of Philo (20 B.C.–A.D. 40), an Alexandrian Jew who sought to show the superiority of Jewish thinking over Hellenistic thinking. He mentions the laws, the oracles given by the prophets, the Psalms, and other books that, according to him, were useful for knowledge and piety. The last group of books refers probably to those outside the canon. In Philo, the Psalms refers not exclusively to the book of Psalms but to a collection that included at least Proverbs and Job, which he quotes as Scripture (e.g., “as the Holy Word says”).

Josephus (A.D. 37–100), a Jewish historian, knew about the threefold division of the OT and was the first to provide a fixed number of books of the OT collection. He identifies a total of twenty-two books constituted by the five books of Moses (the Law), the thirteen books of the Prophets, and four books of Hymns and Precepts for the conduct of life. Josephus considered this collection to be a closed list of books to which nothing was to be added. He did not identify the books by name under each category, but it could easily correspond to the list we have today when we remember that some of the books at that time were combinations of books that we have today: Law—Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy (five); the Prophets—Joshua, Judges-Ruth, 1–2 Samuel, 1–2 Kings, 1–2 Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah, Esther, Job, Isaiah, Jeremiah-Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, the book of the Minor Prophets (thirteen); Hymns and Precepts—Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs (four). Josephus’s quotations from the OT in his writings seem to support this list of specific books. The list of the twenty-two books was known to Christian writers such as Origen (A.D. 185–254) and Jerome (A.D. 347–419). Other Jewish sources mention twenty-four books, instead of twenty-two, probably by counting Ruth and Lamentations as separate books; this number became the traditional number of the books in the Hebrew Bible.

The apocryphal book of 2 Esdras, written around A.D. 100, mentions that the OT contains twenty-four books, plus another seventy hidden books (the writer distinguishes between the two numbers). Melito, bishop of Sardis (ca. A.D. 170), published a list of books belonging to the OT that includes all the books in the modern canon, except possibly Esther.

Originally the books were written on independent scrolls, but once the codex (the precursor of modern bound books) was invented and became the standard format of writing (ca. A.D. 300), it was easier to arrange them in a fixed order. Today the Hebrew Bible organizes the books in a threefold order as follows:

Law (Heb. torah )	Prophets (Heb. nebi'im )	Writings (Heb. ketubim )
Genesis	Joshua	Psalms
Exodus	Judges	Proverbs
Leviticus	1–2 Samuel	Job
Numbers	1–2 Kings	Song of Songs
Deuteronomy	Isaiah	Ruth
	Jeremiah	Lamentations
	Ezekiel	Ecclesiastes
	The Twelve Prophets	Esther
	(Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah,	Daniel
	Jonah, Micah, Nahum,	Ezra-Nehemiah
	Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai,	1–2 Chronicles
	Zechariah, Malachi)

In this arrangement the canon begins with Genesis and concludes with 1–2 Chronicles. This order of books appears to be the oldest witnessed in Jewish literature.

The crucial question that divides modern scholarship is whether the OT had already been standardized by the time of Jesus (or before) or whether this occurred only in the first century A.D. or perhaps even later in the second century A.D. A brief comment is necessary on some rabbinic debates about the canon. Among the Jews there were some disputed books, like Esther, in which the name of God is not mentioned. Some scholars have suggested that it was in the so-called council of Jamnia that final decisions were made concerning the books that would constitute the OT canon. Jamnia, located on the Mediterranean coast of Israel, hosted both a rabbinical school and a legal court established during the period of A.D. 70–135. In the school there were discussions on the extent of the sacred Scriptures and on many other topics. However, such discussions were not unusual, for rabbis had discussed these matters at least in the previous generation and also several times long after the Jamnia period. It is clear that these rabbinical discussions were not formative for the OT canon. The belief that there was a council in Jamnia where the OT canon was finally fixed is not historically reliable. Above all, the witness of Jesus is extraordinarily important for the fixing of the canon.

Jesus and the Old Testament Canon

When we examine the Gospels we find that Jesus confirmed the scope and divisions of the OT canon. In a discussion about the fate of prophets in the hands of the leaders of the people, He referred to the OT martyrs and held the leaders responsible for “the righteous blood

[that has been] shed on the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel to the blood of Zechariah, son of Berechiah, whom you murdered between the temple and the altar” (Matt. 23:35; cf. Luke 11:51). Here Jesus was referring to the martyrdom of Zechariah recorded in 2 Chronicles 24:20–21, and He thus affirmed the canonical order of the OT books by choosing the first martyr mentioned in Genesis and the last martyr mentioned in the last canonical book, 2 Chronicles (chronologically Zechariah was not the last martyr of the OT; see Jer. 26:20–23). These boundaries of the canon used by Jesus indicate that in His day the canon was already closed. Jesus also confirmed the threefold division of the canon, which closed with 2 Chronicles, when He spoke about the fulfillment of everything written about Him in the Law of Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms (Luke 24:44). Earlier in the chapter Luke wrote that Jesus had begun with “Moses and all the Prophets,” as He used “all the Scriptures” to discuss matters regarding Himself (Luke 24:27). The shorter form is another way of designating the threefold order of the OT books (cf. Matt. 7:12; Luke 16:16), as it acknowledged the existence of divisions in a particular order with the Writings being the last. Mentioning only the first two of the three divisions was also the practice among other Jewish writers.

How were all the authoritative books of the OT collected and organized in a threefold order? There is no final answer to this question. Although most scholars have rejected the possibility that it was the work of Ezra and Nehemiah after the Exile, the possibility should not be ruled out. Three arguments give some credibility to this traditional proposal without demonstrating that this was the case. First, Ezra is depicted in the Bible as a man who knew the Hebrew Scriptures well and taught them to the people. Second, there is a Jewish tradition according to which Nehemiah collected books and founded a library. Obviously it is impossible to determine which books he collected, but the tradition suggests that Nehemiah and Ezra were interested in the religious books of the people of God. Third, there is another Jewish tradition that seems to have been affirmed also by some early church fathers, according to which prophecy ceased with Malachi, a contemporary of Nehemiah. The cessation of prophecy would be a way of suggesting that the canon of the OT was closed—nothing else could be added to it. Whether that was the case is impossible to establish beyond any doubt, but for Christians the fact that Jesus acknowledged the existence of a closed OT canon is of great significance and in fact becomes the historical center of the Christian canon.

HISTORY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT CANON

The canon of the Christian church is constituted by both the canon of the OT and the apostolic writings called the NT. This suggests that we should start by examining the OT canon of the Christian church. A good transition to this analysis is a discussion of the translation of the OT into Greek called the Septuagint (abbreviated as LXX).

The Old Testament Canon and the Septuagint

The Greek translation of the OT Scriptures is called “the Septuagint” because of a legend according to which the Ptolemaic king of Egypt Ptolemy II wanted a copy of the Hebrew Scriptures for his Alexandrian library. He supposedly ordered seventy Jewish scholars to each translate the Pentateuch into Greek on the pain of death. As the legend maintains, after they had finished their independent work, the translation of each one of them miraculously and perfectly corresponded to that of all the others. The more likely situation is that the Septuagint was originally a Jewish project, which was produced from the third century B.C. onward and began with the translation of the Pentateuch. Whatever the case, the Septuagint became, during the first few centuries of the Christian era, the Christian Bible, and, in fact, Christians were also the first to call it the LXX.

As far as it can be ascertained, the Septuagint originally comprised the translation of the twenty-four books of the OT. The Gospels and the Epistles of the NT often use the Septuagint when quoting from the OT. Jewish writers distinguished the OT canonical books from other books written during the Second Temple period that were also highly regarded by the Jews. Christians usually referred to these books as the apocryphal or deuterocanonical books. The term apocrypha is of Greek origin and means “hidden things,” probably used to indicate that such books lacked canonical status. When Christians made the Septuagint their Bible, the Jews stopped using it and produced other Greek translations of the OT (e.g., Theodotion, Aquila), but they finally returned to the Hebrew Bible.

The Apocrypha

Significant differences exist between the Hebrew canon and the canon preserved in the oldest codices of the Septuagint. The oldest codex containing the complete Greek Bible is the Codex Vaticanus (fourth century A.D.) and includes the apocryphal books of Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus (Sirach), Baruch, and the Letter of Jeremiah, as well as additions to the books of Esther and Daniel (e.g., Susanna and Bel and the Dragon)—works written between 200 B.C. and A.D. 132 but absent from the Hebrew canon. The larger canon of the Septuagint should probably be understood in terms of confrontations and tensions between Judaism and the growth of the Christian church, already manifested in the NT. Although the Septuagint, as indicated, originated as a Jewish project, its rapid adoption and authority in the Christian community as an important tool for evangelizing the Roman world led to a definite rejection of it by the Jews early in the second century A.D. Therefore, it seems reasonable to argue that these monumental codices (that came into use only from the fourth century A.D. onward) exhibit influences prevalent in the early Christian church, which at that time struggled to define its identity against the background of rabbinic Judaism.

It must be noted that the early Christian church did not always accept the additional books as authoritative and canonical. Both Athanasius (ca. A.D. 296–373) and Jerome (ca. A.D. 345–420) mention the apocryphal books but clearly distinguish them from the OT canonical books. Jerome insisted on a return to the Hebrew canon and rejected the use of apocryphal books in doctrinal discussions. Neither the NT writers nor most patristic writers accepted the Apocrypha as authoritative and as belonging to the recognized OT canon. The larger canon of the Septuagint continued in use, but the discussion came to a climax during the Protestant Reformation. Protestants acknowledged only the Hebrew canon as authoritative and rejected the apocryphal books. In a sense this led the Catholic Church to officially accept, during the Council of Trent (A.D. 1546), the larger canon of the Septuagint, now found in the Latin Vulgate and in the canon of the Orthodox churches. The Orthodox churches have added some other apocryphal books (e.g., 1–2 Esdras, 3 Maccabees, the Prayer of Manasseh, and Psalm 151).

The Old Testament Canon and Jesus and His Disciples

The Gospels provide clear evidence indicating that Jesus used the OT Hebrew canon and considered it authoritative. A few examples illustrate His respect for the OT. Jesus spoke about the importance of complying with OT regulations (e.g., Matt. 5:17–19), thus indicating the binding nature of the inspired and written Scripture. He referred to the OT commands, promises, and other stories in the context of the declaration “it is written” (e.g., Matt. 4:4, 7, 10; 11:10; Mark 7:6), which always appears as a conclusive argument in His discussions. However, there is no evidence that Jesus ever used the Apocrypha or that He assigned canonical status to it.

Some NT books may refer to apocryphal works, the best example being Jude 14–15, which contains a quote from 1 Enoch. The apostle found in this quote content that was compatible with the Scriptures (see Gen. 6–9; Deut. 33:2; Is. 15–16; Jer. 25:30–31; Dan. 7:10, 18, 23, 25). In other words, he found in the text a good expression or summary of what he intended to say and decided to use it. This by no means demonstrates an authorization of this work as canonical. In several instances Paul quotes Greek thinkers (e.g., Acts 17:29; Titus 1:12) without necessarily making them canonical or authoritative. In this sense, a possible reference or allusion to an apocryphal book may be made without canonizing it. The OT text is quoted or alluded to again and again in the NT to teach or support arguments, and it is considered to be divinely inspired.

This same attitude toward the binding authority of the OT is reflected in the apostolic church as well. The Bereans checked the OT Scriptures daily to verify Paul’s teachings (Acts 17:11). Paul utilizes the strength of the OT in his arguments on vengeance being the sole prerogative of God (Rom. 12:19–20) and on the universality of sin (3:10–13). Peter argues for a lifestyle of holiness on the basis of the OT (1 Pet. 2:4–6). This sample of the evidence points to the OT as an authoritative, inspired body of texts. This same attitude toward the OT determined its canonicity for the Christian church. Unfortunately, and for reasons not totally clear, the church through a slow process came to accept the Apocrypha as canonical. It must be remembered that apocryphal books contain some theological concepts not supported by the Holy Scriptures. Among them we find praying for the dead (2 Maccabees 12:43–45); the preexistence of the human soul (Wisdom 9:15); martyrdom as a means of atonement (2 Maccabees 7:37–38; 4 Maccabees 17:21–22); human works as a contribution to salvation (Tobit 4:7–11); and the intercession of dead saints for living ones (2 Maccabees 15:13–14). The fact that for Christ, the apostles, and the early Christian church the Hebrew canon was recognized as part of Christian canon (cf. 2 Pet. 3:16) reveals the deep continuity between the church and the Israel of faith in the NT. They have in common a fundamental messianic message of salvation and hope.

The New Testament Canon and Jesus and the Apostles

The Christian canon includes not only the Hebrew OT but also the writings of the apostles. Here again the identification of the canon as a gift of God is evident. The origin of the content of the NT canon is located in the person, work, and teachings of Jesus Christ, in the unique revelation of God that He brought to the world. The OT Messiah, the Prophet like Moses, arrived (Deut. 18:18–19; Acts 3:19–26), and His teachings, rooted in the OT, brought light and life to the human race. This revelation is to be preserved and proclaimed to the world (Matt. 28:18–20). The revelation from God that Jesus shared with His disciples is absolutely authoritative; all the nations of the earth should learn about it and submit to it. He brought to them the gift of the word of God. Jesus is therefore the historical as well as the theological center of the biblical canon in that in Him the authority of the canon of the OT and its fullness are confirmed and in that He provided the authoritative content of the NT canon. There seems to be a Christological component in the formation of the biblical canon.

At the time of the great commission, the authoritative body of Jesus's teachings had not been written down. For many years it was passed on to others through the spoken word, although aspects of His teachings and ministry were probably soon written down (cf. Luke 1:1). The task of passing on this revelation to others was entrusted by Jesus to His disciples and, in order to make sure that they would preserve His teachings accurately, He promised them the presence and guidance of the Holy Spirit, who would teach them and bring to their memory Jesus's teachings (John 14:26). Empowered by the Spirit, the disciples witnessed for Jesus because they had been with Him from the beginning of His public ministry (15:27). The disciples were made responsible for the trustworthy proclamation and preservation of the content of the NT canon.

Soon the life and teachings of Jesus began to be written down as Scripture for future generations. This happened, as in the OT, in the context of a narrative that is part of the biblical metanarrative of the cosmic conflict. As the church was growing, there was the need to instruct members concerning the deeper content of the gospel and its implications for the lives of the believers in the specific cultural and social settings in which they found themselves. The content of the NT Epistles is clearly identified by the apostles as the word of Jesus, not simply of the apostles, and as trustworthy and authoritative for the life and convictions of all the followers of Christ. The apostolic writings were recognized as authoritative and as Scripture (see "Revelation and Inspiration of the Bible," p. 11). The Gospels preserve the teachings of Jesus that rejected nonbiblical traditions in order for the light from God to fully shine on His followers. His ministry, as narrated in the Gospels, revealed the immensity of His saving sacrifice and the love of God. His teachings and work were being preserved in a trustworthy way in written form.

The Christian audiences who first received the written documents recognized them as authoritative and useful for ordering their lives. They contained a revelation from Jesus Christ for them through the apostles; that is to say, those who had been with Him from the beginning and to whom He entrusted His revelation. The NT canon, whose content was determined by Jesus, was from its very beginning directly connected to the work of the apostles.

It is difficult to determine how widespread the use of the apostolic writings was within the church, but the apostolic teaching was well known. When confronted by heresies, Christian writers began to summarize the apostolic teachings in what they called the “rule [canon] of faith” and used it to expose the falsehood of the heretics, thus revealing the authority of the apostolic teachings in oral and written forms.

The New Testament Canon and the Early Church

If what we have described is to be taken into serious consideration in any discussion of the origin of the canon of the NT, then the writings of the apostles must have been recognized as part of the Christian canon, together with the OT, very early in the history of the church (cf. 2 Pet. 3:16). Scholars are divided on the date the NT canon was closed, some arguing for a late second century date and others for the fourth or fifth century. Evidence from the early church fathers suggests that by the close of the first and beginning of the second century A.D. there was a collection of written Christian documents that enjoyed authoritative status within the church. Irenaeus (ca. A.D. 130–200) speaks about the writings of the apostles as the Scriptures that contain the message of salvation. This suggests that apostolic writings were considered Scripture even before Irenaeus’s days.

In a document called the Muratorian Fragment, usually dated around A.D. 180, there is what could be called a canonical list of the books of the NT that includes the four Gospels, Acts, the Pauline Epistles (thirteen), 2 Johannine Epistles, Jude, and Revelation; but Hebrews, James, 1–2 Peter, and one of the Johannine Epistles are not mentioned. While some books are absent, it is significant that at this early date virtually the entire NT was recognized as authoritative Scripture. Clement of Alexandria (ca. A.D. 150–215) included Hebrews among Paul’s letters. It seems that Papias (ca. A.D. 60–130), bishop in Asia Minor, was acquainted with 1 John, 1 Peter, and Revelation. In 1 Clement, a nonapostolic Christian letter written ca. A.D. 96 by an unknown author, the author uses 1 Corinthians, Romans, and Hebrews and probably knew about Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, and Titus. The controversies with the Gnostics and their literature, such as the Gospel of Truth by Valentinus (ca. A.D. 135–140), illustrated the comprehensive use of the canonical writings in the Christian church and thus suggests that by that time the canon had already been standardized. The evidence summarized here suggests that at the beginning of the second century the Christian canon was practically in place and perhaps largely fixed. The earliest surviving list of all twenty-seven of the books within the NT canon dates to A.D. 367 in an Easter letter written by Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, Egypt.

It is true that during the fourth and fifth century A.D. it was debated in some circles whether Revelation and Hebrews should be part of the canon, but the reasons for this are not totally clear. Perhaps for some the Epistle to the Hebrews sounded very Jewish, and the book of Revelation may have been considered quite different from other NT writings. As indicated above, during the second century both books were acknowledged to be part of the authoritative writings of the apostles. It could be that the growth of the church was not accompanied by a wide circulation of these books and consequently their canonicity was not then obvious. Nevertheless, they were received as canonical books. Several synods and church councils dealt with the issue of the canon of the NT, but they did not determine the canonicity of the NT writings; instead, they ratified earlier practices. The result was the canon of the NT that we now possess.

Criteria for Canonicity

The information related to the historical origin of the canon does not provide an explicit list of the criteria used to identify the canonical books. As we look back at that history, we can identify some implicit elements that contributed and determined whether a book was to be acknowledged as canonical. As we have pointed out, in the OT the revelation and inspiration of a written document was what invested it with authority, and consequently the author had to be a prophet. This is exemplified by the conviction that with the cessation of prophecy among the Jews, no more books could be added to the canon. Perhaps another criterion was that the message of the prophet should not undermine the message God gave to previous prophets—the issue of continuity and consistency within the canon.

When we come to the NT, the basic criterion for canonicity was probably the apostolicity of the written documents. Apostolicity assured the church that the message of Jesus Christ, His teachings, was being communicated in a trustworthy way by those whom the Lord taught, and with whom He entrusted His saving message. Since the apostles received the Spirit to help them remember the teachings of Jesus and to guide them in the proclamation and exposition of the message, the written form of the revelation was considered by the church to be the word of God. The divine inspiration of the apostles was important. Apostolicity was also credited to the writings of those who were not apostles in the technical sense of the word but who had been traveling companions of the apostles and who, under their influence and probably supervision, wrote down their teachings. This includes, for instance, Luke and Mark, whose writings were considered to be apostolic and are part of the canon of the NT. Another criterion was the content of the apostolic message itself, as indicated by the fact that it was used to identify heresies and to exclude written documents that some may have claimed to be canonical. This helped establish the concept of orthodoxy in the sense that congruence and continuity with the apostolic teaching was indispensable. In this case, the criterion served to exclude spurious documents and therefore to set limits to the canon.

THE CHURCH AND THE CANON

The canon and the church should not be separated from each other, not so much because the canon needs the church but mainly because the church needs the canon in order to be what it should be. The debate on this particular topic has been whether the church is the mother of the canon or the canon the mother of the church. According to Catholic tradition, the church defined and established the canon of the Christian church—including the selection of canonical books and the moment when the canon became closed. Therefore, it is claimed, the church has authority over the canon. One of the arguments used in this dispute is that it was the church that determined which books would be part of the canon of the OT for the Christian church by including in it a number of apocryphal books. In other words, the church had the authority to reject the Hebrew canon and create its own OT canon.

Behind this debate lies the question of the extent of the authority of the church or its limits. Unquestionably, the Lord entrusted authority to the church to perform the task He assigned it to do, but in our case the concern is whether the canon is outside the sphere of the authority of the church and, if so, how we should understand the authority of the canon. First, we should go back to Jesus, who both founded the church and gave to it the message it should proclaim. The church did not originate out of spontaneous generation but as the intended result of the work of the incarnated Creator. It was through the apostles that the risen Lord entrusted to the church the content of the biblical canon, thus indicating that the church is not the mother of the canon but a servant of it.

Second, although at first the content of the canon was preserved in oral form, it was protected from corruption by the gift of the Spirit, promised by Jesus to His disciples, until it was embodied by them in the documents and letters found in the NT. The question of the connection between canon and tradition should not cloud the priority of the canon over tradition. One of the most important functions of the written canon, if not the most important one, is to preserve the teachings of Christ and the apostles in a totally reliable and trustworthy form for the church. This was a nonrepeatable event in the life of the church and made it unnecessary to listen to an oral tradition that was not grounded in the teachings preserved now in their authoritative writings: the canon of the NT. The history of the church has made it abundantly obvious that the tradition of apostolic succession has not protected the Christian church from incorporating into its message teachings that reside outside the biblical canon. Tradition must submit to the authority of the canon.

Third, the validation of the church and its authority is not self-validation but comes to it from the outside—from the canon. The church finds in the canon its origin, its mission, its faith, and its way of life in a world that opposes it. These are all elements that display the nature of the canon as a gift from the Lord. Without the canon the church would be a faceless social phenomenon as disoriented as the world itself. One could rightly say that the church cannot define itself except through submission to the will of the Lord as preserved in the biblical canon. Therefore it is the canon that establishes the extent and the limits of the authority of the church and that functions as the rule that measures the church's faithfulness to the message of Jesus. The church did not define and establish the canon, but the canon continues to define and establish the church.

Fourth, the history of the canon indicates that the canon of the church, comprising the OT and the NT, was simply received by the church. Early in church history the received canon was identified as the Prophets (the OT), the Lord (the Gospels), and the Apostles (the Epistles; see 2 Pet. 3:2, 16). We also find a fourfold list: Law and Prophets (the OT), and Gospels and Apostles (the NT). This body of holy and authoritative writings was received by the church as the canon. It is only late in the history of the church that we read about votes taken to define aspects of the biblical canon. The apostolic and early church had no need for such official decisions because they found in the apostolic teachings and writings the word of God, and they received the writings as holy and authoritative books to rule over their lives (e.g., 1 Thess. 2:13; 2 Pet. 3:15–16).

Finally, since the canon is the shaper of the church, the church should constantly make it the center of its concern and interest and the source for the formulation of doctrine, theology, and the Christian way of life. This means the believers must explore the totality of the canon in seeking to understand the will of the Lord for us individually and for the church. In this setting there is no room for the idea that there is a canon within the canon that is more authoritative than the collection of books of the canon itself. Some have argued that the true canon is Christ and that anything within the biblical books that testifies about Him should be considered truly canonical; hence the canon within the canon. In this approach the individual stands over the biblical canon using a critical tool to determine what is or is not canonical. The Scriptures have not entrusted such authority to any individual or group of individuals. To separate the Christ of the Scriptures from the Scriptures themselves in order to set limits to the authority of the canon is human hubris. The spiritual and missiological strengths of the church are directly correlated with the appropriation of the biblical message by those who have accepted the Jesus/Christ of the Scriptures as their Savior and Lord and who are being transformed by His grace. The biblical canon in its totality speaks to the church about its very foundation—Christ and the apostles (Eph. 2:20)—and about the willingness of the church to constantly listen to these holy writings during its pilgrimage on earth while waiting for the realization of the hope embraced by its members and sharing this hope with a world in crisis and despair.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION

Humans by nature seek to understand the world around them, including their own actions and those of others. When we see or hear something, we begin the process of interpretation: “What was that sound?” “Did you see that?” We want to understand, to find meaning, and we engage others in the search for understanding. In some cases we know the meaning and we simply move on: “No, that was not a gunshot; there is a crew working on the road, and one of the tools they use emitted that sound.” We use previous knowledge to interpret the phenomenon. Although often we can interpret many of our experiences rather easily, in some cases we do not have all of the information needed and usually seek help. For instance, when we want to understand who we are, where we come from, and where we are heading, we need help because relying only on our limited knowledge we cannot answer these questions. Christians believe that the answers for such questions are ultimately found in the Scriptures.

The Holy Scriptures, written by many authors over a long period of time in cultures different from ours, need to be interpreted to understand and appreciate the profound message. The task of interpreting the Bible is called hermeneutics, from the Greek word hermeneuein, used to refer to the interpretation of utterance and even to translation from one language to another. Among its many usages, the term hermeneutics now designates the rules and principles to be used in the interpretation of the Bible. These principles are provided by and grounded in the nature of the Bible.

APPROACHING THE HOLY SCRIPTURES

Christians are called to interpret a written text, the Holy Scriptures, originally written mostly in Hebrew in the OT and Greek in the NT. The original text written by the biblical authors is no longer available to us, but copies were made of their writings. Fortunately, we have many of those manuscripts. When the manuscripts were compared one with another, scholars occasionally detected some different readings, but none of them has a negative impact on any biblical teaching and doctrine. Knowing the biblical languages is helpful in the task of interpreting the Bible, but laypeople can gain a deep understanding of the Bible without learning Hebrew and Greek.

Most Bible translations are good enough to be used for serious Bible study, though some are better than others. There are three main types of Bible translations from which the interpreter can choose. The first type is called a formal translation. These translations seek to stay as close as possible to the original biblical text, providing an almost word-for-word rendering of the original, making them ideal for serious Bible study. Such translations tend to preserve ambiguities that might be present in the original text and at times include in the margins alternative translations of a word or a phrase that provide the reader with additional information for contextual analysis. Some of the most popular formal Bible translations include the New King James Version (NKJV), the English Standard Version (ESV), the New American Standard Bible (NASB), and the New English Translation (NET).

The second type of Bible translation is a dynamic translation. These are versions of the Bible where translators do not emphasize word-for-word equivalence but attempt to transfer from one language to another the thoughts and ideas found in the original text, working phrase by phrase. The result is a version of the Bible that is easy to read and elegant in expression. The main challenge with this type of Bible is that the translators must decide for the reader what the biblical writer is saying more broadly than do the translators of the formal translation. In other words, they provide in the translation an interpretation of the biblical text to a greater degree than those who translate word for word. The problem for Bible students using this type of translation is that they need to distinguish between what was in the original text and what is the translator's interpretation, something that is much easier to do in a formal translation. Examples of this kind of dynamic Bible translation include the New International Version (NIV), the New Living Translation (NLT), and the New Century Version (NCV).

The third type of Bible translation is a paraphrase. This refers to a much more free reflection of the general ideas in the original language than that of the dynamic translations. It takes the ideas of the original text and restates them as it attempts to explain or clarify their meaning, similar to a commentary. Some paraphrases work with the original text and some work off of already translated material. This type of translation can be valuable for personal devotional readings. A paraphrase could be useful in that it reveals possible meanings of the text that the interpreter needs to evaluate through her or his own reading of the Bible. This also applies to dynamic translations. Usually the introductory section of a Bible translation informs the reader about the nature and purpose of that translation. Some of the most popular paraphrase versions of the Bible include the New International Reader's Version (NIRV), the Contemporary English Version (CEV), and The Message (MSG).

Claims of the Bible

As we open and read the Holy Scriptures, we soon realize that it makes some claims about itself that set it apart from any other books. First, Scripture claims to be a revelation of God to the human race (2 Tim. 3:16). We are instructed that in it we can hear the voice of God speaking to human beings (see "Revelation and Inspiration of the Bible," p. 11). Second, it claims to reveal the origin of everything, including human life, through the creative power of God. Thus the Bible answers questions that humans by themselves are unable to answer. Humans were created for love and fellowship with God, which could be developed throughout eternity. Third, Scripture teaches that humans chose to join the forces of evil in the cosmic conflict, breaking away from the Creator and bringing sin, suffering, and death into the world. Fourth, Scripture claims that God resolved the problem of the human race through the incarnation, ministry, death, resurrection, and Second Coming of His Son, Jesus Christ. Jesus is at the heart of Scripture, and every portion of it testifies in one way or another about Him.

Since the Bible originates with God, who is its ultimate Author, it makes two essential claims. First, the Bible is authoritative. This claim of ultimate authority is grounded in the fact that God is the Creator and the Redeemer and that in His omniscience He knows what is good for human beings and for the totality of His creation. Humans are challenged to decide how they will relate to the loving will of the Creator and Redeemer revealed in Scripture. Any attempt to remain indifferent to God's will is equivalent to a rejection of both the message of the Bible and God. Second, the Bible is a unity. Although the Bible is a collection of books written by different authors over a period of 1,500 years, and God is its ultimate Author, the unity of the Bible can be affirmed. It is His voice that speaks through each of its inspired authors. Thus, while the human aspect of the Bible can be seen in the different literary styles, vocabulary, and emotions of its individual authors, the divinity of the Bible is strikingly evident in its overall thematic harmony. The consistency of the divine mind speaking to us through the Bible does not allow for a message that is in conflict with itself, contradicting in one place what God states in another. In the Bible we find God's spoken word giving one message for the whole human race.

Since the Bible contains God's revealed will for humans, it is the ultimate source for the teachings of the church and the conduct of believers. In the Scriptures we read about God, His plan for us, and His invitation to live a life worth living in service to God and others. The Bible alone (Lat. sola scriptura) contains all we need to know for salvation and faith (2 Tim. 3:16–17).

Preparing to Study the Bible

As we open the Bible, a proper personal preparation is needed. First, we should acknowledge the need for divine guidance. The ultimate interpreter of the Bible is the Holy Spirit, to whom Jesus assigned the task of guiding us in understanding His message (John 16:13). This guidance is necessary because sin has damaged the human mind and filled it with self-sufficiency and pride (Jer. 17:9; 2 Tim. 3:2–3). Humans cannot by themselves gain a proper and full understanding of the Bible (cf. Eccl. 3:11; Is. 55:8–9). Spiritual things can be understood only through the Spirit (1 Cor. 2:11, 14). The meaning of the biblical text is not determined by the interpreters but is received by them under the influence and guidance of the spirit of the Lord.

Second, interpreters should be humble, honest, and willing to submit to the will of God as expressed in the Bible (Ps. 119:34). These qualities can be placed in the human heart only by the Spirit. Therefore, sincere Bible students have found in Jesus their only Savior and have surrendered their life to Him; they have experienced conversion. Third, in the heart of such persons there is a disposition to solicit, through prayer, the guidance of the Spirit as they open the Scriptures (Ps. 119:33). While in prayer, the human mind “touches” the divine mind, and the Spirit begins to enlighten and illuminate the human mind as it exposes itself to the word of God.

The spiritual preparation of the biblical interpreter does not mean that the meaning of the text will be accessed in a mystical and subjective experience with God or through intuitions. God expects students of His word to apply the mental abilities He has given to them in the study of the Bible. They need to employ proper methods of interpretation that may be used by others to verify whether the interpretation of the text given by someone is reliable and loyal to the intention of the biblical author. The principles of interpretation are drawn from the Bible itself. The divine Author has provided in His word the principles to be used to interpret it.

PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION

That interpreters must follow certain principles of interpretation when studying the Bible does not mean that understanding it is a difficult task assigned only to a few. The content and meaning of the word of God are clear and accessible to any person who carefully and prayerfully reads it. Readers are encouraged to study the divine word for themselves (e.g., Deut. 30:11–14; Acts 17:10–11). The general meaning of the text is usually accessible by keeping in mind that the literal sense should predominate unless the context points to a figurative or symbolic meaning.

The Bible Interprets Itself

The very nature of the Bible requires from its readers the attitude of learners who are willing to open up their minds and hearts to the message of the Holy Scriptures. The axiom that the Bible interprets itself means, first, that readers will let the content of the Scriptures judge their personal ideas and convictions. For instance, if someone believes that everything we see today is the result of natural evolution, the biblical understanding of divine creation recorded in Genesis 1 will challenge that conviction, calling the interpreter to set aside his or her own personal views.

Second, the belief that the Bible interprets itself means that one portion of Scripture can and should be used to interpret another. This is based on the principle of the unity of the Bible, as discussed above. In order for this internal interpretation to occur, students of the Bible must become well acquainted with it by studying and reading it again and again. The more we read it, the easier it becomes to understand it and to appropriate its message. We are also able to perceive connections between one passage and another from a different section of the Bible, thus facilitating the interpretation of the first passage. For instance, when John writes of Jesus, the Word, becoming flesh in the incarnation and dwelling among us (John 1:14), it would immediately remind an attentive interpreter of Exodus 25:8, where God showed His willingness to dwell in a sanctuary among His people. Jesus is now God’s dwelling “place” on earth because Jesus is the incarnated Son of God. The language used by John associates or connects His statement with what the Bible says in another place using similar language or concepts.

Third, in order to allow the Bible to interpret itself, we need to use clear texts to interpret difficult ones dealing with the same topic. One of the best examples to illustrate this principle is the gift of tongues discussed by Paul in 1 Corinthians 14. Establishing the nature of the gift in this chapter is a difficult task and different possibilities have been offered. Finding another passage in which the gift of tongues is discussed and its nature clearly stated would be helpful in the interpretation of the gift in 1 Corinthians 14. We find such a passage in Acts 2, the first manifestation of the gift of tongues. According to Acts 2, the gift of tongues consists of being enabled by the Spirit to speak in a foreign human language. The clear passage should be used to clarify the less clear one.

Fourth, the Bible interpreting itself means that we should study everything the Bible says on a particular topic in order to gain a truthful and reliable understanding of it. The best example of this practice is provided by Jesus Himself during His conversation with the two disciples on the road to Emmaus when He directed their minds to “all the Scriptures” that address everything about His life and mission (Luke 24:27). The unity of the Scriptures is presupposed in this type of study. In this particular case, that unity is grounded on the promise of the coming Messiah found throughout the OT.

Analysis of the Context

It is practically impossible to provide a correct interpretation of a biblical passage if its context is ignored. Taking into consideration the context is one of the most important principles in biblical interpretation; it provides the starting point for the task. The importance of the context cannot be overemphasized. There are different types of context that we should take into consideration as we attempt to comprehend the word of God.

First, there is the context of the words used in the text. Each word (a noun, a verb, a preposition, etc.) in the biblical text must be taken into consideration. Often words have different meanings and consequently the specific meaning is determined by the context within which it is used. The Greek term parousia may mean “coming,” “arrival,” or “presence,” but the context will indicate which one of these meanings fits best. For instance, the arrival of Titus comforted Paul (2 Cor. 7:6), and the physical presence of Paul appeared to be weak (2 Cor. 2:10). The most important usage of this term is in reference to the coming of Christ in glory (e.g., 1 Cor. 15:32; 1 Thess. 4:15; 5:23). But it is also used to refer to the coming of the eschatological antichrist (2 Thess. 2:9). Only the context determines the specific meaning and usage of a word.

Second, each word is part of a sentence or a phrase, and its grammatical function can reveal its immediate significance. John says that “God is love” (1 John 4:8). In this phrase, something is being said about God, and consequently “love” functions as a predicate. Therefore, “love” is not being equated with “God.” Thus, it would be incorrect to say that love is God because God would be identified merely as an abstract concept or quality.

Third, the interpreter should also explore the context of the sentence, namely, the section in which it is located. For instance, after one of Jesus's discussions with the Pharisees, Mark refers to Jesus's words in connection with the cleansing or purification of all foods (Mark 7:1–23). Is Mark declaring that the law of clean and unclean animals was abolished by Christ? To answer this question, we need to read the statement carefully and pay attention to the context. The discussion of food must be understood within the Jewish setting of the story—the participants in the story are Jews. Food in that context refers to the food Jews ate. Also, the sentence is part of a discussion about eating with unclean/unwashed hands that, according to the Pharisees, made the food God had given them to eat ritually unclean—and therefore forbidden to eat—a regulation that is not found in the OT. Thus the context shows that Jesus was rejecting the traditions of the Jewish elders regarding defilement (Mark 7:3). He was declaring that the otherwise clean food they claimed to be defiled by unwashed hands was still clean. He was not declaring to be clean those foods that the Levitical dietary laws had identified as unclean.

Fourth, it is important to examine the context of the section—that is, the whole book or Epistle. This specific step in the interpretation of the Bible requires students to read the entire book several times, taking notes, and outlining the development of the thoughts of the biblical writer. This is the moment when a study of the literary structure of the book can be useful. Identifying the literary structure of a block of material or even a book is time-consuming, as it requires paying careful attention to the use of similar terminology or synonyms and to the repetition of similar ideas within the passage or book. The primary point here is that very often the study of the entire book can help the reader to understand a section of it. For instance, any attempt to fully understand Hebrews 2:17 (or incorrect conclusions that might be drawn about the human nature of Christ) would require a careful study of the entire Epistle to the Hebrews.

Fifth, the ultimate context of a word or sentence is the totality of the Bible. There are cases that could require gaining a general biblical knowledge of a concept or practice before explaining a verse. The meaning of the term nepesh (sometimes translated as “soul”) in Genesis 35:18 requires a clear understanding of the Hebrew term nepesh, translated here as “soul,” as well as the biblical understanding of the nature of human beings. The Bible teaches that humans are an indivisible unity of life and body without an independent soul that goes on existing without a body (a Greek idea). Humans do not have a soul, but they are a soul in the sense that they are mortal, physical living beings (e.g., Gen. 2:7).

Sixth, it is good for the interpreter to know about the historical background of the biblical book that is being studied. This helps to understand veiled references to historical events found in the text. Often a biblical book (e.g., 1–2 Kin.; 1–2 Chr.) provides important historical information that frames the biblical narrative. In other cases a book provides a short historical statement to date the ministry of the prophet (e.g., Is. 1:1; Jer. 1:1–3; Hos. 1:1). Concerning the OT, it is good to have a general knowledge of the Egyptian, Assyrian, Babylonian, Medo-Persian, and Greek empires. In the NT some knowledge of the history of the Jews and the Greco-Roman world would be valuable. In this commentary, a historical background is provided in the introduction to each of the biblical books. A Bible dictionary is also a good reference source for such information.

Finally, an understanding of the religious and cultural backgrounds of the OT in its ANE setting and of the NT in its Greco-Roman world is also useful in the interpretation of the Bible. Since God chose to reveal Himself in human history, the more we can know about the world within which He acted is helpful. This does not mean, however, that we cannot understand the basic meaning of the text without such historical knowledge. Knowledge of the religious and cultural backgrounds of the ancient world simply allows us to appreciate the biblical account even more fully. In the final analysis, what determines the meaning of the Bible is the Bible itself.

STUDYING DIFFERENT GENRES OF BIBLICAL TEXTS

In the Bible we find different literary genres, and it is important to use hermeneutical principles that apply specifically to each one. Here we will mention some of them.

Historical Narrative

In the Scriptures we find a significant amount of narratives—stories told for the edification of the people of God. In many cases reading the stories is easy and enjoyable, but in others the narrative is more challenging. When analyzing a narrative, we should first pay particular attention to the plot of the story. Most stories have a beginning, a development, a climax, and a resolution of the plot. Keeping these elements in mind helps the interpreter to gain a deeper understanding of the narrative.

Second, it is helpful to look carefully for the purpose of the story. The biblical narrator is using the narrative to convey to the readers a particular message or ideology, and this is commonly done through comments made during the telling of the story. For instance, in Genesis 22:1 the narrator (Moses) introduces the narrative by mentioning God's testing of Abraham. This is something that the narrator knows and is sharing with the readers to help them understand the story but that, at this point in the narrative, Abraham does not know. The attentive reader will find here an element of suspense that in fact will run throughout this narrative.

Third, the Bible student will do well to pay particular attention to the characters involved in the plot of the narrative and their specific roles within the account. Some characters remain the same while others change as the story develops, providing clues to readers about the significance of the narrative for their own lives. Sometimes there is an interaction between the good person and the evil one, allowing us to witness a chapter in the cosmic conflict (e.g., Esth. 4–7; Dan. 6). We should keep in mind that sometimes the inspired authors are “omniscient” in the sense that God reveals to them the deepest thoughts and secrets of the characters to help the readers understand the attributes of one of the protagonists.

For instance, in the story of Elisha and his servant Gehazi, the narrator shares the inner dialogue of the servant with himself (2 Kin. 5:20), revealing to us important aspects of the character of Gehazi.

Fourth, in reading the narrative, keep in mind that the narrator is in fact sharing with us the divine perspective with respect to the narrative, its plot, and its characters. The story may be used by the Lord to tell the readers, among many other things, something about true worship, ethical values, correct leadership, or the damaging effects of wickedness. In the process, the narrative is speaking to us by helping us decide whose character reflects ours and what changes, if any, need to be made in our lives.

Parables

Another type of literature that occurs in the Bible is the parable. In a parable a known reality is compared to a lesser-known one in order to share or gain new knowledge and understanding. For instance, Jesus compared the “kingdom of heaven” (something less known to His hearers) with a hidden treasure in a field (something more familiar to them; Matt. 13:44). The task of the interpreter is, first, to look for the purpose of the parable. In general, it could be said that the purpose of a particular parable is to move the listeners or the readers to make decisions for the Lord and to take a stand for what is right. The interpreter should read the parable carefully in order to ascertain the specific divine intention embedded in it. The parable of Lazarus and the Rich Man, based on a well-known story in the time of Jesus (Luke 16:19–31), is used by some to support the belief in the immortality of the soul. The purpose of the parable, however, is to teach that it is in this life that we prepare for life in the kingdom of God; there is not a second chance (Luke 16:29–31). Its purpose is not to teach that the wicked go to Hades and the righteous to heaven.

Second, since parables are usually based on the experience of the original listeners, it is helpful if interpreters are acquainted with what life was like in biblical times. Bible dictionaries are a good source of such information, although a close reading of the parable is in most cases enough to understand it. Third, it is important to remember that not every detail in a parable conveys a particular meaning. We need to read the parable carefully to discern what is meaningful and what is not in order to avoid speculating or reading too much into the use of words, characters, and images. In the parable of the Wise and Foolish Virgins, for example, sellers of oil are mentioned to increase suspense in the parable; it is unnecessary to find a particular figurative meaning for their role (Matt. 25:9).

Types

Sometimes the Bible infuses historical events, institutions, and persons with a future significance that goes beyond their immediate expression or manifestation. These are called types, and the fulfillments are antitypes. God designed a type to prefigure an eschatological antitypical fulfillment in the ministry and work of Christ. As we will see, the antitype is more encompassing and glorious than the type. In this case, the first question that the interpreter confronts is identifying a type. Here the best rule, based on the principle that the Bible interprets itself, is to allow the Bible to identify the type. The NT writers identify historical events, institutions, and persons that prefigured the work of Christ. If we carefully study the Scriptures, we can find these types. For example, the Exodus from Egypt, a historical event, is identified as a type of the new exodus through Christ (Matt. 2:14–15; 1 Cor. 10:1–5, 11). In the book of Hebrews, the Israelite sanctuary is seen as a type of the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 8:5; 9:11); the priesthood of the OT, a religious institution, is a type of the priesthood of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 8:1); the sacrificial system was a type of the sacrifice of Christ (Heb. 10:1–4; see also John 1:29). In Romans, Paul identifies Adam (the first human) as a type of Christ, who was the second Adam (Rom. 5:14).

Second, the study of the type and its antitype should reveal a similarity of meaning between the two. For instance, the priests in the OT ministered on behalf of the people, representing God before them and them before God. The antitypical fulfillment in Christ reveals that He is the exclusive mediator between the people and God and between God and the people (Heb. 4:14–16). The foundation of Christ's superiority is located, among others, in the fact that He is divine and human (Heb. 2:14–18). The earthly sanctuary is a type of the real and yet superior heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 9:11–12, 24). In other words, the type cannot stand for something that is absolutely different from it; there is always a connection between type and antitype.

Third, the fulfillment of some types does not necessarily exhaust the meaning of the type, for it may still point to another antitypical fulfillment identified by the Bible itself. The Exodus from Egypt was a type of the redemptive power of the cross of Christ, but it also points to the moment of the Second Coming of Christ when God's people leave this world of sin to be forever with the Lord (Luke 2:15–16; Rev. 15:1–3). The type-antitype correspondence found in the Bible illustrates and confirms the consistency of the divine plan to save humans through divine grace.

For the interpretation of prophecy, apocalyptic prophecy, wisdom literature, poetic literature, and the Gospels and the Epistles, see the corresponding introductory articles in this commentary.

METHODS FOR THE STUDY OF THE SCRIPTURES

In order to take as much advantage as possible in the study of the Bible, we should select a particular way of reading it with some specific goals in mind. There are several ways of doing this.

Book by Book

The first step is to select a particular book for study. At first it may be better to select a short biblical book because a long one, like Isaiah, will take a long time to analyze and could easily discourage the reader. Second, the student should read the book several times, listening to its content, taking notes of passages, and writing down ideas that seem important. It could be that all we want is to get well acquainted with the content and overall message of the book, and such a reading will accomplish that purpose. We may find that some books have a single overriding theme and others have a cluster of theological topics that enrich our spiritual life and mind. Third, it is better to have a specific purpose for the study of a book. For instance, we may study the book of Psalms to find out what it teaches about the sanctuary and its services. We then need to read it to identify and set apart the passages in which the sanctuary, the sacrifices, the priests, and the festivals are mentioned, with the intention of spending more time with such passages. In the book of Proverbs, one could read it pulling together all the passages dealing with the wise or the fool, work, the use of words, or other topics.

Section by Section

If studying a single book requires too much time, then it is better to select a smaller portion of the Bible to study and reflect on. This could be a short narrative, a parable, a section from the NT Epistles or the Gospels, a psalm, or a passage from the prophetic books. The reader would then apply the steps of biblical interpretation discussed above to unpack the divine message found in the text and to apply it to his or her spiritual life. In selecting a portion of the Scriptures for study, we must ensure that we are taking a group of passages that can stand by themselves as a unity. We must then read the context of the passage to establish its extent or simply use the natural divisions of the text as indicated in the versions of the Bible we are studying.

Topical Study

The topical study of the Bible is also very rewarding and will enlarge one's understanding of the biblical text. We have already mentioned thematic studies on specific biblical books. Here the emphasis is on topical studies based in the whole Bible. The purpose is to bring together everything the Bible teaches on a particular subject. This is a good Bible study project that could last for several years. Among the many possible subjects, one could choose God's mercy, divine promises, redemption, salvation, the Messiah, the law, animal life, natural phenomena, family relations, the Sabbath, and the Second Coming. The list of topics can be extensive. When approaching the topic, one has to decide whether to follow the canonical order of the Bible—from Genesis to Revelation—or to start with blocks of books—for example the prophetic books, the Pentateuch, or the Gospels. In any case, it would be better to study the topic first in each specific book of the Bible and then to integrate the findings into a summary.

A useful topical study could consist in exploring what the Bible teaches on the doctrines of the church, taking each doctrine as a topic by itself. In this case, as well as in the study of words, the use of a concordance is significantly useful. A concordance lists all the biblical passages in which a particular subject is mentioned, thus saving the Bible student considerable time. Each passage must be studied within its own context before bringing different passages together. Topical studies reveal the unity of the Bible and the intention of the divine mind for us. The real purpose of these studies is to strengthen our relationship with the Lord and not to satisfy human curiosity. The results of our study should make us humble as we serve others.

We have identified some of the key elements of faithful Bible study. Finally, it is always good to seek the opinion of others who know the Scriptures and to listen to what they may have to say about our interpretation of particular passages. The interpretation of the Bible ultimately is a collective work in which the Spirit is always present in the body of believers. Realizing that the content of the Bible is deeper than any individual can fully comprehend, we should depend on God in a spirit of true humility.

INTERPRETING BIBLICAL APOCALYPTIC PROPHECIES

The term apocalyptic comes from the Greek apokalypsis, meaning “revelation,” “disclosure,” “unveiling.” It is used in the Greek title of the book of Revelation—Apokalypsis Ioannou (“The Apocalypse/Revelation of John”). The term is employed to designate the books of Daniel and Revelation and some Jewish books that are not part of the biblical canon (e.g., Ethiopic Enoch, 4 Ezra, 2–3 Baruch, Apocalypse of Abraham). The term apocalyptic is usually employed to refer to a type of literature as well as to a worldview. We will examine both usages and the nature and role of the year-day principle in the interpretation of apocalyptic books of Daniel and Revelation.

NATURE OF APOCALYPTIC PROPHECY

It is not difficult to distinguish biblical narratives, poetic books, the Gospels, and even prophetic books from biblical apocalyptic literature.

First, this type of literature consists of messages from God communicated to the prophet through an angelic mediator, in most cases using visions and/or dreams and incorporating highly complex symbols (e.g., animals, composite beasts, elements from the natural world, time periods).

Second, the content of the prophecy covers the time from the days of the prophet to the very end of history, usually culminating with the kingdom of God, thus providing a brief summary of human history from the divine perspective.

Third, it is common to find in the apocalyptic prophecy long prophetic time periods (e.g., 1,260 days; 42 months; 2,300 days).

Fourth, the prophecies are given in visionary or discourse cycles (e.g., four kingdoms [Dan. 2, 7]; three kingdoms and a little horn [Dan. 8]; seven seals [Rev. 6]; seven trumpets [Rev. 8–9]), recapitulating the content of the previous cycle and enlarging its content with new insights from a new perspective. The parallelism of the content of the cycles is helpful in their interpretation.

Fifth, apocalyptic prophecy reveals God’s plans for humanity and consequently is not conditional. In general, biblical prophets functioned within God’s covenant with Israel, and their prophecies of judgment or salvation were directly related to the faithfulness or disobedience of the people to the covenant law. The prophecies of judgment would not be fulfilled if the people returned to God as the covenant Lord. Apocalyptic prophecy is based on God’s foreknowledge and sovereignty and manifests His unchangeable plan for the resolution of the sin problem.

Sixth, although in nonbiblical apocalypses pseudonyms are used for the authors of the books, in the Bible the prophets who received the revelation are clearly identified—Daniel and John.

WORLDVIEW OF APOCALYPTIC PROPHECY

Apocalyptic prophecy offers to its readers a very specific worldview based on a theological perspective of cosmic proportions. It is a way of interpreting the human predicament and the divine plan to resolve it. We will briefly review some of the most important aspects of apocalyptic thought.

First, it assumes that there is a cosmic struggle between God and evil powers and that this conflict is now taking place in the arena of human history and existence (cf. Dan. 5:18–21; 10:13–14; 12:1–3; Rev. 12:2–4, 10–12). Every person is involved in the conflict and must make a decision concerning allegiance: Who is the true object of worship (cf. Rev. 13:8; 14:7)? In their struggle against God, evil powers misrepresent Him, oppress humans—in particular God’s people—and will plan a final attack against God’s kingdom.

Second, the resolution of the cosmic conflict includes a final intervention of God in human affairs that will end the corrupted social, political, and religious structures of this world (cf. Dan. 12:1; Rev. 6:12–17). This final manifestation of the power of God will address the very root of the problem, the very source of evil and oppression in the world—Satan and his evil angels—bringing them to an end. God’s people are warned against the deceptive power of demons and the miracles they will perform aimed at deceiving God’s people and the whole world (cf. Rev. 13:13–14; 17:13–14).

Third, the topic of the final judgment plays a significant role in apocalyptic prophecies (cf. Dan. 7:9–10, 26–27; Rev. 14:7; 20:11–15). The resolution of the problem of evil will not be the result of evil simply destroying itself. Neither will it be an arbitrary, vindictive action on God’s part. Rather, it will be the result of a cosmic judgment. In the resolution of the problem, God’s justice and love will prevail. In that judgment, objective evidence will be presented and analyzed that will demonstrate beyond any doubt that it is right to remove from the universe the disturbing and menacing presence of evil powers.

Fourth, in apocalyptic prophecies the presence of a mediator before God, in His heavenly dwelling, plays a key role in the deliverance of the saints and the restoration of cosmic harmony. This mediator Figure, the Messiah/Christ, ministers on behalf of God’s people during the final judgment and condemns all evil powers to eternal extinction. Consequently, the heavenly sanctuary and the throne of God, as the center of divine government in the universe, are constantly in view (e.g., Dan. 8:10–14; Rev. 8:2–5; 11:19; 13:6; 15:8; 16:1; 21:3). It is there that the final resolution of the cosmic controversy will be determined on the basis of the experience of the sacrificial sufferings of the Messiah as the Lamb of God (cf. Dan. 9:26; Rev. 5:6, 9–10).

Fifth, apocalyptic thought operates within a particular understanding of history, according to which history is moving toward a specific goal preestablished by God (cf. Dan. 2:20–21; Rev. 4:1; 17:17; 21:1). The divine plan develops within the flow of time, and this is indicated by the use of prophetic time periods and the symbolic description of the events that will take place within those periods. This segmentation of history encourages the people of God in that they are able to locate themselves within the flow of history from the perspective of apocalyptic expectation. They are also able to observe God's constant activity within history as the different signs of His coming are manifested. The particular view of history found in apocalyptic thought emphasizes a strong view of divine sovereignty. There is nothing human beings or evil powers can do to alter God's plan for His people or His determination to extinguish evil and evil powers from His universe. Because of this important element, apocalyptic prophecies are not conditional. The coming of the Messiah at the end of the seventy weeks happened as God intended it to happen; the kingdoms of Babylon, Medo-Persia, and Greece have fallen; the fourth kingdom was divided, and so forth. God in His sovereignty expressed His will toward the kingdoms of this world, and that cannot be altered or defeated by any of His creatures. In God's foreknowledge He has predicted the development of historical events and determined in advance the final destiny of history and of those who will join the Lord or the forces of evil. The call to repentance found in biblical apocalyptic literature indicates that everyone must decide by himself or herself which of the two destinies, determined by God, he or she will choose.

Finally, apocalyptic thought projects itself into the distant future and depicts for us the final restoration of cosmic harmony (cf. Dan. 2:44; 7:26–27; Rev. 21). The peace and perfect harmony instituted by God in our world during Creation week are fully restored. In Christian apocalyptic literature this is initiated by the return in glory of the Messiah to consummate the salvation He obtained for all at the cross. At that time His people will be liberated from the presence and power of sin in their own existence and a new environment will be provided for them where they will be freed from the presence of evil.

Although apocalyptic thought contains pessimistic elements, it is fundamentally positive in its outlook. It is characterized by hope. If there is any pessimism, it is related to the inescapable judgment against social, political, and apostate religious institutions. They are described as instruments of oppression employed by evil powers to persecute the people of God. The condition of these institutions and of those who support them is such that they are all totally corrupted. God can only exterminate them. But such extermination has the purpose of creating a new world free from the oppressing presence of evil powers, in which God's people will be able to achieve their most cherished dreams in the company of loved ones, their Redeemer, and their God. Apocalyptic thought is, therefore, optimistic and hopeful, and points to a future of joy and glory rather than sadness and darkness.

HISTORICISM

In the interpretation of Daniel and Revelation scholars have used various methods. Today the prevailing methods are futurism and preterism (see Daniel: see Introduction). Preterists generally date Daniel to the second century B.C. and consider the content of the book to be historical accounts given in the guise of prophecy (the technical phrase is vaticinia ex eventu or "prophecies [given] after the event"). In other words, an anonymous writer in the second century B.C. relates the historical events that occurred from the sixth century to the second century as though his writings are predictions made in the sixth century by a prophet called Daniel. Similarly, they teach that the book of Revelation is not about the future of the church but about events that had already taken place in the church's experience during the first century A.D. Futurists generally date Daniel to the sixth century B.C. but do not interpret the antichrist as the papacy. They apply it to a personal antichrist who will appear after the rapture of the church for a period of three and a half years before the Second Coming of Christ. They believe that from Revelation 4:1 onward the prophecies of the book are about the future to be fulfilled after the rapture of the church during seven years prior to the Second Coming. Both of these methods, with some variances, were formulated by Catholic interpreters to oppose the Reformers' understanding of the apocalyptic prophecies as anticipating the rise of apostate Christianity during the Middle Ages.

Adventists use the historicist approach because they are persuaded that this is the methodology that the biblical text itself provides for us. Historicists believe that Daniel, as the book itself demonstrates, was written in the sixth century B.C. by the prophet Daniel. They also believe that God has full knowledge of the future and that He can reveal to His prophets events that will take place in the distant future. This is clearly found in Daniel, who received from God a sketch of major historical events that will take place from the time of the prophet to the time when God's kingdom will be established on earth.

Witness of Daniel

When we examine the book of Daniel, it is obvious that the book is to be interpreted along the lines of historicism. In Daniel 2, neither the king nor Daniel knew how to interpret the dream. It is through a divine revelation that Daniel gains a full understanding of it. He indicates to the king that the dream is about what God will do in the time of the end (Dan. 2:28). The different parts of the image are interpreted as representing kingdoms, beginning with the kingdom of Babylon, represented by its king (v. 38). There will be four kingdoms and then at the latter days God will establish His everlasting kingdom (v. 44). Three of the four kingdoms will be identified by the angel interpreter as Babylon, Medo-Persia (cf. 5:30-31; 8:20), and Greece (8:21), and Jesus will indicate that the fourth is Rome (see Matt. 24:15-16; cf. Luke 21:20).

In Daniel 7 we have the same sequence of four kingdoms, represented by four beasts (v. 17), and the establishment of the kingdom of God (v. 18), but new information is added relating to the ten horns of the fourth beast and its little horn. The angel clarifies that the fourth kingdom (Rome) will be divided and then the little horn (the historical antichrist) will arise. The approach to the interpretation of the prophecy that we found in Daniel 2 is also the approach used by the angel interpreter to clarify the vision in Daniel 7. Again, this is the case in Daniel 8 where the ram and the goat represent Medo-Persia and Greece, respectively, and the little horn stands primarily for what happened after the division of the Roman Empire. In other words, we are dealing with prophecies that cover a significant amount of history and that will require long periods of time for their fulfillment.

Witness of Jesus and Paul

In Matthew 24 Jesus announces what will take place from the time of the destruction of Jerusalem to the moment of His Second Coming, following the pattern of apocalyptic prophecies found in Daniel. He specifically refers to the prophecy of Daniel 9, the destruction of the city announced by the prophet, and places it in the future (Dan. 9:15–16), connecting it to the Romans. The same approach is used by Paul in 2 Thessalonians 2:1–10 when discussing the coming of the antichrist predicted by Daniel. According to Paul, a number of historical events will take place before the coming of Christ, and he concentrates on the figure of the antichrist. For him, aspects of the prophecy of Daniel have not yet been fulfilled, but they will be fulfilled in the future before the Second Coming of Christ.

Witness of John

John uses the same approach found in Daniel. The best example is Revelation 12, where we can identify a sequence of events from the first century to the final attack against the remnant. The vision begins with the coming of the Messiah as a child, includes the attempt of the dragon to destroy Him (Rev. 12:4), His ascension to heaven (v. 5), and His ultimate sovereignty over the nations (v. 5). The experience of the dragon begins with his rebellion in heaven (vv. 7–8) and moves to the earth where he enters into conflict with the Messiah. This is followed by his attack against the church for 1,260 days and concludes with his final attack against the remnant (v. 17). The people of God are represented by a woman expecting the birth of the Messiah and who, after the ascension of the Messiah, becomes the object of attack of the dragon. At the time of the end, the dragon prepares to oppose God's remnant. The progression is clear: the arrival of the Messiah is followed by the historical period of the Christian church; the dragon persecutes the Christian church but is unable to destroy it; and at the time of the end there is an eschatological remnant threatened by the dragon (Rev. 12:17; 13:14–15), who will be defeated again at the return of Christ (cf. Rev. 17:14). The prophecy moves from the time of Jesus to the moment of the Second Coming, covering a long period of history that outlines the experience of the church within the cosmic conflict.

Witness of the Early Church and the Reformation

The historicist method was used by some of the early church fathers to interpret the prophecies of Daniel. Some of them identified the fourth beast as Rome, the ten horns as the division of the empire, and the little horn as the future antichrist. The approach was used by the early church fathers up to the fifth century A.D., at which time a significant shift in prophetic interpretation took place when Augustine spiritualized the millennium, making it a symbol of the Christian era (amillennialism). It was the Reformers who restored historicism as the method to be used in the interpretation of Daniel and Revelation and identified the papacy as a manifestation of the antichrist predicted in these books.

As already indicated, it was the Counter-Reformation that developed a new system of prophetic interpretation that came to be known as preterism. This method was developed by a Spanish Jesuit named Luis de Alcazar (died A.D. 1613). Preterism was later adopted by some Protestants and became the prevailing method of apocalyptic prophetic interpretation among critical scholars. Futurism, also of Catholic origin, is used by most dispensationalists.

Limitations of Historicism

Probably the main challenge historicists confront is identifying the historical events represented in the apocalyptic prophecies. In Daniel we find historical applications as part of the revelatory experience. The angel interpreter tells the prophet that four kingdoms will rise on earth and the fifth one will be the kingdom of God. As we indicated, three of those are identified in Daniel (Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece) and the fourth by Jesus. As long as we follow the biblical text, we are on safe ground. But we still have other symbols not interpreted by the angel, such as the ten horns, the little horn, the beast from the sea, the beast from the earth, and Babylon (Rev. 13). How are we to identify the prophetic fulfillment of these symbols? Herein lies the challenge.

We can speak with certainty only in terms of the broad outline of the history depicted in those prophecies. Which controls should we use to identify that broad outline? We have to move from what is clearly revealed in the prophecies themselves to what is left historically undefined. It is useful, first, to pay particular attention to the chronology of events described in the prophecy itself. Second, it is also necessary to examine historical events, taking into consideration the prophetic line of thought and its historical perspective.

In Daniel 7 we find the most important outline of apocalyptic prophecy in both Daniel and Revelation. The prophetic backbone found there, together with the explanations given by the angel interpreter, provide the indispensable historical outline or skeleton to be used in fitting other apocalyptic prophecies and their fulfillment within history. The angel interpreter explains to Daniel that there will be four important kingdoms: Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and a fourth one. This fourth one will be divided into many smaller kingdoms, but a particular horn (kingdom) will establish itself as the most influential one. This little horn is a political and also a religious power that opposes God and His people. It will exercise its power for 1,260 days, and at the end of that period the heavenly court will sit to judge (i.e., vindicate) God's people and to bring the power of the little horn to an end. After that, the kingdom of God will be established on earth.

YEAR-DAY PRINCIPLE

One of the interesting and even enigmatic characteristics of apocalyptic prophecies is the inclusion of long periods of time within the prophecies themselves. We read about time, times, and half a time (Dan. 7:25; 12:7; Rev. 12:14); 1,260 days (Rev. 11:3; 12:6); 42 months (Rev. 11:2; 13:5); 2,300 evenings/mornings or days (Dan. 8:14); 1,290 days (Dan. 12:11); and 1,335 days (Dan. 12:12). Historicist interpreters, utilizing the year-day principle, have taken these time periods to be symbolic for years. The Bible provides enough evidence to support the use of this principle.

Day Stands for Year

It is a common practice in poetic literature to use the term day in parallel with the word year, making these terms synonymous (Job 36:11; Pss. 77:11; 78:33; 90:15). In these verses days and years refer to the same general time period. But there are cases in which the Hebrew has the specific number of years of a person also designated as days (Gen. 5:5; see also vv. 8, 11, 14, 17, 20, 27, 31). In the case of Genesis 5:5, the days stand for 930 years.

Day-Year in an Early Prophecy

Interestingly, we find a correlation of days and years in the first-time prophecy recorded in the Bible (Gen. 6:3). No specific number of days is explicitly given, but instead we are told the specific number of years that the use of the term days intended to communicate. Days stand for the number of years granted by God to the antediluvians as probationary time. We can easily detect here the foundation of what later will become the year-day principle in apocalyptic prophecies. This last usage, together with the previous one, indicates that it was natural for the Hebrews to use the two terms interchangeably in their daily speech.

Cases of Year-Day Principle

There are some cases outside apocalyptic prophecies where we can see days being clearly and intentionally used to designate years. The first case is found in the law of the sabbatical year (Lev. 25:1–7). During the seventh year the land will rest, that is to say it will enjoy a Sabbath rest. The law is modeled after the regular week with its literal seventh-day Sabbath rest, but the sabbatical rest does not stand for a literal day but for a full year (Lev. 25:4–5). Both the weekly Sabbath and the sabbatical year were referred to by the same terms (Lev. 23:3; 25:4–5). The clear implication of the sabbatical legislation is that a day can represent a year.

Even closer to the point is Leviticus 25:8, concerning the day of Jubilee. Each day of the week is equated to a year, including the Sabbath, which stands for the seventh year. The Jubilee is calculated using the principle that a day stands for a year resulting in a period of seven years that are to be counted seven times bringing the total to forty-nine years. In order to arrive at the date for the Jubilee, the seven days of a week are to be interpreted as years (see Dan. 9:24–27). A future event is to be dated using the year-day principle.

Another passage in which the year-day principle is present is Numbers 14:34. This is a prophecy of judgment against rebellious Israelites. The forty days the spies spent exploring the land are used to determine the number of years the people will have to bear their sins. The same terminology is used in Ezekiel 4:4–6, when the Lord commands the prophet to lie on his two sides for a total of 430 days. The days are then identified as the years of grace the Lord granted the people before the destruction of the city and the experience of the Exile. The language used is very clear: “a day for each year.” Although these cases are not found in apocalyptic prophecies, they provide the biblical background needed to justify identifying the use of the year-day principle in apocalyptic prophecies.

Symbolism of Apocalyptic Prophecies

The symbolism of the prophetic time periods is contextually supported by the abundant presence of apocalyptic symbols. For instance, human kingdoms are represented by metals (Dan. 2:31–33), animals (Dan. 7:3–7; 8:3–7; Rev. 13:1, 11), or horns (Dan. 7:8; 8:8–9; Rev. 17:12). The people of God are depicted as a pure woman (Rev. 12:1), while the false people of God are represented by the symbol of a prostitute (Rev. 17:4). Jesus is the Lamb (Rev. 6:1; cf. 5:5), and Satan is a dragon (Rev. 12:9). There is no question that apocalyptic prophecy is by definition rich in the use of symbols. Even the use of smaller numbers is usually interpreted as representing something other than literal numbers. For instance, seven is the number of completion or perfection; four stands for the universal; ten expresses completeness; and twelve is taken to represent the diversity of the people of God. It is within the context of the use of symbols that large prophetic time periods are introduced and discussed.

Even the language used to refer to prophetic time periods suggests a symbolic usage of the periods. For instance, the phrase “a time, [and] times, and half a time” (Dan. 7:25) cannot be taken as designating a literal three and a half years because the natural biblical way of expressing that literal time period is three years and six months (Luke 4:25; James 5:17; cf. 2 Sam. 2:11; Acts 8:11). Particularly interesting is that in apocalyptic prophecies days, weeks, and months are mentioned but not years. Symbolically the day stands for the year. Within the specific symbolic context of the time periods, it is hermeneutically sound, even required, to interpret the large time periods as symbolic. It is also hermeneutically sound to use the year-day principle to interpret the large numbers because it is, as we have demonstrated, a principle provided by the Bible itself.

Self-Authentication of the Year-Day Principle

The application of the year-day principle to apocalyptic prophecies is not a decision arbitrarily made by the interpreter, but one that flows from and is authenticated by the prophecy itself. For instance, as we have indicated, the apocalyptic discussion of four kingdoms leading to the kingdom of God covers the time from the days of the prophet to the end of sinful human history at the Second Coming of Christ. The time period of 1,260 days that covers the history of the little horn, representing apostate Christianity during the Middle Ages and the struggles of the dragon against God’s people during that same time (Dan 7:25; Rev. 12:6), could not designate literal days but years (A.D. 538–1798), as the history of the Christian church shows.

The self-authentication of the year-day principle is most clearly manifested in the apocalyptic prophecy of Daniel 8 (see commentary on Dan. 8:1–27). Daniel received a vision (Dan. 8:1; Heb. khazon) from the Lord that covered the time period from the Persian Empire to the time of Papal Rome. The question is asked, “How long will the vision [khazon] be?”—that is to say, how long will it take for the whole vision to be fulfilled. Daniel is told that it will take 2,300 evenings and mornings and then the sanctuary would be nitsdaq (lit. “justified,” variously translated as “cleansed” [LXX], “restored,” or “reconsecrated”; Dan.

8:14). A literal reading of the time period would not cover such a long historical period and, therefore, would not be a correct answer to the question asked in the text. The prophecy itself indicates that the year-day principle is operative and that it is required of the interpreter to use the principle in order to correctly understand it.

The self-authentication of the year-day principle is also found in Daniel 9:24–27 (see commentary on Dan. 9:24–27). The interpreter angel tells Daniel that from the going out of the decree (lit. “word”) to restore and rebuild Jerusalem (in 457 B.C.) until the coming of the Messiah (“the Anointed”), the Prince Ruler (A.D. 27), there would be seven weeks and sixty-two weeks, plus another week during which the Messiah will die (A.D. 31), for a total of seventy weeks (ending in A.D. 34). It is obvious that the prophecy is using the year-day principle because it requires for its fulfillment a span of hundreds of years. Some translate the Hebrew word for week (shabua’) as “sevens (of years)” and interpret it to refer to literal time (seven years in each week), thus practically excluding the use of the year-day principle. The weakness in this approach is that this word shabua’ never means “seven”; it means “week.” Besides, the prophetic period in Daniel is based on the sabbatical year and the Jubilee, according to which each day of the week represents a year. Therefore, the seventy weeks stand for a period of 490 days/years.

What we have seen in our discussion is that the year-day principle is solidly based on the Scriptures and that the Lord employed it in the revelations He gave to Daniel. The long historical span covered by the visions demonstrates that the principle was operative in them, thus self-authenticating its presence in the visions.

Year-Day Principle in History

As far as we can tell, apart from the Bible itself, the earliest evidence for the year-day principle can be found in the Book of Jubilees, a Jewish work from the intertestamental period, dated to the second century B.C. It uses the word week to refer to seven years. Each period of seven years is referred to as a week of years or simply as a week. The seventh of such “weeks of years” (i.e., the forty-ninth year) is designated as a Jubilee year.

A number of other Jewish sources also interpret the expression seventy weeks in Daniel 9:24 to mean 490 years (seventy weeks of years). They count seventy years from the destruction of the first temple to the restoration of the temple under Darius (Hag. 1:1–8) and another 420 years to the destruction of the second temple. This adds up to 490 years, although these figures do not harmonize with the actual dates in history (586 B.C. to A.D. 70).

Some church fathers who wrote commentaries on the book of Daniel interpreted it along historicist lines with Rome as the fourth power in Daniel 2 and 7. The seventy weeks in Daniel 9:24 were seen as 490 years, but the time prophecies in Daniel 7, 8, and 12 were placed as literal days either in the past, in the time of the Roman emperors, or in the future, in the time of the final antichrist. They did not yet have a clear understanding of the time periods, probably because they could not anticipate the passing of hundreds of years before the coming of Christ. The year-day principle, therefore, did not play an important role in the early centuries, though it was not unknown.

The first Christian interpreter to apply the year-day principle outside of the seventy weeks was probably Tichonius (late fourth century) from North Africa, who interpreted the three and a half days of the slaying of the witnesses (Rev. 11:11) to be three and a half years. Following Tichonius, we find throughout church history a number of Jewish and Christian interpreters who used the year-day principle, including Benjamin ben Moses Nahawendi (mid-ninth century), Joachim of Floris (A.D. 1130–1202), and Protestant Reformer Philipp Melancthon (A.D. 1497–1560). But during the eighteenth and nineteenth

Babylon centuries, at the time when the 1,260-, 1,290-, 1,335-, and 2,300-day prophecies were being fulfilled, the number of interpreters who used the year-day principle increased enormously (cf. Dan. 12:4).

Medo-Persia

APOCALYPTIC HISTORICAL CHRONOLOGY

Greece The angel interpreter does not identify the historical entities represented by the fourth kingdom or the little horn. It is at this point that we move from the known to the unknown, to the dangerous zone of human speculation. Finding proper controls is not impossible. The best we can do is to use the same procedure employed by the angel. It is obvious that in the historical outline he provided for us he was describing the succession of ancient empires. The one that destroyed the previous kingdom established itself as the new kingdom. Therefore, we can use that same idea to identify the fourth kingdom: the kingdom that overcame Greece and established itself as the new kingdom was Rome. In our identification of the fourth beast, we have simply followed the same procedure employed by the angel interpreter to identify the historical powers represented by the three previous beasts.

Rome

Judgment

Kingdom of God

Our interpretation of the fourth kingdom is supported by the NT, particularly by Jesus, who, as indicated already, suggested that the fourth kingdom was Rome. Consequently, the horns would represent the division of the Roman Empire. What about the little horn? Already in around A.D. 200, Hippolytus interpreted the fourth beast as the Roman Empire and the little horn as the antichrist. Christian interpreters early in the Christian era continued to use the system of interpretation employed by the angel interpreter to identify the historical fulfillment of apocalyptic prophecies. This was also done by the Reformers. Adventists locate themselves within this approach to the interpretation of apocalyptic prophecies. We also keep in mind that we begin to gain a better understanding of the fulfillment of these prophecies after they are fulfilled. Nevertheless, such prophecies should be studied because they are a revelation from God to His church to guide it and to nurture hope while waiting for the return of the Lord.

CONCLUSION

Today historicism is not the predominant method used by scholars interpreting apocalyptic prophecies. Rationalism's rejection of divine intervention in human affairs, and of God's willingness to reveal to His prophets events that will occur in the distant future, has had a major impact on Christian theology. Liberal theologians prefer to find in Daniel and Revelation the situation of the people of God when the books were written, thus eliminating their predictive role. Our study shows that historicism is the only valid approach to apocalyptic prophecy simply because this is the method that the Bible itself offers. It accepts that Daniel was written in the sixth century B.C. and that there is such a thing as predictive prophecy that covers the whole span of time from the days of the prophet to the establishment of the kingdom of God. One of the key components of this hermeneutical focus is the year-day principle. The biblical evidence in favor of this principle is clear and decisive and is presupposed by the apocalyptic books themselves. In fact, these books authenticate the principle itself.

FAITH AND SCIENCE

Much has been written about the relationship between faith and science as two different ways of determining what is true. Authors generally agree that the question is important, but they often come to radically different conclusions in trying to construct an answer. What is it about the topic of faith and science that generates such different responses? There are several reasons, one of which can be seen by comparing their definitions.

FAITH AND SCIENCE: DEFINITIONS AND SCOPE

Faith

Christian faith is confident trust in God and His word demonstrated by action. Abraham is often used as an example of faith (Heb. 11:8–12). When God called Abraham to leave his home for an unknown location, he revealed his faith by obeying and leaving (Gen. 12:1, 4). When God called on Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac as a burnt offering, he revealed his faith by laying Isaac on the altar. God intervened to spare Abraham the grief of losing his son and commended him for demonstrating his complete trust in God's word.

A combination of factors contribute to developing trust in Scripture. One factor is the appeal to our intellect. Fulfilled prophecy, archeological confirmation of biblical historical details, and internal consistency all contribute to increase one's confidence in the reliability of Scripture (e.g., John 13:19). A second factor is actual life experience. We may have found God's word trustworthy in the past. This may include events in our lives such as perceived acts of providence, answered prayers, and changed habits (e.g., John 10:38). These two factors are important in building our faith, but they are incomplete on their own. The internal testimony of the Holy Spirit impresses us of the truths of the Bible and solidifies our faith. Thus, faith is a divine gift (Eph. 2:10; John 16:13).

A key aspect of faith is that it goes beyond any direct evidence. Empirical evidence plays an indirect role here by establishing the credibility of the source on which faith rests, but faith extends that confidence to instances beyond the empirical evidence. People of faith choose to believe what the Bible says about the physical world because they have found Scripture to be reliable in their personal experience. Their conclusion may be corroborated by the experiences of other believers, adding to their confidence.

Science

Philosophers of science have been unable to provide a universally satisfactory definition of science, although most people have a fairly good idea of what it is. Two definitions of science are commonly used. Historically, science has been understood broadly as the search to understand how the world works. Using this definition, science could include almost any systematized body of knowledge, regardless of its philosophical underpinnings.

On the other hand, many scientists prefer to define science more narrowly, as a systematic search for the physical mechanisms that produce the regularities observed in the natural world, ideally expressed in mathematical terms. This definition gives science an implicitly atheistic approach, since it rejects any reference to God or any other supernatural agent. The exclusion of God from science is commonly called methodological naturalism.

Methodological naturalism does not necessarily require a denial of God's existence, but it does imply that everything in nature can be explained without reference to God. In effect, there is no difference between methodological naturalism and philosophical materialism in the practice of science. The naturalistic bias of science narrowly defined is a key factor in its tension with faith.

The legitimate scope of science depends on which of the two definitions is intended. Science defined narrowly applies to a more restricted scope of inquiry. This type of science is properly applied to events that follow frequently observed regularities in nature. Science that considers only physical mechanisms still in operation today will never find a true explanation for one-time events (miracles, singularities) caused by supernatural agents. Supernatural actions, by definition, are beyond the scope of this type of science.

In contrast, science defined in a general sense as an attempt to understand the world through systematic study can be applied to any aspect of reality that is accessible to human investigation. No potential explanation is excluded a priori, leaving the investigator open to any rational explanation, including the possibility of divine activity.

Role of Faith in Science

Faith is often considered strictly a religious idea, and indeed, faith is at the core of Christian belief and practice. It is impossible to please God without faith (Heb. 11:6). Trust is a necessary part of everyday life. Everyone has to act in situations where empirical evidence is incomplete. We may trust that another person is acting "in good faith," meaning we believe the person will honor his or her word, even when there is no written contract. We trust that our automobile will carry us to an appointment on time, even though we know there is a risk involved. Trust, or faith, cannot operate without risk, but it is a calculated risk where the perceived likelihood of failure is low enough to justify the action. Thus, faith in a generic sense is not strictly a religious idea but rather a universal experience that is present in all human activities.

Science is often considered superior to Christian faith because its claims are supposedly objective and verifiable by anyone with the proper training and equipment. Materialists often criticize faith because it is based on personal experience and cannot be independently verified. This perception is not entirely true, because many Christians have reported similar faith experiences, such as a sense of the divine presence, unexplained providences, and answered prayers. However, it is true that specific personal experience cannot be shared by another person.

Ironically, the situation in science is similar. No scientist can “share the experience” by personally verifying every scientific report. We tend to accept specific conclusions of scientists because other conclusions have so often been corroborated. This gives us confidence in science, and rightly so, but our confidence should be informed by times in the history of scientific revolutions when what everyone “knew” to be true turned out to be false or, at best, incomplete (see “Examples of Faith and Science in Tension,” p. 61). In this sense, our understandings of both science and faith are subject to limitations in our ability to personally confirm the claims made by others.

The distinction between faith and science is not the presence or absence of empirical evidence, but the role of different types of evidence in drawing conclusions. Empirical evidence is also valued by faith. The Apostle John appealed to empirical evidence from his own experience as the basis for his testimony (1 John 1:1–3). However, science insists on clear physical evidence, whereas faith goes beyond the physical evidence to trusting God’s word.

Reason

Reason is the use of our intellect to evaluate the logical and empirical implications of a statement, observation, or experience. A common misconception is the claim that conflict between faith and science is really a conflict between reason (science) and blind belief (Christian faith).

It is true that one cannot reason one’s way to faith, any more than one can discover scientific truth purely by reason, but reason is necessary for both faith and science. We use our reason when we accept that what someone tells us is true because we have confidence in that person, even when we have no other evidence of the truth of the particular facts we are told by that person. We apply our reason as we evaluate the sometimes-conflicting claims of different sources of knowledge. It is incorrect to claim that reason is applied in science but not in faith. In both cases, we use our reason to analyze our experience, either with Scripture or with science or with both. Reason is absolutely necessary, although not sufficient, in both endeavors.

Misuse/Distortions

Both faith and science can be misused. One misuse of faith is to assume that God is acting directly in nature solely on the basis of our lack of explanations for various phenomena. This is called the God-of-the-gaps fallacy. Although now infrequently encountered, this has been a problem in the past. For example, the ancients did not know how blood flowed from the arteries to the veins. This lack of knowledge was used as a basis to conclude that God somehow miraculously guided the blood. When capillaries were discovered to connect the arteries and the veins, the idea that God was guiding the blood was discarded. As scientific knowledge increased, this type of experience was repeated several times until scholars discounted the whole idea of God acting directly in nature. As a result, He virtually disappeared from science.

Science also may be misused. The success of science in refuting many erroneous beliefs and discovering many aspects of nature has led some to extrapolate its successes far beyond the evidence. Some scholars claim science is the only way to obtain knowledge. This idea is known as scientism, and it is widely accepted in modern society, sometimes without awareness of its implications. Scientism is logically self-contradictory because the claim that there are no supernatural events is based not on scientific evidence but on a philosophical commitment to exclude God.

FAITH AND SCIENCE IN HISTORY

Faith and science are frequently regarded as hostile to each other, but the conflict is often overstated. In the history of modern science, many of the pioneers of science openly interpreted their scientific inquiries as attempts to understand how God acts in the world. At present, science is dominated by a materialistic bias, but this has not always been the case, nor is it necessary.

Most branches of modern science were founded by scientists of Christian faith. John Ray (1627–1705), considered the father of modern biology, chose to title his book The Wisdom of God Manifested in the Works of Creation. In this book Ray described the features of living organisms as evidence of God's actions in designing the creation.

Isaac Newton (1642–1726), probably the most influential scientist in history, made significant contributions to physics, mathematics, and other areas. It is said that Newton wrote more about the Bible than about science, but Newton's Christian faith did not interfere with his science. Robert Boyle (1627–1691), the father of modern chemistry, was a devout Christian who established a series of lectures dedicated to the study of God's handiwork in nature. Other pioneering scientists who regarded science as the study of God's works include Johannes Kepler, Blaise Pascal, Michael Faraday, James Clerk Maxwell, William Thompson (Lord Kelvin), Gregor Mendel, Antonie van Leewenhoek, and many others.

Science has contributed greatly to faith by expanding our knowledge of God's creation. Scripture tells us that God is all-powerful and all-knowing, but science has illustrated these points in ways that we would otherwise have no way of discovering. For example, scientific discoveries of the immense size and finely tuned structure of the universe have improved our understanding of God's infinite power and wisdom exercised in creating and sustaining it. Scientific discoveries of the astounding complexity of even the "simplest" living organism have increased our appreciation for God's engineering genius. Scientific discoveries of the fitness of our world for sustaining human life have added to our appreciation of His wonderful providence in designing an environment in which we can survive and thrive. These examples illustrate that science and faith can cooperate in productive partnership.

It should be emphasized that much, probably most, of science does not conflict at all with Christian faith. Instead, the two sources of knowledge are widely complementary. For example, there is no conflict over the physical constants of the universe, the structure of the atom, the principles of chemistry, cellular and organismal anatomy and physiology, ecological relationships, and a host of other aspects of science. There is no conflict between Christian faith and scientific experiments, except when the experiment is unethical, such as some experimentation on humans.

EXAMPLES OF FAITH AND SCIENCE IN TENSION

Some of the most dramatic examples of conflict between faith and science have come as the result of the corruption of faith by the incorporation of ideas from science that everyone “knew” at the time but that turned out to be incorrect. Probably the most famous examples of conflict between faith and science are the conflicts over a geocentric universe and the fixity of species.

Galileo and the Solar System

The experience of Galileo (and, by implication, Copernicus) is widely used as an example of what happens to faith when it opposes science, with the implication that faith must retreat in the face of science. There is an important lesson in this story, but it is quite different from the one usually proposed. The Galileo story is not nearly as simplistic as is sometimes claimed. There was indeed a conflict involving Galileo and some church leaders, but it was complicated by Galileo’s abrasive attitude and intemperate language and the fact that his arguments were not that compelling and included some errors. There were scientists and theologians on both sides of the debate. Nevertheless, it is true that the Catholic Church was embroiled in the conflict and suffered a great loss of prestige as a result.

What is often overlooked is how the church got into that situation initially. Biblical texts are often invoked to claim that the Bible teaches a geocentric universe. However, the true origin of that idea comes from the Greek philosophers, whose ideas were organized and systematized about A.D. 150 by Ptolemy in Alexandria, Egypt. The geocentric system is known as the Ptolemaic system because Ptolemy systematized the thinking of previous philosophers into the theory that bears his name. In attempting to show that science confirms the Bible, early church fathers incorporated this Greek idea into their theology. Texts that use phenomenological words (describing an event in the language of appearance) were interpreted as literal descriptions of proven scientific reality. We still use phenomenological language when we refer to “sunrise” and “sunset,” describing them as they appear, although we know that the earth’s turning on its axis only creates the appearance.

Ironically, modern astrophysics tells us that any point, including the earth, can be taken as the center of the universe, as it is all relative. The advantage of taking the sun rather than the earth to be the center of the solar system is that the mathematics are much simpler.

The real lesson we need to learn from the Galileo incident is that it is inappropriate to incorporate scientific conclusions into our theology, even when “everyone knows they are true.” Science is tentative, and scientific conclusions should never be given the status of biblical truths because it is likely the science will change in the future and leave the person of faith embarrassed.

Darwin and the Fixity of Species

The second example from history of a conflict between faith and science is the matter of the fixity of species. This came to the forefront with the work of Charles Darwin, who proposed that species are not fixed, contrary to what he was taught in his theology course at Cambridge. Instead, species can change and adapt to different habitats. Darwin's observations made a solid case that species can change. Unfortunately, he extrapolated the potential degree of change far beyond the evidence. The ensuing conflict with Christian faith continues to this day, and many Christians have abandoned the Creation story and accepted some form of Darwin's ideas of common ancestry. Again, the church was embarrassed in its conflict with "science."

One may ask how the church got into this predicament. Where did the idea come from that species cannot change? The answer, again, is that the idea came from the ancient Greeks, specifically from Plato's ideas of unchanging "types," further developed by Neoplatonic thinkers. Once more, church leaders took a secular, Greek idea that "everyone knew was true" and incorporated it into their theology. When science advanced and showed that the ancient Greeks were wrong, the church was wrong by association. As with the Galileo incident, the important lesson here is to resist attempts to incorporate "scientific" ideas that "everyone knows are true" into Christian theology. No scientific idea should be regarded as absolute; there is always a likelihood science will change.

CONTEMPORARY ISSUES IN FAITH AND SCIENCE

God and Nature

As already noted, Christian faith affirms that God actively created the universe, our world, and all that exists, continues to maintain its existence, and occasionally acts to accomplish specific purposes. In contrast, modern science generally endorses methodological naturalism, which is the claim that science can discover how nature works without any reference to God or any other supernatural agent. According to this thinking, the laws of nature are fixed, and if God acts in nature, He is constrained to follow natural law, and this means all events in nature can be explained by the "fixed laws of nature."

These differences between the presuppositions of faith and of science play out mainly in questions of origins and other events identified biblically as miraculous. The contemporary issues of greatest significance are the questions of deep time, the nature of humans, and intelligent design.

Deep Time

Those who postulate production of living organisms by natural law realize this is highly improbable and cannot be expected to occur without immense periods of time and vast numbers of chance events. Long ages of time are needed in hopes they can somehow fill the gap in natural law. George Wald, a Nobel-prize-winning chemist, noted the dependence on long ages of time for the materialistic origin of life, arguing that what humans consider impossible to happen in the natural world will happen if given enough time (two billion years). According to him, time performs miracles. But the logic of the statement does not work when the event is in fact impossible, and the origin of life by natural processes is, by all available evidence, truly impossible.

Scientists have searched for methods of measuring the expected long ages of time needed by materialistic science. They believe they have found such a method in the system of radioisotope dating. Radioisotope dating is based on the observation that certain atoms (radioactive isotopes) are unstable and break down by nuclear reactions to form a different kind of atom. The rate at which this breakdown occurs can be expressed in a mathematical formula, and the amount of time required for any specific amount of material to break down can be calculated. The amount of material thought to have broken down can be precisely measured in rocks. The results of such calculations are interpreted to show that different kinds of plants and animals have existed at different times of earth history, extending over a period exceeding 500 million years.

Creationists hold a different view of God's activity in nature. Because of God's supernatural power and intelligence, He can accomplish His purposes without any constraint of time. Scripture describes the creation of our world and its inhabitants within a single week of time. This is no problem for God, because He created nature and its laws. He is not limited by the laws of nature but uses them to accomplish His purposes in any period of time He chooses.

Because the Creation story is foundational to the message of the entire Bible, and Christians have found the Bible to be reliable in their personal lives, they can have faith to believe that the biblical Creation story is true and that Creation did not occupy long ages of time. Creationists point to evidence that indicates a shorter chronology, such as in the widespread preservation of fossil biomolecules, the evidence for catastrophic deposition of many of the sedimentary layers, layers missing without evidence of erosion, and other lines of evidence that do not fit easily with the long-age timescale.

Creationists do not yet have a satisfactory explanation for radioisotope dating, but they believe that such an explanation is possible and are working toward improving their understanding. There is no logical need to replace the biblical description of Creation with processes acting over long ages; the existence of a Creator God makes the short-age model entirely reasonable.

Human Nature

The Bible teaches that humans were created by God separately from any other form of life, endowed with the image of God, and given dominion over the other creatures. Thus, humans are qualitatively different from other creatures.

The uniqueness of humans can be observed in human capacities, which include a sense of morality and spirituality; awareness of one's self and one's relationship to the rest of creation; and the ability to conceptualize abstract ideas and create new forms, plan for future events, compose and appreciate music, and conceptualize abstract mathematical concepts.

Humans also have numerous genes not found in other species. These so-called orphan genes may be responsible for some of the unique characteristics of humans, such as the expanded brain and reasoning capacity. Creationists endorse the biblical teaching that humans are created separately from ordinary animals.

Scientists who deny God's activity in nature have searched for natural mechanisms to explain the existence of humans and their unique qualities. The theory of evolution through random variation and natural selection has been offered as an explanation for the origin of humans and other types of creatures. There is widespread acceptance that natural selection can help species adapt to different local environments (microevolution). However, new types of organisms are not produced by gradual modification of existing species, and many scientists have concluded that evolutionary theory does not explain how new types of organisms might arise (macroevolution). Despite the empirical shortcomings of evolution, there really is no other alternative except special creation, and this they refuse to accept.

Many fossils of humans and humanlike organisms (hominids) have been found. Some of these, such as Neanderthal Man and the "erectines" (Homo erectus and similar fossils) seem related to humans living today ("anatomically modern humans"). Some, such as most of the australopithecines, are clearly apelike. Some fossils appear to have a mosaic of human and apelike traits.

Proponents of evolutionary theory have pointed to these fossils, especially those with a mosaic of human and apelike traits, as transitional fossils that show the evolution of humans from apelike ancestors. Many attempts have been made to construct an evolutionary tree linking all these different forms together, but a steady stream of new discoveries continues to upset the theories. Despite the unstable nature of the proposed evolutionary trees, the existence of these curious fossils has been used to oppose the biblical story of the separate creation of humans.

Very few creationists have pursued the training needed to critically analyze the hominid fossil evidence. It is obvious that the data are sparse, as seen by the frequent upset of proposed evolutionary relationships, but creationists would like to know how these fossils fit with their viewpoint.

Many of the fossil hominids appear to be degenerate, perhaps from inbreeding in isolated small groups soon after the biblical Flood. The extent of variation among the humanlike fossils may be similar to the variation seen in other species. Considerable variation of genes and body form is seen in most living animal groups that have been examined. Among the many examples are dogs, horses, pigs, cattle, chickens, and carp. There is no reason to doubt that humans may have, or once had, a similar potential for variation that could include the Neanderthals and erectines.

The apelike fossils may represent an extinct type of ape, again with the ordinary variation in form that would encompass the entire australopithecine group. The mosaic fossils may represent corruption of the originally created species through degeneration, some type of genetic intermixing, or other unknown factors. Some have suggested the mosaic specimens are actually a mixture of human and apelike individuals, but this is difficult to evaluate without more data. Whatever the details, the hominid fossil record does not disprove the biblical record that humans were specially created apart from any other type of creature.

INTELLIGENT DESIGN IN NATURE: A CONTEMPORARY ISSUE

There is much debate over the possibility that evidence of God's activity can be seen in nature. Everyone recognizes that nature has a design that makes it possible for life to survive and flourish on the earth. The debate is whether this design comes from within nature itself (chance and natural law) or whether it has been crafted by an intelligent mind. As a result, there are two ways to explore this issue: establishing the complexity of design and then establishing the nature of design. With design as the hub, we can think of this as studies leading up to design and studies leading from design.

The Argument to Design

The claim here is that the apparent design in nature can be attributed to an intelligent cause, and not to a combination of chance and natural law, due to its complexity. This argument to design is the theme of the intelligent design movement. The identity of the designer is not a necessary part of this argument, although most people conclude it is probably the Creator God recognized by Christians and also by many non-Christians. Some examples of the argument to design are described below.

Intelligent Design in the Structure of the Universe. The origin, orderliness, and fine-tuning of the universe appear to be the result of intelligent design. Before the discovery of the cosmic redshift and the cosmic microwave background, materialists chose to believe the universe was eternal. Hence its origin needed no explanation. The new discoveries were interpreted to indicate that the universe had a beginning and was not eternal. Thus, an explanation was needed. Despite almost heroic efforts, materialists have not developed any plausible theory that explains the origin of the universe. Many see creation as the best explanation for the origin of the universe and also see it as an example of intelligent design.

The order observed in the universe is another feature that points to intelligent design in nature. The second law of thermodynamics is one of the most well-established regularities observed in nature, and it states that disorder increases over time in a closed system. What, then, is the origin of the order seen in the universe? If the universe exhibits order now, it must have been more orderly in the past. This implies the universe is not a closed system but has received input from an intelligent designer who acted to arrange order in the universe at its creation and possibly afterward.

A third feature of the universe that points to intelligent design is the fine-tuning problem. The structure of the universe is highly sensitive to the exact values of a multitude of physical constants and the fundamental forces. There are numerous physical constants, such as the charges and masses of the atomic particles, the speed of light, and Planck's constant. The four fundamental forces (electromagnetic force, weak nuclear force, strong nuclear force, and gravitational force) are responsible for interactions among atomic particles and different bodies of matter. Remarkably, the physical constants and fundamental forces have the precise values that are needed in order for the universe to be suitable for living organisms. In most cases, the slightest change would mean the universe would be unsuitable for life. It is difficult indeed to avoid the conclusion that the fine-tuning of the universe is purposeful, the result of design by an intelligent and omnipotent Creator.

Intelligent Design in the Living Cell. Living organisms provide an excellent example of intelligent design. The "simplest" living organisms are bacteria, each composed of a single cell. Bacteria are less complex than humans, but they are not at all simple. A single cell includes thousands of molecular machines that interact in chemical-mechanical pathways to produce materials that otherwise would never form in nature. Those molecular machines that have been investigated are extraordinarily complex, and it is highly probable that this is true for all the cellular machinery.

Living cells come only from other living cells and are never observed to form spontaneously from chemicals outside a living cell. Cells cannot form gradually through evolutionary processes, but a complete set of components must be in place for the cell to be alive. Thus, a living cell is irreducibly complex, meaning it cannot be constructed one step at a time through evolutionary processes. There is no plausible mechanism for the origin of living cells other than creation by an intelligent mind.

Irreducible complexity does not exclude the use of the components in other applications. Neither does it mean that there is no redundancy in the cellular components, as some opponents have pointed out. What it means is that an irreducibly complex system cannot be constructed stepwise by gradual evolutionary processes but must be assembled by an intelligent agent. The irreducible complexity of the cell, many of its interacting molecular systems, and a large number of its component parts all support the hypothesis of an active intelligent designer.

Other Examples of Intelligent Design. Intelligent design can also be seen in many other aspects of the creation. The information content of DNA and the molecules associated with its function is not explained by chance or by natural law. Information is stored in the sequence of nucleotides found in the DNA. The sequence is not determined by the laws of chemistry as we know them, and it is too specific and improbable to be explained as the result of chance. It does, however, have similarities with information codes produced by humans and thus bears the marks of intelligent design.

Numerous factors contribute to the fitness of our earth to support life. These include the distance of the earth from the sun, the type and amount of energy output by the sun, the mass of the earth and the moon, the speed of rotation of the earth, the composition of the atmosphere, the abundance of water, with its special properties, the earth's magnetic field, and more. Any single factor may seem unremarkable, but the combination of all these factors, both necessary and sufficient for life, is best explained by intelligent design.

Other examples could be described, such as the components of the nitrogen cycle, the ecological interdependence of plants and animals, the amazing migratory ability of birds, the human mind, the wonderful variety of plants and animals, and the striking mathematical nature of the creation. Any single example is a strong indicator of intelligent design and even more so when they are considered collectively.

The argument to design implies that the materialistic bias that pervades modern science is inappropriate. Because of this implication, materialistic scientists find it philosophically necessary to try to refute the evidence for intelligent design, attributing it to chance or the laws of nature. Their outspoken criticism has contributed to the perceived tension between faith and science, but, ironically, it has helped advocates of intelligent design sharpen their arguments, making the evidence for intelligent design even more compelling.

The Argument from Design

The argument from design is the argument that the intelligent designer whose works are seen in the creation must be the Creator God described in Scripture. This is certainly the biblical view, as, for example, in Psalm 19:1. Nature displays the glory of God. Many other texts affirm that God is the Creator of our world and all that is in it.

The biblical position is confirmed by many Christians in their own experiences. Many have had confirmation of the activity of God in their own personal lives and have experienced the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

Human Personality. The personal nature of humans provides evidence that the designer of the universe is a person and not an impersonal force. Human beings have personality, free will, self-consciousness, and, normally, an inborn sense of morality. These characteristics are not derived from natural laws but are best explained as the result of design by a Creator having similar characteristics. The biblical explanation is that humans were created in the image of the Creator, and this remains the best explanation.

Purpose in Nature. Purpose is another evidence that the world was designed by an intelligent Person and not by impersonal forces. Purpose requires the ability to arrange events in such a way as to produce a desired result. Impersonal forces do not have purpose but merely act according to natural law or randomly. Purpose may be seen in a general sense in the structure of the universe, the fitness of the environment, and the irreducible complexity of life. It may be seen more specifically in the actions of humans as they go about their daily lives and even in the lives of animals as they seek food, shelter, and mates. Purpose is a mark of a personal intelligence, in this case a supernatural intelligence—the Creator God.

The argument to design and the argument from design combine to affirm the view that the world was created by God, who is a Person and who continues to act to uphold His creation.

This claim results in tension between faith and science that is based on the fundamental difference between the two and what each can and cannot accomplish. There is also a tension between the faith bias and the materialistic bias of all practitioners of modern science. Science itself, which is dependent on neither, is used by both sides.

REASONS FOR TENSION BETWEEN FAITH AND SCIENCE

According to the Bible, God is both the Author of Scripture and the Creator of nature. Thus the expectation is that faith and science will be in harmony when properly interpreted. And yet sometimes there is tension, as has been described in previous paragraphs. Examining the philosophical underpinnings of science can help explain the basis of the tension.

Everyone makes some assumptions about the meaning of their existence and how they choose to live. These assumptions are not determined scientifically but are philosophical in nature. Among the most important of these are the relationship of God and nature (part of metaphysics), how one obtains knowledge (epistemology), and how one should behave (ethics). All these questions are related to one's beliefs about origins, and it is here that much of the tension between faith and science is grounded.

Different Worldviews

Collectively, these philosophical assumptions form our worldview, which shapes the way we interpret our experiences and the world about us. Having a worldview is not optional—everyone has one, whether or not they realize it. We generally take our worldview for granted and believe it represents the truth about our world. There are many different worldviews, but most of them fall into one of three categories: theism, pantheism, and materialism.

Theism is the view that God created the universe and is active in it. Matter and energy are created entities under the control of the Creator. People who accept this worldview believe their lives have meaning and purpose because God created them for a purpose. Theists ultimately expect harmony between faith and science and believe tension results from incomplete knowledge. Christians, Jews, and Muslims generally hold worldviews in this category.

Pantheism is the view that God and the universe are the same thing. Matter and energy are manifestations of eternal, impersonal spirit. People who accept this worldview generally believe their bodies are temporary vehicles for eternal spirit and this life is only a phase of existence. Pantheist thought varies, but many adherents do not consider the relationship between faith and science to be important because all truth is relative. Hindus, most animists, Daoists, some New Agers, and many Buddhists hold pantheistic beliefs.

The third worldview category is materialism, also called naturalism. In this view, matter and energy comprise all of reality, and no spiritual entities exist. People who accept this worldview generally believe they are merely complex forms of matter, and there is no spiritual reality or afterlife. Materialists do not expect to find harmony between faith and science because they believe faith is entirely subjective and science is the best way to find truth. Advocates of this position include secular humanists, many atheists, and many of the prominent voices in science.

Deism is another worldview that has an important influence on the relation of faith and science. It does not fit easily into any of the three categories described above, but it combines elements of theism and materialism. Deists accept the existence of a Creator God, a theistic concept, but they deny any supernatural activity in nature, a materialistic principle. In the context of science, there is little if any practical distinction between deists and materialists.

Contradictory Presuppositions in Worldviews

Different worldviews make contradictory assumptions about reality. The most important source of tension between faith and science may be the different presuppositions regarding the relationship of God and nature. Christians of faith affirm that a personal God has been, and continues to be, active in nature. In contrast, science is dominated by the materialistic assumption that there is no God active in nature, while pantheists see only impersonal forces. Thus tension exists on issues such as Creation and the Flood not necessarily because of the empirical evidence but because of philosophical preferences.

Another major philosophical factor underlying the tension between faith and science is their different ways of determining what is accepted as truth. Christian faith affirms the value of special revelation in Scripture, while materialistic scientists consider only physical evidence and only known natural laws. Materialism easily leads to scientism—the belief that science is the only pathway to knowledge. If science is defined materialistically but is applied to events with supernatural causes, tension is to be expected.

Another factor in the tension between faith and science is the tentative nature of scientific conclusions compared to the expectation that faith is based on eternal truths. This becomes a problem when scientific ideas are absorbed into religious faith, as discussed earlier. Science has experienced many revolutions in thought, in which ideas that everyone believed to be true were found to be faulty and replaced by newer ideas. If a scientific idea has been incorporated into religious faith and given the status of eternal truth, any change in the science will produce a crisis of faith.

Tension Related to Historical Questions

The conflict between faith and science primarily comes when we try to reconstruct past events. This is because one's worldview presuppositions have a much stronger influence on interpreting the evidence for historical questions than when dealing with events that can be replicated and analyzed repeatedly. For example, faith and science propose conflicting explanations (supernatural as opposed to naturalistic) for the origin of the universe, the origin of life, the origins of biodiversity, the origin of humans and human consciousness, and so on. These are all historical questions. It is much easier to analyze an event for which the initial conditions are known than to try to reconstruct a past event based only on the evidence left from that event.

When we find conflict regarding these historical questions, this should alert us to the likelihood that the event in question has a supernatural element that is not taken into account by the scientist with materialistic presuppositions. We would be wise to recognize that human efforts cannot access all of reality, and there is more to nature than science can discover.

DEALING WITH TENSION BETWEEN FAITH AND SCIENCE

The incompleteness of our knowledge makes tension between faith and science understandable. One's interpretation of the nature of faith and science and one's reaction to the tensions will be shaped by one's philosophical presuppositions. Those with different presuppositions will react to the tension in different ways. The major ways of dealing with the tension are described below.

Neglecting the Issue

Some are simply unaware that there is an issue here. Children would naturally be in this category until they reach a certain age or educational level, usually by the time they reach secondary school. Some avoid the issue by refusing to dwell on the idea or by keeping themselves so preoccupied with other issues that they never spend time thinking about faith and science. Many seem to think that the question is resolved and no further consideration is warranted.

This approach is unsatisfactory because the issues are central to our understanding of ourselves, the people around us, our environment, and our future. It is difficult to live in modern society very long without being confronted with questions of the relationship between faith and science.

Faith and Science as Inherently Contradictory

The takeover of science by scholars with a militantly materialistic worldview is a major factor in the perception that faith and science are enemies. The theism of faith and atheism/materialism that is imposed into the neutral processes of science pose an irreconcilable conflict, and since faith deals with the unseen and science with the seen, the choice is often made to reject faith, accept the materialism of many of the practitioners of science, and call that materialism itself science.

For those who deny God's activity in nature, the evidence for intelligent design is a nagging problem. The vehemence of the opposition to the apparently benign claim of intelligent design betrays the depth of the struggle to resist theism despite the evidence. Hopefully, the evidence, together with the impressions of the Holy Spirit, may help many to make the transition from materialism to theism.

Faith and Science as Isolated

One strategy to deal with tension between faith and science is to mentally isolate them from each other. One popular form of this approach is called NOMA (Non-Overlapping Magisteria). In this view, science and faith deal with two separate, independent aspects of reality. Science deals with the physical world, while faith deals with spiritual issues such as feelings and morals. There is no possibility of conflict because the two sources are "non-overlapping"—they do not deal with the same topics.

It has been rightly pointed out that it is disingenuous to claim that faith and science do not overlap in scope. In fact, Christian faith has much to say about the world, its origins, its operations, and its future. If one accepts the claims of NOMA that faith deals only with feelings and emotions and not with the physical world, one has ceded to science the entire realm of physical reality, leaving only the subjective churnings of mental states to the realm of faith. This is essentially a materialistic position and faces the same problem of evidence for intelligent design that so threatens materialistic philosophy.

Science as Foundational for Faith

The concept of science as the foundation for faith suggests that the Bible describes God's interactions with His people but it is not intended to teach us about the physical world. That task is allegedly the work of science. This proposal is commonly associated with statements such as "the Bible is not a textbook of science." This phrase is commonly used to justify the proposition that we should look to science to learn about the origins and history of our world and let science determine the validity of what Scripture says about the natural world.

Theistic evolution probably fits into this category, as it holds that God exists but does not act in nature in detectable ways, implying that science is the only reliable way to learn the truth about our world. Theistic evolution fails for several reasons. Philosophically, one may ask what evidence there is for a God who does not act in nature and why anyone should accept that proposition. Scientifically, the evidence for intelligent design described above and elsewhere falsifies the assumption that God does not act in nature. This helps explain the outspoken antagonism of theistic evolutionists to the claims of intelligent design. Theologically, theistic evolution is inconsistent with the God of the Bible, who abhors suffering and opposes death. Death and replacement are required for evolution to proceed. Why would God oppose the very means He allegedly used to create? The relationship described here results in a view of faith and science that differs little from the materialistic view and is untenable in the light of biblical revelation.

Natural theology is the attempt to use science as the basis for theology. The natural theologian accepts that God is active in nature and uses that as the basis for inferring God's character. This approach is highly problematic. While it is true that we can see evidence of God's power in the creation, it is only in the Bible that we can clearly see God's grace, justice, mercy, love, and so on. Nature does not provide a clear picture of what God is like.

The attempt to infer what God is like by studying nature runs headlong into the problem of natural evil. Natural evil includes the destructive effects of earthquakes, floods, famine, and fire; along with suffering from cancer, genetic diseases, and infections; venomous animals; the violence of predation, and the like. If one constructs a picture of God based only on nature, it will be a God of both good and evil, not the compassionate Redeemer and Healer described in the Gospels.

The proper method for developing an understanding of God's character is to study the Bible, especially the life and teachings of Jesus Christ, who was and is the Creator. The Scriptures reveal that there is an enemy, Satan, who introduced evil into this world and is engaged in a great controversy with Christ. Nature has been affected by the curse of Satan's activities so that it does not present an accurate picture of the Creator. Jesus showed us what God is really like.

Concordism: Compromising Faith with Science

Concordism is the attempt to combine elements from both science and the Bible into a theory of origins. Where there is conflict, conclusions about the physical world are shaped by the teachings of science, while conclusions about divine activity are derived from Scripture. In practical terms, this means combining the discrete acts of special creation from the Bible with the long ages of deep time taken from geology. Two examples of concordism are described here.

The Day-Age Theory. This theory proposes that the days of Creation were each long ages of time, not a single week as described in Genesis. This theory has declined in popularity but still has many followers. Unfortunately for the theory, there are major discrepancies between the fossil sequence and the Creation week sequence. The most glaring of these are the fruit trees. Fruit trees and grains are among the first group of organisms created during Creation week, before any animals were created. In the fossil record, fruit trees and grains do not appear until after many fossil layers of both land and aquatic animals were deposited. Another discrepancy is that land animals were created after flying animals during Creation week, but land animals appear below (i.e., before) flying creatures in the fossil record.

Progressive Creation. This theory proposes that God created in discrete events, as described in Genesis, but the time of these events is expanded to millions of years in order to fit the geological time scale. In essence, the theory takes the fossil sequence as the sequence of creation rather than the sequence of burial and preservation. The creation sequence of Genesis is discarded, avoiding the problem of trying to match it to the fossil sequence. The days of Creation week are discarded and replaced by a long, indefinite period of time, avoiding the problem of trying to make it fit into a Creation week. All that is left of Genesis is the idea that God created the various elements of our world in discrete acts. Some similar theories discard special creation altogether and replace it with divinely guided evolution.

Progressive creation intends to resolve some of the conflicts between faith and science, but it does so by stripping the biblical Creation story of its content. The costs of this approach include the integrity of the Bible, the logical coherence of the gospel, and the basis for the seventh-day Sabbath. The gospel story tells us that Jesus died to save us from death, which was the result of Adam's sin. Progressive creation implies that death is not the result of Adam's sin, but that violence and suffering were part of nature for millions of years before humans were created. The seventh-day Sabbath is undermined by denial of God's six days of work and seventh day of rest as a basis for our weekly cycle.

Scientifically, this theory is entirely ad hoc. There is no scientific evidence that God created living organisms in the sequence recorded in the fossil record. It would be just as reasonable, and far more consistent with Scripture, to propose that God caused the various types of creatures to be buried in the sequence observed in the fossil record during the Flood.

Concordism may be based on good intentions, but it ends up placing science over Scripture. In the process, it undermines the gospel and the reliability of Scripture. It denies the evolutionary story but has neither biblical nor scientific support for its distinctive claims. It produces “just-so stories” with little reason for anyone to endorse them.

BIBLICAL FOUNDATION FOR RELATING FAITH AND SCIENCE

The approach recommended here is to regard the revelation of God’s actions in Scripture as the foundation on which the natural world can be understood. To explore this idea, we will address the question of how God’s activities in nature might affect the practice of science.

God Is Active in Nature

The Bible records many examples of God’s action in our world. God created the world and filled it with living creatures (Gen. 1–2); He sent a flood to destroy the corrupted world (Gen. 6–8); He showered Sodom and Gomorrah with fire and brimstone (Gen. 19); He opened a path through the Red Sea for the Israelites to escape the Egyptians (Ex. 14); He caused the walls of Jericho to collapse (Josh. 6); He sent fire down from heaven to burn up the stones of Elijah’s altar (1 Kin. 18); He created the heavens by His word (Ps. 33); He laid the foundation of the earth and spread out the heavens (Is. 48); He set up kings and removed them, revealed secrets, and gave wisdom (Dan. 2); and He caused a host of healings and other supernatural events. Any theory that denies God’s activities in nature is incompatible with Scripture.

The reality of divine activity in nature means that a true history of our world must be grounded on special revelation. It invites us to faith in the revealed description of God’s activities, including a creation in one literal week in which (1) the world was formed and provided with plants and animals in harmonious ecological relationships, (2) humans were created in God’s image and given responsibility for the created world, and (3) death, violence, and suffering were absent.

Types of Divine Activities

God’s actions in nature can be tentatively classified into three types: Creation, directing special events, and sustaining the creation. God’s work in Creation is a past event, unobservable in the present, unrepeatable in the laboratory, and not subject to scientific analysis. God’s work in directing special events is occasional and is likely to be regarded as a “miracle.” Such events may leave effects that are subject to scientific analysis, but their causes are likely to be beyond the scope of science. God’s work in sustaining the world must be consistent to maintain stability, and the regularities are observable in the present and can be tested in the laboratory and analyzed scientifically. Thus, science works well for analyzing the consistent patterns of God’s activities in maintaining nature, but not for studying God’s special actions in creation and other miraculous events.

Laws of Nature

In the biblical view, God is sovereign over all of nature. This means that what we call the “laws of nature” are God’s tools for managing the world, not rules that limit His power or activities. Natural laws are not inherent properties of matter but merely describe how God exercises control over His creation. They are descriptive, not prescriptive.

Science and God’s Activities

A common objection to the claim that God is active in nature is the claim that if God were active in the physical world, His activities would interfere with our ability to practice science. We could not depend on getting the same experimental results at different times or in different places because God might intervene at any moment. This is a misunderstanding of God’s role in nature.

Theists do not fear that God’s activity will spoil the experiment. They realize that they could not conduct scientific investigations if it were not for God’s consistent actions in sustaining the universe. Without this consistency, there would be no regularities to discover in the physical world, and science would be impossible. Thus, it is false to claim that being open to God’s activity in nature inhibits scientific discovery. Scientists should embrace the fact of God’s activity in nature, not deny it.

Science applies well to studying God’s consistent activities in sustaining the universe, but it is not equipped to analyze divine acts of creation. This leaves miraculous events, including the Creation, beyond the scope of science, but this is to be expected. Expertise in how a system operates is not the same thing as understanding how it originated. An auto mechanic may be able to take a car apart and put it back together again, but that does not qualify him to design an automobile manufacturing plant. We are still free to inquire into any topic and to use the power of science to enhance our quality of life and improve our ability to wisely manage our environment. However, we cannot expect that science will provide answers to all our questions.

Science Is Worthwhile

The biblical view of creation is that it is God’s handiwork, made for our benefit. Although damaged by our sin and carelessness, it remains our responsibility to take care of. This requires an intelligent understanding of nature that comes from scientific study. Thus science is a good and worthwhile activity that can enhance our quality of life and improve our ability to cope with the responsibilities of overseeing the creation.

The New Creationists

The name “New Creationists” refers to a group of creationist scholars who are attempting to understand nature in the light of the biblical record. They include biologists, geologists, cosmologists, chemists, physicists, and others. Although their numbers are small, they have already made important discoveries in understanding the world from a biblical viewpoint.

One example of creationist research is the work done by several creationist scientists studying the “fossil forests” of Yellowstone National Park in the United States. Many layers of fossilized logs are preserved, including some trees that are standing upright. These were interpreted by scientists as a succession of forests growing in place over tens of thousands of years. Examination of the fossilized “soil” associated with the layers showed sorting of the particles, indicating that the leaves and “soil” had been washed into place, not formed in place. Several additional lines of evidence were pursued, resulting in the conclusion that these trees were transported from somewhere else and are not preserved where they grew. This conclusion supports the hypothesis of a catastrophic flood.

Numerous footprints and trackways are found in the Coconino Sandstone of the Grand Canyon, in the United States. Careful study of the footprints showed they were deposited under water, and not on dry sand dunes as had been thought. Since the layers below and above the Coconino Sandstone were deposited in water, it makes more sense that the Coconino Sandstone was also deposited under water and not in a desert, again supporting the hypothesis of a catastrophic flood.

Creationist scientists are also studying a series of rock layers in Utah. These layers are separated by distinct boundaries where the grain size changes abruptly. Ordinarily, bottom-dwelling animals burrow through the deposits on the seafloor and mix the sediments thoroughly so that layers with abrupt boundaries do not form. Sequences of distinct layers indicate that deposition was too rapid for burrowing animals to mix the sediments. Such rapid deposition of layers suggests catastrophic processes at work.

As more creationists engage in the study of geology and other sciences, we can expect more progress in developing a creation-based understanding of nature, guided and facilitated by the Creator Himself. Perhaps some who are reading this will join in that endeavor.

CONCLUSIONS

What then can we conclude about the relationship between faith and science? First, we should recognize that the present tension between faith and science is largely determined by philosophical assumptions and their influence on the practice of science. If science is defined as materialistic in approach, then it is inappropriate to try to apply it to events with supernatural causes. It is important to match the scope of science with its definition. Faith and science are rarely in conflict except when attempting to reconstruct historical events associated with divine activity.

Second, we should resist efforts to incorporate scientific “facts” into faith, even if “everyone knows they are true.” We should learn from the historical examples of conflict involving Galileo and Darwin and resist attempts to adjust our faith to accommodate the materialistic claims of deep time and animal ancestry of humans. The scientific path to truth is often slow and marked by many detours. The present state of knowledge is not the final destination, nor is it a safe guide for Christian faith.

Finally, we must affirm that both faith and science have value. We should give glory to God for the wonderful benefits that science has provided from the study of the created world and for the amazing complexity of life that reveals something of the power and wisdom of the Creator. We should encourage and support those who choose to prepare themselves academically and spiritually for engaging the world of science in order to present a creation-based understanding of the universe and our place in it.

ARCHAEOLOGY AND THE BIBLE

Archaeologists do not dig up dinosaurs. Archaeologists are not treasure hunters. Archaeologists study human antiquity, focusing on buried architecture and the material culture of everyday life associated with it. They need the context of buildings and even the soil in which an object is found in order to understand the significance of an object. Thus, in a way, archaeologists are like ancient crime scene investigators, recording even the minutest of details in order to reconstruct as much of the ancient past as is possible. Consequently, archaeology is a discovery science as opposed to an experimental science, although there is a field of study within archaeology that attempts to test archaeological theory by endeavoring to replicate ancient processes. Microstructural analysis, art criticism, and other such activities fall under the broad umbrella of archaeology, but exploration, excavation, and research are the traditional activities of archaeologists.

To understand the value of each discovery, archaeologists often conduct interdisciplinary studies. Cooperation with other branches of science helps to interpret what is discovered. The area of biblical studies can be used to interpret evidence established through archaeological activities.

ARCHAEOLOGY'S RELATIONSHIP TO THE BIBLE

The earliest archaeological efforts in Mesopotamia, the Levant (known more commonly as the Holy Land), Egypt, Turkey, Greece, Rome, and other parts of the Mediterranean world in the 1800s up through the mid-1900s were conducted with a general understanding that sections of the Bible were meant to reflect actual historical events, places, and persons. Many renowned archaeologists even felt it necessary to compare what was being discovered with statements contained in the biblical text. But in the 1970s and early 1980s most of these early scholars had passed away and were largely replaced by proponents of the "New Archaeology" theory. No longer was archaeology done solely for historical reasons, and therefore the connection to ancient texts (including the Bible) was no longer necessary. Today, many archaeologists avoid referencing the Bible in publications, even when it is obvious or necessary that this should be done. An understanding of both what the Bible can and cannot do and what archaeology can and cannot do should help demonstrate that this separation was unwise.

The Bible and Archaeologists

The Bible seems to arouse feelings of distrust for many scholars. This is probably a reaction to the well-meaning work of some religious adherents to prove the historical sections of the Bible in order to justify cherished theological convictions. In the process, some archaeological discoveries have been misrepresented, and evidence that may contradict a cherished view is sometimes ignored, leading the adherent to reinterpret the biblical text in an effort to maintain a particular view. Such practices have unfortunately left many scholars outside of biblical studies (and some on the inside) with little use for the Bible. This includes the vast majority of archaeologists who are not trained in the methods of biblical studies. They dismiss the Bible and do not attempt to connect their work with it.

The Bible was written to instruct on several intellectual and spiritual levels. It contains history, but it is not merely a record of history. The majority of the supposed discrepancies critics often point out are due to hermeneutical presuppositions rather than any fault with the biblical text itself. Only a small portion of these discrepancies seem associated with scribal errors. And when given the benefit of the doubt, these discrepancies can be reconciled satisfactorily (for more, see “Revelation and Inspiration of the Bible,” p. 11). Archaeology has played a significant role in helping to understand some of these discrepancies.

Archaeology and Bible Readers

Archaeologists discover evidence. This evidence needs to be interpreted. There has not been a significant archaeological discovery that has contradicted any historical element in the Bible, but there are many interpretations of evidence that contradict the Bible. This distinction is important. Misunderstanding this distinction has wrecked many sincere people’s faith in the reliability of the Bible. Often it is the interpreter’s presuppositions that provide the contradictory interpretation.

Lack of sufficient data can also result in contradictory interpretations of a piece of data. Most archaeological sites are only partially excavated. It has been the practice of archaeologists through the decades to purposely not excavate an entire site down to bedrock, knowing that better methods of excavation and recording will be developed in the future. As a result, it is estimated that only one-tenth of one percent of all known archaeological sites have been excavated. Further, more sites are being discovered each year and some are yet to be excavated due in large part to a lack of funding. Consequently, a significant amount of data lies waiting to be recovered. Because of this, it is common for archaeologists to discover evidence in an excavation that shifts previous understandings of the site, even from one year to the next. Thus, any dogmatic conclusion by archaeologists should be understood as zeal rather than incontrovertible fact.

A Proper Relationship

There are few, mostly minor, variants of the biblical text. It is always the hope that more manuscripts will be found, but it is doubtful that any will be discovered that will change the text as we currently have it in any consequential way. As a result, new information related to the Bible is most likely to come through archaeological discoveries.

Readers today are separated from the world of the Bible most directly by time, culture, language, and landscape. Archaeological data have the ability to provide the reader with a window in time and space through which they can glimpse the various cultures operating within the historical milieu of a given passage of Scripture. In this way, archaeology provides the modern reader with information that is not immediately apparent from a study of the text itself and that can shed light on the biblical text.

Since archaeologists are scientists and not theologians, their main interest is in providing trustworthy data that can be used by others in a study of the ancient world. The Bible is valuable for the work of archaeologists because it is an ancient document that contains information regarding life in the ancient past (be that geographical, topographical, political, or migrational). However, some secular archaeologists dismiss the value of the Bible partly because of the irresponsible interpretation of some who feel the need to “prove” the Bible to be true. Impatient with the perceived slowness by which archaeology discovers evidence, some pseudo-archaeologists publish documents, give lectures, or produce documentaries that fail to do the hard, slow work of archaeology and, instead, present their “proof” as groundbreaking. This does more damage than good.

Archaeologists, in a way, are at the mercy of elements beyond their control. They cannot control what is found, and what is found through the limited excavations may be an accident of survival following deliberate destructions, natural decay, lootings, and unfriendly environments. Organic materials, for example, do not survive well in damp environments, so any cloth, wood, parchment, paper, or organic substance has a low chance of survival in civilizations that were close to water sources. What material has survived war, natural catastrophe, and natural, organic decay also had to have survived looting through the millennia. Beyond that, it also has to be in an accessible location (i.e., not below a modern dwelling or city, in a war zone, or below water) so it can be found. And an item that has survived all of these still needs to actually be found by someone who knows how to record its context in a professionally responsible way. Putting together a picture of the ancient world, then, has been likened to trying to see life with only a few pieces of a puzzle of unknown size that comes in a box without a photograph of the completed puzzle.

Since archaeology discovers rather than experiments, archaeological findings are not controlled. And because only a small fraction of the available data has been discovered, archaeology is not well equipped to answer the question “Did it happen?” This means that aside from a fortuitous spade full of dirt that might turn up something that supports some aspect of what is contained in the Bible, the best questions that archaeology can answer are “Could it have happened?” and “Is the event, location, or person possible?”

Even when texts are discovered that seem to confirm an event from the biblical record (e.g., the Merenptah Stele; see p. 85), skeptics will not necessarily be persuaded. This is because some would suggest that the author of the text intentionally meant to mislead his audience or intended for the record to be understood as myth or legend. Some would, more kindly, propose that the author thought that he was recording an event that in reality did not happen. In the end, the interpretation of evidence allows for a broad range of views and, as a result, does not constitute proof one way or another.

The message of the Bible is believed through faith, not science. The Bible presents God as unchanging (Heb. 13:8). How He treated people in the past is how He treats people in the present and future. Archaeology helps us to better understand those who lived in the past. This understanding then also allows us to better see how God interacted with those people in the past and then, as a result, to gain a better understanding of how He will interact with us today. This is how archaeology can best help to strengthen faith. And while archaeology can help strengthen faith, the absence of archaeological evidence in relation to some biblical texts or narratives should also not lead anyone to distrust the Bible.

HISTORY OF ARCHAEOLOGY

The word archaeology comes from two Greek words: archaios (“ancient”) and logos (“study of” or “word”). In this way, archaeology means the study of, or a word about, the ancient world. Although it is true that some ancients engaged in activities that resemble aspects of archaeological work, archaeology as a field of scientific study has been practiced for only about two hundred years. Due to its relatively young age, there is still some discussion within the discipline on the goals and aims of archaeology as a science, but nearly all agree that studying, preserving, and presenting material culture from the ancient world is what archaeologists do.

Following Napoleon’s expedition to Egypt (from 1798 to 1801), in which 167 scholars and scientists accompanied him to record and study that ancient civilization, the world was captivated by archaeology and Egyptomania was born. A few decades later, as the Bible came under increasing attacks by source critical scholars, Bible believers financially supported archaeological efforts in the hope of confirming and better understanding the biblical record. Part of the original mission statement of the Palestinian Exploration Fund illustrates this well: “That the Biblical Scholar may yet receive assistance in illustrating the sacred text from careful observers of the manner and habits of the people in of the Holy Land.” Likewise, the Egyptian Exploration Fund stated as one of its original purposes “to make surveys, [and] explorations...for the purpose of elucidating or illustrating the Old Testament narrative, or any part thereof, insofar as the same is in any way connected with Egypt.”

In the early years, collecting objects was the primary objective of archaeology. Mysticism, prestige, and curiosity inspired scholars and laypersons alike to collect curio objects from the ancient world. The idea that the ancients had more understanding of the workings of the universe than modern humanity drove many to romanticize the potential knowledge behind even the most mundane objects. Some even ground up mummies and drank the powder thinking that they would attain some health benefit. Eventually, the first real professionals began to emerge and systematized the collection of data for the reconstruction of the historical past and a better understanding of life in the ancient world.

Sir Flinders Petrie recognized that certain pottery types were found in a specific sequence as seen from site to site. This realization resulted in the systemization of pottery as a method of dating. Although refined through the years, this system is still the standard used for dating related objects, walls, and dirt layers. His meticulous attention to detail and record keeping also became the good practice standard among archaeologists. William Foxwell Albright was instrumental in refining Petrie's ceramic typological work in the Holy Land. He became known as the father of biblical archaeology because of his insistence that all the historical aspects of the Bible were confirmed by archaeological finds. Although his premises were later challenged and his methods refined, his work inspired generations.

As criticism of the biblical text increased, two general lines of thought emerged. Those who considered the historical information in the early portions of the Bible up to the time of Ahab (ca. 874 B.C.) to have only minimal authenticity are called minimalists. Maximalists, on the other hand, argue that a maximum portion of the historical parts of the early portion of the Bible are authentic. Obviously not all minimalists agree with each other, and neither do all maximalists. Scholars of both positions have largely adjusted some terminology to avoid supporting positions of faith or political issues.

As archaeology as a discipline has become more codified, some changes of terminology have been introduced. One change that is common in publication is the practice of using B.C.E. ("before Common Era") and C.E. ("Common Era") rather than B.C. ("before Christ") and A.D. ("anno Domini" or "year of our Lord"), which has obvious Christian ties and thus can be awkward when engaged in research in modern non-Christian cultures. The numbers associated with these remain the same so that 1447 B.C. and 1447 B.C.E. are the same date. In the same way, A.D. 31 and C.E. 31 are the same date. While not all agree with the need for the change or use these new terms, it is important to understand them. As noted elsewhere, this commentary retains the dating system that acknowledges Christ's incarnation as the hinge-point of human history (for more, see "Old Testament Timeline," p. 94).

There have also been changes in the names used to describe the Holy Land. "Palestine" and "Israel" have been replaced as geographic terms in favor of "the southern Levant." (The term Levant comes from an Italian word adopted by the French referring to the rising of the sun and thus was applied to the western coast of the Mediterranean because it is a land east of Italy and France, from which the sun appears to rise.) This change was felt necessary by some to avoid seeming to side with either modern political entity (Israel or Palestine). Obviously, the modern world is divided up politically differently than the ancient world was, and archaeologists working in the region might need to work in territories governed by either Israeli or Palestinian authorities when researching an ancient civilization. To offend one or the other governments by terminology that suggests they are taking a side in a political disagreement does not seem wise. For similar reasons archaeologists also refer to the land in the southern Levant on the west side of the Jordan (modern-day Israel and Palestine) as “Cisjordan” and that on the east (modern-day Jordan) as “Transjordan.” In most places in this commentary, the more traditional term “Holy Land” is used for the entire region of the southern Levant.

Adventists have been conducting and joining archaeological digs in the Holy Land for decades. Siegfried Horn was the first to lead an Adventist dig in 1968 at Tal Hisban in Transjordan. This site was selected based on the similarity of the name with a site mentioned in the Bible (Heshbon; Num. 21:21–32). Since that time Adventist archaeologists have led digs or participated in the excavation of many other sites.

WHAT WE KNOW NOW

A tremendous number of discoveries have been made in the world of archaeology. A significant number of these provide information on some aspect of the Bible. Some of the more recent interpretations of discoveries are still waiting to be widely accepted.

Patriarchs

Abraham was called out of his homeland in Ur to travel to an unknown location (which turned out to be the Holy Land). In 1854 a great ziggurat (pyramid-shaped temple) was excavated at Ur. It had been built by Ur-Nammu to the moon god Nanna (also called Sin) during the approximate period that Abraham left the city. It was 210 feet (64 m) long by 148 feet (45 m) wide and 98 feet (30 m) tall. Many centuries later Nabonidus, the last king of the Babylonian Empire, restored it during his reign. In 1927 Leonard Woolley uncovered the ancient city of Ur itself. Several temples, private houses, tombs, and other buildings were excavated. One of the most impressive of these is the Great Death Pit where sixty-eight women dressed in fine clothing and six men (thought to be guards) surrounded by valuable objects were buried in a large mass grave. These objects still dazzle museum visitors today. The most famous of these are the twin Ram Caught in a Thicket statues that probably held a bowl between them. The rams are intricately decorated with shell, lapis lazuli, silver, and red limestone and have reminded scholars of both the story of the sacrifice of Isaac and the success Jacob had shepherding Laban’s flock. However, these objects illustrate the pastoral element that was closely associated with the lives of even the very rich of this period rather than suggesting any association with a particular Bible story. These excavations and the literature in and about Ur have helped reconstruct the world Abraham left in order to follow God. We now understand that he was leaving the best civilization had to offer to live in a tent among strangers.

Abraham, and his family after him, entered into covenants and treaties with those who occupied the lands he moved through and lived in (e.g., Gen. 14:13; 21:25–32; 26:26–33; 31:43–54). Tablets discovered at Mari (on the Euphrates River) and dated to the first half of the second millennium B.C. reveal that such treaties were common between those living in urban centers and those living in tents around them. Tablets discovered at Nuzi (on the Tigris River) reveal that adoption of a servant in the absence of a legitimate heir was a cultural custom (Gen. 15:2). The tablets also reveal that if a woman could not produce children, it was her duty to provide a surrogate for her husband, a similar situation to what we see described in Genesis 16:2; 30:3–8. The law code of Hammurabi suggests that should an heir be produced by the original wife after providing a surrogate, the sons should split the inheritance, unless the slave and her son were released and allowed to go free (cf. Gen. 21:10). These findings help Bible scholars to have some historical background for the seemingly strange customs of Abraham and his family.

Exodus

A number of discoveries have helped us understand the world during the time of the Exodus event. For example, archaeologists are almost certain now of the locations of the supply cities Pithom and Raamses built by the Hebrews (Ex. 1:11). The locations of both have been a matter of debate for a long time. However, because of careful and persistent excavation in the delta region, the locations of both have now been established with a high degree of certainty. In the process, scholarly errors in this regard have been corrected.

Previously, it was thought that Raamses was located at Tanis in the northeast delta. This was because conclusions were prematurely reached after architectural materials dating to the time of Ramesses II were discovered there. Now we know that these building materials were robbed out of a location a bit further to the south at Qantir, where Seti I and Ramesses II (of the nineteenth dynasty) had established their capital city. Qantir had been selected for the capital (that was named Pi-Ramesses) because it was where the ruling family was from and also because a site more than half a mile (1 km) further to the south (at Tal ed-Dab'a) had been the northern capital in the eighteenth dynasty and the fifteenth dynasty before that.

During the fifteenth dynasty (seventeenth and sixteenth centuries B.C.), Semites (the Hyksos) from the southern Levant (the Holy Land) invaded and conquered Egypt. They set up a capital at Tal ed-Dab'a because it was a natural location for a harbor. This is likely the time when Joseph was in Egypt, although some scholars place him in Egypt approximately two centuries earlier (see "Old Testament Timeline," p. 94). After the Egyptians regained control of their country from the Hyksos (beginning the eighteenth dynasty, in the sixteenth century) this capital was renamed Perunefer (and possibly Raamses). The rulers of the eighteenth dynasty used Tal ed-Dab'a as one of two supply cities for the Egyptian military's excursions into what became the Holy Land. In fact, excavation has revealed that significant storage facilities and large military camps were constructed prior to the building of a large thirteen-acre palace at Tal ed-Dab'a illustrating where the priorities lay.

A similar error was made in the initial misidentification of Tal el-Maskhuta as Pithom. Excavations, as well as advances in ceramic typology, have demonstrated that Tal el-Maskhuta was not occupied in a significant way until the Persian period. Just as had happened with Tanis, building material had been robbed out of a location further west at Tal er-Retabeh. Tal er-Retabeh had a temple to Atum, one of the creator gods. Inscriptions with the name Pi-Atum (meaning "the domain of Atum") have been found. Linguistically, Pi-Atum is a match with Pithom. Tal er-Retabeh (i.e., Pi-Atum), in the western Wadi Tumilat, was constructed in the early eighteenth dynasty as a frontier fortress to supply the military's excursions into the Sinai, just at the time when the Hebrews were put into slavery. Consequently, both Tal er-Retabeh (Pi-Atum or Pithom) and Tal ed-Dab'a (Raamses) were constructed at the same time for the same purpose. A massive enclosure wall and western gate at Tal er-Retabeh made it nearly impossible to breach. It is likely that Tal er-Retabeh was the city that kept the Hebrews from leaving Egypt, which is why they needed permission from the king. Thus, Tal ed-Dab'a/Qantir is certainly Raamses and Tal er-Retabeh is Pithom.

The story of Aaron's rod changing to a serpent before Pharaoh and his court is a remarkable demonstration of the power of God. However, it may have had significance beyond just the obvious. Texts recovered in excavations in Egypt reveal that the Egyptians had more than 1,500 gods and goddesses. Two of these were considered protectors of the two lands of Egypt. Nekhbet, the vulture goddess, protected the narrow Nile valley of Upper Egypt, and Wadjet, the cobra goddess, protected the broad Nile delta region of Lower Egypt. Both appeared on the crown of Pharaoh, where Wadjet was called the Uraeus. Thus, the use of a serpent to demonstrate God's power would have clearly signaled that God was Master of the delta region, where His people lived and worked as slaves (the northern part of Egypt), and of the king himself. The use of the word tomorrow (Ex. 8:23; 9:5, 18–19; 10:4) when setting time designations for the plagues seems to indicate that the plagues affected Egypt for only about a one-day's journey in all directions, as that is the only territory that God's warning message could have reached and likely why He didn't connect any signs to the vulture goddess of the south.

But the Egyptians also had a god named Nehebu-kau (meaning "he who harnesses the spirits"), who had been worshiped since the time of the pyramids of the Old Kingdom. Nehebu-kau was a serpent god who was considered to have great power because he swallowed seven cobras. It is certain that every Egyptian in that room where Aaron's rod turned into a serpent would have immediately understood the significance of Aaron's serpent swallowing the serpents of the magicians. God was communicating to the Egyptians in a language that they would clearly understand, before any plague fell, that He had ultimate power over Egypt's gods. Pharaoh, who denied knowing God, was introduced to God in a way that could not have been misunderstood.

The golden calf narrative is another example of a story that has more meaning with backgrounds discovered in texts through archaeological efforts. The Bible describes Aaron as using an engraving tool to make the molded calf (Ex. 32:4). Later he said that he simply tossed the gold into the fire and a calf came out (Ex. 32:24). Although a clear misrepresentation of the process, this does describe the basic elements needed to make the calf. Statues of metal were often carved out of wax, then surrounded by clay, which was baked to harden into a mold (the wax melting and easily being poured out, leaving a hollow center). The metal was then put inside the clay mold to harden. Once the metal was cool, the clay mold was broken and out came the statue. It is certain that the calf was made in this way regardless of how Aaron minimized his participation in an effort to claim a miracle and remove himself from responsibility. What has not been as readily apparent is why a calf of gold was used to represent the God who brought them out of the land of Egypt. The Sinai region was the land of Hathor, the mother cow goddess, who is often represented as providing nourishment. In fact, Amenhotep II (one of the candidates for the pharaoh of the Exodus) is famously depicted as drinking milk right from her udder. Hathor was a favorite patron deity of Hatshepsut (the most likely candidate for the adopted mother of Moses). Hathor was worshiped by performing that act between a man and a woman that causes a woman to become a mother. Great festivals were held where social boundaries were eliminated so that a commoner could unite with a princess. These festivals were accompanied with frivolity and excess, singing, dancing, shouting, and the clanging of metal sistra (similar to a rattle). It is likely that this was the sound that Joshua heard and mistook for war but that Moses, who was much more familiar with it, was able to recognize for the evil it was (Ex. 32:17–18). However, God was not represented as the mother cow but rather an offspring. Hesat, another cow goddess, was the divine nurse who was also the mother of the new king. Her son, the new king, was represented as a golden calf. It is very likely that Hesat and Hathor were both being worshiped at Sinai because of their similarities. God was likely depicted as their son, the golden calf, the new King who had brought the Hebrews to His mountain and had given them nourishment in the form of manna only after they arrived in the Sinai. Syncretistic worship of the gods was common in Egypt. The people certainly considered that they were worshiping the God who had brought them out of the land of Egypt by worshiping the golden calf (Ex. 32:1, 4).

A few objects also help with the dating of the Exodus. The Merenptah Stele (now in the Cairo museum), which is over ten feet high and over five feet wide, contains the earliest mention of Israel outside of the Bible, with the possible exception of the more controversial Berlin Pedestal. Found by Sir Flinders Petrie in western Thebes, the Merenptah Stele describes Pharaoh Merenptah's successful attack on the Libyans in his fifth year. Toward the end of the account, the enemies of Egypt, including Israel, are listed as also being subdued. This is significant as it places Israel as a people group in the southern Levant (the Holy Land) just five years after the death of Merenptah's father, Ramesses II (in the thirteenth century B.C.), who is often identified incorrectly as the pharaoh of the Exodus. Since the biblical account of the Exodus describes a forty-year period between the Exodus and the conquest of the Holy Land, the Hebrews could not have been a people group living in the promised land when Merenptah attacked in his fifth year. And thus, Ramesses II could not have been the pharaoh of the Exodus.

Conquest of the Promised Land

Because of her stellar reputation as a responsible and trustworthy scholar, English archaeologist Kathleen Kenyon shocked the world when she announced that the walls of Jericho did not come tumbling down and, additionally, that Jericho was not even occupied when Israel was supposed to have conquered the promised land. Nearly fifty years earlier, Ernst Sellin and Carl Watzinger had excavated Jericho. They felt that the evidence did reflect the biblical account. In the early 1930s, John Garstang excavated Jericho and came to the same conclusion. But Kenyon, who excavated in the mid-1950s, felt that they were wrong, stating so publicly, though she never published her findings.

Reexaminations of her notes by Bryant Wood and others reveal that she only dug a trench across the site and based all her conclusions on what was found in this trench. Subsequent excavations discovered evidence of Late Bronze Age occupation (roughly 1400 B.C.), a heavy burnt layer (cf. Josh. 6:24), a double-walled fortification that had fallen outward, as if in an earthquake (Josh. 6:20), large quantities of grain (Josh. 2:6; 3:15; 5:10–12), and grain that was left by the invaders that showed signs of being burnt, as if it had been only a short siege but the conquerors did not take anything (Josh. 6:17–18). Further, a portion of the wall did not collapse (Josh. 2:18–19; 6:22–23).

Kenyon was looking for occupation during the nineteenth dynasty when Ramesses II reigned (thirteenth century B.C.). During this time, Jericho was abandoned. Since Kenyon was not a Bible scholar and had only the academic opinion of Bible scholars to go by, she made their mistakes hers. Bible chronology places the conquest of Jericho around 1400 B.C., and the Bible clearly says that Jericho was abandoned until the reign of King Ahab (1 Kin. 16:34). By the 1200s, the period Kenyon was assuming for the conquest, no one lived there. In this Kenyon was right.

The Period of the Monarchy

The existence and reign of David has been challenged in recent times by minimalist scholars who would like to deny the historicity of David and any earlier biblical history. However, in 1993 archaeologists discovered a stone inscription at Tel Dan in northern Israel that had been reused as fill in the eastern wall of the outer gate. This stele is now called the Tel Dan inscription. The author of the inscription claimed that Hadad (the storm god) made him king and boasted of killing Jehoram of Israel and Ahaziah of the house of David. There is some discussion as to the identification of the author. What is most significant, however, is the reference to the “house of David” in the text, indicating that there was a historical person named David who founded the line of kings in the Southern Kingdom of Judah.

Large six-chamber gates, built as part of a strengthening of wall fortifications at Gezer, Hazor, and Megiddo, match in design and come from the period of Solomon’s reign. This work was probably referenced in 1 Kings 9:15. Similarly, excavations in Jerusalem below the Temple Mount have revealed monumental buildings that have been suggested to be the palace of David and later Solomon. In 2010, part of a wall with a gate house was found and has been associated with Solomon’s fortifications. Large buildings from the tenth century B.C. in Khirbet Qeiyafa, houses built onto casemate (double) walls typical of Judean construction techniques (and not found in neighboring countries at that time), also suggest a strong centralized government at this time, and these have also been associated with David and Solomon. The twin gates (four chambers each) may help with the identification of this site as biblical “Shaaraim” (meaning “two gates”; 1 Sam. 17:52) that guarded the Valley of Elah route between Bethlehem (north route) and Hebron (south route) to Gath in the west. However, further confirmation beyond the existence of architecture is needed before they can be associated with confidence to David and Solomon. In the meantime, the best that can be said is that these findings make a kingdom, like the one described for David and Solomon in the Bible, possible.

Another Bible story that has more credibility because of an archaeological discovery is Joram’s attack against Mesha, king of Moab (2 Kin. 3). In August of 1868 a stele was shown by local tribespeople at Dhiban to a German missionary who immediately recognized its importance and informed the authorities in Jerusalem about what he had seen. Having heard about it, the French epigrapher Charles Simon Clermont-Ganneau obtained a paper squeeze of the inscription. The stone was eventually broken apart (stories vary at this point, so it is unclear what the motivation was), but the paper squeeze, together with the pieces of the stone that were salvaged, revealed that it was a stele commemorating Mesha’s victory over Israel. It refers to the same battle mentioned in the Bible (2 Kin. 3:26–27) but offers the Moabite perspective and contains the earliest known reference to Yahweh outside of the Bible.

Aside from describing events in the Bible, sometimes ancient stelae provide information on events that are about Bible characters. Jehu is depicted in the Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III, discovered at Nimrud (ancient Calah) in 1846 by Sir Austen Henry Layard. The obelisk has four sides. On each side are five panels depicting tribute being brought to the Assyrian king. Significantly, the top panel reveals Jehu bringing tribute and kissing the ground before this king. It is the earliest picture of a king of Israel or Judah. Unfortunately, it shows him submitting to Assyria rather than to God.

The presence and activities of the Assyrians is well documented archaeologically. On one occasion (2 Chr. 32) they invaded Judah. Hanging on walls in a room in the British Museum are twelve panels recovered from room 36 in the Assyrian palace at Nineveh. These reliefs depict Sennacherib’s conquest of Lachish, which is recorded in 2 Kings 18:13–16. By themselves they reveal much more about the battle than is recorded in the Bible, so a fuller understanding of that Bible story is gained. Excavations at Lachish reveal that the depictions are accurate. The panels show the Assyrians attacking the city using siege ramps with siege machines on both sides of the gate. Excavations have found the siege ramps right where the panels seem to depict them. This allows archaeologists to construct a three-dimensional understanding of the two-dimensional panel reliefs and thus understand the Bible story more clearly.

Prior to the Assyrians besieging Jerusalem, Hezekiah had constructed a tunnel to allow the city to have fresh water during an inevitable siege (2 Kin. 20:20; 2 Chr. 32:30). In 1838 Edward Robinson discovered a rock-cut tunnel beneath Jerusalem’s City of David. In 1880 a group of boys playing in this tunnel discovered an inscription. In 1890 this inscription was chiseled out and stolen. Eventually most of it was recovered on the black market. It describes how Hezekiah had two teams tunneling from both ends toward each other, and they were able to meet—a remarkable engineering feat.

Exile

Although the Assyrians did not succeed in taking Judah into exile as they had Israel (2 Kin. 17–19), the Babylonians did a short time later (2 Kin. 24–25). “Babylon” is the Greek rendering of the Hebrew word “Babel.” In this way, both the tower (Gen. 11) and the city ruled by Nebuchadnezzar (in Daniel) are known as “Babel,” demonstrating that the Hebrew authors recognized the parallel. In fact, inscriptions bear testimony that Nebuchadnezzar considered the large ziggurat in Babylon to be a renovation of the tower.

The Ishtar Gate and the Processional Way of Babylon are now housed in the Pergamon Museum in Berlin, but only the smaller of the two gates is reconstructed for visitors to experience. In 1899 Koldewey rediscovered the Babylon that flourished under the kings Nabopolassar and his son Nebuchadnezzar II (famous from the book of Daniel). Over the next fourteen years, work continued until the outbreak of World War I. Since that time, nothing approaching the significance of this excavation has occurred there, although small excavations and clean-up efforts have taken place.

Babylon existed on both sides of the Euphrates River. It was circled by double walls—the larger wall being 20 feet (ca. 6 m) thick or more and possibly 100 feet (ca. 30 m) tall. A moat surrounded the walls which varied in width from 65 to 250 feet (ca. 20 to 76 m). Eight double gates (only four have been excavated) allowed entrance into the city, the Ishtar gate being the most remarkable one yet excavated. The Ishtar Gate on the north side of the city connected the palace and temple district with the bridge that crossed the Euphrates via the Processional Way. Both the gate and the way had walls lined with glazed tiles of blue, yellow, white, and brown decorated with lions, bulls, and dragons. The pavement was also decorated with white limestone and red breccia blocks. The Processional Way was about 62 feet (ca. 19 m) wide and extended for about 600 feet (ca. 182 m).

The enormous palace (that presumably contained the hanging gardens), the gigantic temple of Marduk (the Esagila), and the towering ziggurat Etemenanki were colossal in scale and were designed to wow visitors, filling them with a sense of their insignificance. It is this that Daniel and his friends would have encountered as they first entered Babylon and throughout their life in the palace. What has been excavated sufficiently demonstrates the source of Nebuchadnezzar’s pride (Dan. 4:30).

Nebuchadnezzar is well attested by archaeology. Belshazzar, on the other hand, has not been. For most of the modern era, Belshazzar, king of Babylon (Dan. 5), was unknown outside the Bible. All Babylonian king lists claim that Nabonidus was the last king of Babylon, with no reference to Belshazzar. Then in 1854, excavations at the ziggurat in Ur revealed a piece of history that had been lost. At each of the corners of the last stage of the ziggurat, small clay cylinders were placed. Each cylinder contains the same inscription. Nabonidus, who renovated that ziggurat, gave instructions on these cylinders for the construction of this temple. Each ends with a prayer for his son, Belshazzar.

It turns out, based on cuneiform inscriptions, that Belshazzar was left in charge of the city of Babylon while his father relocated to Tema, in Arabia, for the final ten years of his reign. Although still technically the king of Babylon, and thus its last king, Nabonidus left his son in charge. This is apparently why Belshazzar offered Daniel the position of third ruler over Babylon (Dan. 5:29), as Belshazzar himself was second in rank.

Intertestamental Period

One of the most significant archaeological discoveries related to the Bible happened in 1946 or 1947 when shepherds from the Ta'amireh Bedouin tribe stumbled upon a cave near the Dead Sea containing jars with scrolls in them. Over the next decade, a total of eleven caves were found and more than 800 manuscripts, dating from the third century B.C. to the first century A.D. The scrolls were mostly written on parchment (animal skin), with some on papyrus (paper) and one (in two parts) on copper.

About half of the Dead Sea Scrolls (a little more than 400 manuscripts) discovered so far are classified as Jewish literature, which had previously been available only in ancient translation but now is available in the original Hebrew and Aramaic. About a fourth of the scrolls represent previously unknown texts linked to the religious community of Qumran. Scrolls containing portions of biblical books make up the remaining fourth of texts recovered, reflecting all books of the Bible except Esther (which is referenced in other Dead Sea Scrolls). The manuscripts were only made available to the public in 1992 and now can be studied online.

Most significantly, the scrolls have provided an enormous amount of information about Jewish sects during the Second Temple period (including the time of history recorded in the NT). They also provided textual scholars with Hebrew manuscripts that are over a thousand years older than the ninth century A.D. Masoretic manuscript (the Leningrad Codex) that had been the basis for the Hebrew text of the OT. Scholars have recognized that the Masoretic Text appears to have been remarkably stable in transmission over these one thousand years.

On either side of the Dead Sea stood two major mountaintop fortresses, both containing a palace of Herod the Great. Masada, on the western shore of the Dead Sea, was the larger of the two. Machaerus, on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, is the location where John the Baptist was imprisoned and later beheaded. Both fortresses were occupied by rebels in the Jewish War (A.D. 66). Both also have the remains of Roman siege ramps and camps still visible to visitors today. Machaerus was conquered by Rome in A.D. 72 and Masada in A.D. 73.

The third largest palace/fortress in the Roman world was constructed by Herod on a hill three miles southeast of Bethlehem. It is probable that the soldiers who killed all of the boys under the age of two (Matt. 2:16) were deployed from this fortress. Josephus wrote that Herod was buried halfway up the Herodium. In 2007 archaeologists discovered the burial site (robbed out in antiquity). In recent years some have challenged this identification. Regardless, the size and grandeur of the Herodium provides significant information about Herod.

Gospel

In 1968 Capernaum was fully excavated. Twelve simple homes were discovered around a first-century synagogue. In the largest of these homes, a few fish hooks were discovered along with simple ceramic lamps, jars, pots, and bowls. This large house, unlike the other smaller ones, had its floor covered repeatedly over time with crushed and beaten limestone, and the walls had been successively plastered and decorated. This suggests that it was more than just a simple fisherman's home at some point after the fisherman had lived there. Nothing is known for certain about the identity of the occupants or the use of the building other than this. However, based on early church documents, it is known that Peter's house in Capernaum was turned into an early church. By the Byzantine period, a basilica was erected above this large house to venerate it as the house of Peter. While the identity of Peter's house remains uncertain, the first century A.D. fisherman's home offers an authentic backdrop to the story of Jesus.

In the drought of 1985–1986, the water level of the Sea of Galilee dropped significantly, exposing parts of the sea floor that had not been seen before. Two brothers, looking for relics, stumbled upon a fishing boat from the first century A.D. Because it was waterlogged, great care was taken in preserving this object that now can be seen and studied. The boat, currently in a small museum on the shore of Galilee not far from where it was found, shows that it was repaired many times. A small deck at the stern and possibly another at the bow would have helped the fishermen haul in the nets and steer. Jesus would have slept on or under one of these decks on His boat during the stormy night described in Matthew 8:23–27; Mark 4:35–41; and Luke 8:22–25.

Many of the stories in the Gospels revolved around a pool, and quite a number of pools have been discovered in and around Jerusalem. Some were used for purification before entering the temple, others for water storage. A pool was discovered by the Sheep Gate (John 5:2) north of the Temple Mount that has been identified with the pool of Bethesda. The pool of Siloam was more difficult to identify. Since most of the modern Old City Jerusalem is built above the ancient iterations of Jerusalem, it is difficult to discover sites. For some time the pool at the end of Hezekiah's tunnel was thought to be the pool of Siloam. However, archaeological evidence suggested that this was used only from the Byzantine period onward. Then in 2004 workers digging to install pipes unexpectedly unearthed large ancient blocks. Archaeologists were called in and a massive pool was found with three landings before the bottom of the pool. Five steps descend to each landing and then to the bottom of the pool. The complete pool has not been excavated since much of it rests under the Orthodox church's orchard. However, pottery and coins discovered in the plaster of the pool confirm that it was dug in the first century B.C. and was most likely the pool of Siloam in the time of Jesus.

Also found around Jerusalem and other areas of the Holy Land are rolling stone tombs, although no two are exactly alike. Typically, they were owned by wealthy families (poorer families had rock-cut tombs but without the rolling stone). They usually had a stone bench upon which the body was prepared, carved resting places where the body would decompose, and sometimes there was a ledge where a box (called an ossuary) with the collected bones could sit so the resting place could be reused. The rolling stone itself was typically large and required several people to move. It was placed in a carved trench that allowed it to roll forward to cover the entrance and back to open the entrance. Excavation below the Church of the Holy Sepulcher has found a rock quarry, which had been abandoned in the first century, where new tombs were dug. It is likely that this abandoned rock quarry resembled a skull (John 19:17). This site (enclosed by the Jerusalem city wall in A.D. 41 and commemorated as the site of the crucifixion and burial until A.D. 66) was intentionally filled in by Hadrian ca. A.D. 135 and dedicated to a temple to Aphrodite in order to religiously “contaminate” it. In A.D. 325 it was excavated and has been associated with the death and burial of Jesus ever since. An alternate site was proposed by Charles Gordon in 1883 north of the city due to the appearance of a skull in the recently cut rock quarry. Ninth through seventh century B.C. tombs were discovered nearby that had been reused by the Byzantines. The Garden Tomb (as it is known today) provides a more authentic experience than does the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, even though the church is almost certainly the site of the death and burial of Jesus. The tombs that had been freshly dug at the abandoned rock quarry during the time of Jesus match the “new tomb” description found in John 19:41. The fact that this was a new tomb indicates that it was being reserved for the head of the family, Joseph, to die and that no other body had been placed inside (i.e., “new”). In this way, we can understand that Joseph gave up his right of first burial to Jesus.

In 1961 a fragmented stone dating to A.D. 26–36 with an inscription was recovered in an archaeological site at Caesarea Maritima. The lower portion of the inscription is missing, but what remains clearly says that Pontius Pilate was the prefect of Judea. The stone probably contained a dedication to a temple built for Tiberius. The stone had been reused in a set of stairs for a Herodian theater in the fourth century A.D. From Josephus and Philo we learn that Pilate had difficulty maintaining peace in Judea, particularly because he seemed to be insensitive to Jewish customs. On a number of occasions his actions caused near-insurrections. These incidents included allowing images of Caesar to be brought into Jerusalem, setting up gold shields to honor Tiberius (this time without an image but still despised by the Jews), using money from the temple to build an aqueduct, and slaughtering Samaritans. From these accounts a picture of Pilate begins to form of a man who had been reprimanded by Rome for his judgment on a few occasions, who cared little for the lives of those he ruled, and who certainly could not risk another riot during Passover.

Early Church

Jesus predicted the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem, which at the time seemed a nearly impossible task. Archaeological excavation around the Temple Mount over the decades has been ongoing to such a degree that most of us forget the accuracy of what He predicted. The scale of the blocks used in the construction reveals why His prediction was scoffed at.

When Herod rebuilt the Temple Mount, he did so on a grand scale. The structure covered 172,000 square yards (approx. 144,000 square meters), making it the largest temple precinct in the ancient world at that time. A staircase ran almost a half mile uphill to bring worshipers to the temple. Ritual immersion pools have been discovered along the route for worshipers to purify themselves before entering. An inscribed stone has been found instructing the priests where to stand when they blew the Sabbath trumpet.

Ancient quarries reveal that massive stones, tens to hundreds of tons each (the largest stone still at the quarry is 26 feet [or 8.5 m] long), were moved to the temple site. One of the foundation stones used in the temple wall was 45 feet (15 m) long, 11.6 feet (4 m) high, and 14–16 feet (approx. 5 m) wide and weighed almost 600 tons. The pedestrian street, discovered near the temple wall, has buckled from the weight of the stones tossed down when the Romans dismantled the temple.

Another site that was glorious but lies in ruins is Ephesus. Archaeological work began there in the nineteenth century. Because of this work we now know that Ephesus was the fourth largest city in the ancient Roman Empire. Ephesus was home to a temple dedicated to the Egyptian goddess Isis but was primarily known as the home of the goddess Artemis (who was later equated with the Roman goddess Diana). Her temple was one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. Archaeological evidence demonstrates that there was a building boom in Ephesus in the first century A.D. that included a new stadium, a larger agora (or open marketplace), a new theater that sat 25,000 people, and a complex to house the Olympic games. Temples to the Caesars, a concert hall, a library, a council chamber, baths, a communal latrine, and luxurious terraced houses complete with indoor plumbing, heating, water storage, and magnificent artistic paintings demonstrate the opulence of the upper class. In A.D. 262 an earthquake destroyed much of the city and the Goths attacked in the next year, leaving Ephesus in ruins.

Fake Discoveries

Some notable items of interest have not been found in spite of sensational claims otherwise. The search for Noah's ark continues. Most of the activity in this search centers around a large mountain called Greater Ararat in modern Iraq. Major expeditions took place in 1949, the 1980s, the 1990s, and the 2000s, but they were not led by recognized, professional archaeologists. The most recent claim was by a Turkish–Hong Kong expedition. Nothing found yet has satisfied archaeologists.

The ark of the covenant also has not been found. Ethiopians claim to have it, but this has been disputed with evidence that shows that what they have is a replica. Some have claimed to have found it under the Temple Mount, but this claim has not been verified. Others claim that it is on Mount Sinai or Mount Nebo. Archaeologists nearly universally do not recognize any of these as verified.

The Tower of Babel also has not been found. It is likely that the great ziggurat of Babylon was built on its ruins, but excavation was not extensive enough to confirm or disprove this. At the moment this is mere speculation based on Nebuchadnezzar's claims.

THE FUTURE OF ARCHAEOLOGY AND THE BIBLE

There remains a massive amount of work yet to be done. Each archaeology field report contains crucial information about some aspect of life in the ancient world. Most of this information languishes in the world's libraries for want of scholars trained to recognize its significance. Nearly all archaeological sites are underfunded and left dormant for large parts of the year. Many are not being excavated at all. Museums are filled with objects still needing to be studied and written about. And while there are experts in nearly every aspect of archaeology, few believe in the Bible or have any interest in using the knowledge of archaeology to help illuminate the ancient world presented in the Bible.

The biggest problem is funding for projects and recruiting new generations of archaeologists. One ray of hope is the advancement of technology. Remote imaging has allowed archaeologists to see entire buried cities in Egypt via infrared satellite images. LIDAR (an acronym for LIght Detection And Ranging) and drones have also provided very helpful images from above. Magnetometry, electric resistivity, and ground-penetrating radar allow archaeologists to see below the ground and dig more surgically, thus reducing costs. Computer modeling and Internet tools are allowing excavations to be reexamined and promote collaboration among experts across the globe. The importance of managing an archaeological site even after excavation ends has become a priority. Involving the local population in digs and project management helps them to gain a feeling of ownership that protects sites. Antiquities departments are discovering the value of tourism and are adding more security to certain sites.

Archaeology is a window into the past that allows us to better understand the world of the Bible. When we understand the world that God interacted with in the long-ago past, we better understand how He interacts with us today.

OLD TESTAMENT TIMELINE

The OT generally follows a time sequence from beginning to end such that, with a few exceptions, the further one reads through the biblical text the closer in history to the Roman period one travels. However, because the canon is not always presented in chronological order, it is necessary to understand the timeline in order to also understand the relationship of each part to the others. All of the elements that make up the OT (i.e., stories, laws, wisdom writings, and prophecies) hang upon chronological statements that place these elements along a timeline that the biblical authors often appear to assume the reader is familiar with. This understood timeline is not always clear to the modern reader.

It is important, then, for the modern reader to become familiar with this timeline, for it gives relational meaning to each passage by tying one text to another and one event to another. Modern readers can most easily see the timeline through the chronological statements of the Bible. The primary value of a study of these chronological statements (i.e., the visible portions of the timeline) is that it provides deeper insights into the text by recognizing these relationships. Understanding the statements also opens further comprehension of the invisible portion of the timeline (i.e. the understood timeline that is not explicitly mentioned).

Time is a fixed phenomenon that cannot be seen, but it can be measured. Ancient scholars throughout history found their own ways to measure it. And although there are multiple ways to measure time, time itself is unchanged by these efforts. In this way the natural timeline is unseen, and attempts to measure it, in a sense, endeavor to make portions of it visible. This article will begin by briefly reviewing some of the methods ancient scholars used to measure time and providing a brief history of those who have studied these methods in modern times. This will serve as important background to a study of the biblical timeline from Jesus back to Adam.

OVERVIEW OF CHRONOLOGY

Forces beyond human control were often deified in the ancient world. These natural forces were studied in an attempt to find patterns that could bring order to life and were often used to manipulate people for religious or political purposes. Patterns were identified in daily, monthly, and yearly periods through the movement of heavenly bodies (sun, moon, and stars) and the coming and going of identifiable seasons. The ebb and flow of the cycle of life also provided measurable patterns. Religions and the governments that supported them were built around these measurements, which were systematized into calendars.

Some of these calendars were built around the movement of the moon. The Hebrews, Assyrians, Babylonians, Greeks, and early Romans developed versions of this lunar calendar. This had an immediate value in daily life. However, the basic problem with the lunar calendar was that over time it gradually lost its synchronization with the seasons. Each lunar-based civilization had its own way of dealing with this problem.

Other civilizations, such as the Egyptians and later Romans, crafted a solar calendar. This system did not lose its synchronization with the seasons as quickly as did the lunar calendar, so it took generations to identify the weaknesses of the solar calendar and then make adjustments. Today, we have largely adopted the solar calendar while maintaining some aspects of the lunar calendar for specific purposes. Our modern solution for the problems of a strict solar calendar is based in large part on the Julian calendar system that Augustus introduced in 22 B.C., in which an extra day was added to the calendar every fourth year (known as a leap year).

Another complication was the start to the new year. The Egyptians began their year when Sirius, the most prominent star in the night sky, first became visible, which corresponded roughly to the flooding of the Nile in mid-to-late July. The Assyrians, Babylonians, and Persians celebrated the beginning of their new year at the first new moon after the vernal equinox in late March or early April. God instructed the Hebrews before the Exodus event to begin their new year in the month that they left Egypt (which also corresponded to the vernal equinox). Later, the new year was shifted to line up better with agriculture so that the time of sowing marked the beginning of the year around mid-September. Understanding when and where this shift in the Hebrew calendar took place is vital to understanding some of the chronological statements in the OT and will be discussed where appropriate below. The Romans originally also timed their new year to the vernal equinox but eventually shifted it to January 1, a practice that is in wide, but not universal, use around the world today.

Relative versus Absolute

We do not know how much time passed between the creation of humans and our era. The most common modern system of numbering years increases from a point in time that was associated with the coming of Christ into the world. This system, built around the Christian religion, called all years from year one onward anno domini, the year of our Lord (abbreviated as A.D.). The advantage to this system is that all years before A.D. 1 are numbered in reverse order so that the further back in time one goes the higher the year number, allowing for a variety of chronological schemes to be developed and tested. These years are called B.C. (before Christ). Ironically, a mistake was made when this system was invented so that Christ was actually born somewhere between 6 and 4 B.C. (see below, pp. 101–102).

Recently, there has been a shift in scholarship away from using the Christian-influenced labels, particularly in areas of the world where they might be offensive. Instead of A.D. and B.C., which are based on the advent of Christ, the designations C.E. (common era) and B.C.E. (before common era) are used. The numbers for the years remain exactly the same so that A.D. 1 is the same as 1 C.E. This commentary will retain the A.D./B.C. labels.

A major mistake was made when this system was devised, leaving out the year zero. The result is that when using arithmetic to calculate how many years passed from a B.C. date to an A.D. date, an extra year must be added to the sum. An extra year must be subtracted for the same exercise in reverse. For example, if we wanted to start at 457 B.C. to discover when a period of 490 years ended (the seventy-week prophecy of Daniel 9), we would need to cross between B.C. and A.D. Since B.C. numbers decrease through time, we add 490 (years) to negative 457 (or 457 B.C.), with a sum of 33 (or A.D. 33). However, our integer system uses a zero, which the calendar system does not. Since the span of time between 1 B.C. and A.D. 1 was one year and not two, we must account for that missing year by adding one more year to the sum of our calculation. In this way, 490 years spans the time between 457 B.C. and A.D. 34.

An alternate dating system exists that attempts to calculate time from Creation forward. This system is called anno mundi (A.M.), meaning “in the year of the world” (or “year after Creation”). Many have worked on a system that could be used universally, but since there is not a consensus on when Creation took place, there is no widely accepted standard system. The Eastern Orthodox Church during the Byzantine period used the dates in the Septuagint to arrive at a date equivalent to September 1, 5509 B.C. to begin their A.M. calendar system. The Jewish community in the Middle Ages used the Masoretic Text to come up with a date equivalent to October 6, 3761 B.C. to begin their A.M. system.

The ancient people did not use any of these methods to measure time. Most ancient civilizations primarily dated events by connecting them in a relative way to other events that were well established. We call them anchor events because these established events were used to anchor other dates to the timeline. The reign of a king was often the anchor event. Sometimes the anchor event was a natural disaster, such as an earthquake, famine, flood, or volcano eruption. Sometimes it was a war. In all ancient civilizations, astronomical phenomena such as eclipses and the movements of planets were noted and often tied to the reign of monarchs. These phenomena are useful in establishing absolute dates and setting chronological anchors. It is upon these anchor events that the secular historic chronology is largely based. For example, approximately 1,600 cuneiform texts dealing with astronomy have been recovered from the city of Babylon alone. About 300 of these were mathematical tables used for calculating the positions of various heavenly bodies. The remaining 1,300 texts were observational diaries, general yearly records, records that tracked individual planets, and records of lunar eclipses. Modern astronomers are able to work backward from known astronomical positions today to establish absolute dates that correspond to these observations.

Statements in the OT often use these anchor events to date other events, such as “In the third year of Cyrus...” (Dan. 10:1). It is up to modern chronologists to link the anchor event to a date in an absolute reckoning system (such as A.D./B.C. or A.M.). When this is done, we can know that an event that took place in the third year of Cyrus (Dan. 10:1) happened by our absolute reckoning system in 536 B.C. because we have calculated from other sources the exact absolute dates, according to our system, of the reign of Cyrus.

Archaeology is one area of research that provides absolute dates for these relative anchor events. When an absolute date is associated with an anchor event in OT history, we have an anchor date along the OT timeline. In the discussion of the OT timeline below, these anchor dates will be identified along with the archaeological data that allowed it to be assigned a date. In turn, the anchor date can be used to help understand the relative relationship of a number of other events; the most enlightening are often those from other books of the Bible.

Chronology versus Genealogy

Debate concerning the OT timeline often results from lack of data. Wherever an educated guess is the best that can be offered, there is debate. Sometimes theories are used to support a debated point. Often these theories are themselves educated guesses. And since it is not possible (due to the lack of data) to resolve all of the debates, these theories linger. Over time, unproven but not yet discredited theories become cherished by scholars who have used them. In some cases, when data later emerges that should have clarified the original debate, it is not allowed to do so because of the cherished theory. Students of chronology should always keep this in mind and seek to resolve debate rather than maintain a theory.

The concepts of chronology and genealogy often get confused. Chronology deals with statements of time. Genealogy deals with generations of family relations. It is common to find both of these in the same OT passage. However, genealogy does not follow any given time sequence and thus is immeasurable in absolute time and often unhelpful for debates on chronology. This is because certain numerical factors vary from case to case. These varying factors may be age when married, age of parents at procreation, gender of offspring, and quantity of offspring.

This is clearly seen in the family of Abraham. Before Isaac was born, Abraham's nephew had children (Gen. 18–19), producing three generations in Abraham's brother's line but only two in Abraham's. Thus, because Isaac was born late in Abraham's life, he was essentially contemporaneous with his uncle's grandchildren, rather than his uncle's children, his first cousins. Thus, when Abraham's family is compared to his brother's, a generation was essentially skipped. Without the details of the story, we would have assumed (from a genealogical list that included only names) that Isaac was in the same generation as his cousin, Abraham's brother's son. This generation disparity is further highlighted when we note that Isaac married his own cousin's daughter (Gen. 22:20–23).

Sometimes, disparate facts from different places in one or more scriptural narratives can help us identify generational relationships. Jacob, like Abraham, did not have children until late in life. We know this because his son Joseph was thirty when he rose to power in Egypt (Gen. 41:46). Jacob came to Egypt after seven years of plenty and two years of famine (Gen. 45:11), at which point he was 130 years old (Gen. 47:9). Thus, we can calculate that Joseph was born when Jacob was ninety-one years old. Joseph was also born in the last year of the second set of seven years that Jacob worked for his two wives (Gen. 30:25–26; 31:41), so Jacob was eighty-four when he married Leah and Rachel, one week apart (29:28), and seventy-seven when he fled home (Gen. 27:41—28:5). In this way, chronology helps illustrate how generations are not parallel, even among brothers (his twin, Esau, was married several times by that point and had sons of his own).

HISTORICAL OVERVIEW

The earliest attempts to reconcile biblical events with the history of secular nations were undertaken by Josephus, Africanus, and Eusebius. Josephus was a Jew living in the first century A.D. during the last days before the Romans destroyed Jerusalem and caused the second Diaspora (A.D. 70). It is evident that Josephus wanted the Romans to appreciate the long history of his people, going back to antiquity, and so he wrote his famous work, the Antiquities. Julius Africanus was a Christian writer who lived in the southern Levant at the end of the second and beginning of the third centuries A.D. He wrote Chronography in five volumes. Eusebius of Caesarea lived toward the end of the third and beginning of the fourth centuries A.D. and wrote Chronicle. All three quoted from ancient sources. Unfortunately, their writings do not all agree chronologically. For example, one source was the writings of an Egyptian priest named Manetho, who wrote a history of ancient Egypt. Manetho's work no longer exists as an independent work. Selected quotes, found in these three sources, are all that remain. Unfortunately, the quotes that these writers attribute to Manetho do not agree with each other. This has made modern attempts to use these sources difficult. It has been necessary to find additional data to help reconcile the inconsistencies and fill in the gaps from ancient writers such as these.

Early Attempts

In 1625, James Ussher was appointed archbishop of Armagh, making him the head of the Anglican Church of Ireland. He spent the next few decades writing on theology before publishing a treatise on the calendar in 1648. Two years later, in 1650, his most famous work, Annales veteris testamenti, a prima mundi origine deducti (Annals of the Old Testament, Deduced from the Beginning of the World), was published. In it, he traced the chronology of the Bible back to Creation, which he thought was the evening of October 22, 4004 B.C.

Although he died six years later, Ussher's chronology lived long after him. His A.M. dates were adopted for use as margin dates in many Bibles. The first was a French Catholic Latin Bible in 1662. The best-known Bible to include Ussher's dates in the margins, the King James Version (KJV), did not originally have them. Bishop William Lloyd adjusted Ussher's dates from A.M. to B.C./A.D. in the London edition of the Oxford Bible in 1701. In 1950, the KJV replaced them with an updated set of dates based on new knowledge. By the 1970s most Bibles had removed dates altogether from margins as it was becoming clear that the dates were problematic.

Thiele's Breakthrough

Edwin Thiele, Seventh-day Adventist professor of antiquities, did his doctoral work at the University of Chicago on the chronology of the kings of Judah and Israel. Kings rarely, if ever, died conveniently on the last day of the calendar year so that their successor could begin ruling on New Year's Day. As a result, the remaining days of a calendar year in which the former king died (or was removed from office) was the accession year of the next king. Thiele discovered that the Northern Kingdom of Israel counted the accession year (remaining time in the last year of the previous king) as year one of the new king (essentially counting the same year twice; termed nonaccession- or regnal-year system), while the Southern Kingdom of Judah counted the accession year as his year zero, making the regnal year (first full year of a new king) year one (termed accession-year system).

He also discovered that the two kingdoms considered the new year to begin at different points in the calendar year. Israel (in the north) began its new year in the spring (the month of Nisan), and Judah (in the south) began its new year in the fall (the month of Tishri). Armed with these two pieces of data, Thiele was able to demonstrate that most of the chronological statements in the OT regarding the kings lined up very well. Later scholars added the possibility of coregencies (where a son ruled with his father for a period immediately prior to the father's death). The addition of coregency to Thiele's discoveries reconciled nearly all of the chronological issues for the period of the kings, although some scholars still debate minor points. These discoveries proved vital in a more accurate understanding of how related chronological statements should be understood, not just among books but also within books and particularly the prophecies of Daniel.

TIMELINE AND ISSUES

The review of the OT timeline that follows will work from known to unknown. Most anchor dates are in the more recent past. The further back in time a civilization existed, the fewer archaeological records there are to be recovered. This results in less information for the older civilizations that would enable chronologists to create anchor dates.

Most of the dates from the Roman period back to the Babylonian civilization are firm. As a result, the first section will briefly review anchor dates from Nebuchadnezzar to Jesus (Babylon to early Rome). It will become clear that even with anchor dates, there is still room for debate around events that are not firmly fixed on the OT timeline. The sections that follow this will likewise mark time from one important figure to another until Creation. All dates in these sections are to indicate relationships between chronological statements in the Bible and should not be read as absolutely definitive. They are simply a point of reference. However, one system of interpretation needed to be followed for consistency, and so the one that required the least amount of subjectivity in regard to the biblical text was the method selected. Along the way, prominent areas of disagreement will be briefly examined.

Nebuchadnezzar to Jesus

Jehoiachin Released from Prison. The length of the captivity of Jehoiachin, one of the last kings of Judah, needs some chronological explanation. He was taken captive by the Babylonians when the city of Jerusalem fell on March 16, 597 B.C. For the Babylonians, a new calendar year began on April 13, 597 B.C., about one month later. Two ways were used to record that one month. One way was to ignore it (or wrap it into the next full calendar year). The other was to count it as a separate year altogether. The modern researcher cannot always be sure which system was used.

Jehoiachin was released from prison in the twelfth month on either the twenty-seventh day (2 Kin. 25:27) or the twenty-fifth day (Jer. 52:31), which would have been either March 23 or 21 (respectively), 560 B.C. This is a little more than thirty-seven years after being taken captive (2 Kin. 25:27) but almost a year and a half after Evil (Awel)-Merodach (Marduk, also Amel Marduk) became king. However, 2 Kings 25:27 records that Jehoiachin was released from prison by Evil (Awel)-Merodach in the year that he rose to power. Nebuchadnezzar died in early October 562 B.C. (likely on October 8), making 562/561 B.C. the accession year of Evil (Awel)-Merodach. So his rise to power happened thirty-five years, not thirty-seven years after Jehoiachin was taken captive. The problem is resolved in the translation of the phrase related to Evil (Awel)-Merodach becoming king.

The statement in 2 Kings 25:27, “in the year that he began to reign” or “in the year [he] became king” must be a reference to his first regnal year (561/560), not his accession year. Without this information we might believe that Jehoiachin was released almost immediately after Nebuchadnezzar’s death, rather than almost a year later. Understanding this helps us to realize that Jehoiachin’s imprisonment was not immediately on the mind of Evil (Awel)-Merodach but appears to have been an issue that came up after he had taken the necessary time to secure his throne. This also demonstrates that a year in ancient (including biblical) texts does not always mean one full calendar year.

The Cyrus Decree to Release Jews. Nabonidus (Nabunaid) was the last king of the Babylonian Empire. The Nabonidus Chronicle records the fall of the city of Babylon. Based on the chronology presented in the Nabonidus Chronicle, the Persian forces of Cyrus the Great captured Sippar on October 10, 539 B.C., Babylon on October 12, 539 B.C., and Arahshamnu on October 29, 539 B.C. Having vanquished all his immediate enemies, Cyrus was able to begin the first year of his reign as king of Babylonia the following spring, with the new year in April of 538 B.C., making this the year the decree was made to release the Jewish exiles (2 Chron. 36:22; Ezra 1:1; 6:3).

Decree to Restore and Rebuild Jerusalem. One anchor date from the NT that affects the OT timeline is found in Luke 3:1, 23. This links the beginning of the ministry of Jesus (at about thirty years of age, following His baptism) to the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar, which is commonly believed to have been in A.D. 27 (although there is some discussion on this date). Remembering that there was no year zero, the prophecy given to Daniel (Dan. 9:25) can be calculated to have begun in 457 B.C., the year the command was given to restore and rebuild Jerusalem by Artaxerxes I in the seventh year of his reign (Ezra 7:8–26).

An important factor in correlating anchor dates given by different writers is the new-year reckoning system (spring or autumn) used by the audience those writers were addressing.

Daniel used the Babylonian system (spring) when writing about a Babylonian government event in the narrative portion of his book. Jeremiah, writing about the same event (from the Jewish perspective), used the autumn system (which was used in the Southern Kingdom of Judah at the time; see “Thiele’s Breakthrough,” pp. 98–99). On the other hand, Daniel’s prophecies later in his book, written for a Jewish audience in captivity, also appear to use the autumn system of reckoning.

The Greek to Roman Transition. Alexander the Great crossed the Hellespont in 334 B.C. and defeated Darius in 333 B.C. In 332 B.C. he defeated the city of Tyre and marched into Egypt, establishing Alexandria. He marched into Mesopotamia and defeated Darius again in 331 B.C. On either June 10 or 11, 323 B.C., Alexander died in Babylon after having extended his kingdom into India.

Seleucus, former commander of the cavalry, emerged as ruler of Babylon in 312 B.C. In 301 B.C. Seleucus took control of Anatolia and Syria. Wars with other generals would mark this entire dynasty. Pompey killed the last Seleucid princes and established the Holy Land as a Roman province in 63 B.C. Hasmonean kings reigned there until Herod the Great (with the blessing of Rome) defeated the last of them in 37 B.C. and ascended to the throne.

Meanwhile, in either 305 or 304 B.C., the Ptolemaic Kingdom was established in Greece under Ptolemy I, former general and satrap of Egypt. Eventually the last (and famous) Cleopatra (the seventh) began to rule in 51 B.C. Julius Caesar, who had defeated Pompey, become emperor of Rome, and formed an alliance with Cleopatra, died on March 15, 44 B.C. His adopted son, Octavian, became emperor. In 37 B.C., the same year that Herod began ruling in Judea, Mark Antony married Cleopatra. Herod allied himself with Antony and named the Antonia Fortress just north of the Temple Mount in his honor. When Octavian defeated Cleopatra and Antony, Herod re-allied himself with Octavian, whose name was later changed to Caesar Augustus (Luke 2:1). Herod built a new port city (to replace Joppa) and named it Caesarea (Marittima) to honor his new patron.

Birth of Jesus. Luke 3:23 states that Jesus was “about thirty years of age” in A.D. 27. “About” could reasonably mean one to two years on either side of thirty (meaning that He could have been slightly younger or older than thirty at the time). Thirty years prior to A.D. 27 is 4 B.C. (remembering that there was no year zero in this system). Herod the Great died (Matt. 2:19–20) about 4 B.C.

Early church authors (Clement of Alexandria, Julius Africanus, Origen of Alexandria, Eusebius of Caesarea, Epiphanius, Tertullian, and others) record the tradition that Jesus was born anywhere from A.D. 1 to 4 B.C. Herod was named king by the Roman Senate in late 40 B.C. but not named king in Jerusalem until the summer or fall of 37 B.C. after defeating the last Hasmonean king. His reign ended after his thirty-fourth year in Judea, which was 4 B.C. (He died in Jericho but was buried at the Herodium, southeast of Bethlehem.) Both Origen and Eusebius relate the tradition that Jesus was about two years old when the wise men visited and that He was in Egypt for about two years, which fits the information in Matthew 2.

How trustworthy any of these early church traditions are (since they do not all agree) is still a matter of debate. Since Jesus spent some time in Egypt and was less than two years old when they traveled to Egypt (Matt. 2:16), it seems likely that He was not born before 6 B.C. and more likely sometime in 5 B.C.

Solomon to Nebuchadnezzar

Divided Monarchy Chronology. At some point following the death of Solomon, the years of the reigns of the kings of Judah (the Southern Kingdom) were recorded in Scripture using the accession-year system (essentially counting the remaining parts of the rest of the last year of the previous king as a year zero of the new king). The years of the reigns of the kings of Israel (the Northern Kingdom) were recorded by the regnal-year system (or nonaccession; making the last year of the previous king the first year of the new king, essentially counting the same year twice). Combining this piece of information with the understanding of coregencies of certain kings provides a solution to most chronological issues of the Hebrew kings (see “Thiele’s Breakthrough,” pp. 98–99).

Two archaeological objects provide the most important anchor dates that can be applied to the internal chronology to give the OT timeline absolute dates during the time of the divided monarchy. Corroborating archaeological evidence supports these dates. Shalmaneser III’s Monolith Inscription records the defeat of a coalition of forces from the Levant at Qarqar that included “Ahab, the Israelite.” This battle is believed to have taken place in 853 B.C. (based on the dating in the inscription) but is not recorded in Scripture. Soon after, in the same year (according to the chronology of the reigns of the kings in the Bible), Ahab died at Ramoth-Gilead, an event that is recorded in Scripture (1 Kin. 22:3, 35) and can thus be dated with confidence. The Black Obelisk shows Shalmaneser III receiving tribute in 841 B.C. from many peoples and regions, including Jehu, king of Israel. Scripture does not record this event, but it records the year in which Jehu began to reign in Israel. These two events, twelve years apart, are anchor dates in the chronology of the kings of Israel in the OT timeline.

There has been some debate regarding the date of the division of the kingdom. Alternative dates include 926 and 922 B.C. The year 922 B.C. is based on a citation of Menander of Ephesus by Josephus regarding a kings list of Tyre and not by a calculation of dates backward from Ahab. However, Josephus was wrong in his dates and also with his math. Thus, based on the anchor dates of Ahab and Jehu and on the reigns of the kings of the Northern Kingdom as given in Scripture, the date 926 B.C. is generally regarded as the correct one.

Other Anchor Dates. In an inscription, Tiglath-Pileser III of Assyria claims to have received tribute from Azariah/Uzziah of Judah in 743 B.C. This does not match with any account in Scripture, but it does fit within the chronology. Another inscription describes the defeat of Rezon by Tiglath-Pileser III in 732 B.C. (an account probably associated with 2 Kin. 16:7–9) around the time of Hoshea’s rise to the throne in Israel (2 Kin. 17:1). This provides another anchor date.

A Babylonian chronicle that dates to about 500 B.C. records that Shalmaneser V destroyed Samaria in 722 B.C. (2 Kin. 17:3) in the last year of his reign. This is an anchor date. This was also the accession year of Sargon II. He also claimed in his own inscriptions to have destroyed Samaria in 722 B.C., probably because he participated in the battle before officially becoming king.

The annals of Sennacherib record that in his third campaign, dated to 701 B.C., he laid siege to Jerusalem. This is no doubt the same event that is recorded in Scripture (2 Kin. 18:13; Is. 36:1), which occurred during Hezekiah's fourteenth year as king. This is an anchor date.

Rise of Babylon. Cuneiform tablets help us pinpoint the exact dates and make sense of the chronology in the closing years of the kingdom of Judah. On November 23, 626 B.C., Nabopolassar began to reign in Babylon, according to a cuneiform tablet in the British Museum (BM 25127). He was the father of Nebuchadnezzar II (who appears in the book of Daniel). Jeremiah's ministry, then, began in the year before this event (627 B.C.). In other words, God had already begun to predict the fall of Jerusalem by a conqueror from the north (Jer. 1:14) in the year before Nebuchadnezzar's father even began to reign and while Babylon was still part of the Assyrian Empire.

Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, joined forces with the king of Media. Together they attacked and defeated Nineveh. According to a cuneiform tablet in the British Museum (BM 21901), this was in July or August of 612 B.C. That same tablet also indicates that Nabopolassar attacked the remnant of the Assyrian empire under Ashurballit II, taking Haran in 610 B.C. The next year (609 B.C.) a large army from Egypt tried to capture Haran to assist the Assyrian king. This is almost surely what was referenced in 2 Kings 23:29 (2 Chr. 35:20–21) when Josiah died. This is an anchor date.

The Egyptians under Necho II took Kimuhu, a Babylonian fortress, in 606 B.C. according to a cuneiform tablet in the British Museum (BM 22047). The next year, 605 B.C., another tablet (BM 21946) says Nabopolassar sent his son Nebuchadnezzar to meet the Egyptians at Carchemish, where he crushed them. Nebuchadnezzar chased the Egyptians into the southern Levant and, in the process, conquered Jerusalem. This is an anchor date.

Nabopolassar died on August 15, 605 B.C. On September 7, 605 B.C., Nebuchadnezzar was made king of Babylon (making 605 B.C. his accession year). On April 2, 604 B.C., Nebuchadnezzar began his first regnal year as king of Babylon.

Dating the First Conquest of Jerusalem. Jeremiah wrote that the battle at Carchemish took place in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (Jer. 46:2). The kings of Judah, at least from the time of Josiah to the fifth year of Jehoiakim, reckoned their year from fall to fall (rather than spring to spring as they had from the Exodus at least through Solomon's reign). The book of the law was found during the eighteenth year of the reign of Josiah (2 Kin. 22:3, 8) and Passover was celebrated (because they wanted to do what the book of the law said) also in the eighteenth year (2 Kin. 23:23). Josiah died in May or June of 609 B.C. at the battle at Megiddo. Jehoahaz reigned for only three months, and thus his reign ended in either July or August of 609 B.C. Pharaoh Necho II deposed Jehoahaz and installed another son of Josiah, Jehoiakim (changing his name from Eliakim), who reigned for eleven years (2 Kin. 23:36). Jehoiakim, therefore, took the throne in July or August of 609 B.C. with only a month left in that accession year. His first regnal year began in September of 609 B.C. and the battle of Carchemish occurred four years later, as Jeremiah said. Jeremiah also connected this event to the beginning of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 25:1). However, the phrase that is sometimes translated as “first year” should more accurately be understood to mean “beginning year” (or “accession year”). Because the Hebrews reckoned the regnal year from September (when Nebuchadnezzar was put on the throne), Nebuchadnezzar began his regnal year not from April of 604 B.C. (as the Babylonians reckoned) but from September of 605 B.C., as reckoned by those in Judah. Thus, it is still accurate from the perspective of Judah to call 605 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar’s first year.

Exactly the reverse reckoning is seen in Daniel 1:1. Daniel recorded that Nebuchadnezzar attacked Jerusalem in the third year of Jehoiakim. But Nebuchadnezzar attacked Jerusalem after the battle of Carchemish, which, as just was said, took place in Jehoiakim’s fourth year. This has been explained by simply understanding that Daniel was writing from Babylon, in which the regnal year began in April, not September, and so appears to have reflected the Babylonian government’s system of reckoning. In later prophecies when writing about his people, Daniel’s method appears to have used the autumn to autumn reckoning system. From the Babylonian perspective (as the first chapter of Daniel is written), the accession year of Jehoiakim ended not in September of 609 B.C. but in April of 608 B.C. Therefore, from the Babylonian way of reckoning, the battle of Carchemish, and thus the fall of Jerusalem in 605 B.C., took place in the third year of Jehoiakim, not his fourth. This does not affect the seventy-year prophecy of Jeremiah (Jer. 25:11–12; 29:10), as he was writing based on the Jewish way of reckoning. This amply illustrates the ever-present difficulty when comparing chronologies of unrelated ancient cultures. The chronologist must always remember from what perspective the information was recorded.

End of Judah. Nebuchadnezzar returned to the Levant (which the Babylonians called “Hatti-land”) in May or June of 604 B.C. to receive tribute from those he had conquered the year before. It seems that when Jehoiakim became his vassal (2 Kin. 24:1), he also adopted the Babylonian calendar and returned to counting the years from spring to spring. From the perspective of those in Judah, Jehoiakim’s fifth year was seventeen months long rather than the normal twelve. This explains how the ninth month of his fifth year fell in the winter (Jer. 36:9, 22).

In this way, Jehoiakim’s eighth year was at this point the same as Nebuchadnezzar’s fourth year. A cuneiform tablet in the British Museum (BM 21946) records that in Nebuchadnezzar’s fourth year he was defeated on the border of Egypt. This most likely explains why Jehoiakim rebelled after serving Nebuchadnezzar for three years (2 Kin. 24:1).

Three years later (Jehoiakim's eleventh year; 2 Kin. 23:36; 2 Chr. 36:5) Nebuchadnezzar returned. A cuneiform tablet in the British Museum (BM 21946) says that he camped against the city of Judah in his seventh year. This tablet dates the beginning of the siege to December 18, 598 B.C. and the end to March 16, 597 B.C., which is the exact date of the fall of Jerusalem. Since 2 Kings 24:5–6 makes it clear that Jehoiakim died and his son Jehoiachin ascended to the throne and ruled for three months and ten days (2 Chr. 36:9) before Nebuchadnezzar replaced him after the siege, Jehoiakim must have died and Jehoiachin must have taken the throne on December 9, 598 B.C., just before the siege began.

Mattaniah, Jehoiachin's uncle, was made king by Nebuchadnezzar, who changed his name to Zedekiah (2 Kin. 24:17) immediately after the end of the siege, which was before the end of the regnal year in April. So the remainder of that year was his accession year. His first regnal year began on April 13, 597 B.C., corresponding to Nebuchadnezzar's eighth regnal year.

Zedekiah reigned for eleven years (2 Kin. 24:18), putting the fall of Judah in 587/586 B.C., which is dated to the nineteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign (Jer. 52:12–14). The siege had begun in the ninth year on the tenth day of the tenth month of the reign of Zedekiah (2 Kin. 25:1; Jer. 39:1). This means that the siege began on January 15, 588 B.C. Zedekiah's eleventh (and last) year as king began on April 23, 587 B.C. On the ninth day of the fourth month of that year, the walls were breached (2 Kin. 25:3–4), which was July 29, 587 B.C. Then on either the seventh day (2 Kin. 25:8–9) or on the tenth day (Jer. 52:12–13) of the fifth month, which would have been either August 25 or August 28, 587 B.C., Nebuzaradan burned the temple, the palace, and all the houses of Jerusalem. If Jeremiah was using the old way of calculating the start of the year (meaning in the fall) and not the Babylonian way, then the fall of Jerusalem was in the spring of 586 B.C. instead. This is likely the case, which is why many Bible chronologies, including this one, list 586 B.C. as the date for the fall of Jerusalem.

The wealth of data available in this period of history demonstrates what could be possible in understanding biblical chronology and the events associated with it in earlier periods if more data were available to work with.

Moses to Solomon

Dating the Exodus Event. Working from known historical dates that connect with stated biblical events, anchor dates were established that can be used to apply absolute dating to the relative dating statements in Scripture. As a result, working backward in time, Solomon died in 931 B.C. after reigning for forty years (1 Kin. 11:42). Thus, he began his reign in 971 B.C. First Kings 6:1 reads that the construction of the temple began in the second month (month of Ziv) in Solomon's fourth year. The mention of the month of Ziv reminds readers that at that time the Hebrews were still reckoning their new year in the spring. Thus, the construction of the temple began in what we call April/May of 967 B.C. This is important for dating the Exodus event because 1 Kings 6:1 also links the building of the temple to the Exodus event, 480 years earlier. According to this reckoning, the Exodus event would have taken place in March/April of 1447 B.C.

There has been an attempt to push Solomon's reign back a few years due to his coregency with David, resulting in an Exodus date of around 1450 B.C. Solomon would have reigned (as coregent and later as sole king) for forty-three or forty-four years. Other conservative scholars propose 1446 or 1445 B.C. as the date of the Exodus by rounding down. A very different approach has been suggested by those who argue that the 480 years are representative of generations and should not be understood as actual years. This is proposed in an effort to shorten the duration of the period to allow for Ramesses II (who ruled in the thirteenth century B.C.) to be associated with the Exodus event, which is not possible if the 480 years are taken as literal years. If understood literally, the 480 years allows for a ca. 1407 B.C. destruction of Jericho (it was not occupied in the thirteenth century B.C.) and a full 300 years from that date to the time of Jephthah (Judg. 11:26).

Forty Years Wandering. The Hebrews left Egypt on the fourteenth day of the first month (Ex. 12:2, 6, 31). Three months later they reached Sinai (Ex. 19:1). They left Sinai nearly eleven months later (Num. 10:11–13), a little over a year after the Exodus event. Aaron died on the first day of the fifth month in the fortieth year, when he was 123 years old (Num. 33:38–39). On the first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year, Moses recited Deuteronomy to the Hebrews, who had already killed Sihon and Og and were camped across from Jericho (Deut. 1:3–4). Moses died shortly thereafter on Mount Nebo, when he was 120 years old (Deut. 34:1, 7). These statements are in harmony with the age gap given in Exodus and also confirm that the forty years spoken of were counted from the Exodus event (Ex. 7:7) and not from the rejection of God by the Hebrews following the report of the scouts (Num. 14:33). They also confirm that there were only thirty-eight years from the pronouncement of the penalty until they began to fight for the land that they would later inhabit (Deut. 2:14). Understanding this helps us to understand God's mercy. The forty-year penalty included time already spent in the wilderness at Sinai.

Reign of Saul. There is a chronological statement regarding the reign of Saul (1 Sam. 13:1), the first king of Israel, that is difficult to understand because it appears that the Masoretic Text has left some words out. The Septuagint provides the possible missing information that likely appeared in other Hebrew manuscripts that are now lost but were reflected in the statement in Acts 13:21. Saul likely ruled for forty or forty-two years and may have been thirty years old when he began to reign. This information gives us some insights into the timeline of the story. Since David was thirty years old when he began to reign (2 Sam. 5:4), Saul had ruled for about ten years before David's birth.

Genealogy of David. There is a very short genealogical list between Perez, son of Judah by Tamar (Gen. 38), and the birth of David (Ruth 4:18–22), but it is consistent with other genealogical lists (1 Chr. 2:3–15; Matt. 1:3–6; Luke 3:31–33). Aaron (from the tribe of Levi) had married Nahshon's sister (from the tribe of Judah), Elisheba (Ex. 6:23). Nahshon was the leader of the tribe of Judah in the Exodus event (Num. 1:7; 2:3). His son Salmon married Rahab (Josh. 6; Matt. 1:5). Their son, Boaz, married Ruth (Ruth 4:13; Matt. 1:5), even though she was much younger than he was (Ruth 3:10). Their son, Obed, was the grandfather of David, who was the youngest son of eight (1 Sam. 17:12–14), although it looks like one son might have died early and was not counted in later genealogies (1 Chr. 2:15). Since these genealogies do not give chronological statements, there is no reason not to trust that they are complete. However, if they are complete and there were 480 years (1 Kin. 6:1) between the Exodus and David's son Solomon's fourth year of rule, then most of these genealogical links must have also been unusual, such as marriages between those who were of different generations within a family (see Isaac and Rebekah below) and births to parents late in their lives (see Abraham and Isaac below). This is likely here since it appears that at least one of the marriages was late in life (Boaz and Ruth), at least one involved a youngest son (David), and at least one involved a son born when a parent was old (Solomon; 2 Sam. 11:1; cf. 2 Sam. 21:15–17; 1 Kin. 1:1).

Abraham to Moses

From this point back to Creation, the archaeological record is highly fragmented and has suffered data loss to such a degree that dates can be reckoned only by chronological statements. As a result, there are no more anchor dates that can be determined confidently using extrabiblical data. Thus, we move into a time when there is much uncertainty in regard to how biblical events line up with secular ones.

Call of Abram. It is clear that Abram was seventy-five years old when he left Haran following the death of Terah (Gen. 12:4), but it appears that the call (Gen. 12:1–3) came while the family was still in Ur. There is no chronological statement to allow us to know how much time expired between that call and the death of Terah, but it is likely to have been two to three years if the entire 430 years of the sojourn (Ex. 12:40–41) included time in Canaan beginning with Abram's call (see below).

Some scholars have suggested that Amraphel, king of Shinar (Gen. 14:1), is another name for Hammurabi, king of Babylon. There are three chronological schemes that are used by scholars to date kings of ancient Babylon. Each scheme is named based on the length of the chronology so that there is a long chronology, a middle chronology, and a short chronology. Because there is not sufficient data, there is no way to determine confidently which scheme is correct. However, it is not possible that Hammurabi was the same person as the biblical Amraphel since all three of the chronological schemes appear to place Hammurabi more in the lifetime of Isaac or Jacob than early Abraham.

Birth of Jacob's Sons. It is common to think of Joseph as much younger than his other brothers. However, chronological statements make it clear that all eleven brothers were born within a seven-year period (Gen. 30:25; cf. 31:41). In order for this to be possible and each of the four mothers to receive at least two months of recovery time before becoming pregnant again, some of the mothers were pregnant at the same time.

Sojourn and Exodus 6. One area that remains unsettled in scholarship is the length of the sojourn. The term sojourn means “temporary stay” and refers to a length of time either from Abraham until the Exodus or from Joseph until the Exodus. Exodus 12:40–41 says that the length of the time Israel lived temporarily (without a permanent home) was 430 years. The Masoretic Text reads that the entire 430 years were spent in Egypt. The Septuagint and the Samaritan Pentateuch read that the 430 years includes time spent in both Canaan and Egypt. This latter reading seems to reflect a Hebrew manuscript that no longer exists but was referenced by Paul (Gal. 3:16–17), who claims that there were 430 years between the call of Abraham and the Law given at Mount Sinai (three months after the Exodus and thus in the same year as the Exodus; Ex. 19:1). Exodus 6 also seems to support the understanding.

Exodus 6:13–16 recounts the names of the family members who moved to Egypt and follows the list in Genesis 46:8–11. None of the other brothers are listed because the point is to explain who Aaron and Moses were (Ex. 6:26–27). In vv. 17–25 all of the sons born in Egypt to the family of Levi are listed. Also listed is the age at death for each of those in the line of Aaron and Moses (Ex. 6:16, 18, 20). Moses and Aaron's ages are also listed (Ex. 7:7). However, because the age of the father when his son was born is not listed (as the chronologies of Genesis 5 and 11 do), there is no way to link the chronology of Jacob to Moses directly. This has allowed for both sojourn theories (Abraham until the Exodus or Joseph until the Exodus) to be debated. That said, there either have to be hidden generations (not mentioned in Exodus 6) or the time in Egypt was much shorter than 430 years. This is because the total listed years from Kohath to Moses equal only 350 years ( $133 + 137 + 80 = 350$ ). However, this would mean that Kohath was only a newborn in Canaan and that all of his 133 years of life were spent in Egypt. It would also mean that he fathered his son, Amram, in the year he died (at the age of 133). It would likewise mean that Amram fathered Moses, his youngest son, in the year he died (at age 137). These scenarios are unlikely. It is also not clear where the hidden generations are supposed to be inserted to accommodate more time in Egypt, since the biblical text is clear that Kohath was born in Canaan (Gen. 46:11), that Amram married Levi's daughter/Kohath's sister (Ex. 2:1; 6:20), and that Moses was Amram's son (Ex. 2:1–10). This illustrates the difficulty of placing the Hebrews in Egypt for all 430 years of the "sojourn" (for more on this debate, see "The Four-Hundred-Thirty-Year Sojourn," p. 211).

Noah to Abraham

Flood Chronology. The Flood was tied to the age of Noah so that it began when he was 600 years old (Gen. 7:6). It ended when Noah was 601 (Gen. 8:13), although the family and animals (except for a few birds) did not leave the ark for nearly two more months (Gen. 8:14). There are chronological markers throughout the story to inform the reader when the rain stopped, when the waters started to diminish, when the tops of trees could be seen, and a few other events. This is important when discussing the event. Most events take place on a single day or within a relatively short period of time. Noah's family was in the ark well over an entire calendar year.

Dating Post-Flood Patriarchs. Because Genesis 11 provides chronological detail with the genealogy, it is possible to gain some insights into the patriarchs who lived after the Flood. There was a clear drop-off in age between Eber (who lived 464 years) and his son Peleg

(who lived 239 years—only about half as long). Because the cryptic phrase about the dividing of earth is attached to the days of Peleg, some have theorized that this could be a reference to the Tower of Babel event and that it may have involved physiological changes rather than just a simple language confusion. Others have wondered if there was a physical division of the earth beyond what had happened during the Flood. Another drop in life span is noticeable between Serug (who lived 230 years) and his son Nahor (who lived 148 years). It is not clear what caused these drops in life span.

Also, because of these two major drops, a study of the chronology reveals that some of the patriarchs were alive for most of this period. Noah died two years before Abram was born. Shem died ten years after Isaac and Rebekah's wedding. This has led some to theorize that Shem may have been Melchizedek because he was the oldest living patriarch at the time. Arphaxad died two years after Ishmael was born. Shelah died only nineteen years before Sarah. And Eber (after whom the Hebrews were named) lived for 464 years and for all but sixteen years of Abraham's life.

Adam to Noah

Date of Creation. Ussher calculated his A.M. (anno mundi) 1 date to be equal with 4004 B.C. This was based on his understanding of Bible chronology that set Jehoiachin's release from prison in the year 562 B.C. (2 Kin. 25:27). He considered that since the Sabbath is Saturday, then the Creation week began on Sunday. Using the Rudolphine Tables, he thought that the autumnal equinox should match with the creation of the heavenly bodies on the fourth day of Creation, which helped him set the start of Creation to the evening of October 22.

A chronology that considers the 430-year sojourn (see above, pp. 107–108) to include time from Abram's call to Mount Sinai (Gal. 3:16–17) could calculate the Creation event as being equal to 3958 B.C. One who determines the 430 years to have been only time in Egypt might pinpoint the Creation to about 4173 B.C. Some Christian scholars allow for the Creation event to be dated as far back as 10,000 B.C. with the understanding that, since the Bible is basically a book with the purpose of teaching lessons, perhaps there are further gaps in the chronology that are not apparent in the text itself. There are enough variables in the record that no one can know with any certainty the date when Creation week began.

Dating Pre-Flood Patriarchs. Even a cursory glance at the chronological statements given in Genesis 5 reveals that the life span of humans after the Fall but before the Flood were on average somewhat less than one thousand years each, with two major exceptions. Enoch did not die (Gen. 5:21–24) but appears to have lived a life that included delivering warning messages to the pre-Flood world (Jude 14–15) before being taken to heaven (Heb. 11:5), as Elijah later was (2 Kin. 2:11; cf. Matt. 17:3). The other life span anomaly was Noah's father, Lamech, who lived only 777 years. This has led some scholars to speculate that he may have died of other causes than old age. Methuselah, who lived to an age older than any other recorded human, 969 (Gen. 5:27), died in the same year as the Flood, causing some to wonder if he died in the Flood or just before it. Altogether, the Masoretic Text lists 1,656 years between Creation and the beginning of the Flood.

CONCLUSION

A study of chronology has led some to misuse it. One way that it is misused is in the setting of future dates. One of the most common theories is the notion that since there are six days in a week and then a seventh-day Sabbath, perhaps the thousand-year millennium (Rev. 20:3) is a seventh part of the history of sin (2 Pet. 3:8). The theory postulates that the six thousand years that precede the seventh will end with the Second Advent of Christ.

Ussher predicted that the six thousand years would end in the year A.D. 2000. Many others have set other dates. All have been wrong. A chronology that saw Creation as occurring in 4173 would have expected the six thousand years to have ended in A.D. 1828. A chronology that dated Creation to 3958 B.C. would expect the Second Coming in A.D. 2043.

However, these theories need to take into account that there is no prophecy toward this end in Scripture. Also, the dates presented here rely heavily on the current understanding of archaeology, which is always open to revision due to new discoveries and excavations. Further, some of these dates are tied to eclipses, and as more precise astronomical information is collected, those dates may also be adjusted, which would shift the dates in the OT timeline. As a result, theoretical speculation regarding end-of-time date setting should be avoided.

The Bible is a document intended to teach its readers how to form a loving, healthy relationship with God. It records history, but not every part is intended to be a record of history as many events are skipped. Understanding how all of its parts are related requires a study of chronology. The OT timeline provides a line that connects these parts.

A CHRONOLOGY FOLLOWING THE INTERNAL TIMELINE OF THE BIBLE

The Bible writers followed ancient methods of marking time by linking events in a relational way to other events, usually referred to as relative dating. This sometimes makes it difficult for us today to quickly understand when these biblical events took place in regard to unrelated events. We solve that problem with absolute dating. This method assigns fixed year numbers that, by their very nature, provide the relationship for unrelated events.

Because of the relative dating method found in Scripture, modern scholars use different systems to understand how these relative dates should be reinterpreted as absolute dates. Here we provide a chronology that follows one of these systems, as reflected throughout this commentary. These dates begin with the most recent and move backward toward Creation. The dates given here should not be taken as the final word on the matter. This chronology is presented as a reference tool. Major events are highlighted with bold text. Biblical references are provided for entries based on chronological statements or statements about the event in the text.

Although several modern scientific dating systems are at conflict with some of the earlier dates in this chronology, the relative happenings of these events are seen by assigning them dates as indicated in the internal timeline of the Bible.

- 1 If Jesus was about thirty years old when His ministry began (Luke 3:23), He would have been born ca. 5 B.C. However, “about thirty” could reasonably be plus or minus two to three years, which would shift this date.
- 2 The northern kingdom appears to have been split at this time (Hos. 5:5), which is reflected in the chronological reckoning.
- 3 The Septuagint provides missing information from Masoretic text in 1 Samuel 13:1.
- 4 This date reflects simple arithmetic from 1 Kings 6:1. Conservative scholars allow for an Exodus date between 1445 and 1450 B.C.
- 5 This reflects a 430-year sojourn in Canaan and Egypt (Abraham to Sinai; Gal. 3:16–17). Should the 430-year sojourn consist entirely of time spent in Egypt (Ex. 12:40; Masoretic text), all dates before this should be moved earlier by approximately 215 years.
- 6 This date is deduced by moving backward through the chronological details from Genesis 45:6.
- 7 Scripture does not provide a chronological statement for this event. The date reflects a statement connected with Peleg’s birth (Gen. 10:25).
- 8 The date of this event depends on the accuracy of the chronology in Genesis 10 and 11 (compare Luke 3:35–36).
- 9 Some scholars allow for this date to be as far back as ca. 10,000 B.C.

PENTATEUCH

INTRODUCTION TO THE PENTATEUCH

The term Pentateuch refers to the first five books of the Bible. It is a two-part Greek word, penta (“five”) plus teuchos (a case for carrying scrolls and later the scroll itself), and it goes back at least to the second century A.D. when the church father Tertullian spoke of the pentateuchos biblios, the “five-scrolled book.” The oldest designation of the Pentateuch is the Hebrew word torah. Although usually translated “law,” this term also more broadly refers to “instruction” and even “story.”

AUTHORSHIP

There is abundant evidence throughout Scripture (and early Jewish/Christian testimony) that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch.

Evidence from within the Pentateuch

The Hebrew phrase “God spoke to Moses” is found more than 235 times in the Pentateuch. Numerous passages refer to Moses as writing parts of the Pentateuch, and these include all three major types of writing in the Pentateuch: history/narrative, legal material, and poetry (see Ex. 17:14; 24:4; Num. 33:2; Deut. 31:9, 22, 24). Deuteronomy 31:24 mentions that Moses wrote all the words of “this torah” on a scroll. This verse may refer primarily to the book of Deuteronomy, but in light of the other references in the Pentateuch to Moses’s writing, it ultimately applies to the whole Torah.

Even though the book of Genesis does not itself explicitly mention Moses as the author, internal evidence of the Pentateuch points strongly toward this conclusion. The opening word of Exodus contains a grammatical construction (the word “and” as a waw conjunction) that links it with what comes before (i.e., the book of Genesis) and thus the two books are viewed together as a unity. The book of Genesis also has numerous Egyptian loan words, giving evidence that the author was well acquainted with the Egyptian language and customs, as was the case with Moses. Finally, various linguistic peculiarities of the Pentateuch are found only in Genesis and the other four books of the Torah.

Testimony of Joshua

After Moses’s death, God appeared to Joshua, Moses’s successor, and exhorted him to be strong, very courageous, and dedicated to obeying all of the Torah, which His servant Moses had given to him. Indeed, Joshua was instructed to continually speak of and think about the whole Torah in order to obey it and prosper (Josh. 1:7–8). Immediately after Moses completed the writing of the Torah, it was to be regarded as “canonical,” the foundation of divine revelation to God’s people.

Testimony of Later Old Testament Writers

Numerous passages in the OT refer to Moses as the author of the Pentateuch. Preexilic testimony includes Joshua 8:31–32, 34; 22:5; 23:6; Judges 1:20; 1 Kings 2:3; 2 Kings 14:6; 23:25. Exilic and postexilic testimony includes 2 Chronicles 23:18; 25:4; 30:16; 35:12; Ezra 3:2; 6:18; Nehemiah 8:1, 14; 13:1; Daniel 9:11, 13; and Malachi 4:4.

Testimony of Christ and the Gospel Writers

The Gospels cite the Pentateuch more than sixty times, often explicitly describing it as “the law of Moses” (e.g., Luke 2:22; 24:44; John 7:23) and using terms like “Moses wrote” (Mark 12:19; Luke 20:28; John 5:46) or simply “Moses” (Luke 24:27; John 5:45). In John 5:46, Jesus referred specifically to Moses’s writings, noting that he had written about Him.

Testimony of Acts and the Apostles

The book of Acts cites the Pentateuch more than twenty times and contains several references to the “law (nomos—the Greek word used for the Torah) of Moses” (Acts 13:39; 15:5; 28:23) and other expressions implying authorship of the Torah to Moses (Acts 3:22–23; 6:11, 14; 15:21; 21:21; 26:22). The apostles quote the Pentateuch more than sixty times, often referring to Moses as the author (e.g., Rom. 10:5 says “Moses writes,” citing Lev. 18:5; cf. Rom. 10:19; 1 Cor. 9:9; 2 Cor. 3:15; Heb. 10:28; 12:21).

Testimony of Early Jewish and Christian Sources and Ellen G. White

The historian Josephus (c.a. A.D. 37–100) states that “five are the books of Moses.” The Babylonian Talmud likewise affirms that “Moses wrote the Pentateuch and Job.” The early Christian church fathers consistently refer to the Pentateuch as written by Moses. Ellen White identifies Moses as the author of the Pentateuch, including the book of Genesis. She indicates that Moses wrote Genesis and Job in the wilderness of Midian (ST Feb 19, 1880; cf. PP 251). Other statements indicate her acceptance of Moses as the author of the Pentateuch (e.g., GC 434; PP 343, 364, 463).

Affirmation of Moses as the author of the Pentateuch does not eliminate the possibility that Moses himself used other written sources (see Gen. 5:1 and Num. 21:14) and that some explanatory phrases or updating of place-names may have been added for clarity in a later historical setting (e.g., the mention of Dan in Gen. 14:14 [cf. the original name Laish, Judg. 18:29]; the reference to the Canaanites in Gen. 12:6). The last eight verses of Deuteronomy, recording Moses’s death, were apparently written by Joshua.

CRITICAL THEORIES OF AUTHORSHIP

Throughout Judeo-Christian history until the rise of higher criticism in the time of the Enlightenment, the Pentateuch was almost universally recognized as written by Moses, under the inspiration of God. But with the rise of the Enlightenment, which elevated human reason over divine revelation, questions regarding the authorship of the Torah began to be seriously entertained. Starting with the Jewish philosopher Benedict Spinoza in the seventeenth century and the French court physician Jean Astruc in the eighteenth century, scholars gradually began to reject Moses's authorship of the Pentateuch.

Especially in German scholarship, various hypotheses of multiple sources (excluding Moses's authorship) were proposed and came to be called the Documentary Hypothesis. During the latter half of the nineteenth century, the New Documentary Hypothesis, developed by K. H. Graf, Abraham Kuenen, and Julius Wellhausen, began to dominate over the earlier theories, and it still holds sway in much of higher critical scholarship to the present day. Wellhausen was largely responsible for giving classical expression to and popularizing this New Documentary Hypothesis (1878). According to this theory, there were four main sources for the Pentateuch:

- J (Jahwist): written about 850 B.C. in the Southern Kingdom of Judah
- E (Elohist): written about 750 B.C. in the Northern Kingdom of Israel (a redactor [R<sup>JE</sup>] combined these sources about 650 B.C.)
- D (Deuteronomist): the core of the present book of Deuteronomy, produced in the time of Josiah (a redactor [R<sup>D</sup>] added the D source to JE about 550 B.C.)
- P (Priestly): written between 536 B. C. and 450 B.C. (a redactor [R<sup>P</sup>] incorporated the P source into the JED sources and completed the Pentateuch about 400 B.C.)

Since the time of Wellhausen, some modifications have been suggested regarding the dating of these and additional sources. But the basic schema of Wellhausen's Documentary Hypothesis is still widely defended in critical scholarship.

The basic pillars of the Documentary Hypothesis (also known as source criticism) were originally derived from the work of German classical literary critics studying the German fairy tales collected by the Grimm brothers and published in seven expanding editions from 1819 to 1857. In the spirit of the Enlightenment, it was assumed that the stories of the Pentateuch, like the Grimm stories, were myths or fairy tales and thus the techniques of literary source criticism common to the times could similarly be used for understanding the development of the Pentateuch.

The five basic pillars of the classical Documentary Hypothesis include: (1) use of different divine names (Yahweh and Elohim); (2) duplications and repetitions (double names like Jethro/Reuel, Ishmael/Midian, and Sinai/Horeb; repetitions like Abraham's two denials that Sarah was his wife [Gen. 12 and 20], and Hagar's two departures [Gen. 16 and 21]); (3) variations of style and language (such as different genres together—narrative, poetry, laws, etc.); (4) contradictions/anachronisms (e.g., the mention of domesticated camels and use of iron in the time of the patriarchs; the reference to the Hittite Empire; existence of codified laws); and (5) other signs of composite authorship (e.g., shifts and breaks in the narratives).

It must be noted that all of the basic pillars of the nineteenth-century literary-critical study of the German fairy tales and other Western folk literature have long since been abandoned, yet many biblical literary critics still continue to defend the results of scholarship based on these very pillars for supporting the composite authorship of the Pentateuch. Many of them simply ignore questions of authorship and focus on the final form of the text, called the New Literary Criticism.

Furthermore, all of the pillars of Wellhausen's Documentary Hypothesis have now been shown to be suspect when compared to other ANE literature discovered since the time of Wellhausen. (1) Numerous ancient documents with unquestioned unity use double names for the gods (e.g., Baal/Hadad in Ugaritic literature; Osiris/Wennofer in Egyptian literature; multiple epithets for God in the Code of Hammurabi). (2) Duplicates and repetitions like those in the Pentateuch can be seen in many Egyptian and Mesopotamian double names of individuals and geographical localities (e.g., the Assyrian King Tiglath-Pileser III/Pul; two names for Egypt in Merenptah's Israelite Stela). Documents and monuments with duplicate accounts, as in Genesis 1–2 (containing a general summary outline and then a more detailed account), are found throughout the ANE materials (e.g., the dual descriptions of Thutmose III on the Karnak Stela). (3) There are many ANE documents where variations of style/genre occur in the same context (e.g., the Biography of Uni [ca. 2400 B.C.] contains narrative, summary, hymns, and refrains). (4) Many of the supposed contradictions/anachronisms have now been shown to fit precisely into the times claimed for the patriarchal period: extensive evidence for the early domestication of camels and use of iron has been found; the existence of a vast Hittite Empire, unknown in the time of Wellhausen, has now come to light through archaeological excavations; various patriarchal customs described in the Pentateuch are illustrated in the Nuzi and Mari tablets from this very time; and major ANE law codes have been discovered from this period of history. Finally, (5) the supposed signs of composite authorship (e.g., narrative shifts/breaks) have been found throughout ancient literature, representing the literary style of the times. There is simply no ANE example for the kind of editorial method proposed by source critics.

Source criticism of the Pentateuch is undergirded by several specific presuppositions: (1) skepticism of the historicity of the recorded narratives; (2) an evolutionary model of Israel's development from primitive to advanced forms; (3) the rejection of supernatural activity in this evolutionary development; and (4) the assumption that the sources were human products of the life setting of the communities that produced them. Later techniques of higher criticism applied to the Pentateuch employ the same naturalistic presuppositions. This includes form criticism (pioneered by Hermann Gunkel in the 1920s), which focuses on the preliterary stage of oral traditions behind the written sources; and tradition history (pioneered by Gerhard von Rad in the 1930s), which attempts to trace the entire history of the pentateuchal tradition, from precompositional oral traditions, to written sources, to final shaping by the creative redactor.

The methodology underlying all of these approaches is that of the historical critical method (also called higher criticism). The central principle of this method is what scholars call the principle of criticism (the Cartesian principle of methodological doubt), which affirms the supremacy of reason as the ultimate criterion for truth. Nothing is accepted authoritatively at face value; everything must be verified or corrected by rationally reexamining the evidence; the Bible is always open to correction, and therefore the human interpreter is the final determiner of truth, and his or her reason is the final test of the authenticity of a passage. The basic steps of the higher critical method used on the Pentateuch involve (1) breaking down the text into sections, (2) inferring an original life setting that may have given rise to the text, and (3) reconstruction of the process in which the various stages of the tradition reached its final form.

Already at the turn of the century, Ellen White warned of the dangers of this method: “The work of higher criticism, in dissecting, conjecturing, reconstructing, is destroying faith in the Bible as a divine revelation. It is robbing God’s word of power to control, uplift, and inspire human lives” (AA 474, italics added). This method is opposed to the basic biblical principle of sola Scriptura, the Bible and the Bible only as our rule of faith and practice (e.g., Is. 8:20). Even a modified use of the historical critical method, which retains the principle of criticism and subordinates the Bible to human reason or experience, is unacceptable to those who maintain the biblical principle of sola Scriptura. The biblical approach to interpreting the Pentateuch rejects the principle of criticism; it analyzes but refuses to critique the Bible; it accepts the text of Scripture at face value as true and refuses to engage in the threefold process of dissection, conjecture, and hypothetical reconstruction (often contrary to the claims of the text) that is at the heart of all historical critical analysis. The biblical approach accepts what Scripture itself claims about the authorship of the Pentateuch: that it was written by Moses under the inspiration of God.

DATE AND PLACE OF WRITING

According to 1 Kings 6:1, Solomon began to build the temple in the fourth year of his reign, which was 480 years after Israel’s Exodus from Egypt. The fourth year of Solomon’s reign is dated to 967 B.C., and thus 480 years earlier yields circa 1447 B.C. as the date of the Exodus (see “Old Testament Timeline,” p. 94). Moses was eighty years old at the time of the Exodus (Ex. 7:7), after having spent forty years in the wilderness of Midian (Acts 7:30), during which period of time he wrote the book of Genesis (see pp. 120–121). Moses died at the age of 120 (Deut. 34:7), shortly after completing the writing of the Torah (31:24). Thus the Pentateuch was written during the fifteenth century B.C., with Genesis being written by Moses sometime between circa 1487 and 1447 B.C., while he was in the wilderness of Midian, and the rest of the Pentateuch between circa 1447 and 1407 B.C., during the wilderness sojourn of Israel between Egypt and the borders of the promised land.

UNITY OF THE PENTATEUCH

Historical Unity

The five books of Moses present a coherent and seamless history of the origins of this world and humankind and of the birth and development of the people of Israel as a nation. Genesis 1–11 chronicles the universal history of this world, including the accounts of the Creation and Fall of humankind and the history of the antediluvian world and the global Flood. Genesis 12–50 narrates the call of Abraham and pivotal events in the life of Abraham and Sarah and their descendants to the fourth generation of the covenant line—Isaac (and Rebekah), Jacob (and his wives), and the twelve sons of Jacob, with a spotlight on the life of Joseph, and Israel’s entry into Egypt.

Exodus continues the story of the covenant line, focusing on God’s presence with Israel in Egypt, delivering them from bondage to the Egyptians (Ex. 1–13), and God’s presence with Israel in the wilderness and at Mount Sinai, delivering them from the bondage of sin (chaps. 14–40). At Mount Sinai, God revealed the Law to them, entered into a covenant with His people, and gave to Moses detailed instructions regarding the building of the sanctuary. After the people’s sin of idolatry with the golden calf, God renewed His covenant with them. Israel, out of gratitude for God’s forgiving grace, built the sanctuary according to divine instructions, and the glory of God filled the completed tabernacle. God’s interaction with and revelation of His laws to Israel at Sinai occupied a period of almost a year and is described in Exodus 19–40, the entire book of Leviticus, and Numbers 1:1–10:10.

The rest of Numbers describes Israel’s journey to the plains of Moab at the border of the promised land. This journey includes Israel’s departure from Sinai and their rebellion at Kadesh Barnea; the forty years of wandering in the wilderness, interspersed with the giving of various laws; and Balaam’s futile attempt to curse Israel, followed by Israel’s apostasy at the Jordan. In the final book of the Pentateuch, Moses delivers his farewell address to the people of Israel, presented in a covenant renewal structure. The aged leader reviews God’s leading of Israel and His covenant stipulations, and he encourages Israel to be faithful to God. The book of Deuteronomy and the Torah as a whole conclude with the account of the death of Moses and the transfer of leadership to Joshua, who would lead them into the promised land. It is a unified story, providing a connected history from the Creation of the world to the death of Moses.

In broad overview, the main story line of the Pentateuch may be summarized by highlighting the main contribution of each book. This story line actually constitutes a microcosm of the unfolding of the entire sweep of salvation history for the world:

Genesis:	Humanity created in God’s image but ruined through sin (the book of Genesis ends with the words “a coffin in Egypt”)
Exodus:	Humanity (God’s people) redeemed from bondage
Leviticus:	Humanity (God’s people) worshipping God
Numbers:	Humanity (God’s people) in pilgrimage toward the promised land
Deuteronomy:	Humanity (God’s people) experiencing covenant renewal with God while poised at the borders of the promised land

Literary Unity: Macrostructure of the Pentateuch

The Pentateuch is composed of four major literary types: narrative, poetry, law, and genealogy. While the genealogies provide structure to the earlier sections of the Pentateuch, especially Genesis, they do not serve to structure the Pentateuch as a whole. Likewise, the legal portions of the Pentateuch are clustered in the center of the Pentateuch, especially Leviticus, but these collections of laws are not the means for shaping the Pentateuch as a whole. The whole of the Pentateuch is structured by the juxtaposition of the two remaining literary genres: narrative and poetry.

Already in the opening chapters of Genesis, a threefold literary sequence may be observed: narrative, poetic speech, and epilogue. The Creation account of Genesis 1:1—2:22 is narrative, followed by the poetic speech of Adam (2:23) and a short epilogue (2:24). Likewise, the account of the Fall (3:1–13) is a narrative, followed by a divine poetic speech (3:14–19) and an epilogue (3:20–24). There are numerous other examples of this technique in the microstructures of the Pentateuch (Gen. 4:1–26; 6:5—9:17; 9:18–29; 14:1–24; 16:1–16; 24:1–67; 25:1–26; 27:1–45; 37:1—48:22).

The fact that the threefold structuring sequence of narrative/poetic speech/epilogue is found so frequently in the Pentateuch on the microstructural level suggests the possibility that this same technique is perhaps employed in structuring the Pentateuch as a whole. OT scholar John Sailhamer has shown that indeed such is the case. The major blocks of narrative in the Pentateuch are punctuated by four major sections of poetic speech, each then followed by an epilogue. First, the patriarchal narratives of Genesis are concluded by a major block of poetic text in Genesis 49 followed by an epilogue (Gen. 50). Second, the Exodus narrative block (Ex. 1–14) is capped off by another major poetic text (Moses's and Miriam's songs in Ex. 15:1–21) followed by an epilogue (Ex. 15:22–27). Third, the narrative block of Israel's experience in the wilderness (Num. 1–22) is climaxed by the poetic oracles of Balaam (Num. 23–24) and an epilogue (Num. 25). Finally, the pattern embraces the whole of the Pentateuch, as the overarching narrative of the Pentateuch, which stretches from Genesis 1 through Deuteronomy, is concluded by the poetic Song of Moses (Deut. 32–33) and the epilogue of chapter 34.

In three of these macrostructural junctures in the Pentateuch (Gen. 49; Num. 24; and Deut. 31) the material that connects the poetic sections to the preceding narrative sections contains similar terminology and motifs. In each there is:

- a central narrative figure (Jacob, Balaam, Moses), who
- calls together an audience in the imperative (Gen. 49:1; Num. 24:14; Deut. 31:28),
- to proclaim (Gen. 49:1; Num. 24:14; Deut. 31:28)
- what will happen (Gen. 49:1; Num. 24:14; Deut. 31:29)
- be'akharit hayyamim ("in the end of the days" or "in the days to come"; Gen. 49:1; Num. 24:14; Deut. 31:29).

This final phrase provides an indication that the poetic passages are eschatological—the passages point to an indefinite future time, which also embraces the ultimate end-time windup of the plan of salvation. By placing the eschatological poetic speeches after the narrative sections, Moses is also highlighting the point that the narratives are likewise to be seen as ultimately having end-time significance. The narrative texts describing God's dealings with His people in the past may be seen to foreshadow the end-time divine acts of salvation.

The three poetic seams coming at the three macrostructural junctures in the pentateuchal narratives (Gen. 49, Num. 23–24, and Deut. 32–33) not only refer to the last days but also highlight the coming of the Messiah. These passages reveal that the very heart of the eschatological focus in the Torah is on the coming Messiah. In the first poetic passage (Gen. 49), Jacob's last words of blessing are introduced as being given to his twelve sons individually (v. 1), but the conclusion of the blessing reveals that Jacob also had in mind "the twelve tribes of Israel," not just the individual sons (v. 28). Among the blessings on each tribe, two tribes are singled out by Jacob for extended blessings: Judah and Joseph. Close reading of these two extended blessings indicates that both point beyond the tribe to a future messianic figure who will come in the last days. The Messiah will be a royal figure from the tribe of Judah, Shiloh ("Provider of peace/prosperity [Heb. sh-l-h"]"; Gen. 49:10–12) and a divine, suffering servant, the antitypical Joseph (Gen. 49:22–26); note especially the motif of suffering in v. 23 and the abrupt aside referring to the divinity of the Messiah in v. 24, the Shepherd and Stone/Rock of Israel.

Deuteronomy 32–33, the last of the major pentateuchal poetic passages, contains a second blessing of the twelve tribes, paralleling that of Genesis 49, but this time given by Moses before his death. This blessing also occurs in the context of the "end of the days" (Deut. 31:22), which points to the indefinite future but also ultimately includes the messianic age to come. In his blessing Moses (like Jacob) singles out two tribes for extended attention, Joseph again but also Levi (not Judah as in Gen. 49). Again, close reading of these two extended blessings indicates that both point beyond the tribe to a future messianic figure who will come in the last days. The Messiah will be the new (antitypical) Joseph (Deut. 33:8–11) and also the antitypical Levitical priest (Deut. 33:13–17). Thus Genesis 49 and Deuteronomy 32–33 form a pair of poetic passages in the Pentateuch, both comprising blessings upon the twelve tribes, and both emphasizing the last days and the coming of the Messiah.

In a similar way, the Song of Moses (Ex. 15) and the Oracles of Balaam (Num. 23–24) form a pair of poetic passages, highlighting the eschatological future and the role of the Messiah in the New Exodus. The oracles of Balaam portray the Messiah as a future King bringing a new eschatological Exodus, recapitulating in His life the events of historical Israel in their Exodus from Egypt and conquest of their enemies. Note how Numbers 23:22 speaks of Israel's past Exodus and how God was bringing them out of Egypt. Numbers 24:8 repeats the exact same line in Hebrew, except with singular forms, applying it to the future King introduced in v. 7: God was bringing Him out of Egypt (note that some translations continue to use the plural forms in v. 8). The identity of the "Him" as conquering King is further clarified in vv. 8b–9 with the description of Him conquering His enemies, the nations. The fact that Numbers 24:17 takes place in the last days (v. 14) confirms the Messiah's eschatological royal reign and victory over the forces of evil (v. 17).

Exodus 15 does not contain the same eschatological phrase as the other three poetic passages located at the macrostructural junctures of the Pentateuch. But whereas Genesis 49 and Deuteronomy 32–33 form an outer pair of poetic passages, both comprising blessings on the twelve tribes, Exodus 15 and Numbers 23–24 comprise an inner pair of poetic passages with a common theme: the Exodus. Exodus 15 is the Song of Moses, celebrating the Exodus of Israel from Egypt and deliverance from their enemies at the Red Sea. Already in Exodus 15, the Exodus is open-ended toward the future, with a description of a future safe passage of Israel through the midst of their enemies instead of the expected portrayal of passage through the Red Sea (vv. 14–17). Next it climaxes with a description of the reign of Yahweh (ultimately the Messiah) “forever and ever” (v. 18). This forward-reaching movement in the Song of Moses finds its counterpart in the Balaam oracles, where the Exodus of Israel from Egypt is viewed as prefiguring the exodus of the messianic King and His conquest of His enemies. When viewed together, the Song of Moses (Ex. 15) and the Oracles of Balaam (Num. 23–24) form a pair highlighting the eschatological future and the role of the Messiah.

Thus the four poetic passages that form macrostructural seams in the Pentateuch are all eschatological in nature, and together they point to the Messiah at the heart of the last-days fulfillment. The four poetic passages are framed in a chiastic arrangement, ABBA, with the matching outer pair focusing on the motif of blessing the twelve tribes, and the matching inner pair focusing on the motif of the Exodus/New Exodus:

- A Blessing of the Twelve Tribes: Judah and Joseph (Gen. 49)
- B Exodus and New Exodus (Ex. 15)
- B' Exodus and New Exodus (Num. 22–24)
- A' Blessing of the Tribes: Joseph and Levi (Deut. 33)

Taken together, all of these poetic passages, placed after blocks of narrative, indicate that the preceding narrative portions are also to be seen as prefiguring the eschatological future. Thus, in the compositional strategy of Moses, under the inspiration of God, the large narrative blocks of the Pentateuch as well as the poetic seams are juxtaposed so as to be read eschatologically, and the eschatology ultimately focuses on the Messiah. The narrative portions of the Pentateuch, along with their poetic seams, may therefore be regarded as Christ-centered eschatology.

What about the major block of the Pentateuch that is not predominantly narrative/poetry, namely, the large section of legal material in the central portion of the Torah? A closer look reveals that in the compositional strategy of Moses, inspired by God, the legal portions of the Pentateuch clustered in its center, the book of Leviticus, are also framed to highlight Christ-centered eschatology.

The book of Leviticus is organized in a chiastic structure (see Leviticus: Introduction). The chiastic climax of Leviticus (and of the whole Pentateuch) is Leviticus 16, the chapter dealing with Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement. The Day of Atonement came at the end of the Hebrew ritual year. Its more accurate name (from Scripture) is not Yom Kippur but Yom Lippurim—the “Day of Atonements” (plural), which in Hebrew syntax implies the “Day of Complete or Final/Ultimate Atonement” (Lev. 23:28). All during the year, atonement was made for sins, but this day was the climax of the yearly ritual, in which the high priest made final atonement for all the sins of Israel (Lev. 16:16) and for the entire sanctuary that had been defiled during the year. On the holiest day of the year (Day of Final Atonement) the holiest person on earth (the high priest) went into the holiest spot on earth (the Most Holy Place of the sanctuary) to conduct the holiest work of the year (the work of “ultimate atonement”).

The high priest is a type of Christ (see Heb. 8:1–5), and this final cleansing work in its antitypical fulfillment takes place at the time of the end (see Dan. 7:9–14; 8:14). The eschatological nature of Leviticus 16 is already implied in the passage itself in the usage of the Hebrew verb kalah (“to finish,” “make an end”; Lev. 16:20). Only in this one occurrence in the Pentateuch is there said to be an “end” of atoning work. The Hebrew ritual year is a compacted typology foreshadowing the entire sweep of salvation history, and the Day of Atonement represents the eschatological climax of salvation history, focused on the day of final judgment. This eschatological day of judgment, centered in the work of Jesus in the heavenly sanctuary, is further developed in the books of Daniel (chaps. 7–8), Hebrews (10:25–30), and Revelation (11:19–20:15).

It may be concluded, therefore, that Moses, under divine inspiration, had a compositional strategy that cast the entire Pentateuch into an eschatological framework, with the person and work of the coming Messiah at the heart of that eschatological frame. In a sense, then, the Pentateuch as a whole, from beginning to end, may be seen as messianic eschatology.

It is not known in detail all that Jesus said to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus on Resurrection Sunday, but when Luke records that He began with Moses and diarmēneuō (“explained,” “expounded”) to them the materials in all the Scriptures concerning Himself (Luke 24:27), this may not be hyperbole after all. On the road to Emmaus Jesus’s principle of interpretation, His “hermeneutic”—for that is the word used in this verse, diarmēneuō—may not have been different, after all, than the original eschatological, messianic hermeneutic of Moses. The entire Pentateuch is centered in Christ.

Theological Unity: The Grand Central Theme

In recent decades scholars have increasingly recognized that Genesis 1–3 is set apart from the rest of the Pentateuch, constituting a kind of prologue or introduction. These opening chapters of the Torah are now widely regarded as providing the interpretive foundation for the rest of the Pentateuch. A close reading of Genesis 1–3 allows a multifaceted theological center of the Pentateuch to emerge. Like seven facets of a beautiful diamond, there are seven interrelated themes that comprise the grand central theme of the Pentateuch.

1. Creation and God’s Design for His Creatures. As one opens the first pages of the Pentateuch, the overriding theme of divine creation becomes immediately apparent. Not only creation per se but also God's original design for His creation is demonstrated. For humans this included God's provision for their home, their work, their diet, their day of rest and worship (the Sabbath), their social relationship with each other, their relationship with the animals, and so on. God also established a creation covenant with humans, who were made in His image, which involved the multiple covenant blessings of descendants, dominion, land, and a personal relationship with their Creator (Gen. 1:27–28; 2:1–3, 8–17), as well as one covenant curse/sanction (not to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil on pain of death; Gen. 2:17). So Creation and God's covenant provisions for His creation is an obvious first facet of the multifaceted diamond that comprises the theological center at the beginning of the Pentateuch.

The creation theme continues throughout the Pentateuch, often appearing in subtle ways. The Flood was a process of cosmic de-creation and re-creation of the earth. Abram swore an oath by the Creator of heaven and earth (Gen. 14:22). The plagues against the Egyptians were another de-creation (Ex. 7–12). At the end of the Pentateuch, coming full circle with its beginning, one encounters creation language echoing Genesis 1:1–3. God created again (Deut. 32:6, 10–11). This time He is described as the One who “made” (Heb. ‘asah, Deut. 32:6; cf. Gen. 1:7, 11–12, 16, 25–26, 31, etc.) the people of Israel into a nation, finding them in the waste places (Heb. tohu, Deut. 32:10; cf. Gen. 1:2) and hovering (Heb. rakhap, v. 11; cf. Gen. 1:2) over His people as the Spirit did at Creation. The divine provisions for human needs given at Creation are expanded throughout the Pentateuch, including legislation regarding work, diet, Sabbath, marriage/family/sexuality, care of animals, and so on.

2. The Character of the Creator. A close reading of Genesis 1–2 reveals an even deeper underlying issue than the work of creation: the character of the Creator. In portraying creation week in Genesis 1 (which actually continues through Gen. 2:4a), Moses identifies the Creator as “God,” using the Hebrew elohim; but in the rest of Genesis 2, the complementary Creation account, Moses adds the name of God, which in Hebrew is yahweh (represented in English as “LORD”). Critical scholars have claimed that this gives evidence of two different sources, but in so doing they have missed the profound central issue portrayed in Genesis 1–2. This two-part Creation narrative does not contain different conjectured sources but rather forms a unity composed by a single author. In Genesis 1 and 2, Moses is not only portraying the divine act of Creation and God's original design for humankind but also eloquently highlighting the character of the Creator.

In Genesis 1, God appears as elohim. This is the generic word for God; el in Hebrew means “mighty one,” and the plural probably serves as a superlative, meaning “the Mightiest One.” He is the omnipotent God; He speaks and it is done. He is the transcendent One, totally separate from and above His creation. He is the infinite One, the all-powerful sovereign Creator. He is elohim. In Genesis 2 the name yahweh (usually appearing in English as “LORD”) is introduced alongside elohim. Yahweh is the personal, covenant name of God. He is the Self-Existent, Intimate One, who comes down to be present with His creatures, who bends down over a lump of clay and blows into Adam's nostrils the breath of life, who takes one of Adam's ribs and architecturally designs and builds a beautiful creature to be his companion. He is the intimate, caring God. The two methods of representing God reveal a dual portrayal of the character of God.

Throughout the Pentateuch the character of God is repeatedly revealed by the use of one or the other (and sometimes both) of these names for God, depending on which aspect of God's character is being emphasized. Various other names for God are also employed, highlighting other attributes of the divine character:

- adonai: "Lord" or "Sovereign" (e.g., Gen. 15:2)
- 'el 'elyon: "God Most High" (Gen. 14:18–22; Num. 24:16; Deut. 32:8)
- 'el ro'i: "the God Who Sees" (Gen. 16:13)
- 'el shaddai: "God Almighty" (Gen. 17:1; Ex. 6:3; Num. 24:4)
- 'el 'olam: "Eternal/Everlasting God" (e.g., Gen. 21:33)
- pakhad yitskhaq: "the Fear of Isaac" (Gen. 31:42)
- 'abid ya'aqob: "Mighty One/God of Jacob" (Gen. 49:24)
- tsur: "Rock" (Deut. 32:4, 15, 18, 31)
- 'ab: "Father" (Deut. 32:6)

Looking schematically at the Pentateuch, each of the five books may be seen to emphasize one major character trait of God: (1) Genesis presents God's sovereignty as Creator; (2) Exodus reveals God's redeeming power; (3) Leviticus emphasizes God's holiness; (4) Numbers traces God's justice and mercy (goodness and severity) in dealing with Israel during their wilderness pilgrimage; and (5) Deuteronomy highlights God's covenant faithfulness (Heb. khesed) toward His people.

3. The Rise of the Moral Conflict. Why was it so important to emphasize the character of the Creator at the beginning of the Pentateuch? Because only against this background can the central issue in Genesis 3 be properly grasped. Genesis 3 describes the rise of a moral conflict on earth over the issue of the character of God. The presence of the serpent, clearly identified in Revelation 12 as the devil or Satan who was cast out of heaven (Rev. 12:9), indicates the cosmic nature of this conflict that had already begun in heaven (Is. 14:12–15; Ezek. 28:12–19; Rev. 12:7–9). The serpent called into question the goodness of the Creator with his insinuations to Eve. Eve and Adam believed the lies of the serpent, they fell from innocence, and the floodgates of woe were opened upon the world.

Thus, the third facet of the Pentateuch's theological center is the rise of the moral controversy, and this conflict rages over the issue of the character of God. The first part of Genesis 3:15 records God's promise that He would put enmity between the serpent and the woman, and between his descendants and hers. Here is the prediction of the continued moral conflict down through history between the spiritual descendants of Satan and the spiritual descendants of Eve.

The remainder of the Pentateuch traces this continued moral conflict in the history of the world and in the history of Abraham and his descendants, the people of Israel. The paradigm of this Great Controversy outside the Garden is first illustrated in the moral conflict between Cain and Abel, and the conflict is highlighted throughout the book of Genesis: the genealogy of Cain (Gen. 4) versus the genealogy of Seth (Gen. 5); the “sons/daughters of men” versus the “sons of God” (Gen. 6:1–4); the wicked antediluvian world versus the righteous remnant saved in the ark during the Flood (Gen. 6–9); and the history of the covenant line through Abraham versus the attempts from both human and supernatural enemies to derail the onward progress of the covenant. Throughout this continued conflict the issue of theodicy—the trustworthiness of God’s character—emerges over and over.

In the book of Exodus the cosmic moral conflict is concentrated in the clash of deities—the true and living God of Israel versus the gods of Egypt (Ex. 12:12)—played out on the human level in God’s deliverance of His people from the oppressive power of Egypt. The moral conflict continues throughout the narratives of the Pentateuch, as Israel’s experience alternates between obedience to God (all too infrequently) and rebellion/murmuring against Him in the wilderness, including apostasy with the golden calf at Sinai and with Baal Peor on the borders of the promised land. Throughout these episodes the trustworthiness of the living God is the core issue. Israel’s worship—either of the true and living God Yahweh or of the false gods, such as Baal—reveals what they regard as the worthiness of the One they chose to worship.

4. The Gospel Covenant Promise Centered in the Person of the Messianic Seed. Genesis 3:15 also reveals a fourth pillar of the theological foundation of the Pentateuch. The enmity described in v. 15 is not a natural hatred. After Adam and Eve sinned, there was no longer natural enmity between them and the serpent. They had sold themselves to the serpent, and their hearts had become depraved and bent toward evil, just like the serpent’s. But in this verse, God Himself promises to implant enmity between Eve and the serpent and between their spiritual descendants (collective zer’a, “seed,” “offspring”).

The structure of the narrative of the Fall, found in the third chapter of Genesis, is symmetrical (chiastic), and exactly in the center, at the apex of the chiasm (vv. 14–15) is found what theologians call “the first Gospel promise.” The middle part of Genesis 3:15 goes to the heart of this promise and shows that it is centered in a Person. God told the serpent that He would shup (“crush,” “bruise,” “strike”) the serpent’s head and the serpent would shup (“crush,” “bruise,” “strike”) His heel. In this verse the conflict narrows from many descendants (a collective “seed”) in the first part of the verse to a masculine singular pronoun in the last part of the verse—“He”—fighting against the serpent. Elsewhere in Scripture whenever the term “seed” is modified by a singular pronoun, it is a single individual who is in view. Likewise, in this verse God promises victory centered in a Person. “He”—the ultimate representative Seed of the woman, later to be revealed as the Messiah—shall bruise your head, Satan, and you shall bruise His heel. This is the fourth facet of the Pentateuch’s theological center: the promise of redemption centered in the Person of the messianic Offspring/Seed. In the examination of the literary macrostructure in a previous section, it became evident how this messianic theme structures and permeates the entire Pentateuch.

Covenant terminology is implicit in the context of Genesis 3:15, indicating that this messianic promise is actually the first pronouncement of the everlasting covenant between the Father and the Son, announcing that a solution to the cosmic moral conflict will be forthcoming. This covenant theme figures prominently throughout the rest of the Pentateuch, including the Noahic covenant (Gen. 6:18; 9:9–17), the Abrahamic covenant (Gen. 12, 15, 17), and the Sinaitic covenant (Ex. 19:5; 24; 34). The covenant promises originally given to humankind (Gen. 1:28)—seed/descendants, land, dominion, and divine-human intimacy—are repeated to Abram (Gen. 12:1–3, 7; 17:6–8) and to Israel at Sinai (Ex. 19, 24, 34). So the fourth facet of the Pentateuch's theological center is the Gospel covenant promise of a solution to the moral conflict, centered in the messianic Offspring/Seed.

5. Substitutionary Atonement Worked Out by the Messianic Offspring/Seed. Visualize what is depicted in Genesis 3:15: the Seed/Offspring, Christ, takes off His sandal, as it were, bares His heel, and steps voluntarily on a venomous viper. It is a picture of the Seed/Offspring voluntarily giving up His life to slay the serpent. Christ volunteered to consciously step on the head of the most deadly viper in the universe, the serpent Satan himself, knowing full well that it would cost Him His life. Here is a powerful portrait of the substitutionary sacrifice of Christ on our behalf. Here is the fifth facet of the Pentateuch's theological center: the substitutionary atonement, as our representative Seed/Offspring would die on behalf of the fallen human race. This facet is further highlighted in Genesis 3:21, where Adam and Eve are covered with the skins of a slain animal, intimating their being covered by the robe of righteousness of their Substitute, the Lamb of God (cf. Isa. 61:10).

The theme of substitutionary atonement is developed throughout the Pentateuch: in the drama of Abraham and Isaac on Mount Moriah, with the ram dying in Isaac's place (Gen. 22); in the instructions for the first Passover service, where God passed over the homes covered by the blood of the Passover lamb (Ex. 12:12–13); and in numerous divine instructions regarding the Levitical sacrificial system elsewhere in the Pentateuch, particularly in the book of Leviticus. For example, Leviticus 1:4 points to the meaning of substitution. The sacrificial animal was a substitute, representing the repentant sinner who brought it. Leviticus 17:11 describes the meaning of the blood in the sacrificial system: the life is in the blood, and the blood of the sacrifice makes atonement for the nepeš—a term meaning various things but here meaning “soul” or “life.” The key phrase in this passage regarding this atonement can be rendered, “in exchange for the person.” This highlights the concept of substitution that is involved in the sacrifice, pointing to the substitutionary death of Christ on the cross (see also Lev. 4 and 16).

6. The End of the Cosmic Conflict. The sixth facet of this theological jewel of the Pentateuch is also found in Genesis 3:15. Here is predicted the resolution of the cosmic conflict at the close of earth's history when evil and the serpent will come to an end. In New (mixed with Old) Testament terms, Christ's heel would be bruised at Calvary, but this was only a wound to the heel. Later revelation, including pentateuchal prefigurations in the typology of the sanctuary (e.g., the waving of the wave sheaf on the third day after the Passover sacrifice; Lev. 23:10–11), makes clear that though the Messiah would die, on the third day He would come back to life. But Satan would be crushed in the head, a mortal wound with no hope of recovery. The great cosmic conflict will not go on forever (see Lev. 16). Romans 16:20 alludes to Genesis 3:15, as Paul describes the end of the cosmic conflict when the God of peace will crush Satan under our feet. Satan’s head was mortally wounded at Calvary and will receive the final crushing at the end of time. So the sixth facet of the Pentateuch’s theological center is the predicted final end of the moral conflict as the serpent’s head is crushed.

7. The Sanctuary Setting of the Moral Conflict. A seventh, and last, facet of the multifaceted theological center of the Pentateuch is implied throughout Genesis 1–3. There are in Genesis 2–3 theological concepts that later will be at the heart of the theology of the sanctuary as found in Exodus and Leviticus and other places in the Bible. This incipient theology of the sanctuary is expressed through what later on will be sanctuary terminology and concepts. Although Eden is the home of Adam and Eve, it is also the place where God comes and meets with them and where an investigative judgment takes place (Gen. 3:8–19) and grace is made available through the promised Messiah and His sacrificial death (Gen. 3:15, 21). After Adam and Eve are expelled from the Garden, God placed two cherubim by the eastern entrance of the Garden—pointing to the future eastern entrance to the sanctuary, where humans came to worship the Lord.

In the time of the patriarchs after the Flood, the basic features of the sanctuary were represented by the altars that the patriarchs built wherever they sojourned. After Israel was delivered from Egyptian bondage at the Red Sea, the Song of Moses predicted that God would establish His sanctuary in the promised land (Ex. 15:17). In the remainder of the Pentateuch, the sanctuary becomes the locus of attention as the place where God comes to dwell in the midst of the people (Ex. 25:8) and also as the battleground of the moral conflict. At the sanctuary the people of Israel expressed loyalty to Yahweh in their worship, and conversely at the sanctuary God’s people and their leaders often showed their disloyalty and even rebellion against God (e.g., Nadab and Abihu; Lev. 10) and their failure to avail themselves of the provisions of the sanctuary services (e.g., Lev. 23:29–30). Thus the sanctuary is the seventh facet of the pentateuchal theological diamond, the center of the great controversy over the character of God, as well as the center of God’s work of redemption for His people.

From its opening pages the Torah’s seven-faceted theological center emerges and is unfolded in the remainder of the Pentateuch. This center is not an “organizing principle” into which all the other themes, motifs, and concepts of the Pentateuch are to be forced to fit. Instead, this center serves as an orientation point in light of which the other themes of the Pentateuch make ultimate sense.

IMPORTANCE OF THE PENTATEUCH

The Pentateuch constitutes the foundational revelation for the rest of Scripture. This becomes apparent in several ways.

The Torah Is Foundational for Later Blocks of Hebrew Scripture

The Hebrew Bible is divided into three sections: Torah, Prophets (Former and Latter/Major and Minor, beginning with Joshua), and Writings (beginning with the book of Psalms). These major blocks of inspired material were juxtaposed in the final canonical form of the Hebrew Bible (perhaps by Ezra; see “Formation of the Biblical Canon,” p. 21). They are organized so that at the seam of each of these sections is an evident pattern that presents a consistent call to focus on the Torah.

It has already been pointed out above how the book of Joshua begins with the divine charge to study, consider, speak, and perform everything written in the law (Torah) of Moses (Josh. 1:8). At the end of the Prophets, in the final chapter of its last book, Malachi, God gives a similar charge to remember the law (Torah) of Moses, His servant (Mal. 4:4). And positioned immediately thereafter, as presented in the Hebrew Bible, is the book of Psalms, which begins with a Torah psalm, echoing Joshua 1 and offering a blessing upon the one whose delight and daily meditation is focused on Torah (Ps. 1:2).

The order of books in the Septuagint, organized thematically by the Greek translators and generally followed by modern versions, likewise highlights the Torah in the way the major blocks are seamed together. Immediately after the Torah come the Historical Books, beginning with Joshua with its divine call to meditate on the Torah (Josh. 1:6–8). Then comes the collection of Hymnic-Wisdom Literature, commencing with Psalm 1, in which the person is blessed who meditates day and night on the Torah (Ps. 1:3). Finally come the Prophets, concluding with Malachi, with its last chapter exhorting us to remember the Torah of Moses (Mal. 4:4).

Later Blocks of Hebrew Scripture Reveal a Dependence on the Torah

The later writers of the Hebrew Scriptures show their great indebtedness to the Torah by references and allusions to the books of Moses. In the historical books of the Former Prophets there are references to the curses of the law (Torah; i.e., Lev. 26; Deut. 28) that would fall upon Israel for disobedience (e.g., Josh. 8:34; 23:6–13) and narratives revealing how these curses did in fact fall upon the nation in their apostasy. As another example, the promise to David that his son would build a house for God’s name (2 Sam. 7:13) is intertextually linked with the original promise in Deuteronomy 12:5. Again, at the end of David’s reign, his final words to his son Solomon stressed the need for him and the nation to follow the will of God as set forth in the Torah (1 Kin. 2:3). As a final example, later kings of Judah (Hezekiah and Josiah) followed the Lord in accordance with the words of the Torah given by Moses (2 Kin. 18:6; 23:25).

The greatest impact of the Torah is found in the Latter Prophets. Both Major Prophets and Minor Prophets (the Book of the Twelve) give evidence of heavy dependence on the contents of the Torah. For example, the frequent covenant lawsuits of the OT prophets (e.g., Is. 1:2–20; Jer. 2:4–13), with their call to “heaven and earth” as witnesses, allude back to the covenant lawsuit of Deuteronomy 32. In these lawsuits there are also references to the covenant stipulations of the Torah that have been violated (e.g., Ps. 50:16–21; Jer. 2:10–11; Hos. 4:1–2; Mic.

6:9–12) and the covenant curses of the Torah that have already fallen or will fall upon those who are disobedient (e.g., Is. 1:5–6, alluding to Deut. 28:51–52; Hos. 4:3; and Mic. 6:13–16). Numerous other passages in the Prophets show direct dependence upon the Torah.

In the Writings, several psalms are devoted to extolling the Torah (Pss. 1, 19, 119). In the most unsuspected places of the wisdom literature appear references to the Pentateuch. In the Song of Songs, for example, subtle allusions to the events of Israel's Exodus from Egypt occur, which were long ago recognized by various Jewish authors. As noted above in the section on Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, Ezra and Nehemiah make numerous references to the "law of Moses," and Daniel and Chronicles refer to the covenant curses of the Torah that have come upon the people of Israel for their rebellion against God.

Numerous New Testament Citations of the Pentateuch

The Pentateuch is quoted by NT writers at least 148 times. Genesis is cited thirty-four times, Exodus forty-four times, Leviticus seventeen times, Numbers three times, and Deuteronomy fifty times. Deuteronomy is the third most cited book in the OT, after Psalms and Isaiah (cited seventy-nine and sixty-six times respectively). Often these citations from the Pentateuch form the basis for major theological arguments. For example, Paul's message in Romans and Galatians about righteousness by faith without the works of the law depends heavily on the story of Abram and Moses's foundational statement about this paragon of faith—that is, that Abram believed in the Lord and He credited/accounted it to him for/as righteousness (Gen. 15:6).

New Testament Use of the Pentateuch in Typological Readings

Beyond explicit NT citations of the Pentateuch, various historical realities of the Pentateuch—persons, events, and institutions—are recognized as types (1 Cor. 10:6, 11) that find antitypical fulfillment in Jesus and the Gospel realities brought about by Him. A few of these pentateuchal types identified as such include Adam (Rom. 5:14); Noah and the Flood (1 Pet. 3:20–21; 2 Pet. 3:5–7); Melchizedek (Heb. 7:1–17); the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (2 Pet. 2:6–10; Jude 7); Hagar and Sarah (Gal. 4:24–31); Isaac, Abraham's Seed/Offspring (Gal. 3:16, 18, 29), especially in his experience on Mount Moriah (Rom. 9:7); Israel's Exodus from Egypt (Gr. exodos; Matt. 2:14–15; Luke 9:31); Israel's "baptism" in the Red Sea (1 Cor. 10:1–2); Israel's wilderness wandering and temptations (1 Cor. 10:1–11), especially the water from the rock (John 7:37; 1 Cor. 10:4), the giving of manna (John 6:32–58), and the brazen serpent of Numbers 21:9 (John 3:14–15); Moses the prophet (Deut. 18:15–19; John 6:14; 8:40; Heb. 3:1–6; cf. Matt. 5–7; Luke 6:20–49); the sanctuary and its services (Matt. 12:6; John 1:14; 2:21; 1 Cor. 3:16–17; 2 Cor. 6:16; Heb. 8–10; Rev. 3:12; 7:15; 11:19; 21:3, 16, 22); and the priesthood (Heb. 3:1; 6:20; 8:1; 1 Pet. 2:5, 9; Rev. 1:5–6; 5:10; 20:6). As evidenced from this representative sample, whole swaths of NT theology and practical lessons of Christian living are built upon or illustrated by typology taken from the Pentateuch.

New Testament Doctrines and the Pentateuch

Almost all of the NT doctrines are already summarized in Genesis, even in the first three chapters of Genesis. There is a growing consensus among scholars, whether liberal or conservative, that Genesis 1–3 forms the interpretative foundation for the rest of Scripture. All of the major biblical doctrinal themes—Creation, covenant, the cosmic conflict, law, the Sabbath, God and His attributes/character, Christ, the Holy Spirit, the nature of humanity, sin, salvation, righteousness by faith, the sanctuary, atonement, eschatology, the remnant, marriage and sexuality, etc.—may be traced, at least embryonically, to the opening pages of the Bible in Genesis 1–3 and are developed in Genesis and the rest of the Pentateuch. Without this foundation in the Pentateuch, many of these doctrines would be incomprehensible or at least unclear.

For these and many other reasons, the Pentateuch may be regarded as the foundation of present truth, waiting to be explored by the earnest Bible student. Every new Spirit-led examination of the jewels found in the Pentateuch will make them shine with new luster, and the Christ to whom they ultimately point will become ever more precious to the attentive reader whose heart will be filled with hope.

Ultimately, the Pentateuch's foundational nature and its all-encompassing, God-centered worldview remind us of God's intimate engagement in this world and in the lives of His people. While readers throughout the ages have been able to discern innumerable pillars of magnificent truths, they have also been encouraged by the realization of God's unfathomable grace as manifested in the ups and downs of human history. In the midst of the Pentateuch's realistic depiction of dysfunctional families, failed leadership, and rebellious mobs, interrupted by sparks of human faithfulness and stubborn reliance on God's unwavering promises, we can see grace at work. This grace is taken hold of by frail human faith, engendering hope in a future when sin will be no more and eternity will become a present reality. That will truly be Eden restored.

GENESIS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The book starts with the Hebrew term bereshit (“in the beginning”) which, following ancient conventions, is also its title. The English name comes from gene-seos, meaning “origins,” the title taken from the Greek Septuagint and adapted by the Latin Vulgate. The book of Genesis does not explicitly state who its author was. However, Moses is recognized as the author of the Pentateuch by many authors of the NT (Matt. 8:4; 19:7–8; 22:24; Mark 7:10; 12:19, 26; Luke 2:22; 16:29; 24:27, 44; John 1:17, 45; 5:46; 7:22–23; 8:5; Acts 3:22; 13:39), who themselves lived with the tradition that he was the author.

Date. From the early centuries A.D. until only recently, most Christian interpreters have understood Moses to have written the Pentateuch sometime in the fifteenth century B.C. Jewish interpreters have had this understanding much longer. However, beginning with the rise of rationalism in the mid-1800s, this consensus began to be questioned by scholars using the historical-critical method. These scholars suggested that the Pentateuch was written not by a single hand but by many through a complex editorial process. They proposed at least four different sources written by anonymous authors between the tenth and the fifth centuries B.C. Although no external evidence has ever surfaced for the existence of any of these proposed sources, most academic work done today assumes this theory to be true. Key arguments of critical scholarship include the use of differing divine names as an indication of multiple sources, the large numbers mentioned in the Pentateuch (esp. regarding the number of Israelites leaving Egypt), doublets and repetition (e.g., the wife/sister incidents in Abraham’s and Isaac’s lives [Gen. 12, 20, 26]), supposed anachronisms (such as the appearance of camels), and so forth. Some of these challenges to the authenticity of Mosaic authorship will be dealt with in the notes of this commentary (see “Introduction to the Pentateuch,” p. 120). However, the heart of the issue concerns one’s understanding of what makes a text historically reliable. First, it is important to remember that the theological, biographical, selective, and interpretive nature of biblical stories does not automatically disqualify them from being historical. Rather, these characteristics highlight the important cultural differences between a twenty-first-century (often Western) audience and the biblical authors whose Eastern and holistic worldview left space for a God, who actively intervenes in human history. Considering biblical chronology as a whole as well as the internal evidence of Genesis, it is likely that the book was indeed written by Moses during his sojourn in Midian prior to the Exodus. Moses himself may have had access to archival documents that were marked by the recurring toledot formula (see p. 139) while other material was received by direct divine revelation (see “Introduction to the Pentateuch,” p. 120).

Backgrounds. The narrative flow of Genesis moves from Creation to the arrival of the Hebrews in Egypt. Genesis 1:1–11:26 is an overview of human history that serves as an introduction to the entire Bible. This overview includes the creation of the cosmos, the creation of humanity during the creation of life on this planet, humanity’s fall into sin, a universal Flood, and the confusion of the languages. From Genesis 11:27 to the end of the book, the narrative slows down as it focuses on God’s promises to Abram, particularly the promise of a “Son,” and the struggles, mistakes, and faithfulness in the generations of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob during their journey through the promised land and their final arrival in Egypt.

Genealogies play a significant role in the structure of Genesis. Ancient cultures placed great importance on genealogies because they provided a link to the past, explained origins, established kinship links, demonstrated the legitimacy of people or people groups (such as priests or kings), and highlighted continuity. The Hebrew phrase 'elleh toledot ("these are the generations," or, using a more generic translation, "this is the genealogy") appears eleven times throughout the book (2:4; 5:1; 6:9; 10:1; 11:10; 11:27; 25:12; 25:19; 36:1; 36:9; 37:2). Based on comparative ANE data, scholars have understood the phrase as either a title or a summary statement. While many of these genealogies move the story forward or act as transitions between key scenes, others seem unimportant and disconnected from the bigger covenantal picture (e.g., 25:12 contains a brief genealogy of Ishmael, and 36:1, 9 contain genealogies related to Esau, both of whom are not part of the covenant line). While they do not provide a symmetrical or clear structural layout for Genesis, their presence throughout the book suggests unity and an attempt at creating structure. The author used a collection of similar documents to tell an important story, and the distinction between primordial and patriarchal histories is one not of historical reliability but of focus. This emphasis on name lists and their relations can become monotonous or boring to modern readers, who may find their significance difficult to understand. The genealogies in Genesis point toward the future: following the first pronouncement of the good news in Genesis 3:15, generation after generation wonders about the One who would bring salvation from the curse of sin.

Theology and Purpose. Genesis provides the foundation upon which all other authors in Scripture wrote and thus lays the groundwork for understanding and interpreting the entire Bible. Key topics, including theology (studies regarding God as Creator and Savior), anthropology (studies regarding humanity's creation from dust and its return to dust), sociology (studies regarding the family, marriage, and community), cosmology (studies regarding the origins of the cosmos), and soteriology (studies regarding the plan of salvation in the context of Creation and the Fall), all have their beginning in Genesis. This is why one will never accurately understand the remainder of Scripture without grasping Genesis's introductory theological themes.

1. In the Beginning. Genesis is built around beginnings. Light and darkness, earth and heaven, animals and plants, humanity, marriage, the Sabbath, the covenant family, sin and salvation—all are topics that will be further developed throughout the rest of Scripture. Genealogical notes are carefully positioned to emphasize the importance of beginnings (births) and continuity. Creation was a movement from seeming disorder to awesome order. Genesis 1:2 describes the earth as a mass of disorganized raw material, out of which the divine word created order in a systematic manner—forming, filling, and separating the physical and temporal environments. At the apex of Creation week, the seventh-day Sabbath ordered and sanctified life. In summary, Genesis is a reminder that in regard to order, true beginnings require a divine word. It is the creative word straight from the mouth of God that produced light, plants, animals, and life and that also sanctified the seventh day. In the prologue to his Gospel, the NT writer John reveals that this creative and divine Word arrived on earth with a mission of re-creation—and His name was Jesus (John 1:1–14).

2. The Disruption of Creation. Although Genesis begins with a description of the grand scheme of things, it soon becomes relational. A perfect creation was marred by the doubt and decisions made by humanity's first ancestors, which in turn led to the loss of paradise. The entrance of sin into this world, as told in the Fall narrative of Genesis 3, reversed the initial Creation order and resulted in disorder. It affected man and woman (3:12) and the rest of creation (3:15, 17–19). The pain of separation from God was palpable when Adam and Eve had to leave the Garden (3:23–24). Disorder was further exemplified when brother slayed brother (4:8). When humanity's downward trend toward wickedness reached a nadir, disorder became so irreversible that God decided to purify the world by a universal Flood (6:1–7). However, it wasn't long before disorder reigned supreme after the Flood as well. The confusion of languages, causing the dispersion of humanity (11:1–9), serves as a good example.

3. Promises and Hope. Promises play an important role in the book of Genesis. Without prompting, God promised a resolution to the conflict (Gen. 3:15). Immediately following the Flood, He offered another promise (8:21–9:1). In the selection of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, God made additional promises (12:1–3, 7; 13:15–17; 15:7–21; 17:4–8; 22:16–18; 26:2–4; 28:13–14) that were crucial to the development of the story in the rest of the Pentateuch and laid the foundation for further promises at its end (Deut. 28–32). The promises found in Genesis center on God.

The blessings pronounced in them deal with the growth of family, the settlement of land, and the result of both of these being a blessing to those who lived around them.

Genesis reveals that in the midst of evil and separation and pain, there was hope grounded in divine promises. Hope that the One who would crush the head of the serpent (3:15) would come as a descendent of the woman. Hope that God would provide a way to survive a universal Flood. Hope that God's elected would become a blessing to all the nations of the world (12:1–3). This hope recognized the Creator but longed for the Savior. While it is, at times, veiled, it reappears at key moments in the narrative and previews the blessed hope that has moved and transformed millions since. Ultimately, the last book of Scripture, Revelation, provides the balancing counterpart to Genesis. A new creation reverses the fallen creation. The Alpha and the Omega has been recognized as the One who was slain for the sins of humanity. Instead of a garden, there is a city, a new Jerusalem that becomes the home of re-created humanity.

4. Personal Piety. The first book of Scripture is not only a source of significant theology and crucial narratives for developing an understanding of origin and destiny. It is also a book permeated by prayer. Personal devotion and prayer are presented in Genesis as crucial to a life of piety. This can be seen in Abraham's prayers. He prayed for a son (15:1–3), for the cities doomed to destruction (18:16–33), and for foreign kings (20:7, 17–18). God answered the prayer of Abraham's servant (24:12–14, 26–27, 42–44) and Isaac's prayer for his wife (25:21). Prayer was significant in the life not only of the men of Genesis. Women are also shown as having had prayers answered: Hagar's desperate cry for help (21:16–21), Leah's prayer for children and the love of her husband (29:32–33; 30:17), and Rachel's prayer for children (30:22). People called upon the name of the Lord (e.g., 12:8; 13:4; 21:33; 26:25) in worship, praise, perplexity, and desperation—and God heard and acted in His time. The God of Genesis is a God who answers prayers and interacts with His creation—a critical message in the face of uncertainties, pain, loss, and hopelessness. Those who hope also pray.

5. Cosmic Theology. Genesis encourages the reader to step back to see the larger picture of a controversy with cosmic dimensions. Creation and the Fall were followed by tangible examples of God's involvement in this world and in the lives of His people and offer helpful insights into God's character. The God who searched for fallen humanity is also the God who planted the gospel seed found in Genesis 3:15. With the conflict moving from heaven to earth (Rev. 12), the entire universe could witness the divine plan that would bring salvation, rest, and restoration to a fallen world (1 Cor. 4:9).

COMMENTARY

1:1—11:26

PRIMORDIAL HISTORY: GOD'S DEALING WITH HUMANITY

Genesis 1:1—11:26 focuses on ancient history and describes the origins of humanity (including the creation of this planet, the Fall, a universal Flood, and the division of people).

Days of Creation

The phrase “evening and morning” in the Creation narrative indicates that the days of Creation should be understood as literal days. This is reinforced by the fact that the term “day” is accompanied by a numeral (e.g., “first,” “second”), and in such cases, the term “day” designates a literal day. From a biological perspective, aside from supernatural intervention, vegetation and natural life would require a short cycle of darkness and light indicated by a literal day in order to be preserved.

Besides, the Sabbath commandment demonstrates that the seven days are to be understood as literal days. While the Hebrew term for “day” can indicate a period of time longer than a twenty-four-hour day (e.g., it is possible that the Day of the Lord [Is. 2:12; Jer. 46:10; Joel 3:14] does not always refer to a 24-hour day), it does so in combination with other linguistic elements (such as prepositions, prepositional phrases, or compound constructions) but never when used with an ordinal or cardinal number.

An appropriate comprehension and appreciation of these first chapters is foundational for understanding the rest of Scripture.

1:1—2:25

God's Perfect Creation

After the general outline of Creation in chapter 1, chapter 2 focuses more closely on the creation of humanity. Genesis 1 and 2 are written in prose yet exhibit a wonderful rhythmic cadence while factually recording God's creative activity. The text is interested in the who, the how, and the result of God's creation.

1:1–2. Introductory Statement. The first two verses appear to function as a title or summary statement for the rest of the chapter. Scripture states right from the outset that the universe did not come into existence by itself but that it was the result of the creative activity of God. Before this beginning, there was only God, the uncreated One. In Hebrew thinking, the portrayal of the result often precedes the description of the process. God, standing above and outside of creation, created the heavens and the earth (v. 1), perhaps pointing to the planet with its atmospheric heaven surrounding it, even though it could also be interpreted as a reference to the creation of the larger universe. John's "in the beginning" (John 1:1) may point to the latter possibility, emphasizing the eternal existence of the Word. While this is possible, it is important to keep in mind that Genesis is primarily interested in God's relation to earth and its inhabitants. The verb "created" (bara') is always linked to divine creative activity (Ps. 33:6, 9; Amos 4:13) but does not always refer to creation out of nothing (Is. 65:17).

The description in v. 2 does not refer to chaos but to the condition of the planet before the raw materials were constituted by the Creator into the proper habitat for human existence (cf. Is. 34:11; Jer. 4:23). The spirit of God is mentioned, without any introduction, as being active in the work of creation in anticipation of the Creation week. This is the same spirit of God mentioned in other parts of the Bible (e.g., Gen. 41:38; Ex. 31:3; Pss. 51:11; 143:10; Is. 63:10). The members of the Godhead all participated in Creation, as highlighted by John's description of the creative power of the living Word in John 1. John 1:1–3 describes the handiwork of the Word that became flesh, picking up on the divine word in Genesis 1 and linking it to the important concepts of the Jewish memra' ("word") that appeared in intertestamental Judaism and the Greek logos ("word"; see notes on John 1).

1:3—2:4a. The Creation of Earth. God created the various elements and environments, as well as the creatures that would inhabit them and benefit from them—a process sometimes referred to as "forming and filling." The speech for each Creation day includes an announcement, a command, the fulfillment of the command, an assessment, a separation, a summary of the components, and the number of the day.

The creation of light on the first day (1:3–5) established the format of the other days of Creation. While the sun and moon signaling times and seasons (1:14–19) appeared specifically during the fourth day, the reference to light on the first day perhaps indicates that God created some unidentified source of light. Some believe that the sun was created on the first day but given purpose on the fourth. The phrase "evening and morning" on the first day does indicate that the light was functioning in the same way that the sun would function. The author of Genesis purposefully avoided naming the celestial lights in 1:16, instead opting to call them the "greater light" and "lesser light." While contemporary Ugarit texts from the second millennium B.C. mention a "great light" in reference to the sun, there is no equivalent phrase for the moon. When Moses penned these timeless words during the second half of the second millennium B.C., the sun and moon were the major deities in the ANE. Genesis 1 establishes their rightful place: they were created, nameless entities that do not deserve human worship. They are in the Creator's hand—like plants, animals, and humanity. There is an apparent parallelism between v. 4 and v. 18. God badal ("separated" or "divided") the light from the darkness (v. 4), and the luminaries divided the light from the darkness (v. 18; see 2 Cor. 4:1–6). Creation by separation established boundaries and structured the transformation of raw materials into an ordered creation propitious for life. In the Bible, God's law regulated boundaries and made possible proper social and religious interaction. In the building of the Israelite sanctuary, separation would also play an important role, indicating that its construction was an act of creation (see "Creation, Sabbath, and the Sanctuary," p. 231).

The final element of each Creation day involved God's observation and declaration of goodness, followed by naming. Scripture often links God's "seeing" to other decisive activities

(Gen. 6:12–13). In Genesis 1, God saw each Creation day activity and then declared it good (1:4, 10, 18, 21, 25) or even very good, as He did at the end of the sixth day (1:31). The Hebrew notion of “good” is more comprehensive than the common definition in English. In addition to a functional dimension (“it works”), the Hebrew tob refers also to aesthetic beauty, especially when associated with seeing (cf. 6:2; 24:16; 1 Sam. 16:12; 1 Kin. 1:6; Dan. 1:4), as well as to ethical uprightness (Is. 7:15). Following each creative act, God named the phenomenon or being. The divine act of naming marked divine sovereignty.

The account of the second day of Creation (1:6–8) describes the creation of the firmament. God made the expanse or the atmosphere of the planet. The text utilizes a verb that is often associated with the work of an artisan (e.g., a potter in Jer. 18:3–4). Again, God spoke and then made the sky, separating the atmosphere surrounding the earth and establishing the crucial water cycle—though described in prescientific phenomenological language.

On the third day of Creation (1:9–13), the water was separated from the dry land, and vegetation was created. Twice God called His creation “good” on the third day. The preparatory act of

Scripture and Science

The relationship between Scripture and science has been debated heatedly since the Enlightenment in the eighteenth century. Up to that time, most scholars had presupposed the existence of God and the veracity of the Bible. Science was the handmaid of theology. This relationship changed dramatically when rationalism and materialism became the underlying philosophical presuppositions of science. Reason, logic, and matter were elevated as the all-encompassing building blocks of knowledge and truth. Since God’s existence and His interventions could not be rationally demonstrated or explained, scholars began to exclude God from science. They suggested that the distinction between faith and science made science more objective, and faith became a private matter. In recent decades, scientists have begun to recognize that objectivity is impossible—due to the human factor. Yet the goal of achieving objectivity still remains a high priority for modern scientists. Scripture, on the other hand, begins with an assumption: In the beginning—there was God. Creation, albeit described in the first chapters of Genesis in phenomenological language, had God as its cause and agent. He spoke and it was.

Christian interaction with science can be classified using three different models. The first model suggests that science and religion should remain isolated from each other and should be considered separate entities. A search for truth—wherever the evidence leads—would argue against this model. The second model could be described as parallel yet separate. Both religion and science are recognized as sources of truth, yet they should not cross-pollinate. This model is the philosophical framework of theistic evolution, a theory that seeks to combine evolution and divine revelation by suggesting that God used evolution and its mechanisms (including natural selection) to “create” this world. One particular problem with this model is the existence of death and pain—as evidenced in the fossil record of the geologic column. While equality between the two sources of truth is postulated, science actually seems to play the first fiddle.

The third model calls for interaction between science and religion yet gives God (and His revelation) priority in the search for truth. Christians are not hostile to science but recognize God as the ultimate Creator of natural laws and seek to understand creation based on this premise. This model recognizes a higher Being as the true source of knowledge and wisdom and gives priority to Scripture in situations that require a choice between science and faith. It recognizes the transitory nature of scientific theories (some of the assured results of science that have been disproved by later generations of scientists) and gives priority to divine revelation. This model truly seeks to integrate all relevant data in a holistic manner because it acknowledges God not only as the Revelator but also as the Creator who established the laws of nature that engages and intrigues scientists (for more discussion, see “Faith and Science,” p. 57).

dividing the dry land and the water created the environment that was needed for fauna, flora, and the human inhabitants of the earth. Water was subject to divine command and was not an independent divine agent as in many creation accounts found around the world. Water could also become an agent of divine judgment (cf. Gen. 6–8). Once dry land had been established, God adorned the land with grass, bushes, and trees.

A possible translation of v. 14 would be “let the lights in the expanse be for separating.” This is held up by some as support for the notion that the sun had already been created on the first day but was only given its purpose and function on the fourth day. Either way, similar to v. 5, light was to play a key role in determining time and marking the distinction between day and night and different seasons by the position of these two heavenly bodies.

Day five witnessed the creation of fish and birds (1:20–23), who are described as nepesh khayyah (translated sometimes as “living souls” or “living creatures”). This phrase is also used with respect to humans (2:7). The biblical text reflects the abundance of life and life-forms that filled both water and sky, including the great sea creatures (cf. Job 3:8; Ps. 74:13–17; Is. 27:1). In ANE myths, these creatures represented primeval monsters; in the biblical text, they are part of a list of living creatures that derived their existence from an all-powerful Creator. Each species of animal and flora (1:11) was created according to its kind and followed God’s divine master plan and purpose (1:21). Through the command to be fruitful and multiply (or increase), God identified the means by which the earth would be filled with fauna and flora.

The Hebrew text distinguishes between cattle (i.e., livestock or domesticated animals), creeping things (i.e., animals moving on the ground), and beasts of the earth (i.e., wild animals). God made each animal species according to its kind. However, in the creation of human beings, God did something that He had not done before. He used a plural to refer to Himself. This suggests that within the mystery of the one God, there was a plurality, something that had already been indicated in the reference to the spirit of God in v. 2. While plants and animals were made according to their various kinds, humans were created in God’s image, with the capacity to interact with Him and to represent Him as free, rational moral agents. Their exhibition of their divine origin was reflected not only in the beauty and symmetry of their outward appearance but also in the holiness and purity of their characters (Ps. 8:5; 2 Cor. 3:18; Col. 3:10). Several English translations recognize v. 27 from the Hebrew as the first line of poetry in Scripture, emphasizing further the significant difference between the origin of humanity and the rest of creation. The distinction between male and female in humanity’s creation points to the complementary nature of the two sexes. They were both the expression of God’s image while at the same time being differentiated by gender. This gender distinction would be a vehicle to transform the divine blessing into reality (v. 28). God’s blessing involved not only filling the earth but also representing the Creator as stewards. God gave to both Adam and Eve the privilege of participating in God’s loving and caring dominion over creation. They became stewards of the Lord.

God also took care of the dietary needs of His creatures and assigned to them a vegetarian diet (1:29). Meat would become part of the human diet only after the Flood (9:3). God has always been interested in the well-being of His creatures, and this is shown here through His concern for what they should eat (see Lev. 11). The Lord created human beings as physical entities; matter is not evil. Scripture’s resounding “it was very good” (1:31) provides a fitting summary of God’s forming and filling activities. Order and structure point toward a Creator who enjoys a multiplicity of life.

The work of Creation climaxed on the Sabbath (Gen. 2:1–3) and consisted in the establishment of a time for communion with the Creator. He separated and sanctified the Sabbath for holy use. Although God is described as resting, He Himself does not need rest (Is. 40:28), but He did so to model for humans the importance of working six days and resting on the seventh day. This biblical passage provides for the reader the true origin of the seventh-day Sabbath rest. God instituted it during Creation week. Since God sanctified it, no human being has the right to desecrate it or appoint a substitute for it. The rest motif pointed beyond the Sabbath. In a post-Fall world, salvation rest is closely linked to Sabbath rest, without substituting for it (Heb. 4:1–10). Humanity can truly rest in God’s grace, not in its own works, and look expectantly toward the ultimate rest with the Creator and Savior.

2:4b–25. Humanity in the Garden. Many scholars commenting on the Creation account of Genesis 1–2 have suggested the existence of multiple sources, distinguishing two Creation accounts that are, at times, at odds with each other. However, a careful reading of the literary design of the first two chapters of Genesis presents a different picture. Following the general outline of Creation in chapter 1, Genesis 2:4–25 focuses more closely on the creation of humanity and the living conditions of their garden home (note the subtle shift from heavens and earth [1:1] to earth and heavens [2:4]). The chapters complement and supplement each other. On a small scale, the relationship between Genesis 1 and 2 illustrates the larger move of Genesis from the universal to the personal, from the creation of a planet to the creation of a people, beginning with a family.

God is described by a new name in Genesis 2:4. While Genesis 1 used the generic 'elohim, “God,” throughout, chapter 2 uses the combination “the LORD God.”

Genesis 2:4–6 is parallel to 1:1–3 and includes an important description stating that the Lord God formed Adam from the dust of the ground and breathed life into him (2:7). The Hebrew word 'asah (“formed” or “made”) used here designates the work of an artisan (Is. 29:16; Jer. 18:4–6). This human being or “man” ('adam) did not originate in the divine Being, but he was formed from the dust of the earth (Heb. 'adamah), and because of sin, he would return to it (Gen. 3:19). God’s life-giving breath transformed the dust into a creature made in the image of God who was to depend constantly on Him (Job 27:3; cf. Ezek. 37:9–10). Both animals and humans are described as khayyah (“living”; Gen. 1:20–21, 24, 30; 2:7, 19), but only the life of humankind was directly created through the divine breath.

The man was put in a garden (2:8), the future residence of both Adam and Eve. It would become the place where God met with them, and in that sense, the Garden expressed elements of the sanctuary (3:8; Ex. 25:8). The Garden of “Eden” (conveying the ideas of “pleasure” and “delight”) connotes a beautiful location filled with fertile vegetation. Notice that by mentioning Gihon, Cush, Hiddekel/Tigris, and Euphrates, the biblical writer is using geographical terms (toponyms) known to the readers. However, the pre-Flood topography of earth (and thus the probable geographic location of Eden) was markedly different from the post-Flood topography, a transformation likely caused by major tectonic changes and continental shifts (cf. Gen. 10:25).

Genesis 2:8–17 describes God as a gardener placing humans in Eden. Two specific trees are mentioned in v. 9: the “tree of life,” referred to in other places in the Bible (Prov. 3:18; 11:30; 13:12; 15:4; Rev. 2:7; 22:1–2, 14, 19), and the “tree of the knowledge of good and evil,” found only in Genesis 2–3. The phrase “knowledge of good and evil” is employed in other places to express the idea of independence. Children, who do not know good and evil, depend on their parents for wisdom (Deut. 1:39). Therefore, to know good and evil is to claim and act in total independence from God. Following the description of the bounty and beauty of Eden, the Lord made a home for humanity in the Garden (2:15). They would 'abad (“work” or “serve”) and shamar (“guard” or “tend”) their new home. This is how their dominion over nature would express itself. As noted, the verb shamar implies guarding, which suggests the possibility of danger (cf. 3:1). The two verbs are used together to define the work of the Levites in the sanctuary, indicating that God gave them “dominion over” the sanctuary and its services (Num. 3:7–8; 18:7).

Following the positioning of humanity, God’s first command involving the tree of the knowledge of good and evil was issued as a positive expression of God’s goodness (Gen. 2:16–17). God’s permission to eat from all other trees of the Garden (v. 16) was later twisted by the cunning serpent to emphasize the prohibition (3:1). This was a test of human obedience (cf. Gen. 22) that must be understood in the context of a cosmic conflict. Who would own the allegiance of humanity—God or the not-yet-identified opponent whose voice would be heard through the words of the serpent in Genesis 3? The issue of human allegiance and obedience is still crucial and will play a significant role in end-time events (Rev. 14:6–12).

God’s Name: The Tetragrammaton

The Hebrew divine name YHWH (most likely pronounced as Yahweh), also known as the tetragrammaton (Greek meaning “four letters”), appears first in Genesis 2:4. Recognizing God’s immense holiness, modern Jews do not pronounce this name but read instead the term Adonai (“my Lord”) whenever the name appears in the OT. Yahweh is most likely derived from the Hebrew verb “to be” and points to God’s eternal existence and covenant relationship (cf. Ex. 3:13–15). The use of Yahweh emphasizes God’s personal relationship with humanity.

Genesis 2:18 contains a surprising twist. Something in God's creation, recognized by the Creator Himself as "very good" (1:31), was "not good." Creation was not complete until Adam met Eve. Until a love relationship was established, Creation was unfinished. Humankind was to replicate (on a different scale) the divine love that gives and gives—and gives more. God designed Eve to be kenegdo—variously translated as "suitable," "comparable," "as his complement," "as his partner"—to Adam, yet she was also different. Creation in God's image and likeness (1:26–28) required both man and woman—only together did they reflect the ideal divine image. Sovereign God caused Adam to fall into a deep sleep, emphasizing the fact that man did not contribute anything to the creation of his soul mate. Woman was as much God's creature as man was. The verb used in 2:22 to describe Eve's creation means "fashioned" or "built." This verb marked the deliberate construction of the woman out of material taken from man—a fact that is recognized in the second piece of poetry included in the Creation account in 2:23. "Bone of my bones," "flesh of my flesh" marks the acknowledgment of correspondence: "She is like me!" was Adam's refrain after the Lord God had brought Eve to him in the first marriage to take place on earth. Notice that the Hebrew term for man ('ish) sounds very similar to the one for woman ('ishah) again suggesting closeness. They were joined in the oneness of marriage (v. 24), complementing each other, experiencing sexual union, and enjoying each other in their daily existence.

Living Soul or Living Being?

The phrase nepesh khayyah is at times translated as "living soul." While the word nepesh can mean various things in the Hebrew Bible, including "emotions," "thoughts," "mental faculties," "desires" (especially in poetic passages; e.g., Job 24:12; Pss. 6:3; 13:2; 31:9; 42:4–6; Ezek. 24:25), and even sometimes "dead body" (e.g., Num. 5:2; 9:6), it often, as here in Genesis 2:7, means "life" or "person"; never does it refer to an eternal, separate, conscious entity. God formed humans from dust and then breathed life into them. Death is the reverse process—when people breathe their last, their bodies return to dust (Eccl. 12:7). The concept of a soul as a separate, eternal entity is completely foreign to Scripture and based on Greek philosophy.

Genesis 2:25 functions as an important bridge to the Fall narrative in chapter 3. Man and woman were naked yet felt no shame. The term "naked" refers here to not being clothed in a normal manner (cf. 1 Sam. 19:24). Psalm 104:1–2 suggests that God's garments include splendor/honor, majesty, and light. The fact that humans were not dressed in a normal manner yet had been created in God's image and likeness (1:26–27) suggests that they reflected God's light and glory (cf. PP 45). This would change following the Fall, when Adam and Eve were suddenly ashamed of their nakedness after their eyes had been opened (3:10–11).

3:1–24

Humanity's Fall

The chapter tells the tragic story of humanity's temptation and Fall, followed by divine judgment and the introduction of the plan of salvation.

3:1–7. The Choice: Temptation and Fall. The initial waw conjunction at the beginning of v. 1 (usually translated as "now") captures well the link between the Creation narrative and the story of the Fall. This conjunction is used to highlight this important connection and is typical of Hebrew narratives. The unsuspecting reader expects, after the account of Creation, another story full of "good" or "very good" things. However, a creature more 'arum ("cunning," "crafty," "prudent," or "intelligent") than any other animal became the mouthpiece of the tempter and antagonist of God. This word 'arum can hold both negative and positive connotations in the OT (Prov. 12:16, 23; 13:16). In this context, the use suggests a negative meaning.

Hebrew readers would catch the wordplay between the "cunningness" ('arum) of the serpent and "naked" ('arumim; 2:25), the human experience that resulted from listening to the creature. The serpent demonstrated its cleverness by its ability to speak and the craftiness of its language. Throughout the ANE, serpents were used as mythological figures acting in opposition to the creator. The Bible identifies the serpent in the Garden with Satan (Rev. 12:9; 20:2), who also challenged God at the beginning of the cosmic conflict in heaven (Is. 14:12–14). The serpent's question did not contradict God's command outright but only added the negative "not," which suddenly transformed God's loving command into an absolute prohibition. It sounded similar yet communicated something entirely different—this is a good reminder of the power of words.

By entering into a dialogue with the serpent, Eve placed herself on dangerous ground. She was appointed together with Adam to guard the Garden and to have dominion over all the animals, but she was beginning to lose that dominion. She was the one who introduced the topic of death (v. 3), and the serpent took immediate advantage of it, arguing that death did not exist. It was God who, by threatening them with death, was setting limits on their potential. At first, the serpent's statement appeared to be true because after eating the fruit, the couple did not immediately die. Instead, what they experienced was spiritual death, and consequently, they were destined to disappear forever. The serpent demonstrated himself to be in open conflict with the Creator. Eve was fascinated by the prospect of opened eyes that the serpent offered her. The opening phrase of Genesis 3:6 mimics Genesis 1, where God saw that what He created was good. This implies that Eve was usurping the Creator's role in determining what was good. Suspicion of an all-powerful God, limited understanding, and selfish interest still warp humanity's ability to distinguish between good and evil (Is. 5:20). Eve's attraction affected three key areas: taste, vision, and intellect (cf. James 1:14–15). The Hebrew term khamad (usually translated as “desirable,” as in v. 6) expresses the same idea of covetousness as expressed in the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20:17). Eve ate and became an instrument of the serpent in leading Adam to eat of the fruit of the tree. He was not deceived but voluntarily chose death over life (1 Tim. 2:14). As a result of their eyes being opened, both Adam and Eve “knew,” yet this knowledge involved shame. They immediately set out to cover themselves with fig leaves (v. 7)—the first illustration of righteousness by works.

3:8–24. God's Questions and Judgment. The biblical text does not give any clue about the time span between Adam and Eve's recognition of shame and the hearing of God's voice. The reference in v. 8 to the “cool of the day”/“the time of the evening breeze” (lit. “the wind of the day”; ruakh can be translated as “wind” or “spirit”) likely indicates a habitual meeting time. Adam and Eve heard the sound of God walking in the Garden, and instead of welcoming Him they hid from His presence. Ironically, the Hebrew word translated as “heard” can also mean “obey,” which was precisely what both humans did not do. What followed was the first scene of divine investigation and judgment recorded in the Bible. God's approach was redemptive and began with a number of questions. “Where are you?” (v. 9) invited Adam and Eve to reflect on their relation to God. It was not a divine call for a precise geographical location. Obviously, God knew. “Who told you?” (v. 11) looked at the bigger picture, pointing the reader beyond the serpent to the antagonist whose rebellion had begun the cosmic conflict. “Have you eaten...?” (v. 11) reviewed the what of the transgression. All three questions were directed at Adam (“you” is singular), who immediately began pointing fingers (v. 12). Sin had changed forever the relationship between God and humanity and between husband and wife. Eve, in turn, pointed to the serpent as the source of her deception (v. 13). Indirectly, both Adam and Eve insinuated that God was responsible for sin.

The divine verdict was first pronounced against the serpent, then Eve, and finally Adam. The Lord did not leave them in total darkness to face the death that would follow their rebellion and their claim of independence from Him. Where there was no future for humanity, God provided one for them in Genesis 3:15—the first promise of redemption found in the Bible. The “seed” or “offspring” of the woman would overcome the serpent and would bring to an end enmity by restoring full shalom between humans and God. The “seed” (Heb. zera') of the woman is singular and can refer to an immediate offspring (4:25; 15:3), a distant descendant, or a large group of descendants. David was guaranteed a zera' (2 Sam. 7:12). Paul applies the Abrahamic zera' promise to Jesus Christ but also includes the church in Christ as Abraham's seed (Gal. 3:16, 29). The Hebrew term appears repeatedly in the contexts of genealogies, leaving the reader wondering when the seed would finally appear. The male seed would bruise or crush the head of the serpent while the serpent would bruise or strike His heel. Since the Hebrew term is the same for both actions, the verb communicates similar enmity between both opponents—yet with different results, due to the nature of the organs involved. Judgment on Eve reflected the entrance of pain and struggle and death in birth and family relations. God is not the author of pain. Both death and pain are due to humanity's sin, and God's judgment is a result. The punishment involving “desire” and “rule” described in v. 16 involved a struggle for control, something that would become even clearer in 4:7, where both terms appear together again. Judgment on Adam involved the means of supporting life. The text refers five times to eating and to the increased struggle to provide food (vv. 17–19). Life separated from the Creator meant toil, struggle, and constant conflict—and ultimately death (v. 19). Adam's naming of Eve (v. 20) has been interpreted as an indication of man's headship, yet the name paradoxically also marks the beginning of hope. Eve's name (Heb. khawah) is related to the Hebrew words for "living" (khay), "to live" (khayah), and "declaring" (khawah). In naming her, Adam expressed confidence in the coming of the seed/offspring (vv. 15–16).

Following this glimmer of hope, God concealed the nakedness of the couple. Dressing them was an act of investiture implying acceptance and a new status. God provided for them the skin of an animal, thus removing their shame. The plan of salvation was refigured: the innocent had to die for the guilty in order to atone for sin. Finally, vv. 22–24 describe the expulsion of humanity from the immediate presence of God. The language of vv. 23–24 is strong: God sent them away, banished them, and drove them out. This is the language of exile. Cherubim were stationed at the entrance to Eden to prevent access to the tree of life (3:24). The biblical text points to the direction of the eviction: eastward movement marked increasing separation from the Lord (4:14–16; 11:2; 25:6).

4:1–26

The Entrance of Death

The first human death soon followed the expulsion from Eden, yet the chapter ends on a hopeful note: another son was born.

4:1–15. The First Death: Cain Murders Abel. Eve expressed awe following the first human birth. Even though neither Adam nor Eve "created" in the divine sense, they shared in the creative act that God had established. In the Hebrew of v. 1, the verb yada' ("to know") is used as a euphemism for sexual intimacy. This underlines the closeness of sexual love and, in this case, the joy of the arrival of a child. Humans exhibited excitement in the midst of sadness. Eve's exclamation regarding Cain (v. 1) is significant. The Hebrew particle 'et has caused translators significant difficulty. Most translations convey the idea that Eve recognized God had helped her give birth. In that case, the 'et means "with"—"I have brought forth a man with the Lord" (i.e., with His help). However, another translation is possible—one that is in line with the nature of the promise of 3:15 and that is plausible in the Hebrew grammar. It would read: "I have acquired [or received] a man-child—the Lord." Here the particle 'et is translated as a sign of the direct object and suggests that Adam and Eve expected Cain to be the Savior.

Right from the outset, the biblical texts describe two basic (and, historically, often conflicting) human activities: Abel was a shepherd while Cain had chosen to be a farmer (4:2). Both Cain and Abel presented an offering to the Lord that reflected their vocations (4:3–5). The text does not provide details concerning the performance of the ritual, but it does state that God accepted Abel's offering from the first-born of his flock but did not accept that of Cain from the fruit of the ground (vv. 4–5). Assuming that when God dressed Adam and Eve with the skins of animals, He also instructed them concerning the importance of atoning sacrificial blood, one can find in Cain's offering a lack of respect for God and His instructions concerning atoning blood. Abel's bloody sacrifice, offered in faith (Heb. 11:4), indicates his dependence on the promised Savior. Cain refused to bring a sacrifice that would have atoned for sin (cf. PP 71).

Cain's response to the rejection of his offering was rage, expressed in a similar way as the fury and anger that led Jacob's sons to massacre the city of Shechem after they had heard of the rape of their sister (Gen. 34:7). The expression referring to Cain's (lit.) "fallen face" (translated variously as "downcast," "despondent," or "resentful") reiterates the anger and frustration boiling in Cain's heart. Part of this was a reaction against God and the preference shown to Abel. This jealousy was fueled by resentment over the fact that his younger brother had not deferred to his judgment. In spite of Cain's strong reaction, God reached out and interacted directly with His wayward creature, using pedagogical questions to draw him out. He also indicated a path for Cain to overcome his anger—he could change his course and follow the Lord's plan (v. 7). This suggests that Cain knew the difference between right and wrong and between appropriate and inappropriate offerings. The idea of rabats ("to lie down") can convey the image of someone, an animal or an evil power, waiting by the door to attack (cf. 49:9). Another way to understand this passage is to consider the term translated as "sin" (khatta't) in v. 7 to mean "sin offering" (as it does in much of the OT usages) rather than "sin." The idea thus would be that God told Cain to accept and present the "sin offering" that was "at the door"—which may be understood as a reference to the worship that Adam and his posterity offered at the Garden of Eden's guarded gate. Two key words in 4:7 echo directly the Fall narrative in Genesis 3. Sin had a desire (teshuqah) for Cain yet needed to be mastered (maschal). In 3:16, the woman's desire (teshuqah) would be for her husband, and he would rule (maschal) over her. While 3:16 represents a curse, God's admonition in 4:7 showed the way to life.

In spite of God's direct intervention, Cain murdered his brother Abel. The biblical author does not provide a specific reason or cause. Cain talked with Abel. In some ancient versions, it is written that Cain said to Abel, "Let's go out to the field." But in other manuscripts, no further details are given. Then brother rose against brother, and Abel was killed. The Hebrew term used here, harag, indicates "slaughter" and "murder" and is distinct from the verb used in the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20:13). Death entered human society and made explicit what had only been implicit in God's description of a world governed by sin.

In 4:9–15 the reader is privy to a second dialogue between the Lord and Cain, in which the Lord again sought to lead to the recognition of sin by using questions (a type of investigative judgment, as was the case with Adam and Eve). Clearly, God knew what had happened to Abel, so the issue here is not information but recognition and repentance (cf. 3:9–19). The first reference to blood in the Bible is found in v. 10, where it is personified as crying for justice to the Lord (cf. Rev. 6:9–10). Cain did not recognize the gravity of his action. Instead of repenting, he bewailed the punishment (v. 13). However, God's mercy was still at work and included protection from human recrimination (cf. Ex. 12:13). God's mark showed both guilt and protection and prefigured other marks (or "signs" as the Hebrew word can also be translated) in future narratives (Ex. 12:13; Josh. 2:12; Rev. 13:17; 16:2; 19:20; etc.).

Minkhah in the Old Testament

The term denoting "offering" used in this story is minkhah, representing a more generic term for an offering or a gift. In Leviticus 2, as part of a larger section dealing with different sacrifices, the term is used to describe a grain offering. In other instances, it can refer to food offerings in general (Is. 57:6; Ezek. 45:17) though it is usually translated as "grain offering." In Genesis 32:13, it describes a gift Jacob presented to his brother while in 1 Samuel 10:27, it refers to a gift for a king. Similar to its use in this story, it can also be employed to describe animal sacrifices involving the shedding of blood (1 Sam. 2:12–17).

4:25–26. Hope Never Dies: A Child Is Born. However, all was not lost. There was a faithful lineage. In two verses, the biblical author reinserts hope into a cold and desperate world. Eve gave birth to another son, Seth, who in turn had Enosh, whose name means "man," echoing Adam's name. Enosh, perhaps symbolic of a new Adam, represented a new line of faithful followers of the Lord, which would ultimately culminate in Jesus, the "second Adam" (see Rom. 5:12–21; 1 Cor. 15:45). The term Eve used to describe her new child, Seth, was very specific: zera' (lit. "seed," "offspring"; v. 25). It points directly and significantly back to Genesis 3:15. The birth of Seth marked another stride toward the fulfillment of God's famous promise and was characterized by reliance on God, recognition of His goodness, and worship of the Creator. The phrase referring to “calling on the name of the LORD” (4:26) is repeatedly used in Genesis in connection with the construction of an altar, the offering of sacrifices, and ultimately worship (12:8; 13:4; 21:33; 26:25). While Cain’s family line was noteworthy for music, nomadism, herding, metalworking, and establishing cities, Seth’s line was noteworthy for its worship. There was nothing intrinsically wrong with the ingenuity and invention of Cain’s line; the problem was that they did not acknowledge God as the Giver of all of their gifts. In all of their accomplishments, there was a distinct lack of worship. In this way, the cosmic battle between Satan and God had come to earth, and humanity was choosing sides.

5:1–32

Bridging the Gap: Genealogy from Adam to Noah

Chapter 5 contains a linear genealogy of faithful descent, linking Adam to Noah. Genesis 5:1 is the only place in the book in which toledot (“genealogy,” “family records,” “generations”; see Genesis: Introduction) is associated with the word seper (“document” or “book”), which suggests a written document. God created humans in His image, but this is recalled here in the context of the rebellion of Cain and Lamech. Yet the descendants of Seth, the worshipers of the Lord, would preserve the image of God although it had been extremely damaged by sin.

The genealogy follows a common pattern, beginning with the name of the person, his age when the first child was born, the name of the child, the years he lived after the arrival of the firstborn, and his age at death. Adam could not create descendants in the exact image of God; Seth was born in Adam’s own likeness and image (v. 3). Unfortunately, Seth’s likeness was further removed from God’s original image. Yet each child was named by a progenitor, marking another important connection to God’s activity in Genesis 1. Human procreation was God’s way of passing on the remnants of the divine image from parents to children—even after the Fall had almost entirely eradicated it.

Ancient versions (or translations) of this passage have resulted in differences in the chronology of Genesis 1–11. For example, the Samaritan Pentateuch (established at least from the first century B.C.), a text that was maintained by the Samaritans, tallies 1,307 years from Creation to the Flood, while the Masoretic Text (MT, established at least from the ninth century A.D., the text on which most modern versions of the OT are based) asserts there were 1,656. The Septuagint (LXX, established at least from the third century B.C.), the Greek translation of the OT, maintains 2,242 years for the same period. Some of these differences can be explained as variants resulting from textual errors. Others may suggest the use of a different chronological system. However, the system of the MT appears to be the most reliable since, by its reckoning, all of Noah’s ancestors died before the Flood.

ANE genealogies are manifold and come in different shapes and forms. One of the most famous, the third-millennium-B.C. Sumerian King List, has often been connected to Genesis 5. The list contains the names and cities of Sumerian kings before and after the Flood. While it is primarily interested in kingship (thus having a focus distinct from Gen. 5) and contains ludicrously high numbers for royal reigns, one can note a similar pattern in longevity when compared to the genealogy of Genesis 5. Before the Flood, the reigns of the Sumerian kings were exceedingly long (e.g., King Emmeṣarḫiškamaš reigned 43,200 years) while after the Flood, the number of years decreased drastically.

The importance of the number seven is evident in the genealogy of the faithful lineage of Adam’s descendants. Enoch, the seventh member of that line, walked with God (v. 24), an expression not found in the other genealogical records. The metaphor “to walk with God” suggests intimate communion with God, is reminiscent of Adam and Eve’s experience in the Garden (3:8), and would characterize the life of Noah (6:9), the only other human to whom this phrase was applied. In the Psalms, walking before God means life and prosperity (Pss. 56:13; 116:9); the prophets use the expression to highlight proper ethical choices (Is. 30:21; Jer. 18:15; Mic. 4:5). The author of Hebrews associates it with pleasing God through a life of faith, believing that God exists and that He rewards those who seek Him diligently (Heb. 11:5–6). Because of Enoch’s close walk with God, He “took” him (Gen. 5:24). The Hebrew laqakh denotes physical activity but is also used metaphorically for death or for being saved from it. Life could be “taken” by God (1 Kin. 19:10, 14). Notably, the verb is also used to describe Elijah’s ascension to heaven (2 Kin. 2:3, 10–11). Enoch’s life did not end in death but in translation. For the pre-Flood generations, he represented a tangible expression of God's promise of redemption. Enoch appears in later biblical texts that extol his faith (Heb. 11:5) and his prophetic ministry (Jude 14), and he was also a famous figure in noncanonical texts.

The wish of Lamech (not the Lamech of Gen. 4) expressed at the birth of Noah (5:29) connected Noah's name with comfort. This illustrates how names and their sounds in the OT were often creatively linked to significant ideas or concepts. The genealogy of Seth splits into the three sons of Noah, thus preparing the way for the narrative of Noah (5:32).

6:1—9:29

Flood and Covenant

This section describes divine judgment by universal Flood and God's plan to fulfill His promise of salvation by ultimately renewing the covenant between the Creator and His creation. Noah, the tenth from Creation, became another type of the second Adam (see notes on 4:25–26), the first following the Flood. The text is organized in the literary form of a chiasm, pointing the reader to the most important element at its center. This chiasmic structure is surrounded by two narratives that diagnose and narrate wickedness before and after the Flood (6:1–8 and 9:18–29).

- A Noah and his three sons (6:9–10)
- B Violence in God's creation (6:11–12)
- C Resolution to destroy (6:13–22)
- D Command to enter the ark (7:1–10)
- E Beginning of the Flood (7:11–16)
- F The rising floodwaters (7:17–24)
- GOD REMEMBERED
- NOAH (8:1a)
- F' The receding floodwaters (8:1b–5)
- E' The drying of the earth (8:6–14)
- D' Command to leave the ark (8:15–19)
- C' God's resolution to preserve order (8:20–22)
- B' Covenant blessing and peace (9:1–17)
- A' Noah and his three sons (9:18–19)

6:1–8. Divine Diagnosis: Increasing Wickedness. The initial words of 6:1 indicate narrative continuity in the typical Hebrew manner. While the text makes reference to multiplication (which, after all, corresponds to a divine command; cf. 1:22), the distinction between the “sons of God” and “daughters of men/humankind” prefigures conflict. Many different explanations for these two groups have been suggested (for example, angelic celestial beings, human rulers, or godly men), yet the most convincing contextual interpretation appears to be the correlation of the sons of God with the descendants of Seth (Gen. 5) and the daughters of humankind with the descendants of Cain. The faithful servants of God are occasionally identified as children of God (e.g., Deut. 14:1; Is. 43:6) although in some contexts the phrase suggests angelic or divine beings (Job 1:6; 2:1; Dan. 3:25). When the sons of God saw the beauty (lit. “good”) of the daughters of humankind, they married (lit. “took wives”) for themselves. The language employed in 6:2 clearly echoes the Fall narrative in 3:6, where Eve “saw” that the fruit was “good” and then “took” it. These actions led to divine judgment (6:3). Life spans were restricted, and God declared the withdrawal of His Spirit, most likely a reference to the life-giving power of God in 2:7. The duration of “forever” (Heb. ’olam) in biblical texts is always linked to the subject the term describes. When associated with human beings, it marks a limited time span: several hundred years prior to the Flood and 120 years following the Flood (6:3). The word don is a difficult term, as suggested by the two main translations usually given: “contend/strive,” or “abide/remain.” It appears only once in the OT, and in this context, it could mean “remain” or “abide.”

Another difficult term is nepilim. Some opt to transliterate it “Nephilim”, while other translators use “giants” or “fallen ones.” The former translation is based on the LXX rendering, which may have been influenced by the occurrence of the term in Numbers 13:33 (where it clearly refers to men of great stature, the children of ’anaq; Num. 13:32–33). In identifying these same men elsewhere in the Bible, the term repa’im is used (Deut. 2:11, 20; 3:11, 13), a term later utilized to refer to Goliath and his brothers (2 Sam. 21:16, 18, 20, 22; 1 Chr. 20:4, 6, 8). In the context of the Flood, the nepilim could refer to both the “extraordinary ones” (thus suggesting mighty heroes) and the “ones who have fallen” (or “ones who have fallen upon”). Since Genesis 6:1–4 describes the conditions of pre-Flood humanity, the reference to the nepilim is another way of depicting the wickedness of the antediluvian world and the corrupting influence of marriages with unbelievers. This leads to an important moment in the narrative describing divine action. When God saw, He acted (cf. 29:31; Deut. 32:19; Is. 59:15–16)—either as Judge or as Savior. God saw human wickedness, including the intent and inclination of the heart (6:5). This description highlights the importance of motivation and attitudes. In response, the Lord was sorry and was disturbed. This confirms how seriously God takes human actions and how they impact Him. Some versions have “repent” here, but this is potentially misleading when referring to God because it suggests the idea of remorse for wrongdoing. God changes only in response to human repentance. God’s determination to destroy (Heb. makhah) expresses the idea of “wiping out,” a term that implies that the judgment was universal. Although there did not seem to be any hope for the human race, Noah found khen (“favor” or “grace”) in the eyes of the Lord.

6:9—8:22. Judgment Call: A Universal Flood.

Genesis 6:11–12 repeats some of the diagnostics of vv. 5–6. However, the focus is not on humanity alone but includes the entire system. That the earth was “corrupt” suggests that the divine order established at Creation was no long operative. All life on earth was characterized by a violence that paid no respect to social justice and spiritual integrity. The universal corruption of humanity required for its correction a judgment of universal extent—a global Flood.

The next section (6:13–22) contains detailed divine instructions regarding the construction of the ark. It is introduced by a phrase that is significant in biblical theology, namely, “the end of all people” (lit. “flesh”; v. 13). Intriguingly, Ezekiel 7 describes the destruction of Jerusalem in similar terms (including key words such as “end,” “violence,” “coming,” “is full”), suggesting that the end of Jerusalem and its temple was perceived to be as existentially disturbing as the cataclysmic end of the antediluvian world. Since the Hebrew qets (“end”) often has eschatological connotations (Dan. 8:17, 19; 12:13), the Flood provides a show-and-tell laboratory for eschatological realities.

The ark was a very large structure of 450 feet (137 m) long, 75 feet (23 m) wide, and 45 feet (14 m) high, built according to the instructions that God gave to Noah. The sentence structure of v. 17 is very emphatic: God Himself was going to generate floodwaters on the earth. Divine judgment was as personal as divine creation and divine salvation. This was not merely the result of God withdrawing His protection and allowing nature to take its course, as some have suggested. Genesis 6:18 marks the first occurrence of the term “covenant” (Heb. berit) in Scripture, which is employed here to refer to a unilateral decision on the part of God based on His grace and expectation of a response of faith from humans.

God gave Noah specific instructions about the construction of the ark and explained His intention to use the boat to rescue Noah, his family, and all living things. Genesis 6 concludes with a brief completion formula that prefigures a similar formula found at the conclusion of the construction of the sanctuary (cf. Ex. 40:16; Lev. 8:4, 9, 13, 17, 21, 29, 36): Noah listened, he obeyed (v. 22), and he trusted that what he had heard had

The Biblical Flood Story and Extrabiblical Flood Stories

Flood narratives have been found throughout the world with significant variations. For biblical scholars, the most important stories come from Mesopotamia because they show interesting similarities to the biblical tale. They are called the Gilgamesh and Atrahasis epics, dated to second-millennium sources. When compared to the biblical narrative, there are some significant differences, two of which are worth mentioning. First, in the Bible, God was in complete control of the waters and did not feel threatened by them while in the Mesopotamian stories, the gods were afraid when they saw the waters rising uncontrollably. Second, while in the Babylonian story, the reason for the flood was an emotional reaction to human noise that made it difficult for the gods to rest, in the Bible, the Flood was a divine response to moral evil. One could speculate that Moses was acquainted with the Mesopotamian flood stories, but by offering a reliable account of what took place, he was undermining the pagan version of the event and discrediting the characters of their gods.

indeed been God's voice preparing him for an unprecedented phenomenon—a Flood.

Noah and his household entered the ark in obedience to God's command without ever having experienced rain (7:1–9). He stepped out in faith, trusting the One who does not fail (Heb. 11:7). The biblical text clearly distinguishes between clean and unclean animals here: God ordered Noah to take both types of animals into the ark (7:2–3, 9). The Hebrew text remains unclear as to whether there were one or two pairs of unclean animals. Different Bible translations handle this discrepancy differently. The distinction between clean and unclean highlights the ritual classification of animals, already known in Noah's time, that was later explicitly included in laws governing the dietary practices of the covenant people (Lev. 11:1–47; Deut. 14:3–21). Here, however, the distinction seems to prepare the reader for the sacrificial offering Noah and his family prepare after disembarking from the ark (8:20). Only clean animals were offered; this underlines divine holiness and separation. Furthermore, up to this point, God's diet for humanity had been a strictly vegetarian one (Gen. 1:29).

Echoing the larger literary design of 6:9—9:19 that highlights God's remembering of Noah (and his family), chapters 7–8 exhibit a similar chiasmic design based on time markers associated with the Flood narrative.

- 7 days of waiting for the Flood (7:4)
- 7 days of waiting for the Flood (7:10)
- 40 days of rain (7:17)
- 150 days of water rising (7:24)
- CENTER: God remembered Noah
- 150 days of waters receding (8:3)
- 40 days of waiting for dry land (8:6)
- 7 days of waiting for the return of first bird (8:10)
- 7 days of waiting for the return of second bird (8:12)

Genesis 7:10–24 describes the catastrophic Flood that covers everything. Every living being outside the ark perished (7:21–23), except, of course, the inhabitants of the sea, a fact that highlights the divine diagnostic of 6:5, 7, 13, referring to the earth. The destructive water came from on high and from below (7:11). The reference to the “fountains” or “springs of the great deep” involves the use of the Hebrew term tehom (“sea,” “deep,” or “abyss”) that is used in the description of the earth prior to God's creation (1:2).

The destructive waters of the great deep corresponded to the great wickedness of humanity leading to the Flood (6:5). Isaiah 51:10 uses the same phrase to describe God's destruction of the Egyptian armies during the Exodus. To accomplish this, the windows/floodgates of heaven were opened (Gen. 7:11). The rain (Gen. 1:6–8) fell to the earth like mighty waterfalls, and that which lay beneath the earth shot up in jets. In this way, God was returning the earth to its pre-creation state.

The biblical text provides a very specific time reference, namely, the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, on the seventeenth day. One year and eleven days later, the earth had finally dried up enough to support life (8:14). “On that day” (or, in this case, on the “very same day”; 7:13) is often used in the OT to emphasize a significant event. For example, “this day” marked the arrival of Israel at the Wilderness of Sinai (Ex. 19:1). The identical phrase found here in 7:13 (be'etsem hayyom, “the same day”) is used to tie the Festivals of Unleavened Bread and the Passover to the first night of the Exodus (Ex. 12:17, 41, 51) and to link Moses's speech to the moment of his death (Deut. 32:48–50).

While Noah was singled out, he was not saved alone. Noah's household—including his wife (whose name is not mentioned); his sons Japheth, Shem, and Ham; and their wives (whose names are also not mentioned)—was likewise part of God's rescue plan. The miraculous entry of wild and domesticated animals into the ark must have caused quite a stir to the observing onlookers. After all had entered, the Lord sealed the door of the ark (Gen. 7:16). This highlighted God's commitment to Noah and those inside the ark. Humanity's survival was due to divine grace, not human effort. In the Mesopotamian flood narratives, the heroes shut the door themselves.

The following verses describe the immensity of the Flood. The ark was at this point moving in the waters that covered the mountains by 15 cubits, or approximately 22 feet (7 m; 7:20). All basar (lit. “flesh”), meaning all living things with the breath of life in their nostrils (7:22), animals and humans, died in this cataclysmic event (7:21–23); only Noah and those who had sought refuge in the ark remained alive. Here, the biblical text introduces a significant theological concept—the remnant. It is found here in Genesis and also in Revelation (12:17). In the midst of total upheaval, God is always willing and able to preserve a remnant through whom He continues to demonstrate His saving purpose for the human race.

As already indicated, God remembered Noah and all who were with him (8:1). The meaning is not that God had forgotten but that He was caring for and acting on behalf of His servants (e.g., 30:22; Ex. 2:24; 6:5). As the waters receded, the ark settled on firm ground. The might of the subterranean water and seemingly endless rain from above must have resulted in immense changes to the earth's surface, including newly created continents, mountains, deep canyons, twisted rock folds, and rugged riverbeds. The location of the mountains of Ararat (8:4) is not quite clear. Assyrian records link Ararat to ancient Urartu, covering southeast Turkey, southern Russia, and northwest Iran. Yet no specific location can be ascertained from the biblical text, particularly considering the completely changed geography of the post-Flood world.

Noah's opening of a window of the ark (8:6) was not prompted explicitly by a divine command. He released first a raven (v. 7), followed by a dove (v. 8). While the raven, which could eat carrion and was a stronger bird, did not return to the ark, the dove found no place to land or rest (v. 9). Ancient mariners often used birds to ascertain proximity to land; Noah may have used them to confirm his visual impressions after he had opened the window of the ark. The verb used to describe Noah's sending (shalakh) of the birds is also used to describe the sending of the spies into Canaan (Num. 13:3; Josh. 2:1) and God sending Adam and Eve from the Garden (Gen. 3:23). The image of the returning dove, holding a freshly plucked olive leaf, has become a symbol of peace and safety in contemporary culture. Here it is merely an indication of the existence of growing vegetation, resulting in Noah's removal of the covering of the ark (8:13). Only then did God speak again to Noah. The divine order was clear and echoed the order of 1:28, "Be fruitful" (8:17).

After having been inside the ark for over a year, Noah's initial action involved the construction of an altar (8:20). This is the first explicit mention of an altar and a burnt offering, even though 3:21 and 4:3–5 may implicitly refer to an altar. The burnt offering was taken from among the clean animals. The anthropomorphic phrase stating that the Lord smelled a soothing or pleasing aroma is language found in the context of the sanctuary services and communicates the idea that God accepts the sacrifice and the offerer (see Lev. 1:9). Here, it is an expression of God's grace conveyed in the poetic declaration of 8:22. The promise guaranteed God's continued preservation of the earth and its ecology until the final judgment (2 Pet. 2:5–12).

9:1–17. God's Covenant with Noah and His Descendants. The following section represents the first formal covenant ritual in the OT and starts off with a number of divine instructions (9:1–7). Importantly, God's blessing preceded any instruction. The command of 9:1 to be fruitful echoed chapters 1 and 2. After the Flood there was, so to speak, a new creation and a new beginning. Following the order to fill the earth, the passage contains detailed instructions concerning diet and cultic purity involving the use of blood (anticipating Lev. 17:10–14). Even more important, beginning in v. 5, God gives specific directions as to the sacredness of human life. Whoever shed human blood would have to answer to the Creator because life belongs to Him (v. 6). The text foreshadows the lex talionis ("eye for eye" [Ex. 21:24; Lev. 24:20; Deut. 19:21]), which required that the punishment for a crime correspond to the nature of the crime. Shedding blood is another way of referring to murder (Gen. 37:22; 1 Kin. 2:31; Ezek. 22:4). The taking of life required death because it was a violation of the image of God (1:27). Later legislation underlined the importance of societal punishment (over individual revenge), tempered with regulations such as the cities of refuge that governed accidental manslaughter (Num. 35:9–15; Deut. 4:41–43; 19:1–13).

God's covenant (cf. 6:18) included Noah and his descendants, as well as every living creature with him (9:9–10). It was based on the grace of God, who took the initiative to reach out to sinners and restore their fractured relationship. God's covenant sign was public and highly visible (9:12–13). The Hebrew word qeshet in v. 13 is sometimes translated as "rainbow" here, but it is the same word used for a warrior's bow in the OT. Part of the implication is that further conflict with God was needless. The bow was an offer of peace and a covenant sign. The context indicates that this bow "in the cloud" was a rainbow. The same word is used in Ezekiel 1:28, where "rainbow" is again evidently intended. In Revelation 4:3 and 10:1, the rainbow is associated with God's throne room in a vision. Following God's remembering of Noah (8:1), God promised twice to remember the covenant (Gen. 9:15–16). He did not forget Noah, his family, or any living creature in the ark, and neither would He forget His promises.

9:18–29. Noah's Curse and Blessings. Following the assurance of divine acceptance and protection, the focus changes from Noah to Noah's three sons. Would the future be different from the past, considering the terrifying experience of the Flood still fresh in the minds of Noah's sons?

The section opens with a description of three generations, including also a reference to Canaan, the son of Ham (9:18–19), who was the only grandchild mentioned in the genealogy. Genesis 9:20 contains the first reference to viticulture in the OT. Whether by innocent accident or carelessness, Noah's drunkenness led to his shameful condition. Nudity is, in most cases in the Bible, considered shameful and humiliating. Prisoners of war were displayed naked to humiliate them and as a sign of victory over them (for more on the idea of uncovering oneself, see Ex. 20:26; Deut. 23:13–14; cf. Hab. 2:16). In this case, nakedness was associated with the consumption of alcohol. Several passages of Scripture point to the damaging effects of alcohol on humans (cf. Lev. 10:9; Prov. 21:17; 23:20–21; 29–31; Is. 5:22). What Ham did to his father was also ignoble because, instead of covering him, he passed on the information to his brothers and thus dishonored his father.

Scripture does not reveal precisely how Noah ascertained what Ham had done; yet his curse, expressed in poetic lines, was unequivocal. The curse of Canaan (9:25) represents a surprising twist in a problematic story. Why would Canaan be cursed when his father had committed the sin? Was this not an affront to divine justice? Commentators have struggled with this verse. However, a look at the larger context of the first eleven chapters of Genesis may provide a hint. Adam and Eve's decisions to heed the voice of the tempter resulted in their expulsion from Eden and the entrance of death—affecting all future generations. The wickedness of the sons of God in Genesis 6:1–7 resulted in the Flood and the destruction of almost all human and animal life. In line with the language of the commandments, sin shatters relationships and affects both the one committing the sin as well as future generations (cf. Ex. 20:5–6). However, later generations may have emphasized this reality to such an extreme that the Hebrew prophets argued against using this concept fatalistically to avoid personal responsibility (cf. Jer. 31:29; Ezek. 18:2). Canaan's punishment was to be subservient to his brothers. The curse language is similar to 3:14, but this time it was uttered by a human being. The curse of Canaan was balanced by the blessings of Shem and Japheth (9:26) and did not exclude his descendants (e.g., Rahab and the Gibeonites) from being part of the people of God.

Dispersion of the Nations

This section describes, in geographical terms, God's interest in the nations of the world. Taking as its point of departure one family, it chronicles divine blessings (i.e., multiplication) in response to the divine command, followed by dispersion and the focus upon the line of Shem.

10:1–32. Peoples: The Table of Nations. The presence of the many genealogies in chapters 1–11 underlines their importance. In this case, the list of the nations prepares the way for the call of Abram and the divine promise to make of him a new nation by which the other nations of the earth would be blessed (12:1–3). None of these early nations could be used by the Lord to accomplish His purpose to save sinful human beings.

Japheth was likely the eldest son of Noah (10:21), although Shem is often named first since it was through his descendants that the family of Abraham came. Japheth's offspring essentially represented Indo-European people groups who populated the region covering India, Asia Minor, and southern Europe. Seven sons of Japheth are included in this list, followed by further descendants of his first two sons (10:2–5). Throughout the table of nations, it is not always clear if a name represents solely an individual or a people. Furthermore, the table seems to be based on authentic ancient data since Israel's neighbors (such as the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites), known from later sources (and biblical texts) dating to the first millennium B.C., are not explicitly mentioned. The final note of 10:5 mentions the peoples on the coast who were separated (or "divided") into their lands, anticipating 11:8.

The sons of Ham represented the peoples of northeastern Africa and the Levant (10:6–20). Cush (Ethiopia), Mizraim (Egypt), Put (possibly Libya or Somalia), and Canaan (the Levant) were direct sons of Ham and had names known from other biblical texts. Genesis 10:8–12 describes in further details the exploits of Nimrod, the son of Cush. Geographically, Nimrod was associated with prominent cities in Mesopotamia that impacted Israel's history (e.g., Babel and Nineveh; cf. Mic. 5:6) and is described as a "mighty hunter before the LORD" (v. 9). The description "before the LORD" is often used to indicate priestly service (Ex. 16:9; 27:21; etc.), but here it seems to simply highlight the fact that even this mighty warrior was not outside of God's control and vision. Interestingly, later in the narrative, Esau is also described as a skillful hunter (25:27) and thus his (infamous) story becomes linked to Nimrod's story. Nimrod's name can be translated as "we shall rebel," and his kingdom and city building anticipated the huge construction project of Babel's tower in Genesis 11. The description of Nimrod as a mighty or heroic figure (v. 8) uses the same Hebrew term as in the description of the mighty ones of 6:4 prior to the Flood. While Nimrod built cities and an empire by sheer aggression and power (vv. 10–11), Abraham built altars to worship the One who led him to the promised land (12:7–8; 13:18; 22:9; etc.). Much later, the humble carpenter from Nazareth exemplified and taught the same principle: lasting change and the kingdom of God can be built only upon love, service, and community.

The reference to Casluhim (some translations read "Kasluhites") in 10:14 includes an additional note introducing the Philistines. During the early history following Israel's arrival in the Holy Land, the Philistines represented an important reference point in biblical history. A few hundred years after the Exodus, waves of people began to immigrate to the southern Levant (and even tried to settle in northern Egypt). These peoples are referred to as the "Sea Peoples." Some associate them with the later Philistines of the late Judges and early monarchy period. The question then is: Who are the Philistines mentioned in the patriarchal narratives? Different answers have been given to this question. It is possible that the migrants, these "Sea Peoples," assimilated into the people group already known to the Hebrews as Philistines (21:32–34; 26:1–33). It is also conceivable that the term "Philistines" was added anachronistically by later scribes since the people with whom the patriarchs interacted lived in the same location as the Philistines from the time of the early monarchy (see "The Philistines," p. 407).

Canaan's descendants (10:15–19) included later city-states and tribal groups. At the end of 10:15, the term khet is mentioned. Some take this to refer to early Hittites, the famous empire in Anatolia, but others suggest that this term could also indicate a different group. In the patriarchal period, the Hittites lived in Canaan around Hebron (cf. Gen. 23). In stark disregard for his parents' views about eligible marriage partners for their sons, Esau intermarried with the Hittites (26:34–35; 27:46). The final summary statement of Ham's descendants involves families, languages, clans, and peoples (similar to 10:5, 31–32). The reference to languages anticipates 11:1.

Genesis 10:21–31 lists Shem's descendants. This was the group from which God's covenant people would emerge. Shem's descendants included four tiers, for a total of twenty-six names. Attention is given to the offspring of Arphaxad and then Joktan. The name of one of Eber's sons, Peleg (v. 25), was associated with an event that was apparently so significant that it is included in the genealogy. The name Peleg means "divide" and is associated here with the division of the earth. Many have speculated on what this might mean. Most likely it is a reference to the dividing of the earth into nations at the Tower of Babel. Other suggestions include a major earthquake or even the continental shift. Shem's genealogy is not complete by 10:31 and will be continued in 11:10–26. The final statement (10:32) echoes the first verse of this chapter. This appears to form some type of literary bracket (also called an "inclusio").

11:1–9. The Tower of Babel and the Dispersion of Humanity. This story describes two diametrically opposed movements: humanity's desire and ill-conceived attempt to reach heaven (11:4) and God's coming down in response (11:5). The story is sandwiched between two lines of the descendants of Shem. One line ends in confusion and Babylon (Babel), the other in a promise and covenant leading to the promised land.

The Tower of Babel in Comparative Perspective

While no direct parallel has been found, Mesopotamian texts contain references to the origin of the diversity of languages (e.g., the Sumerian Enmerkar and the Lord of Aratta) and the desire of humans to reach heaven, which belongs to the gods (a Mesopotamian proverb). There are also references to humanity's intention to build a structure that would extend to heaven in order to indicate their supremacy (the Enuma Elish epic). The religious connotations of the tower can also be linked to Sumerian ziggurats, or temple towers, which represented an artificial mountain with a temple at its peak. However, while some ideas are shared, the texts themselves are completely distinct from the biblical narrative.

Language is one of the most fundamental characteristics of being human. The confusion created by the multiplicity of languages made it more difficult to communicate; this damaged the possibility of peaceful existence. But perhaps this is not only about language but also about the beginning of significant cultural distinctions in the population of the earth.

Human pride resulted in the rejection of the divine promise, and this was accompanied by an attempt for self-preservation. They built a tower in order to make a name for themselves (11:4). They did not seem to know that making a name for someone is the work of God (see 12:2). Clearly, they wanted to be self-sufficient and independent from God—attitudes that are closely associated with the unfathomable origin of sin (cf. Is. 14:12–14). The desire to be independent from the Creator and Lord of the universe is not only a problem in this narrative; it represents an important theological theme found in Scripture. Humans habitually seek control over their own lives and often reject the Creator’s lordship.

Genesis 11:5 describes God as “coming down” to pronounce a legal verdict. Sometimes the appearance of God is for salvation or to instruct His people, but here His coming down is also a reminder of His justice. God’s descent did not mean that He was unaware of what was going on. He knows all things and is omnipresent (1 Kin. 8:27; Ps. 139:1–4, 7; Is. 46:10; Jer. 23:24). In fact, the text indicates that He knew what would have happened had He not intervened to disrupt the tower builders. Rather than showing a lack of knowledge, the anthropomorphic language used here is evocative of God’s justice having been displayed. God is shown as having investigated the case before executing judgment. God once again spoke within the mystery of His being, using a plural pronoun as He did in 1:26, but this time the result was judgment in the form of confusion. The Babylonians called the city bab-ili (“gate of the gods”), but for the Hebrews, it was balal (“confusion”). The irony of this is highly significant, especially in view of the later importance of Babylon in Scripture. While Babylon (Babel) considered itself to be the gateway to the gods, it produced only confusion. As a result of God having confused the ability of the builders to freely communicate, the city (and the tower) could not be completed. The builders were scattered (v. 8); this resulted in the state that the builders had intended to avoid (v. 4).

11:10–26. The Righteous Family Line from Shem to Abram. The narrative moves almost imperceptibly from concerns of a universal nature to matters related to one single family: the descendants of Shem. The list of Shem’s faithful descendants includes ten individuals—a description that echoes the list of the ten descendants of Adam (5:1–32). While the first eleven chapters of Genesis contained a number of important promises, the opening verses of chapter 12 add more that would become highly significant for God’s redemptive plan. God was on the move again and was preparing an individual and his family to step out in faith.

PATRIARCHAL HISTORY: GOD’S CALL OF A FAMILY TO BE A BLESSING

Genesis 11:27—50:26 represents the second major division of the book of beginnings. Having painted in broad strokes the vast picture of Creation, the Fall, and the Flood, in order to briefly explain where Abraham came from, the text now shifts to the story of one family—Abraham’s—and how that family came to live in Egypt. The history of this family with its victories and setbacks is the nucleus of God’s hands-on plan of redemption. A cursory examination of these chapters may lead the reader, at times, to wonder about God’s covenant people, but their struggles and God’s patience highlight the nature of the kingdom. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and all their descendants (including the later sons and daughters of the promise) could not lay exclusive claim to God’s blessings or even argue that they deserved it exclusively. God’s blessings have always been available, not because humans have a claim to them but because of His abundant grace.

Abraham

The story of Abraham brings a new tone to the biblical narrative. The earlier descriptive and genealogical material of the first eleven chapters of Genesis are complemented by the multiple facets of the story of an individual and his family. Abraham’s story of faith, failure, and forgiveness provides a valuable backdrop for understanding the travails and victories of God’s elect through the ages. It represents another beginning for humanity and is a reminder that the God of Genesis (and Scripture) was a God of new beginnings.

11:27—12:9. God Calls Abram. Genesis 11:27–32, as part of the genealogy of Shem’s righteous line, introduces the family of the man who will be the subject of the next fourteen chapters of Genesis. The mention of Abram's and Nahor's wives, and particularly the infertility of Sarai, in the genealogy prepares the reader for what is coming (11:29–30).

Ur was an important Sumerian city-state in Mesopotamia at the end of the third millennium B.C., which corresponds to the time of Abram. The city boasted an important religious center (including a towering ziggurat), as well as sophisticated public and private buildings. The Ur that Terah and his family left was a center of the arts, science, and literature, and included many of the conveniences of city life.

God spoke at Creation (2:18) and following the Fall (3:13–14, 22); He also spoke with Cain (4:6, 9) and Noah (6:13–21; 7:1–4; 8:15–17; 9:1–17). Here He spoke again. The Lord first called Abram in Ur, before the first stage of his journey with his family described at the end of chapter 11 (see Acts 7:2–5). Abram's family had been idolatrous (Josh. 24:2), but they were willing to leave Ur with him at Yahweh's command. Perhaps the start of 12:1, vayyo'mer, should be translated and understood (as it has been by some commentators and translators) as, "Now the Lord had said to Abram." In this case, 12:1 describes God's call to Abram that had led to his family's departure from Ur as described in 11:31, and the mention of leaving Haran in 12:4 is a continuation of the previous description. On the other hand, it could also be the case that Abram received two calls—one in Ur, and one to leave Haran, which was a renewal of the first. In both cases, it could be said that Abram was leaving his house, his family, and more—in the first case, because he was leaving his homeland, friends, and extended family, and in the second case, because 12:5 indicates that Abram left Haran with only part of his family (Lot) though he was accompanied by people who had joined his household in Haran. God's call to Abram was succinct and definitive: the divine command is to halakh: "Go!" Some translations emphasize the separation from everything known and thus read "Get out." Abram's obedient and trusting response is described in 12:4—he went, leaving country, family, and his father's house behind. The sequence marked the different spheres of ancient society, even though "country" should not be confused with the modern notion of a nation. Important layers of patriarchal society included the family, the larger clan, and the tribe.

Even though Abram was not aware of his destination (Heb. 11:8), nor did he have an heir (cf. 11:30), God promised three specific blessings associated with this call: (1) Abram would become a great nation, (2) he would receive God's blessings, and (3) God would make his name great (in contrast to 11:4 where the builders wanted to make a name for themselves). Blessings and curses were closely linked to Abram's relationship with God. Ultimately, Abram was to bless all the *mishpekh*ot ("families," "clans," "peoples") of the earth (12:3). This highlights the global dimension of God's call. God did not simply select an individual at random in order to bless him and his descendants. His mission was much larger: God wanted to reach and transform the entire world through this one family.

Abram left Haran and obeyed God's word and promise (12:4). Abram's family included not only his own large household but also the household of Lot, his nephew and the son of Abram's brother Haran (11:27). Lot's choices and interactions with his uncle would play an important role in later chapters. When Abram left Haran, he was seventy-five years old (v. 4) and did not have even one son—yet God promised the improbable. Canaan is mentioned as the destination following Abram's departure from Haran (cf. 11:31). The term describes a land that was somewhere on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, comprised of parts of modern Lebanon, Syria, and most of the southern Levant west of the Jordan River. Abram's first address in Canaan was in Shechem, at the terebinth or oak tree of Moreh (12:6). Ancient Shechem was located between Mounts Ebal and Gerizim, the location where, hundreds of years later, Joshua renewed the covenant between the Lord and Israel's tribes (Josh. 24:1–25). Following the conquest of Canaan, Shechem would also be designated as a city of refuge for the central part of the Holy Land (Josh. 20:7).

The Lord then appeared to Abram, marking the first specific reference to a theophany in Genesis (cf. Gen. 17:1; 18:1; 26:2, 24; Deut. 31:15), and in response to this revelation, Abram built an altar to Him (Gen. 12:7–8; 13:18; 22:9). These altar construction references represent, in a condensed form, patriarchal worship. The altars focused the attention of the family upon the God who had called them to live as foreigners, and they also served as a public witness to the tribes living near the patriarchs. While no explicit reference to sacrifices is included, the altar suggests them. Genesis 12:8 hints at an additional dimension of patriarchal worship: calling on the name of the Lord, which is a clear reference to prayer (Ps. 116:4).

In reference to the divine promise of land, the word zera (“seed” or “offspring”) is used again. The Hebrew term is singular, and even though the noun can be used in a collective sense, it is an echo of the zera referred to in 3:15, where the singular “He” is clearly and emphatically indicated. The theology of land in the OT is deeply rooted in God’s ownership of the earth and His promise to Abram. In an agricultural society, land meant security, food, and a future.

Abram’s travel log references three locations: Shechem (v. 6), a site between Bethel and Ai (v. 8), and the South (or the negev in Hebrew; v. 9), the region bordering the southern limit of Canaan. As a foreigner, he lived a seminomadic existence, always contending for grazing lands and water.

12:10–20. Abram’s Egyptian Sojourn. Famine drove Abram’s household to Egypt, anticipating similar moves by his son Isaac (26:1) and his grandson Jacob (41:54; 43:1; cf. Ruth 1:1). As a result of poor judgment, Abram failed this test of faith. Yet God did not fail him. The beauty of Sarai must have been stunning—even considering her advanced age of about sixty-five years (see 17:17). Abram felt vulnerable as a foreigner and prepped Sarai to state a half-truth (both Sarai and Abram had the same father; cf. 20:12)—that is, to refer to herself before the Egyptians as his sister (v. 13). Abram’s fears were well founded, and Sarai was taken to Pharaoh’s house (v. 15). In line with ANE customs, Pharaoh paid the bridal price, including slaves and a variety of animals (v. 16), to the bride’s family (cf. 34:12).

The question of whether Pharaoh actually had sexual intercourse with Sarai is difficult to answer. That Sarai was taken into his house (or palace; v. 15) may not indicate that sexual intercourse took place (cf. 20:2, 6), even though the phrase is ambiguous. The Hebrew laqakh (“take”) is used to indicate marriage and thus sexual intercourse (6:2; 11:29), but similar episodes in Genesis add additional information that usually follows sequentially once a woman had been “taken” (e.g., 34:2, 38:2). Pharaoh’s strong response highlighted the fact that adultery was a serious offense in the ANE, as many law codes suggest. This episode was different from the later one with Abimelech (20:3), in which God communicated directly to the offending king. The link between the Lord and the afflictions in Pharaoh’s palace (12:17) was not immediately obvious to the king. Yet he recognized the superior power of Abram’s

God and had Abram’s household escorted to the borders of his kingdom. There are noticeable narrative parallels between this story and that of the Exodus: Abram and Israel were both welcomed in Egypt at first but later faced challenges, they were rescued by means of plagues, and in both cases, they left Egypt with increased wealth and returned to Canaan.

13:1–18. Abram and Lot Separate. The conflict between the servants of Abram and those of Lot was a dispute that could be resolved through dialogue. The Hebrew word rib, used to describe the quarrel, is sometimes employed in the context of legal arguments and prosecution (cf. Gen. 26:20–22; Ex. 17:2, 7; 23:2–3, 6; Job 31:35; 40:2; Hos. 4:1; Mic. 6:2). In the patriarchal narratives, Lot’s actions often contrast with Abram’s, thus shining a spotlight on the latter’s faithfulness. Lot, as the younger man, ignored custom by actually accepting Abram’s generous offer to allow Lot to choose first (13:10) and selected Sodom and the cities of the plain (v. 11). With this, he moved east (cf. notes on 11:2). Clearly, his choices were motivated by economic factors (v. 10). The author of Genesis adds an important explanatory postscript to Lot’s choice in v. 13 and diagnoses Sodom’s inhabitants as extremely wicked and sinful. Several examples of lexical imagery exist between Lot’s poor choice and Eve’s fateful decision. This suggests that Lot was moving in the wrong direction (see “Common Imagery Associated with Lot’s and Eve’s Choices,” p. 159).

The description of Sodom’s wickedness anticipates Genesis 18 and 19. The evil inhabitants of Sodom were sinning against the Lord (13:13). This is a reminder to the reader that the Lord is not a parochial or regional deity like the other deities of the ANE. God’s jurisdiction and sovereignty went beyond the land—even the promised land. Just as He judged an Egyptian pharaoh and the anonymous tower builders at Babel, He also knew what was happening in Sodom.

Lot’s departure, most likely disheartening to Abram, was followed by an affirmation of the divine promises (13:14–17). The Lord spoke and revealed the future to Abram. The assurance of land for him and his descendants (v. 15) represented an expansion on the original promise of 12:7. When God invited him to walk through the land (v. 17), He was asking Abram to possess it and was anticipating the filling of the land by his descendants. This land promise was partially fulfilled in Joshua’s time (Josh. 21:43–45; but note 13:1–7). Later generations saw another partial fulfillment (in the time of David and Solomon; see 1 Kin. 4:20–25); but due to Israel’s unfaithfulness, the promise was never completely fulfilled, except ultimately through Christ (Rom. 4:13; Gal. 3:16). Abram’s next destination was Hebron, the town with the highest elevation in the southern Levant and located at 3,050 feet (930 m) above sea level. Hebron was strategically located between Jerusalem and Beersheba. Here Abram built another altar and affirmed his commitment to the God of the promise (v. 18; see notes on 12:7, 8).

14:1–24. Abram Rescues Lot. The exciting story of the rescue of Lot and the people of Sodom by Abram and his allies seems to interrupt a narrative that is concerned with God’s plan for His chosen people and not really interested in the ups and downs of regional power games. However, this story is another reminder that God is not a regional or parochial God but is interested in blessing all those who willingly receive His benedictions.

The names of the four kings who threatened the Jordan Valley city-states suggest an ethnically diverse coalition including Elamite, Amorite, Hurrian, and Hittite groups (14:1). The biblical record of these regional city-states controlling other city-states fits well into the known historical landscape of the last part of the third millennium B.C. The five city-states of the Jordan Valley (Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar) could not withstand the attack of the Mesopotamian coalition, which had previously received tribute from the Jordan Valley inhabitants for twelve years (v. 4). Chedorlaomer (Kedorlaomer), the king of Elam, located in modern Persia, seems to have been the leader of the coalition (vv. 4–5). While no individual of this name has been attested in surviving texts from this period, the two elements comprising his name are authentically Elamite. The itinerary of the attacking eastern coalition and their victories (vv. 5–7) underlined the army’s north-south movement along the so-called King’s Highway (Num. 20:17; 21:22), which followed the Transjordanian plateau on the eastern shores of the Jordan and Dead Sea. In order to stop the approach of the eastern coalition, the five city-states of the Jordan Valley engaged them in battle (Gen. 14:8).

This chapter contains five explanatory notes suggesting that the biblical author may have used an older account that required updating so that the readers could understand it appropriately. The notes always commence with “that is.” For example, Bela apparently was the ancient name for Zoar (vv. 2, 8). The Valley of Siddim was the Valley of the Salt Sea (or the Dead Sea Valley; v. 3) and was also the location of the battle between the two armies (v. 8). En Mishpat was later known as Kadesh (v. 7), and the king of Sodom met Abram and his people at the Valley of Shaveh—that is, the King’s Valley (v. 17).

The asphalt or tar pits in the vicinity of the Dead Sea favored the eastern coalition. The kings of Sodom and Gomorrah and their disintegrating armies became stuck in the pits when they tried to flee to the mountains surrounding the low-lying plains (v. 10). The Hebrew term describing Abram’s trained army (khanik; v. 14) occurs only here in the Hebrew Bible, but it can be found in a nineteenth-century-B.C. Egyptian text and in a fifteenth-century-B.C. letter from Taanak, written in cuneiform. This locates the story in time. The size of Abram’s household was significant. Abram was not a poor shepherd but a powerful clan leader who had established important ties with the surrounding clans.

Whereas the king of Sodom wanted to talk business (vv. 21–24), the meeting was interrupted by the appearance of the king of Salem. Encountering Melchizedek signified a divine blessing since he was the priest of God Most High (v. 18). Bread and wine could signify a lavish meal, perhaps even a banquet (1 Sam. 16:20). In later parts of Scripture, these items are connected with covenant and sacrifices (cf. Num. 15:2, 10; 1 Sam. 1:24; Matt. 26:26–29).

Common Imagery Associated with Lot’s and Eve’s Choices

Melchizedek's blessing is written in poetic form and refers twice to "God Most High." The Hebrew is 'el 'elyon. This divine epithet functions here as a personal name highlighting the power of God. Verse 19 includes the Hebrew term qoneh, which is sometimes translated as "Possessor" because it comes from the verb "to own" or "to purchase." However, based on parallels in other Semitic languages and the use of the verb in some OT texts (e.g., 4:1; Deut. 32:6; Ps. 139:13), another possible translation would be "Creator." Melchizedek's blessings would thus include two key statements about God: He is both Creator and Deliverer. Both elements are also central to a biblical Sabbath theology and the God of the Sabbath.

The person of Melchizedek would be used as a type of Jesus, the real Priest-King (Heb. 7:1–16). Abram, in response to the blessing received from the Lord, gave a tithe (or a tenth) to God's representative. The law of tithing preceded the Levitical legislation (Lev. 27:30–33). Here the practice was established on the theological idea that God is the Creator of the universe and the One who blesses humans. Giving the tithe to Him is not only a duty but also a deep expression of gratitude.

Abram's interaction with the king of Sodom was brief but poignant (Gen. 14:21–24). Abram rejected the customary practice of retaining the bounty and agreed to return the people to their cities of origin (v. 21). Framed as part of an oath, Abram affirmed his reliance on the Lord and echoed terminology and characteristics of Melchizedek's earlier blessing (vv. 19–20, 22). Abram's faith journey involved waiting upon God's timing, not his own timing or careful geopolitical plotting. The Hiphil form of the verb 'ashar ("to make someone rich") constitutes a wordplay on "tenth" (ma'aser). Abram's wealth was attributed to the Lord's blessings (24:35), and he accepted only the provisions that his allies had already consumed on the campaign (14:24).

15:1–21. God's Covenant with Abram. After Abram experienced divine blessings during the daring rescue mission of Lot and his family in chapter 14, God reminded him of his future and his mission and affirmed the covenant.

Significant events begin with "the word of the LORD" (v. 1). In this case the divine intention for Abram was introduced by the assurance that he did not need to be afraid. The dialogue between God and Abram suggests intimacy and a close relationship. Abram was even ready to question God—Abram's concerns were presented to God, and He responded to him! God's promise involved protection and blessings, something that Abram had already experienced in different circumstances. However, he still has no offspring.

Abram's servant Eliezer is described as a servant born in his house and Abram's designated heir. This reflects an ancient custom where a childless couple adopted a son as their heir (vv. 2–3). In fact, Abram had already been assured a son three times (12:2, 7; 13:16), but the promise had yet to be fulfilled. God's response to Abram's question was unequivocal (15:4–5): He emphatically indicated that Eliezer would not be Abram's heir and that His plan would involve no shortcuts or alternative routes. Again, the promise was renewed by an object lesson (counting the stars in the sky) and a divine proclamation (v. 5). Echoing the futile attempt to count the dust of the earth (13:16), the impossibility of counting all the stars in a bright night sky emphasizes that only God can do the impossible. Faith is defined here as belief, in the sense of placing absolute trust in God's power to fulfill His promise. This response of profound faith in God was accounted to him for righteousness. He was declared to be so not because of his superior works but on the basis of his faith (v. 6; cf. Rom. 4:3–4, 9, 22–25; Gal. 3:6–9). God then reminded Abram of His saving action in bringing him out of Ur, employing words that anticipated God's liberation of Israel from Egypt (v. 7; Ex. 20:2; Deut. 5:6). The phrase is part of a brief historical review that precedes the account of the covenant ritual. It also reminded Abram of the fact that the promise included not only offspring but also land. The covenant was ratified through a ritual that required that the sacrificial animal, unlike a regular sacrifice, be cut in two halves. The covenant ritual apparently lasted a significant amount of time since vultures tried to feed on the split carcasses and were driven away by Abram (v. 11).

At sunset, a deep sleep and a thick and terrifying darkness overcame Abram (15:12). Both seem to have been divinely induced, which is suggested by the fact that Adam's deep sleep in 2:21 is described using the same Hebrew term. The Hebrew word for the horror described in 15:12 is the same word used when God promised to send terror before Israel when they entered Canaan (Ex. 23:27; Josh. 2:9). God spoke to Abram in his deep sleep, and His communication was significant. What He said was certain, as the construct yadoa' teda' (lit. "knowing, know"), an idiom for "know certainly," suggests (v. 13; on the four hundred years mentioned in v. 13, see "The Four-Hundred-Thirty-Year Sojourn," p. 211). Abram's descendants would be strangers (Heb. ger) in a foreign land. Readers should immediately notice the link to Egypt, considering that Abram's sojourn in Egypt is described using the same root (12:10). The Amorites mentioned in v. 16 represent all the inhabitants of Canaan.

The description of the smoking pot and burning torch that passed through the animals in v. 17 is emblematically significant. Fire is often a symbol of God's presence, and walking between the two parts of the animal was a declaration that what happened to the sacrificial victim would be the fate of the violator of the covenant (cf. Jer. 34:18).

16:1-16. Hagar and Ishmael. The prototype of faith was struggling with the practical implications of faith. In this chapter, Abram does not hear from God. However, God talks to Hagar (16:8-14).

The biblical text reminds the reader of the barrenness of Sarai right from the outset (v. 1). What appears to be a sad fact in a Western context becomes a tragedy in a biblical (and Eastern) context. Barrenness encompassed every aspect of a woman's life in biblical times and brought pain and stigma (cf. 1 Sam. 1:5-6). It not only endangered the very survival and future of a family, but it also suggested possible divine displeasure. Sarai, the main protagonist of this chapter, decided to be proactive and resolve her barrenness by turning to the practice of surrogate motherhood, which was well known in the ANE from the third to the first millennium B.C. Both Abram and her maidservant Hagar submitted to Sarai's proposal. Surprisingly (and tellingly), the end of v. 2 in the Hebrew echoes Genesis 3:17, where the same phrase is used with different names when Adam decided to eat the forbidden fruit: Abram listened to Sarai as Adam listened to Eve. Careful readers will anticipate conflict and additional verbal links and motifs that connect this story to the Fall narrative (e.g., "took" [3:6; 16:3]).

Sarah's reasoning in v. 2 is revealing: the fact that God had prevented her thus far from having children (similar also in 20:18) was suggested as a rationale for attempting the logical solution. While Hagar appears to be a tool in Sarai's hands, Hagar's pregnancy changed everything in Abram's household (vv. 4-6). Hagar came to despise (qalal) her mistress (v. 4). The Hebrew term used here, which Sarai repeats in v. 5, is the same as the one describing Michal's reaction to David's ritual procession in 2 Samuel 6:20. Sarai's position in the household was in danger. She complained to Abram and seemed to suggest his guilt in the matter (v. 5). The Hebrew term khamas ("wrong" or "violence") is strong and is later used by the Hebrew prophets to indicate social injustice (Amos 3:10; Hab. 1:3; cf. the use of the term in the Flood story in Gen. 6:11, 13). Sarai concluded her complaint by appealing to a higher authority, the Lord, to be the Judge (Gen. 16:5).

In response to Sarai's complaint, Abram confirmed Sarai's position in the household (v. 6). Once Sarai's position was validated, Sarai dealt harshly ('anah) with Hagar (cf. 31:50, where the same verb is used). Interestingly, this verb is also used to describe the Egyptian mistreatment of the Israelites (Ex. 1:12). As a result of Sarai's harsh treatment, Hagar fled from the family's home settlement.

The next seven verses describe the dialogue between the Lord and Hagar. Hagar's recognition, in v. 13, of a divine presence suggests that the Angel of the Lord was God Himself in this context. Surprisingly, the Angel of the Lord addressed Hagar by name (v. 8). This is the only known instance in ANE literature where a Deity addresses a woman by name.

Hagar was addressed not only by name but also as Sarai's servant, which reminded the runaway servant of her relationships and obligations. This is the first time in the Bible that a child was named before birth (v. 11). The child would be an expression of God's concern for a woman in suffering. Ishmael ("God hears") would be a reminder to her and to others that God indeed listens to those who pray to Him. As was the case with other important sites of God encounters during the patriarchal period, the place where Hagar encountered the Lord was commemorated by name.

The chapter concludes with Hagar's return to Abram's encampment and the birth of Ishmael, who was named by his father and was thus legitimized (vv. 15-16). Abram was, at this point, eighty-six years old and had been traversing Canaan for more than eleven years (v. 16). Had God's promises been realized in Ishmael's birth?

17:1–27. The Covenant Sign: Name Change and Circumcision. Following the covenant ritual described in chapter 15 and the Hagar episode, God's silence lasted for thirteen years. God spoke again in this chapter and emphasized the renewal of the already-established covenant and the institution of a specific covenant sign. God confirmed again the promises of descendants and land to Abram (cf. 12:1–3; 13:14–17; 15:4–5, 18–21). He identified Himself with the name 'el shaddai (v. 1). The phrase appears five other times in Genesis (28:3; 35:11; 43:14; 48:3; 49:25) and thirty-one times in Job. Jewish interpreters understood the name as "He who is sufficient" while others have suggested "God of the mountain." Both possibilities emphasize power and strength. The all-powerful God offered His blessings to His elect. God also reminded Abram of the fact that the covenant relationship required his devoted response of "walking" (i.e., living) before Him and being tam ("sound," "blameless," "perfect"). To be tam is to live a life entirely committed to God rather than to sinless moral perfection (Job 1:1, 8; for the use of the phrase in a sacrificial context, see Lev. 1:3).

God changed the name of Abram ("exalted father") to Abraham ("father of many nations"; v. 5). This essentially proclaimed the promise as if it were already fulfilled. The covenant (vv. 4, 7, 9–10, 14) that is mentioned is actually part of the everlasting covenant (v. 7). Note the difference between the essence of the eternal covenant and the sign of the covenant—that is, circumcision. God's covenant with humanity is eternal.

Circumcision became the sign of the covenant (vv. 10–11) and was required from all male members of the household. Those unwilling to participate would be cut off from among God's people. This punishment was normally applied to acts of commission (e.g., eating blood [Lev. 7:27; 17:10, 14], eating sacrificial fat [7:25], eating the peace or fellowship offering while unclean [Lev. 7:20], eating what is unclean [Lev. 7:21], etc.). Being "cut off" may refer to the death penalty (as in Ex. 31:14–15; Num. 15:31; 1 Sam. 28:9) or to being separated from God's covenant community. This is the fourth account in Genesis that mentions the importance of a sign ('ot; v. 11). In 1:14, the luminaries served as signs of the seasons. In 4:15, God's sign on Cain signified divine protection. Following the Flood, God placed a rainbow in the sky as a sign to remind Himself and the world of His promise to Noah (9:8–17). Circumcision was also practiced by other people groups in the ANE though mostly as a puberty rite and not on the eighth day following birth (17:12). Other biblical passages clarify the fact that true circumcision is circumcision of the heart (e.g., Lev. 26:41; Deut. 10:16).

Following the introduction of circumcision as the covenant sign, God changed Sarai's name to Sarah ("princess"), another form of the earlier Sarai. While the new name is not explicitly explained (as was the case for Abraham's name change; cf. v. 5), a name change suggests a change of destiny. Divine blessings would finally transform Sarah into a mother of nations (v. 16). Abraham's reaction to this divine promise is surprising. Falling on his face, he laughed (v. 17) and rightly wondered how a one-hundred-year-old man and a ninety-year-old woman could have a son. The first act suggests worship; the second is sometimes taken as implying doubt and is replicated in 18:12–15 (and in 21:6 by Sarah). However, Abraham's question was a practical one. Without divine intervention, birthing a child was impossible. The father of John the Baptist had a similar question (Luke 1:18) and was reprimanded for unbelief (Luke 1:20), perhaps because he had the example of God's involvement in Abraham's case. Not surprisingly, Isaac's name ("he laughs") echoes the surprised reaction of his parents to God's promise. Yet God did the impossible, and doubt became joyous laughter. Finally, Abraham pled for Ishmael, the son by Sarah's maidservant Hagar. Abraham's prayer for Ishmael in Genesis 21:18 was both an expression of doubt and an appeal for blessing. The man of faith (15:6) could not predict God's solution.

God promised to bless Ishmael but also made it clear that the son of Sarah would be the son of the promise (vv. 19, 21). Finally, the promise had a name, and the clock was ticking. The reference to the time (Heb. mo'ed, "appointed time," "next year") is a cipher for the birth of a child following a regular pregnancy lasting nine months (cf. the promise to Abraham in 18:10 and to the Shunammite woman given Elisha's prophecy in 2 Kin. 4:16, where a similar phrase appears). This indicates that Abraham and Sarah had to act on the promise for it to come true. The final verses of the chapter report the execution of the divine order, involving Abraham himself, Ishmael, and all the male members of Abraham's household (Gen. 17:23–27). The response was immediate—twice it is mentioned that the rite was carried out that same day (vv. 23, 26). The stage was set for the son of the promise to appear; yet prior to his coming, Abraham's faith, compassion, and character needed to grow even more.

18:1–15. Abraham Entertains Three Messengers from Heaven. Even though Abraham did not immediately recognize the heavenly visitors, his generous hospitality provided another opportunity for God to affirm the future reality of the seemingly impossible.

The language of 18:1 recalls earlier theophanies (12:7; 17:1), yet Abraham himself was seemingly not initially aware of his heavenly visitors. However, it is true that he bowed down to the ground (v. 2), an act that often indicated worship (e.g., Ex. 20:5). Abraham saw three men; one turned out to be the Lord (vv. 2, 22), and two were possibly angels (19:1). Yet Abraham spoke only with the One who ostensibly stood out: Abraham's address in 18:3 uses a second-person-singular grammatical form in Hebrew. As was customary, Abraham provided his visitors with water (for washing their feet) and food (vv. 4–5).

The following verses (18:6–8) describe a household that sprang into action to prepare a meal for their guests, according to the usual customs of hospitality. The narrative then turns to the Guest's prophecy of what lies in store for Sarah. By verbalizing Sarah's private thoughts (v. 13) after she overheard the promise and laughed, the Lord showed Himself omniscient. The rhetorical question of whether anything is too difficult for the Lord (v. 14; cf. Jer. 32:17, 27) implies a negative answer. Sarah was not punished for unbelief, which indicates that, like Abraham's, her question was of a practical nature. She had long since passed the child-bearing age, and she had not been able to have children, even when she was younger. In support of this, Hebrews 11:11 highlights Sarah's belief in the famous parade of faith.

18:16–33. Abraham Intercedes for Sodom.

As a good host, Abraham accompanied his guests on the first leg of their onward journey (18:16). He literally walked with God (cf. Enoch in 5:24 and Noah in 6:9). Overlooking Sodom from the heights of the Judean mountains, the Lord revealed to Abraham His intentions (v. 17–19; cf. Amos 3:7). The divine rationale for this was the fact that Abraham's descendants would be a great, mighty, powerful nation (v. 18) that would bless the entire population of the earth. In other words, God wanted Abraham to develop compassion and the capacity to bless others, beginning with his household and his descendants (v. 19). "To keep the way of the LORD" involves doing what is right and just and indicates metaphorically right behavior leading to right destiny based on a right relationship with the Lord.

The "outcry against Sodom and Gomorrah" (v. 20; the cities are usually mentioned together in biblical texts) stood in direct contrast to Abraham's righteousness (v. 19). In Hebrew, the words for outcry (ze'aqah) and righteousness (tsedakah) sound very similar. Isaiah uses the same wordplay in the famous prophetic vineyard song in relation to God's chosen people (Is. 5:7). The Lord intended to go down (see notes on Gen. 11:5, 7) and see whether the outcry against Sodom and Gomorrah was warranted (v. 21). This language does not imply any lack of omniscience or foreknowledge on God's part—these attributes were strikingly evident in the detailed prophecies of the preceding chapters (e.g., 15:13–21; 17:5–8, 15–21) as well as the preceding verses, which indicate that God anticipated that Abraham would faithfully instruct his children and that the world would be blessed through his progeny (vv. 17–19). Instead, the use of this anthropomorphic language was indicative of a legal case, an investigation, and judgment.

Genesis 18:22 contains a textual note preserved by the Masoretes, the Jewish scholars who transmitted the biblical text. It suggests that the original reading of this verse was inverted to indicate that Abraham was standing before the Lord, whereas the original had indicated that the Lord was standing before Abraham. This change was most likely motivated by theological reasons, since "standing before" was the position of a servant and indicated social status (Gen. 41:46; Lev. 9:5). The theological implications are staggering and foreshadow God's willingness to serve humanity—even unto death (Matt. 20:28). God's attitude of service invited Abraham to become an intercessor.

Here Abraham entered the conversation and based his plea on God's righteousness (Gen. 18:25). Indiscriminate punishment is not divine judgment. Abraham did not question God's ability or jurisdiction for judgment—"all the earth" included every location and people group—but he appealed to God's justice. God punishes the guilty (Ezek. 14:12–20) and spares the repentant (cf. Rahab in Josh. 2 and Nineveh in Jon. 3–4).

When the Lord concluded the dialogue with Abraham, His justice and righteousness had been established beyond the shadow of a doubt. God investigated the accusations (18:21) carefully, included in the deliberation two objective witnesses as well as the faithful, and offered a way to salvation. The pattern in 18:16–33 provides a blueprint for future judgments and foreshadows the activities associated with the millennium following the Second Coming of Jesus as Judge of all the earth (Rev. 20).

19:1–38. Sodom’s Destruction and Lot’s Rescue. The dramatic story involving Sodom provides another example of divine judgment in response to human sin. The location of Sodom and Gomorrah is debatable. Some have suggested that they were located on the south-eastern side of the Dead Sea, the areas of Bab-edh-Dhra and Numeria. A geographical text from Ebla in Syria from the same period mentions sa-dam as a city located in the region of Bab-edh-Dhra, close to the Dead Sea. However, Lot chose to live in the Jordan River Valley (Gen. 13:10; north of the Dead Sea). Certainly, the general region of the Lower Jordan River Valley and the Dead Sea (called “Salt Sea” in the OT) was the location of these cities (Gen. 19:25).

The following verses (Gen. 19:4–9) graphically highlight the evilness of Sodom’s inhabitants (cf. 13:13), a description that provides clear justification for the coming judgment. The Hebrew verb yada’ (lit. “to know”) used at the end of the verse implies sexual activity (cf. 4:1) and is accordingly translated in some versions as “have sex” or “have relations.” This exhibits the depravity of the misguided sexuality exhibited by the men of the city (v. 4) and suggests homosexual practices. The biblical text specifically indicates that this was not an isolated group of degenerate people—both old and young, and people from every section of the city, surrounded Lot’s home (v. 4). Considering the important cultural value of hospitality in Eastern cultures (including also ancient Canaan), the complete corruption of basic human values that this intended sexual abuse represented becomes immediately clear, even for readers who did not worship Yahweh. Sexual predators justified the coming judgment by their utterly immoral action. Lot was rightly concerned with his guests’ well-being, something that, as already indicated, was highly valued in his ANE culture. However, the offer of his daughters to the mob also reveals, on the one hand, that Sodom had affected his inner moral core (vv. 4–9) and, on the other, that girls were of very little value at that time. Ironically, Lot’s daughters later abused their father sexually, resulting in competing lineages (vv. 36–38; the Moabites and Ammonites). While Lot was a “righteous person,” in the sense that he had not completely allowed himself to be absorbed into the evils of these cities and was still disturbed by the people’s conduct (2 Pet. 2:7), his grasp of moral principles was seriously diminished by his association with Sodom’s residents. It was out of divine grace that he and his family were preserved.

Instead of ten righteous people (Gen. 18:32), only four people were left (and the righteousness of these is in serious doubt), some of whom the angels had to drag out of the city (19:16). God’s mercy often involves a painful separation from the things and people that keep His children in “Sodom.” Thankfully, salvation is based entirely on divine grace (Titus 3:5) and not on human performance.

In the face of an imminent inferno, Lot began to negotiate with his angelic companions. Lot’s hesitation (Gen. 19:16), his objections, and his wife’s ultimate destiny, as well as the later abusive ploy of Lot’s daughters, suggest that even though the family had been saved physically, their hearts and minds carried the seed of Sodom with them to safety. Instead of trusting in divine protection in the mountains (v. 19), Lot longed for the urban safety and security of nearby Zoar, a name derived from the size of the city (v. 20). Hopefully, a little city would have little sin in it. Lot’s bargaining (vv. 18–20) echoes lexically Abraham’s intercession for Sodom and its inhabitants (18:22–33). The angels conceded, and at sunrise, Lot finally entered Zoar, one of the five cities of the plain (14:8).

The description of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah uses flood language (himtir [“rained”] in v. 24 and mamtir [“caused to rain”] in 7:4 make use of the same Hebrew root). The mention of fire and brimstone (or burning sulfur; 19:24) could be a reference to a firestorm caused by the breaking up of the surface of the earth, accompanied by strong tremors that resulted in major destruction of the beautiful region. The repeated use of forms of hapak (“overthrow,” lit. “to turn upside down”; 19:21, 25, 29), may suggest the breaking up of the earth’s crust. The nature of the fire from heaven is not defined in the text but could have been meteorites, resembling bolts or balls of fire. The biblical author makes it very clear that this judgment was not the result of a natural catastrophe; twice the Lord is identified as the originator of the cities’ destruction. Later prophets considered this event to be the symbol of destruction (Amos 4:11). In the NT, it is used as an illustration of the eschatological judgment against the wicked (Luke 17:28–30; 2 Pet. 2:6–9). Tragically, Lot lost not only his home and property but also his wife, who, in direct disregard for the command of the angels in v. 17, looked back and became a pillar of salt (Gen. 19:26). It is possible that she belonged to a Sodomite family since she was mentioned prior to Genesis 19. In Luke 17:31–32, Jesus admonishes His audience to not look back, as did Lot's wife, when the time of the end comes, for those who strive to keep their lives will lose them (v. 33).

The dramatic action was observed by Abraham from the place where he had stood before the Lord (see commentary on Gen. 18:16–33). The mediator had become a spectator, yet God remembered him (v. 29). Often in Scripture, to remember is to act on behalf of the person in need (see 8:1).

The final verses of this chapter include the last references to Lot (19:30–38), who fled further away from Abraham and his spiritual values. His story would include alcohol use, incest, and the birth of two sons whose descendants would become two enemies of Israel, the Moabites and the Ammonites.

20:1–18. Abraham and Abimelech at Gerar.

The man who would be remembered forever because of his faith in God here failed another test of faith for a second time, in the same way he failed before (Gen. 12:10–20). Unbeknownst to him, an even more severe test (Gen. 22) still awaited him. Abraham's move to Gerar, a town located halfway between Beersheba and Gaza that marked the southern border of Canaan, was not motivated by a famine (12:10). Yet in brief, terse phrases, the drama of chapter 12 was repeated: Abraham publicly declared Sarah to be his sister; in response, Abimelech (also Abimelek), king of Gerar, sent for and "took" Sarah (20:2). Genesis 21:32, 34 (see also Gen. 26) link Abimelech to the Philistines (for more on the Philistines, see "The Philistines," p. 407).

God spoke to the king of Gerar in a dream (v. 3) in order to avert a grave iniquity. Dreams were believed to be important means of divine communication (cf. 28:12; 40:8; Num. 22:9, 20). Adultery was considered a serious sin among many peoples of the ANE, as can be seen in Ugaritic and Egyptian marriage contracts (cf. Deut. 22:22). Abimelech's defense (vv. 4–5) was reasonable and also emphasized that no sexual intercourse had taken place. God's response acknowledged that no sexual relations had occurred but adds an important concept: God kept Abimelech from sinning against Him (v. 6). God's restraint of the evil actions of humanity (e.g., 1 Sam. 25:39; Ps. 19:13) is another facet of His grace and mercy.

God demanded from Abimelech full restoration of Sarah to her husband (Gen. 20:7). The reference to Abraham as a prophet, the first time this technical term (nabi') is used in the OT, emphasizes the intercessory role of a prophet (v. 7). Following the divine orders, Abimelech summoned his household and court and confessed publicly. The ensuing dialogue between Abraham and Abimelech echoes Pharaoh's interaction with the patriarch (12:18–19). The question "What have you done?" (20:9) recalls the rhetorical question in 3:13. Abraham's response, while plausible, lacked an important ingredient: faith in the God who called him to be a blessing. Abraham did not expect Abimelech to exhibit high moral values (20:11) and thus decided to use his old ruse.

Abimelech's response was overwhelming and included a comprehensive list of special gifts (Gen. 20:14–15), free access to the land of Gerar, as well as an "honor fee" of one thousand shekels (v. 16)—a huge sum, considering that Babylonian laborers earned half a shekel per month and a slave could be bought for a mere twenty shekels (37:28). This payment to Abraham vindicated Sarah and represented a public exoneration—particularly in view of the following chapter that describes the birth of Isaac. The phrase at the end of v. 16 is literally "a covering of the eyes." Some have suggested that this phrase signifies that she was to be veiled so as to avoid further incident—that is, that she was "rebuked," as some translations indicate. Others suggest that this means that any suspicions of adultery were covered by Abimelech's gift, signifying that her honor was vindicated, as noted in other translations. Surprisingly, the Lord, in response to the intercession of Abraham, restored the fertility of the women in the household of Abimelech. He would certainly do the same for Sarah.

21:1–21. Birth of Isaac and Expulsion of Ishmael.

God's promise finally became a reality, yet joy over its fulfillment was mingled with pain over past mistakes and their effects on many lives. The chapter opens with a magnificent statement: the Lord paqad (lit. "visited") Sarah, and the son of the promise was born. This verb (paqad) often conveys the idea of "caring for"; accordingly, some translate the verb as "was gracious to," "came to help" or "took note of." Considering the long wait and ensuing complications, the description of the birth of Isaac is very brief and emphasizes God's faithfulness (vv. 1–2, 6). The mention of the mo'ed ("appointed time") in v. 2 points back to 17:21 and 18:14. The bottom line of this important theological motif is significant: God always fulfills His promises—at the right time (cf. also in regard to the Messiah; Gal. 4:4). As is customary in the Abraham narrative, the age of the patriarch is mentioned at key moments in his life. At the birth of Isaac, Abraham was one hundred years old (21:5); this was twenty-five years after he had been called by God and had been promised descendants.

Yet not all is well. Unfortunately, human designs often clash with divinely ordained plans (21:8–21). Isaac's weaning, a significant rite of passage that accompanied the transition from infancy to childhood, marked the beginning of the affliction (Gen. 15:16). ANE texts uniformly indicate that weaning normally occurred after three years. The scorning of Isaac by Ishmael (who was half Egyptian), a teenager of seventeen years, is represented by a term (tsakhaq) difficult to translate (some read "mocking," others read "playing"). It comes from the same Hebrew root (tsakhaq) as Isaac's name (yitskhaq), meaning "to laugh." Sometimes it expresses the idea of being superior (laughing at or mocking others) and may also indicate laughter that is occasionally associated with sexual acts (e.g., Gen. 26:8; 39:14, 17). Its use here should be understood as mocking Isaac, expressing disdain and a sense of superiority. Sarah's response was immediate: she told Abraham to banish Hagar and Ishmael (Gen. 21:10), which meant that Ishmael would lose his inheritance. Abraham was distressed because Ishmael was his son (v. 11). However, Sarah based her demand on moral and legal grounds. For example, the Mesopotamian Lipit-Ishtar code (ca. 1875 B.C.) stipulated that if a master granted freedom to a slave and her children, the children of the slave should not share the estate with the children of their master. God endorsed Sarah's request but included a special blessing for Ishmael (vv. 12–13).

The expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael echoes the earlier story of Genesis 16. For a second time, Hagar found herself alone, despondent, and out of options. Yet God sustained her again. The first woman in Scripture whom God addressed by name (16:8) received another important visitor. In response to Ishmael's cries, God promised Hagar an unexpected blessing. The admonition to not be afraid (v. 17) always introduces God's special blessings (Is. 41:13–14; 43:1; Dan. 10:19). God not only spoke to Hagar but also opened her eyes (v. 19; cf. 22:13; 2 Kin. 6:17). Hagar's experience prefigured Abraham's encounter with God on Mount Moriah (Gen. 22) in many ways (a journey, provisions, a child about to die, divine intervention, a solution, and a promise).

21:22–34. Abraham's Covenant with Abimelech. After assuring the future of Abraham's family physically, the text now describes Abraham's place in society and his survival as a foreigner within an unpredictable political context. Due to the importance of water, Abraham came to an agreement with Abimelech concerning the use of wells (see Isaac's similar action later in 26:15–18), yet the covenant was much broader in scope, allowing Abraham's family to stay in the land of the Philistines for an extended period of time (21:34). The covenant ritual was sealed by the giving of gifts (vv. 27–28) and a solemn oath (v. 31). This is a classic example of a bilateral covenant involving mutual obligations from two parties. Abraham planted a tree at the well (most likely as a sign) and "called on the name of the LORD" (v. 33; 12:8; 13:4; 26:25), who had opened the way for a new alliance. God's description as the Everlasting/Eternal God (v. 33) underlines His omnipotence and power.

22:1–19. The Gospel to Abraham: The Binding of Isaac. The ultimate test of Abraham's faith involved the most precious gift the patriarch had received from the Lord—his long-awaited son. Yet while Abraham's faith is on display, it is ultimately God's character that shines through this chapter. The binding of Isaac has been an object of reflection for centuries.

Verse 1 represents, in typical Hebrew fashion, a summary as part of the introduction. The testing of Abraham consisted of creating a situation within which the faith and commitment of Abraham to the Lord would be manifested. The divine command—to take Isaac, his beloved son, and offer him as a burnt offering—is shocking (Gen. 22:2). What is missing in most English versions is the translation of a Hebrew term (na') meaning "please," at the beginning of the sentence. The imperative to offer Isaac creates a theological conundrum. Why would God, who hates human sacrifices (Lev. 18:21; Deut. 12:31; 18:10), demand such an offering? The reference to testing invites the reader to reserve judgment. More than what meets the eye is at play here. The location of the offering was in the land of Moriah, most likely an area around Jerusalem (2 Chr. 3:1). The distance from Beersheba to Jerusalem was about 50 miles (80 km), corresponding to three days' travel (22:4). Mention of Abraham's early rising and departure marks the patriarch's immediate and deliberate response. Taking with him two servants, a donkey, Isaac, and firewood, Abraham set off toward the place to which God had directed him.

On the third day (v. 4) of the journey, the party finally arrived. The third day is often when a decisive moment takes place in biblical stories (Gen. 31:22; 34:25; Ex. 19:11; Judg. 20:30; Esth. 5:1). One wonders how Abraham lived through these days, knowing that he would be required to sacrifice his only son. Abraham's comment that "we will come back," however, was not simply a reassuring reply to the slightly suspicious members of his household. It was a desperate expression of faith, similar to his answer to Isaac's question in v. 8. It anticipated the later struggle of Abraham's grandson, who pled for a blessing from the One who had wrestled with him at Jabbok (32:26). Faith can struggle, but faith holds on. The book of Hebrews confirms that Abraham believed that God could raise Isaac from the dead (Heb. 11:19). This was quite extraordinary because there is no record of anyone ever having been raised from the dead before that time.

The crucial dialogue between father and son (22:7–8) underlines the fact that Isaac's role was not passive. He could have run away from his father. Abraham's statement of faith—God would provide a lamb—was the answer to Isaac's question. They both went together (vv. 6, 8), one in obedience to God and the other in obedience to the father.

The New Testament and the Aqedah

The Hebrew term aqedah is used for the "binding" of Isaac as a sacrificial victim in Genesis 22 and has been employed in Jewish literature as a name for the story. This particular narrative plays a significant role in explaining God's work of salvation through Christ in the NT. Hebrews 11:17–19 and James 2:21–23 explicitly refer to Abraham's faith and obedience while the wording of Romans 8:32 ("He who did not spare His own Son") highlights God's willingness to offer Jesus in substitution for humanity and creates a clear link to the well-known story of Isaac's binding and Abraham's faith.

Following the construction of the altar, Abraham bound Isaac (marked by the important designation "his son") and laid him on the altar (v. 9). The following sequence reads as a slow-motion description of Abraham's most heart-wrenching moment. Yet at the right moment, the Angel of the Lord intervened (regarding the nature and identity of the Angel of the Lord, see 16:8–14 and Judg. 2:1–5). The Angel's twofold exclamation expressed the urgency of the instruction. A ram caught in a thicket (v. 13) became the substitutionary sacrifice on Mount Moriah—it was offered "instead of his son." The experience of Abraham was, in a very limited sense, a revelation of the experience of God through Jesus Christ, His Son, when He offered Himself as an expiatory lamb for sinful human beings (Mark 10:45; John 1:29, 36; 2 Cor. 5:17–21; 1 Pet. 1:18–19).

Following the climax of the narrative, God reaffirmed His promises to Abraham (12:2–3; 13:16; 15:5; 17:5–6). Abraham's obedience is one of the key themes of this chapter. Isaac is not explicitly mentioned in the report of Abraham's return, even though the phrase "they went together to Beersheba" may indicate he was included in the return party (cf. the similar phrase in vv. 6, 8). Since this chapter is primarily focused on the characters of Abraham and God, the absence of Isaac's name should not surprise the reader.

The final section of Genesis 22:20–24 functions as a bridge to what follows. Notably, the text mentions twelve sons of Nahor (by his wife and a concubine), corresponding to the twelve sons of Israel (49:28) or the twelve sons of Ishmael (25:12–15). The names of Nahor's descendants have been associated with locations in northern Mesopotamia and Transjordan. For example, "Uz" in v. 21 has been linked to Edom (cf. 10:23; 36:28). The location is also mentioned in Job 1:1 even though some translations have transcribed the Hebrew name as "Huz" in Genesis and as "Uz" in Job—in fact, a more phonetically precise transliteration is 'uts.

23:1–20. Sarah's Death and Burial. When Sarah died, Abraham succeeded in procuring a piece of property for her burial. While still a stranger, Abraham legally owned a piece of the land that in the future would belong to his descendants. Similar to Jeremiah's purchase of a field in the face of the impending Babylonian captivity (Jer. 32:6–15), Abraham's purchase was another expression of faith.

Sarah died at the age of 127 in Hebron, twenty miles (32 km) south of Jerusalem (23:1–2).

This marked the beginning of the end of an era and slowly shifted the focus of the biblical narrative from Abraham's family to Isaac, the son of the promise. Hebron played an important role in the early reign of David (2 Sam. 2:1–4). Abraham came to mourn and to weep for Sarah (v. 2). This generally involved certain mourning rites, such as tearing garments, wearing sackcloth, shaving one's beard, and loud weeping. The presence of death in Genesis at crucial intersections of the narrative serves as a brutal reminder of the loss of immortality and paradise.

The bulk of the chapter describes the important negotiations for a burial site (Gen. 23:3–16). Keywords include natan ("give" or, as some translate contextually here, "sell" or "pay"; vv. 4, 9, 11, 13) and shama' ("listen," "hear"; vv. 6, 8, 11, 13, 15), which represent operative words in ANE negotiations and were used instead of "buy" and "sell." The identity of the sons of Heth (also called Hittites) in 23:3 is unclear, as is their relationship to the well-known Hittites from Anatolia (modern Turkey) that dominated the ANE more than half a millennium later. The Semitic names of the sons of Heth in chapter 23 may suggest a different group from the later Indo-European Hittites.

Since Abraham was a foreigner (v. 4), he did not own land that he could use as a burial ground for his family. He had to negotiate with the landowners, and this took place at the gate of the city, which was a center for business and legal decisions (cf. Deut. 21:18–20; Ruth 4:1–11). The negotiation was marked by courteous interaction and demonstrations of respect (e.g., Abraham stood and bowed repeatedly). Note that Abraham did not address Ephron directly but requested the leadership of Hebron to intercede on his behalf. This presence of an intercessor was another important feature of ANE culture.

Ephron the Hittite finally suggested an amount (v. 15) for the purchase of the field that also included a burial cave. Burial practices during the time of Abraham included cave tombs that were often used for an entire family. Following the decomposition of the body of the deceased several months or years after the burial, the bones and other grave gifts were often collected in a big vessel or ossuary, which was then placed in a niche in one section of the cave. The cave of Machpelah was not only the burial place for Sarah but also the location where Abraham, Isaac, Rebekah, Leah, and Jacob were later buried (Gen. 49:30–32; 50:13). Four hundred shekels of silver, or 10 pounds (4.5 kg; v. 15), represented a significant investment. Although later in history, "shekel" was the name of a particular denomination of coinage, at this time, coins had not yet been invented. Thus, shekel here is in reference to the weight (v. 16). The weight of silver was what merchants in this period used for transactions. Cross period comparisons are always difficult, but Jeremiah purchased his field for only seventeen shekels (Jer. 32:9) while Omri paid six thousand shekels for the entire site of Samaria (1 Kin. 16:24). In any case, Abraham was able to pay what was required for the sale. We should remember that during the time of Abraham a "shekel" was not a denomination of coinage; coins had not yet been invented. It was a weight of silver used by merchants for transactions. The final summary statement of the legal and public transaction as well as the burial of Sarah (23:17–20) highlights Abraham's faith in God's promises. Abraham invested in a future he could not see.

24:1–67. Finding a Suitable Wife for Isaac.

Isaac's future and the assurance of God's promise were important concerns for Abraham, recently widowed and conscious of his age; the text introduces the patriarch as quite old (Gen. 24:1). Yet in order to secure the future of his family, Isaac needed a wife. Since parents did the matchmaking in OT times, Abraham made his chief servant swear an oath, which forms a frame around the dialogue. These are the last recorded words of Abraham.

The oath was ratified by Eliezer's symbolic act of putting his hand under Abraham's thigh (v. 9). The legal function of this symbolic act was to commit the oath-taker to fulfilling the pledge (cf. 47:29). Notably, Eliezer is never mentioned by name in the entire chapter—rather he is called the servant (or the oldest servant of his house; v. 2), and his name, presuming this is the same person, is known only from Abraham's earlier dialogue with the Lord in 15:2. The intimate nature of the symbolic gesture underlines the solemnity of the oath. Abraham made two important requests that were in line with the larger issue of the divine promise to his family: (1) the future wife of Isaac should not be from the daughters of the Canaanites (v. 3), and (2) Isaac should not return to the land of his ancestors in the north (vv. 6–8).

A brief travel log linking Canaan to Aram Naharaim in northern Syria introduces the next scene (vv. 10–27). Eliezer prayed and asked God for a sign (vv. 12–14). The decision he would make would have important repercussions for Isaac and his future. The hospitality of the young girl was impressive, as was her physical strength—providing water for ten camels was no small matter. The servant's requests for God's kindness shows dependability and trust in the Lord (24:12, 14, 26-27, 52). Additionally, v. 16 also notes that Rebekah was very beautiful, of marriageable age, but not married. Rebekah passed the test of kindness and offered to give water to the camels, as the servant looked on silently (vv. 16-21). Finally, after the hard work had been done, the servant presented her with abundant gifts (v. 22). Jewelry was often representative of financial security when given to a woman in this context.

Bethuel was Isaac's cousin (v. 24; cf. 22:23), and thus met the first of the two requirements stipulated by Abraham. Rebekah's speedy return to her mother's household may be an indication that Bethuel had more than one wife or that they were living as an extended family (v. 28). Laban's reaction was probably motivated by selfishness (v. 30; cf. 29:1-30).

Meals were important events in ancient cultures because they brought people together and provided a space for negotiations. The drawn-out marriage negotiations began (24:33-51) with a report of divine guidance by Abraham's servant (vv. 34-49), who also included hints as to Abraham's riches (v. 35). The role of Laban in the story suggests that Bethuel was old by this time and that Laban had become the leader of the clan. Alternatively, it could also reflect a local custom involving the eminence of the brother in marriage negotiations, as attested in Old and Neo-Babylonian period documents.

Abraham's servant then offered a prayer of thanksgiving and presented the bride-price to the family. The request for a quick departure the following morning was met with mixed reception. The amount of time requested in v. 55 is literally "days or ten," which could mean few days or years. In order to settle this issue, the bride-to-be was, for the first time, actively involved in the process and was asked personally whether she would go with Abraham's servant. Rebekah's concise, affirmative answer (one word in Hebrew) settled the issue (v. 58). Prior to her departure, Rebekah received the family blessing (v. 60), which was written in poetry in Hebrew and which invoked the promise of numerous descendants and power. The blessing echoed the earlier blessing to Abraham on Mount Moriah (22:17).

The final scene of the unique love story was located in Canaan, the place of God's particular blessings. Isaac lived in the south (or Negev) and went out to suakh (24:62-63). This is an obscure Hebrew term that appears only once in the OT. Most versions understand it as referring to some type of activity involving prayer or meditation (LXX, Vg., Tg.). Others have suggested the translation "roaming." The point of the story is that Isaac and Rebekah met outside the camp. Following the customs of her time, Rebekah covered herself with a veil while Eliezer (still described as the servant) informed Isaac about the marriage negotiations (vv. 64-66). The next verse describes a formal marriage ceremony. Isaac brought Rebekah into his mother's tent and laqakh—"took" Rebekah (the technical term for marriage), which resulted in Rebekah becoming his wife (v. 67). The final statement, that Isaac loved her and was comforted after his mother's death, connects the narrative to the bigger story. Scripture highlights the special relationship between Isaac and Rebekah. On the occasion of their marriage, she would become the matriarch of the clan. By this time, Abraham would have been 140 years old (see 17:17; 25:20).

25:1-18. Abraham's Death and Ishmael's Family Line.

The final wrap-up of Abraham's story brought his sons together at the grave of the patriarch. Both were sons of the friend of God (James 2:23), but only one was the son of the blessing, whose line would ultimately see the divine promise of land and offspring realized.

Following Isaac's marriage to Rebekah, Abraham took another wife (v. 1), who may also be described as a concubine (v. 6). Her ethnicity and family heritage are not mentioned. Neither the text nor the context is clear concerning the question of whether Abraham married Keturah while Sarah was still alive or whether it was after her death, though the term pilegish, "concubine," might imply the former. Abraham's sons from Keturah warrant a brief genealogy, and yet, aside from Midian, they are irrelevant within the larger scheme (v. 6). At the ripe age of 175 years, Abraham breathed his last and died (25:8). The description denotes not only age but also contentment. Abraham was ready to rest in his grave, having experienced God's presence, forgiveness, and vindication of his faith. The expression used at his death, that he "was gathered to his people," is not about the survival of an immortal soul but about the reality of human mortality. This is a term used in reference to being buried in a common tomb. The equivalent is "rested," "slept," or "lay down" (shakhab). He was not in heaven with his ancestors/fathers (e.g., Gen. 47:30; Deut. 31:16; 1 Kin. 2:10). All are sooner or later gathered to those who preceded them; all will die (cf. 25:17; 35:29; 49:33; Deut. 32:50).

Genesis 25:11 introduces the important continuation of the story of divine blessings for Abraham's family. The verse reads like the passing of the baton, highlighting God's special blessing for Isaac, whose story would continue in 25:19. The brief genealogy of Ishmael (vv. 12–18), also described as Abraham's son, underlines the fulfillment of the promises to Hagar (16:10) and Abraham (17:20). Ishmael's twelve sons foreshadowed the later tribal units of Israel (35:22–26). The summary statement of Ishmael's life (25:17) is very similar to Abraham's (25:8) and links father and son in death. The final verse of this genealogical summary includes a brief geographical note as to the whereabouts of Ishmael's descendants as well as the obscure final phrase al pene kol 'ekhaiw napal (v. 18). The Hebrew text literally reads, "And upon all the faces of his brothers he fell." Some translations have viewed this as a reference to his death in the presence of his brothers, but it can also be viewed as suggesting the hostility mentioned in 16:12.

25:19—26:35

Isaac's Story

Isaac's limited role in the patriarchal stories is reflected in the space allotted to the description of his life and activities. While some have included Jacob and Esau's story as part of Isaac's family record, it may be better to recognize the quiet and unobtrusive presence of Isaac, the son of the promise, on his own terms. He represented another link in the chain of promises, and readers are privy to his struggles involving faith, trust in the God of his father, and ultimately, personal victory.

25:19–34. Birth and Rivalry of Esau and Jacob. Following the programmatic reference to Isaac's genealogy (v. 19), using the technical marker toledot (see Genesis: Introduction), the text focuses on Rebekah's barrenness and the birth of her twin sons in response to Isaac's intercessory prayer and God's miraculous intervention.

Isaac's story begins with his birth (v. 19), followed by a brief recap of the facts involving his marriage to Rebekah (v. 20), whose barrenness of twenty years (cf. 25:26) must have been a continuous source of stress in the patriarch's marriage. However, unlike his parents, Isaac did not succumb to the "quick solutions" of concubinage. Isaac's proactive intercessory prayer sheds a different light on Isaac, who often appears to be passive. The Hebrew term referring to Isaac's entreaty in v. 21 ('atar) appears repeatedly in the Exodus narrative, where it describes Moses's appeal to God to remove the plagues (Ex. 8:8–9, 28–30). The lack of time markers (when did God grant Isaac's plea?) emphasizes the powerful intercessory ministry of Isaac, as the sequence of prayer, divine response, and conception seemingly followed one after the other.

Yet all is not well. The mention of the children struggling in Rebekah's womb introduces the theme of conflict and strife into the Isaac narrative. The Hebrew word used for their conflict (ratsats) is a strong term, referring to "crushing" (Deut. 28:33; Judg. 9:53). Conflict began in the womb, occurred during delivery (Gen. 25:26), is highlighted by the different professions chosen by the sons (v. 27), and ultimately is reflected in the opposing preferences of the parents (v. 28). Rebekah desired to hear from the Lord, so she went to inquire of Him (v. 22; cf. 2 Kin. 8:7–15). Usually this phrase in the OT is reserved for requesting divine guidance from a prophet (Ex. 18:15; 1 Sam. 9:9). The divine reply was expressed in a poetic, four-line response that underlines the conflict between the two sons of Isaac and highlights divine election over and against established traditions (i.e., the rights of the firstborn). The statement about the older (lit. the "greater") serving the younger (Gen. 25:23) contains a wordplay between "shall serve" (ya'abod) and Jacob's name (ya'aqob). Jacob's election was based on divine sovereignty, grace, and foreknowledge (cf. Rom. 8:29–30; 9:11–12), not on his upright character.

The biblical text briefly relates how Jacob and Esau developed distinctly different personas (Gen. 25:27–28). Esau, the skillful hunter, was loved by Isaac, while Jacob, who lived in the fields, was loved by Rebekah. The Hebrew adjective tam (translated variously as "mild," "peaceful," "quiet," or "plain") is based on a root indicating completion or perfection. It can also be translated as "full of integrity," "complete," "flawless," "clean," "blameless," or "perfect" (cf. Gen. 6:9; 17:1 [where the similar tamim is used]; 20:5–6; Job 1:1; Ps. 7:8; Song 5:2; 6:9). In the present context, this word, used to describe Jacob, seems to suggest the idea of an amiable and pious person.

The stage was set for more conflict within Isaac's family. Genesis 25:29–34 illustrates the personalities of both sons. Jacob, calculating and astute, won the birthright in exchange for a meal. He sought to outsmart tradition and “assist” God, whose prophecy he must have heard from his doting mother. Esau’s shortsightedness and disdain (Heb. 12:16–17) for the birthright is clearly illustrated by the speed with which he made the transaction, consumed the food, and went on his way. The bekorah (“birthright”) refers to the rights of the firstborn in biblical times. The firstborn held a position of honor within the family (Gen. 43:33) and the right of succession (2 Chr. 21:3), or as in the case of Abraham’s family, the covenant. The pentateuchal laws stipulated that the firstborn should receive a double portion of his father’s inheritance (Deut. 21:17). Israel as a people was considered God’s firstborn among the nations (Ex. 4:22; Jer. 2:3).

26:1–33. Isaac and Abimelech. Isaac’s encounter with Abimelech contains many echoes of earlier episodes in Abraham’s life. It is the first story focusing exclusively on Isaac. Genesis 25 and 26 are not ordered chronologically but thematically. Since there is no mention of children in chapter 26, it is possible that the events described in the chapter happened during the first twenty years of Isaac’s marriage to Rebekah. The Philistines who recognized her beauty would have noticed her nursing or raising her children had they already been born.

Genesis 26:1 sounds like a repeat of 12:10. A famine in the land led Isaac to move to Gerar, the territory of Abimelech, king of the Philistines. Several decades separated Abraham’s move to Gerar (Gen. 20) from Isaac’s visit. The repetition of the same name for Gerar’s king, Abimelech, is most likely due to its use as a dynastic name (something that was common in other ANE cultures; i.e., Egypt). Isaac obeyed God’s direct command not to go to Egypt, given during the divine appearance (26:2). God reiterated four key promises to Isaac (vv. 3–4), including (1) the special divine presence and blessing, (2) ownership of the promised land, (3) countless descendants, and (4) the blessing of the nations through his descendants. The final verse of the divine promise, introduced by “because,” reminded Isaac of the conditionality of the blessings. Obedience to the divine principles and instructions were central to the promises to Abraham as well as to Isaac (v. 5).

Unfortunately, Isaac repeated some of his father’s mistakes (Gen. 12:10–20; 20:1–18). Out of a fear similar to his father’s, he told a lie. The “long time” referenced in v. 8 suggests that Isaac’s fears were baseless. Instead, the king saw Isaac showing affection to Rebekah. The Hebrew term used here (tsakhaq, “to laugh”) includes the same consonants that are present in Isaac’s name. There is thus here a wordplay that appears repeatedly in the Abraham narrative: Sarah tsakhaq in unbelief at the announcement of Isaac’s birth (18:12–15) but eventually tsakhaq for joy at his birth (21:6). Later, Ishmael tsakhaq (cf. notes on 21:9) when Isaac was weaned, and then Isaac (26:8) tsakhaq with his wife (here the nuance of the verb is more like “to play with” or “to caress”; cf. Ex. 32:6, indicating more of a sexual playfulness). Abimelech’s critique was stern, and he recognized the potential for grave sin that would have affected an entire community (v. 10).

Genesis 26:12 marks the first reference to a patriarch working in agriculture. Isaac enjoyed tremendous divine blessings and reaped a hundredfold. Gerar’s inhabitants envied him (v. 14), and the resulting conflict suggested it was time to relocate. Farming and animal husbandry both required secure access to water. Three times Isaac’s servants reopened a well that Abraham had dug (and that had been stopped up by the Philistines). Each time Isaac renamed the well and thus laid claim to its water (vv. 15–22). The tenuous interactions between Isaac’s clan and the inhabitants of the land were mirrored by the different names given to the three wells: Esek (i.e., “quarrel” or “dispute” in v. 20), then Sitnah (i.e., “hostility” in v. 21), and finally Rehoboth (or “open space” in v. 22), which in the OT is often associated with prosperity or salvation (Is. 54:2–3).

The second theophany reminded Isaac of the true source of power in his life: God’s declarations that He was the God of his father, that he should not be afraid, and that He was with him and would bless him and fulfill His promises to Abraham through his descendants dispelled any challenge he might face (Gen. 26:24). These words continue to have deep meaning for Abraham’s seed (Gal. 3:29) on the other side of the cross. In response, Isaac, for the first time, built an altar and worshiped the Lord—echoing earlier responses of his father (v. 25; cf. 12:7–8; 13:18).

The final section of the narrative describes another covenant-making ceremony involving a patriarch and Abimelech, who represented the inhabitants of Gerar (Gen. 26:26–31). Initially, Isaac, because of the earlier hostilities, does not seem to be cordial toward the king (v. 27). Accordingly, he did not offer the king food, but he was probably anticipating an agreement, after which he prepared a covenant meal to seal the agreement (v. 30).

26:34–35. Esau's Foreign Wives. The final verses of Genesis 26 seem to be completely disconnected from the earlier narrative of Isaac's sojourn in Gerar and his faith-building experiences. Featuring Esau's foreign wives, they function as a bridge to move the spotlight upon Jacob, beginning in 27:1. Together with 28:6–9, they form a frame for the crucial story of how Jacob stole Esau's blessing.

Esau erred on two accounts: first, he entered into a polygamous relationship; second, he had not learned anything from his grandfather's search to find Isaac an appropriate wife, a bride who not only had a similar ethnic and cultural background but, more importantly, shared the family's commitment to the Lord. Both wives are described as Hittites (26:34), which was greatly distressing to Esau's parents. The last phrase can be literally translated as "they were bitterness of spirit to Isaac and Rebekah," and may be related to the better-known expression marat nepesh (lit. "bitter in soul"; 1 Sam. 1:10; Job 7:11; 10:1). The exact nature of Isaac and Rebekah's bitterness and grief is unclear; however, Isaac should have recognized that Esau was unfit to receive the blessing of the firstborn. Isaac's poor judgment is an appropriate introduction to Jacob's story.

Jacob's Story

Conflict, tension, faith, and finally, reconciliation are key themes in Jacob's story. Caught between a father committed to following tradition (while avoiding careful Spirit-guided judgment) and a mother who had heard God's voice and schemed to help God along, the son of the blessing experienced numerous mountaintop and valley experiences as he grew into the man who would become Israel.

27:1—28:5. Jacob Steals Esau's Blessing.

Forms of the root "bless" appear twenty times in this suspense-filled story, representing the key word of the narrative. The ill-gotten blessing of the firstborn revealed that Rebekah's plan did not agree with that of her husband.

Isaac is described as old and suffering from eye trouble (27:1). He seemed to have been aware of his decline because, in his instructions to Esau, he asserted that he wished to bless him before he died (v. 4). In contrast to other OT figures who called their families to their side in anticipation of death (Gen. 47:29; 50:24), Isaac did not include Jacob and Rebekah.

Rebekah overheard Isaac's command to his favorite son, Esau, and immediately set in motion a plan to secure the blessing for her favorite son, Jacob (27:5–10). Note the clear distinction between his son (Esau) and her son (Jacob) in vv. 5–6. Isaac's family was a family with divided loyalties. Rebekah's words to Jacob (v. 8) were another way of saying, "Do what I tell you. I know better." Individuals should take responsibility for their own moral decision-making—even if the guidance of others appears to be pure. Rebekah's reply to Jacob's concerns suggested a possible curse (v. 13).

The word mat'ammim ("savory/tasty foods" or "delicacies"; vv. 4, 7, 9, 14, 17, 31) appears only twice outside of this chapter—in Proverbs 23:3 and 6. Food played an important role in Jacob's acquisition of both the birthright (bekorah) and the blessing (berakah) in 25:29–34 and 27:1–29. Following the preparation of the choice meal, Rebekah masked Jacob with Esau's clothes and wrapped the skin of young goats around her son's hands and neck (v. 16). Jacob was camouflaged—but would the ruse work?

Jacob's first words, "my father," resulted in an immediate query regarding his identity. Jacob's reply represented the first of his spoken lies. In response to Isaac's question about his son's quick return, Jacob credited God's special blessings during the hunt (vv. 19–20). The reader can sense Isaac's unease as he invited Jacob to come closer so that he could touch his skin (vv. 21–22). The deception had been successful, yet Isaac remained puzzled: it seemed to him that the voice was Jacob's but the hands were Esau's (v. 22).

Finally, Isaac finished his meal and blessed Jacob. This entailed divine gifts of fertile land as well as dominion over peoples (Gen. 27:27b–29). The land blessings, more relevant for a farmer than for a hunter, alluded to Israel's settlement of the land of the promise. The final promise is later repeated in Balaam's blessing of Israel as a nation—albeit in inverted sequence (Num. 24:9).

Following Isaac's blessing and Jacob's immediate departure, Esau entered the scene. Isaac's question, "Who are you?" (v. 32), echoed the earlier question to Jacob (v. 18) and suggested a completely bewildered Isaac. In response to Esau's answer, Isaac trembled uncontrollably (v.

33). The text describes Isaac as more animated than he is described anywhere else in Genesis, and the reason for his animation was intense fear. Esau wept in anger and begged for his father's blessing (v. 38), but what resulted was a make-shift "anti-blessing" that contained many negative statements. The words of Isaac to Esau (v. 39) began in the same way as part of the blessing of Jacob (v. 28), but translators and commentators disagree concerning whether they mean the same thing. The difficulty lies in the Hebrew preposition min, which can mean "with" or "in," but also "away from." Thus, some suggest that here min means that Isaac was proclaiming that Esau would live "away from" the fertile ground and the dew of heaven. Others suggest that the same words should have the same meaning in both verses and that the prophecy concerning Esau (which includes some bleak elements in v. 40) need not be entirely negative. The prophetic final line of the blessing in v. 40 was fulfilled during the time of the reign of Jehoram of Judah, when Edom revolted against Judah and crowned its own king (2 Kin. 8:20, 22).

Clearly beaten, Esau's hatred for Jacob smoldered dangerously underneath the surface of a dysfunctional family life. Esau's determination to kill his brother Jacob (v. 41) identified him as the seed of the serpent, following the pattern of Cain and Lamech (Gen. 3:15; 4:8, 23; John 8:44). Rebekah's dense network within the camp kept her informed of Esau's threats, and consequently, she commanded Jacob (cf. v. 8) to flee to her clan's home in Haran (v. 43). However, while she intended for her son to stay there only a short time (v. 44), the sojourn lasted twenty years (31:41), and Jacob never saw his mother again following his departure to Haran.

The last verse of this chapter contains one of the few dialogues between Isaac and Rebekah. Again, Rebekah took the initiative, shaping her request for Jacob to travel to Haran within the context of a bridal search. In response, Isaac called Jacob, blessed him, and admonished him to abstain from marrying a Canaanite (28:1; cf. 24:3–4). Then he sent Jacob away (v. 5), but not before he blessed him a second time. Isaac's second blessing echoes Abraham's earlier blessings (vv. 3–4; cf. 12:2–3, 7; 13:15, 17; 22:17). Jacob left for the homeland of his mother. Padan (Paddan) Aram (v. 5) may be linked to the Akkadian paddanu, "highway."

28:6–9. Esau Marries Ishmael's Daughter.

The use of the Hebrew verb ra'ah ("to see"; 28:6, 8) suggests not only observation but also mental assimilation and thought; hence, some translate it in these verses as "learned" or "realized." The disappointment over the lost birthright, the stolen blessing, and the impossibility of revenge compelled Esau to change his strategy. Esau went to his uncle Ishmael, who had married an Egyptian (21:21), and married (again, the Hebrew verb here is lit. "took") Ishmael's daughter Mahalath as his third wife (v. 9). Esau forgot that the divine promises were to be fulfilled through the descendants of Isaac, not Ishmael. His partial obedience to his father's command was not good enough (v. 8).

28:10–22. Jacob's Dream at Bethel. A dream encouraged and guided Jacob on his way to Haran. His encounter with the God of his forefathers marked a definitive moment in his life, prefiguring another important encounter many years later on his return from Haran (Gen. 32:22–32). Following the commands of his parents, Jacob was en route from Beersheba, in southern Israel, to Haran, in modern-day Syria. The journey covered about 550 miles (885 km) and must have taken weeks. Reaching "a certain place" (Gen. 28:11), the fugitive prepared for another night on the road. The word "place" reappears several times in the passage (vv. 11, 16, 17, 19) and is significant for the identification and naming of Bethel. In some instances, the term is used to indicate a cultic place of worship (Deut. 12:5). The basic meaning of the verb paga', appearing at the outset of v. 11 and translated as "reached" or "came to," is literally "to meet" or "to encounter" and reappears in 32:1 when Jacob is met by God's angels on his return trip. The presence of the verb, together with other elements, suggests a close link between chapters 28 and 32.

Jacob encountered God in a dream in which he saw angels ascending and descending a ladder with the Lord at the top of it. The movement of angels on the ladder underlines the important link between heaven and earth and is later referred to by Jesus describing Himself as the true link between God and humanity (John 1:51). God's self-description as the Lord God of Abraham his father and the God of Isaac (v. 13) emphasizes covenant continuity. In line with other patriarchs, Jacob received affirmation of previous promises of land, descendants, and the role of mediator of blessings to the world (cf. 12:3, 7; 13:15; 17:4–6; 18:18; 22:17–18). Then God spoke to Jacob's current needs: He promised to be with him and shamar ("keep," "watch over") him (v. 15; cf. the same promise given to Isaac in 26:3).

Jacob's response recognized God's presence and his own lack of perception (vv. 16–17). Jacob then used two phrases to describe "this place" adequately (28:17). The "house of God" (Heb. "Bethel") became an idolatrous sanctuary during the time of the divided kingdom (1 Kin. 12:28–31). The "gate of heaven" is reminiscent of Mesopotamian language linked to ziggurats (cf. notes on Gen. 11:6–7).

Following the naming, the pillow stone became a pillar stone (28:18), a memorial to Jacob's experience with the Lord in this place. He consecrated the stone by offering a libation offering of oil on top of it (v. 18). Later legislation would condemn the erection of pillars because of their function in the religions of Israel's neighbors (Ex. 23:24; 34:13; Lev. 26:1; Deut. 16:22).

Jacob's final response to the dream was a vow (Gen. 28:20)—the longest formulated vow in Scripture. Vows include conditions involving God's blessings. Some misunderstand Jacob to have been exhibiting a wrongful spirit of bargaining by using the word "if," as if he were in doubt of God's promise and would obey Him only contingently. The context (vv. 16–19; 32:9–12, 22–32), however, indicates that this was not the case. He was responding in faith and commitment to the assurance that he had just received. The "if" is best understood as "because" or "since." Jacob's pledge of a tenth in v. 22 is the second reference in Genesis (cf. 14:20) to tithing prior to the formulation of the specific law (Lev. 27:30–33; Deut. 14:22–29). Clearly, the patriarchs were aware of and practiced tithing.

29:1–14. Jacob's Safe Arrival at Haran.

Jacob's arrival at his destination is marked by a change in scenery. The reader encounters a pastoral scene instead of dark nights and lonely locales. As an outsider who did not know the geography of the place, Jacob realized only later in the dialogue that he had finally arrived at Haran—safe at last. The chapter opens with a typical betrothal-type scene (see 24:10–61; Ex. 2:15–21).

Jacob's journey ended in a country populated by Eastern peoples. No specific location is mentioned, but he must have felt relief when he finally saw a well (Gen. 29:2). The stone covering of the well represented a well-known strategy of water preservation. The ensuing dialogue between the shepherds and Jacob was terse. Jacob's questions regarding location and his relations were met with one- or two-word answers in Hebrew. This changed only when the shepherds announced the arrival of Laban's daughter Rachel. At the appearance of Rachel, the text has a particle of interjection (hinneh), variously translated as "behold," "and look," and then "here comes his daughter Rachel." The use of this word is an indication to the reader that this is a crucial moment requiring attention.

Jacob saw Rachel and then went to the well, rolled the stone from its mouth, and watered the flock of his uncle Laban. Was Jacob showing off, or was he overcome by sheer relief at having reached his destination? Most likely both, as his strong emotional reaction in v. 11 suggests—he kissed Rachel and wept aloud. Different from Abraham's servant, who prior to accomplishing his purpose committed himself and the purpose of his visit to God in prayer (24:12–14), Jacob, the man of action, was on his way to marital bliss. At least that must have been on his mind as the conversation with Laban in vv. 15–19, following his arrival at the household, suggests. Laban likely anticipated that the arrival of a member of Abraham's family would bring with him a valuable bride-price but was frustrated by what he saw, namely, a young man without any possessions. Laban recognized Jacob's kinship by referring to him as his flesh and bone (or, in more contemporary terms, "flesh and blood"; this description echoes Gen. 2:23, where the same phrase occurs. Cf. Judg. 9:2; 2 Sam. 5:1; 19:13). The formula may indicate more than blood relations and point to a larger covenant agreement.

29:15–30. Jacob Marries Leah and Rachel.

The suggestion of another successful marriage agreement (see Gen. 24) was dashed when Laban outsmarted Jacob. This dispute is programmatic and links this section to the larger theological motif of conflict in the households of Isaac and Jacob.

This brief section describes the service-in-lieu-of-a-bride-price agreement between Laban and Jacob (seven years of service). The key words "work"/"serve" and "pay"/"wages" reappear repeatedly in the following three chapters (29:18, 20, 25, 27, 30; 30:16, 18, 26, 28–29, 32–33; 31:6–7, 41). Laban's initial question regarding Jacob's wages is followed by a description of the main characteristics of Laban's two eligible daughters (29:16–17). The oldest daughter, Leah (most likely meaning "cow"), had eyes that were rak ("tender," "delicate"). Some translate this term as "weak" or "ordinary." However, this adjective has a wide spectrum of meaning depending on the context. Thus, either she had weak eyes, or her eyes were an attractive and captivating part of her. In comparison, Rachel (whose name means “ewe”) is described as being beautiful in appearance and to’ar (“form” or “figure”; v. 17). Jacob loved Rachel (v. 18), and this was shown in the depth and single-mindedness of Jacob’s commitment and his willingness to serve for seven years in exchange for her hand.

Deceived by Laban, Jacob completed the bridal week with Leah, and then immediately married Rachel, the one he indeed loved. The result of this polygamous relationship can be seen in the record of chronic family conflict and jealousy. This underscores the fact that such a practice was not part of God’s plan for human families.

29:31—30:24. A Promise Fulfilled: Jacob’s Wives and Children. The story of Jacob’s wives, concubines, and children is a story of fulfilled divine promises and challenging family conflicts. Similar to Abraham’s experience with Sarah and Hagar, Jacob was to suffer the consequences of a polygamous household where jealousy reigned supreme. Yet in the midst of tension, jealousy, and conflict, God showed Himself sovereign and fulfilled His promises.

In a tight sequence of seemingly never-ending pregnancies and birth announcements, the section describes the birth of eleven of Jacob’s sons, plus the arrival of one daughter, Dinah (30:21), all within seven years (30:26). Dinah’s presence among the birth announcements echoes the earlier inclusion of Rebekah in Nahor’s genealogy (22:23). God was intricately involved in giving children—in line with other OT references that clearly link children to divine intervention and blessings.

The text also suggests God’s care for His children’s emotional well-being. The introduction to the first sequence of four birth announcements reveals that God was concerned about Leah being less loved than Rachel (29:31). The Hebrew word here (sane’) can mean “hate” but also “less loved” or “unloved.” The text need not imply that Jacob detested Leah (since all of her children were begotten of Jacob). God was not passive. He enabled her to have a child (v. 31), the first reference to divine activity since Jacob’s encounter at Bethel. A son was born, and Leah called him Reuben (v. 32), whose name can be translated as “See, a son!” He was Jacob’s firstborn. As this story illustrates, God cares for the brokenhearted.

The naming of each son by either Leah or Rachel emphasized the substitutionary function of the two maidservants Bilhah (30:3–8) and Zilpah (30:9–13), who each bore two sons to Jacob. Both Leah and Rachel used sexuality and childbearing to outmaneuver and gain dominance over the rival wife while Jacob appeared essentially passive in the midst of the conflict.

30:25–43. Divine Blessing: Jacob’s Wealth Increases. The compressed story detailing the birth of Jacob’s children is followed by another recounting of divine blessings—how Jacob acquired his riches. The narrative is full of strange symbolic acts, yet it is not Jacob’s cleverness or astuteness but God’s hidden hand that ultimately is in control of the natural world and human hearts.

In response to Jacob’s request to return home (v. 25), Laban publicly recognized God’s special blessing, but he also stated that this recognition had been acquired by nakhsh (v. 27). This word usually means “to divine.” Divination often attempted to gain wisdom from the gods through ritual performances and the observation of signs. It was widely practiced in the ANE but strictly forbidden in Israel years later (Lev. 19:26; Deut. 18:10, 14). Some have taken the word to mean that Laban learned “by experience” or observation that the Lord had blessed him through his relationship with Jacob. This interpretation is highly unlikely, for the verbal root always refers to divination through means other than this. A better alternative, based on an Akkadian verbal root, is a Hebrew verbal root spelled the same way as nakhsh meaning “to become rich.” In that case, Laban would be saying “I have become rich/prospered for the Lord has blessed me on account of you.” Laban finally offered a wage contract that would guarantee Jacob the possibility of acquiring his own herds while taking care of Laban’s (v. 28).

Jacob’s request for the speckled and spotted sheep and goats as his wage must have seemed very minimal to Laban, who immediately took the offer without any haggling (v. 35). Laban knew that goats were normally black or dark brown while sheep were white. Contemporary records set the wages for hired shepherds at around 20 percent of the newborn animals. Because of the relative rarity of speckled and spotted animals, Jacob was apparently settling for a potential wage much lower than that of a typical shepherd. Laban knew he had secured an advantageous arrangement; furthermore, he made sure that Jacob’s wages would be even lower by removing the speckled and spotted animals from his herds and giving them to his sons (v. 35). Later, Jacob claimed that Laban had changed his wages ten times (31:41).

However, Jacob became exceedingly prosperous (v. 43) after an additional six years of service for Laban. Different translations present different purposes for the rods Jacob laid before his flocks (vv. 37–42): (1) to encourage more breeding or (2) to actually affect the appearance of the animals. The context indicates that the increase in livestock was the result of God blessing Jacob (31:8–12) and not the result of Jacob's unusual ideas about breeding and genetics. Jacob's riches included not only goats and sheep but also servants, camels, and donkeys (v. 43).

31:1–55. Jacob's Flight and a New Covenant.

At the end of twenty years full of tension, conflict, and treachery, Jacob finally decided to relocate his large household to his homeland. Pursued by Laban and his kinsmen, Jacob experienced divine protection and reassurance (31:1–3). The charge of Laban's sons that Jacob had taken everything from their father was at least partially true. God had blessed Jacob so abundantly that his possessions surpassed those of Laban. God's commanded Jacob to return to Canaan—that is, the land of his fathers and his relatives (v. 3). Both land and community had been part of God's promise to Abraham.

The next scene involved clandestine meetings, and for the first time, Rachel and Leah agreed on a plan of action. Jacob shared his perception that their living situation had changed, following a visit from the Angel of God, called in other places the Angel of the Lord (see Judg. 2:1–5). Here He is the Angel of "God" because He identified Himself as the "God" who spoke to Jacob at Bethel (cf. Gen. 16:7–8; 22:11–18; 32:30; cf. Ex. 23:20–22; Judg. 13; Hos. 12:4). The divine "I have seen" (v. 12) is repeatedly used in Scripture to indicate God's compassion for those suffering (cf. Gen. 16:13; 29:31; 31:42; Ex. 3:7, 9; 4:31). When God sees, things begin to happen. God also identified Himself as the God of Bethel (v. 13)—that is, the God who had already appeared to Jacob and who had heard Jacob's vow. Interestingly, the brief, summarized version of God's communication to Jacob in v. 3 is expanded in the fuller description in vv. 10–13. Rachel and Leah's response was unanimous; in fact, they disassociated themselves from their father's house, utilizing terminology involving outsiders and slaves (v. 15).

With his wives in agreement, Jacob moved quickly and departed from Laban's household while Laban was away shearing his sheep (v. 19). Camels were used as means of transport for the growing family (v. 17) and had already been mentioned in 12:16 and 24:10. Critical scholarship has questioned the historicity of camel domestication in the time of the patriarchs. However, archaeological evidence confirms that the camel was domesticated in the second millennium B.C.

Rachel's theft of the family household idols (or teraphim) was her reaction to Laban retaining her bridal price (vv. 14–16), which was paid to him to be held in trust for her. Teraphim were generally portable idols, often associated with the gods of the ancestors. Rachel's thievery was not discovered because she hid the teraphim in her saddle and claimed (probably falsely) that she could not rise from it due to her menstruation (vv. 33–35). The "Fear of Isaac" is used as a surprising divine epithet or title (vv. 42, 53). Data from the third-millennium-B.C. Ebla texts support the rendering of the Hebrew pakhad as "dread," suggesting the translation "the Dreaded One of Isaac." Dread often befalls Israel's enemies (e.g., Ex. 15:16; Deut. 2:25; 11:25; Esth. 8:17). It should be taken into consideration that pakhad is also used to describe a proper awe and respect for God (e.g., 2 Chr. 19:7; Ps. 119:120; Prov. 28:14; Hos. 3:5). Also the LXX translation of pakhad here is phobos, which is also used throughout the OT and NT to refer to an appropriate reverence (e.g., Ex. 20:20; 2 Cor. 7:1; Eph. 5:21; cf. Heb. 12:28–29).

Finally, Jacob and Laban entered into a covenant (v. 44), bringing resolution to the tension between them. Pillars of stones were set up as witnesses to the covenant (v. 52). The use of Aramaic and Hebrew terms for the pillars suggests that Laban's primary language may have been Aramaic, an element that underlines the separation between the distinct families. Jacob then offered a sacrifice (v. 54), followed by a covenant meal ratifying the agreement. Laban's departure the next morning included a kiss for his grandchildren and daughters but none for Jacob (cf. 29:13). Twenty years had taken their toll on Laban and Jacob's relationship.

32:1–32. Jacob Wrestles with God. Fear is one of the threads running through this key chapter of Jacob's biography. Wrestling with the divine Messenger, Jacob finally reached the end of himself. Fear, pain, and dread fell away as he overcame and was overcome. Jacob was ready to meet his brother, Esau.

Genesis 32:1–2 describes an angelic encounter, one which was probably intended to encourage Jacob on his journey home. Mahanaim means “two camps.” In order to prepare for the encounter with Esau, Jacob sent messengers ahead of his caravan (32:3–5). The report that these messengers brought back, however, was ambiguous and increased Jacob’s anxiety. The prayer of Jacob expressed his fears (v. 11) and claimed divine promises (v. 12). The God of Abraham and Isaac had become the God of Jacob (v. 9). God was becoming real and personal in this chapter—in more ways than Jacob could have imagined.

Following his prayer, Jacob sent a significant gift ahead for his brother, Esau. He referred to Esau as “my lord” and himself as “your servant,” which implied that Jacob honored Esau and did not seek to flaunt his birthright status. Jacob’s reference to his attempt to appease or pacify his brother in 32:20 is related to the Hebrew term translated in other places as “ransom” (e.g., Ex. 21:30; Ps. 49:8).

Having divided his camp, Jacob found himself alone (v. 24). The careful reader recalls an earlier night spent alone in the fields around Bethel (28:11–22). Suddenly, a Man appeared and wrestled with Jacob in the darkness. The Hebrew verb for “wrestled” occurs only in this chapter and sounds similar to the Hebrew yabbog. It has been linked to a comparable Hebrew verb meaning “embrace” (29:13; 33:4). However, this was no friendly embrace. The identity of the Attacker was at first unknown, but Hosea would call Him the Angel (12:4) while Jacob would acknowledge Him to be God (32:30; cf. Hos. 12:5; see notes on Gen. 16:7–8; 31:9–12). Jacob was defeated by a simple touch, and this led him to ask for a blessing. He had finally realized that the blessing was a divine gift.

The ensuing dialogue between Jacob and the unidentified Assailant centered on the issue of names (vv. 27–28). Jacob received a new name, Israel, the future name of the covenant nation. Jacob also wanted to know his Attacker’s name (v. 29). Knowing the name of another person provides access to that person. Yet Jacob’s Opponent did not want to provide this information; instead, He blessed him. Even though Jacob may have only sensed the true identity of his Attacker, this was the blessing he had sought for years. This was the real thing. His declaration that he had seen God “face-to-face” forms the basis for the place name Peniel—that is, “face of God” (v. 30). However, “face-to-face” emphasizes more the intimacy of the encounter and not necessarily visual contact. As Jacob limped into a new morning, he walked with a constant reminder of the divine Presence—in this sense, the divine touch that had caused the limp functioned as an object lesson. He could face the coming encounters with Esau and his parents with hope. Jacob had been transformed. The dietary restriction based on this encounter was a perpetual reminder; “to this day” (v. 32) reflects the perspective of the author.

33:1–20. The Reunion of Jacob and Esau. The encounter at Jabbok changed many things for Jacob, but it did not immediately change Jacob’s relationship with Esau. However, vertical transformation affects horizontal relationships. Again, God was working behind the scenes. As He did for Israel during their sojourn in the wilderness many centuries later, God went ahead of Jacob and prepared the way for reconciliation. Jacob preceded his household (v. 3) instead of staying behind them (32:17, 19, 21). The Hebrew term used here (‘abar) is also the root of the name “Hebrew.” Jacob crossed over the Jabbok, but his move from rearguard to vanguard also marked profound changes in his character. Seven times Jacob bowed to the ground before Esau. This was a common practice of vassals toward their overlords, documented in the second-millennium-B.C. Amarna correspondence. The four-hundred-man fighting force (see 32:6) behind Esau must have appeared formidable. Yet God had done another miracle and had prepared Esau’s heart and blessed him (33:9). While the biblical text does not mention any direct divine intervention, as was the case during Laban’s pursuit (cf. 31:29), Esau’s intent on hearing of the arrival of his brother and calling up four hundred fighting men must have been hostile. The sequence of Esau’s actions represents a complete reversal of what the reader expects: Esau ran to meet Jacob, embraced him, fell on his neck, and kissed him—and then both wept (33:4). A comparable scene, using similar language, is described by Jesus in Luke 15:20. This was palpable grace. Instead of attacking and hurting one another, the two estranged brothers embraced, which is described by a Hebrew term (khabaq) that sounds similar to the one describing Jacob’s wrestling with God (‘abaq; 32:24–25).

The ensuing dialogue repeatedly reflected the vassal-overlord motif introduced by Jacob’s seven bows. Jacob referred to himself as “your servant” (33:5) and provided expensive gifts that he urged Esau to accept (v. 10). Esau’s changed attitude was reflected in the kisses he bestowed on his brother. His reaction seems to indicate forgiveness (2 Sam. 14:33), recognition of Jacob as his brother (Gen. 33:9), and acceptance of the blessing (v. 11; in reference to the gifts in v. 10 and a conscious echo of the stolen blessing).

Yet all was not well—Jacob's responses to Esau's invitation to accompany his household suggest some hesitation (vv. 12–17). Jacob's delicate replies underlined his reliance on God; thus, he avoided offending his brother (vv. 12–15). Following Esau's departure to Seir (cf. 36:8), Jacob journeyed (again using a term marking nomadic travel) to Succoth (or Sukkoth), which is the Hebrew word for "shelters" or "booths." Succoth was located on the eastern side of the Jordan River Valley in territory that was later given to the tribe of Gad (Josh. 13:24–27). This is the fourth location that Jacob named (Bethel, Mahanaim, Peniel, and Succoth), each marking significant events in his journeys with the Lord.

Finally, Jacob entered Canaan proper and settled near Shechem, where he bought a parcel of land for his camp (Gen. 33:17–20). There he built his first altar, providing an important link to Abraham and Isaac (12:7–8; 13:18; 22:9–10; 26:25; 35:7). The final verses of Genesis 33 function as a bridge to the story of Dinah.

34:1–31. The Dinah Incident. Peace and reconciliation, so marvelously illustrated in the previous chapter, did not last long. There were major tensions between the residents of Shechem and the sons of Jacob, and they would lead to disaster, involving the rape of Dinah. The problems had to do with dissimilar values and matters of honor and shame.

Dinah, introduced as Leah's daughter (34:1), "went out to see," or visit with, the daughters of the Hivites that lived in Shechem. When Shechem, the son of Hamor (Hebrew for "male donkey"), "saw her," he raped her (v. 2). This verbal sequence (ra'ah, laqakh, shakav, 'anah) is telling and deliberate. Seeing (the first verb) led to taking (the second; cf. Eve in Gen. 3:6, with no sexual connotations). "To lay with" or "have sex with" is the third verb, which is combined with the fourth in some translations as "raped" or "lay with her by force." This is because the last of these verbs ('anah) comes from a Hebrew root meaning "humiliated, afflicted." This was not consensual sex but blatant rape. Yet Shechem thought he was in love. The biblical text states that he loved her and spoke kindly/tenderly to her. This last phrase is literally "he spoke upon the heart," which appears several times in the OT, in less than perfect contexts where there is often a sense of guilt or repentance (e.g., Judg. 19:3;

1 Sam. 1:13; 2 Sam. 19:7; 2 Chr. 30:22). Shechem endeavored to right a wrong and asked his father to request Dinah's hand in marriage (Gen. 34:4), initiating customary marriage negotiations. Consequently, the chapter contains a number of elaborate speeches designed to convince the opposing party.

It is unclear how Jacob heard the news, but it appeared to be public knowledge and thus brought shame upon his family. Jacob's role in this narrative was very passive—most of the talking was done by Shechem, Hamor, and the sons of Jacob. When the sons heard the news, they were disturbed and extremely angry because of the nebalah ("disgraceful," "senseless") act that Shechem had done (v. 7). The term 'atsav, which is one of the words used to describe the grief, shock, and anger of Jacob's sons, had been used earlier in Genesis to describe God's response to Noah's pre-Flood generation (6:6). Interestingly, decades later, Joseph's response to his brothers' speechlessness after he had disclosed his identity employed the same two terms (45:5). Nebalah is a serious term, appearing thirteen times in the OT, eight of which describe sexual crimes (cf. Deut. 22:21; Josh. 7:15; Judg. 20:6, 10; 2 Sam. 13:12, etc.).

The invitation to unite in marriages with the people of the city (v. 9) utilizes a technical term marking intermarriage, which was later forbidden in Mosaic law (Deut. 7:3). One of the key elements of marriage involved religious loyalties. While there were instances of Canaanites, Moabites, or others who married into Israel and became part of the covenant people (e.g., Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, etc.), intermarriage in general was forbidden by law (cf. Ezra 9–10; Neh. 13:23–29).

The negotiations with Shechem and Hamor were managed by Jacob's sons, who were deceptive in their dealings (Gen. 34:13). The theme of deceit and betrayal, so prevalent in Jacob's earlier story (27:35; 29:25), continued in the lives of his sons, who insisted on circumcision as a prerequisite for a marriage agreement (vv. 14–15). Jacob's sons "used" the covenant sign (17:9–14; cf. Ex. 12:43–49) and voided it of any spiritual implication. Jacob later disassociated himself completely from the two ringleaders of the massacre, Simeon and Levi (49:5–6).

Hamor and Shechem brought the proposal to the city gate (v. 20), the place of official deliberations and decisions (Gen. 19:1; 23:18; Ruth 4:1). Nowhere in their speech (34:21–23) did Hamor and Shechem explain the true reason for their request to circumcise the male population of the city. Instead, they emphasized the point that if they joined with Jacob's family, all of the patriarch's possessions (livestock, property, and animals) would be shared (or taken over; v. 23). Two cycles of deceit and duplicity are at work in this narrative. In response to their convincing counsel, every male was circumcised (v. 24).

Finally, Jacob spoke his mind (v. 30). He reproved his sons strongly. He said that their actions had made him ba'ash (lit. "to stink") sometimes translated here as "obnoxious." This refers metaphorically to behavior that leads to reprisal and revenge (Ex. 5:21; 1 Sam. 13:4; 2 Sam. 10:6). Jacob feared complete annihilation (v. 30; 2 Sam. 21:5). Jacob's fear was palpable, yet no reference to Dinah's painful experience is included. The lack of respect in the reply of Jacob's sons anticipated future conflict. "Our sister" instead of "your daughter" emphasizes deeper rifts in Jacob's family (v. 31). The final rhetorical question remains unanswered in the narrative and leaves the reader to genuinely speculate about Jacob, the state of his family, and the blessing he was meant to be.

35:1–29. Jacob Returns to Bethel. Following the tragic disaster at Shechem, God was on the move again. Spiritual revival and worship characterized Jacob's journey and arrival at Bethel. Finally, the patriarch could fulfill his vow.

This chapter begins with God's all-powerful voice and the command to return to Bethel. Jacob, unlike Abram (12:1–3), knew his direction and destination. God's directions were even more specific: Jacob was commanded to build an altar. An altar indicated worship and was a witness to others of Jacob's commitment and dedication to the Lord (12:7–8; 13:18; 22:9–10; 26:25).

Jacob's response reveals a need for spiritual renewal. First, he commanded his household to dispense with their foreign gods (v. 2). The imperative appears in similar revivals elsewhere in the OT (Josh. 24:14, 23; Judg. 10:16; 1 Sam. 7:3–4; 2 Chr. 33:15). The exact nature of the foreign gods is not further described. They may have included figurines, amulets, and the family teraphim that Rachel had stolen from Laban (Gen. 31:30–35). Together with the gods, the family gathered their earrings, and everything was hidden under a tree (35:4). The hiding or burying is not expressed by the regular verb denoting burial (qabar) but by the rare verb taman—possibly an indication of a descent into oblivion (cf. Job 3:16 and its reference to a miscarriage using the same verb). The gods whom Rachel had sat upon and allegedly tarnished with menstrual blood (31:30–35) were finally being discarded. Furthermore, Jacob ordered his household to purify themselves (v. 2). Purification required ritual activities and, together with the change of garments, was an important element of the priestly ordination ritual (Ex. 29:4–9; Lev. 8:6–9, 13). The cultic language of the passage suggests the notion that Jacob's household was to be a "priestly" household, prefiguring Exodus 19:6. Because Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had all been called to be God's special people, they were to be holy and mission-driven (cf. 1 Pet. 2:5–9).

As Jacob's household journeyed toward Bethel, the terror of God fell on the inhabitants of Canaan (Gen. 35:5), enabling Jacob to travel safely through an increasingly hostile environment (cf. Ex. 15:14–15). Luz was the ancient name of Bethel (v. 6; cf. 28:19). This update suggests some type of later contextualization of the biblical text in the earlier story of Abram (13:3), for in Abram's time, the city was still called Luz. The construction of the altar seems to have functioned as a symbol of the complete fulfillment of Jacob's vow—even though the text does not elaborate further.

Genesis 35:8 contains the surprising death of someone who had not appeared by name in the story before. Deborah, Rebekah's nurse (cf. 24:59), died at Bethel and was buried under the terebinth or oak tree (the definite article, "the," indicates that this was one of the landmarks of Bethel). Her presence may have been due to Rebekah's absence. Genesis does not provide a death notice for Rebekah.

The next section (35:9–15) affirms Jacob's name change (cf. 32:28) and blessing. The mention of God having appeared to Jacob (35:9) reminds the reader that God is never far off. This covenant renewal is a powerful reminder of God's presence and care in the face of death.

The notice of the departure from Bethel (v. 16) is surprising—especially in view of the fact that Jacob's favorite wife, Rachel, was pregnant and at the point of giving birth. However, what appeared to be another blessing, fulfilling the ideal family size of twelve sons, turned out to be an experience of grief and pain. Rachel died while giving birth to her second son, whom she named Ben-Oni, "son of my sorrow" (v. 18; cf. the irony of Rachel's clamor to Jacob in 30:1, that he should give her children or else she would die). Jacob renamed his son Benjamin, "son of the right hand." The text mentions Rachel's nepeš (see "Living Soul or Living Being?" on p. 145). In this case, it seems evident that the meaning is simply “life”—her life was ending (lit. “going out”). This is an illustrative description of Rachel’s death rather than evidence that her eternal “soul” was returning to heaven (as some have claimed). There is no evidence in Scripture for the idea of an eternal, conscious entity that survives the death of the body. The explanatory note in v. 19 clarifies the statement in 35:18. Rachel was buried in Bethlehem, about 15 miles (24 km) south of Bethel. Another pillar marked this significant place (v. 20).

Signs of further fragmentation and disunity in the family soon followed. Reuben had sex with Bilhah, his father’s concubine (v. 22). Bilhah, the maidservant of Rachel and the mother of Dan and Naphtali, after having lost Rachel’s protection, represented a prized target for power-hungry Reuben. His disturbing action (one that rabbinical traditions considered offensive enough to prohibit its translation in the synagogue) was meant to assert his leadership over the clan and establish his rights as the firstborn. This anticipated Absalom’s later similar act (2 Sam. 16:22; cf. 2 Sam. 3:7; 1 Kin. 2:22). As one of Leah’s sons, Reuben may have also detested Jacob’s disdain for his mother Leah. Similar to the Dinah incident, Jacob heard about what Reuben had done but did not do anything (Gen. 35:22). The text gives the impression of an old and broken man, unable or unwilling to discipline or even engage with his family. The moral fiber of Jacob’s clan became increasingly brittle.

The brief notice of Isaac’s death concludes the stories of Isaac and Jacob (vv. 27–29). Isaac died at the age of 180 years. Esau and Jacob (listed in the order of their birth; 35:29) buried him. Similar to Isaac and Ishmael at the grave of Abraham (25:9), the brothers were united by the death of their father.

36:1–43. The Family of Esau. The genealogy of Esau demonstrates that God had fulfilled His promise of making Abraham the father of many nations (17:5–6, 16). Similar to the manner in which the account of Ishmael’s descendants separated the family histories of Abraham and Isaac (25:12–18), this description of Esau’s line acts as an interjection between Jacob’s family story and Joseph’s, which resumes in chapter 37.

The lists contain seventy personal names and mark an overall sociopolitical movement from extended family (vv. 1–8), to tribal organization (vv. 15–19), and ultimately to a monarchy (vv.

31–39)—a description that anticipates Israel’s own historical development. The record opens with a list of Esau’s wives, including his two Canaanite wives, Adah and Aholibamah, plus Basemath, the daughter of Ishmael. When compared to the earlier references to Esau’s wives (26:34; 28:6–9), there is only one name, Basemath, that appears in all references, even though in 26:34, Basemath is the daughter of Elon the Hittite while in 36:3 she is the daughter of Ishmael. All three references agree that the first two wives were Canaanite (or Hittite/Hivite) while the third wife was more closely related, a daughter of Ishmael. There is no easy solution to this puzzle. The apparent mix-up in names may have been due to problems in the textual transmission, even though there is little indication of that. Perhaps the wives had more than one name.

Woven among the names of Esau’s wives are the names of his five sons. The author of Genesis includes this information purposefully in this location as a contrast to the listing of Jacob’s twelve sons by two wives and two concubines (35:22b–26) that anticipates the notice of Isaac’s death. Children illustrate numerically the blessings and the promise of the covenant.

Esau’s decision to move out of the promised land was likely motivated by an abundance of (divine) blessings. Their possessions (referring to Jacob’s and Esau’s clans) were too numerous (36:7) for the land to sustain them both. Unlike the situation described in Genesis 28, Jacob and Esau’s separation did not involve hostilities or conflict. The land simply “could not support them.” The final clause of this section, which equates Esau with Edom, is programmatic; it links Edom to Mount Seir (Deut. 2:4–6, 12, 22; Josh. 24:4), and it thus reminds the reader of postpatriarchal geopolitical realities. Esau is more precisely characterized as the father of the Edomites (36:9). “Father” can also be understood as “ancestor” (Ex. 13:5; Deut. 26:5; Josh. 24:3; etc.). Esau’s grandchildren (from only two sons, Eliphaz and Reuel) were ten in number, including Amalek, the son of Eliphaz’s concubine Timna (36:12). The Amalekites later became bitter enemies of Israel (Ex. 17:8–16) and became a distinct people separate from the Edomites (Deut. 25:17–19).

The next section (Gen. 36:15–19) names the chiefs of the sons of Edom. The Hebrew term can also be translated as “clans,” but “chief” appears to be the better translation here as the reference is to tribal units identified by their leader.

Verse 19 underlines the important links between Esau's sons and Edom's sociopolitical structure.

The following section (vv. 20–30) records the sons of Seir, the Horite. According to Deuteronomy 2:12 and 22, the Horites (perhaps Hurrians?) were the original inhabitants of the hill country of Seir but were later dispossessed by Esau's descendants. Their inclusion in the list provides a snapshot of the populations that Esau's family encountered. While Deuteronomy 2:12 and 22 suggest that Esau's descendants destroyed the Horites, some names in the list also appear as spouses or in-laws of Esau's family (including Anah [v. 20, 25; cf. vv. 2, 14], Timna [v. 22, cf. v. 12], Aholibamah [v. 25, cf. v. 2]). This suggests that the Horites were absorbed into Esau's family line. As with other genealogies in Genesis, sometimes a noteworthy event or an accomplishment of an individual is included. Genesis 36:24 includes such a note for Anah, who was possibly a father-in-law of Esau (cf. vv. 2, 14). Some translations describe him as the one who found water in the wilderness. The translation of the Hebrew word yemim is uncertain. The Latin Vulgate reads "hot springs," which is followed by some translations. One of the targums (Pseudo Jonathan) suggests that "mules" is the correct meaning, and this rendering is followed by some other translations.

The next section lists the kings of Edom (vv. 31–39). Eight kings are listed in the linear sequence of Edomite kings before there were any kings in Israel (v. 31). Some kings are associated with specific cities while others are mentioned in connection with specific events. Hadad is reported to have struck down Midian in the field of Moab (v. 35). Hadad is the name of the Semitic storm god who is also identified with Baal. The chapter concludes with another list of chiefs, cataloging eleven names, seven of which appear for the first time. The exact relationship to the first list of chiefs or clans (vv. 15–19) is not clear. It may be that the latter list represented later chiefs of Edom, some of which used names already employed by their predecessors. The final line of v. 43 forms a frame with v. 9 that brackets the genealogies proper of Genesis 36.

37:1—50:26

Joseph's Story

The final section of Genesis, introduced by another toledot (see Introduction), focuses on Joseph, Jacob's first son by Rachel. It revisits many themes from earlier patriarchal history (including sibling rivalry, famine and survival, deceit, divine blessings, etc.), yet it concludes in a different location. While Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob all returned to Canaan toward the ends of their lives, Joseph and his family died in Egypt. Thus, Joseph's story anchors the Exodus narrative many centuries later.

37:1–36. Joseph's Dreams and Slavery.

Joseph's story is not told in isolation. As Jacob's son, he was only one of twelve, yet his life affected his entire family—and beyond. Like many patriarchal narratives, Joseph's story begins with a dream, followed by much trouble. Throughout the narrative, Joseph experiences divine silence but not divine absence. God works behind the scenes in the flow of the narrative and in the heart of the protagonist of the story, preparing a great deliverance.

The characterization of seventeen-year-old Joseph is nuanced: Joseph worked as a shepherd alongside his half brothers, yet he was apparently no team player since he brought Jacob a "bad report" about them. The phrase "Israel loved Joseph" (v. 3) anticipates the undercurrent of envy and hatred in the family. Considering the divided household of Isaac, Israel should have remembered the disastrous effects of having a favorite child. Instead, he made Joseph a tunic of many colors. Israel's skills as a tailor may have pointed back to the depiction of him in 25:27 as one who lived in tents. The Hebrew term for Joseph's robe is puzzling, and its translation is based on ancient versions. Egyptian contemporary tomb paintings of Beni Hassan (dated to the nineteenth century B.C.) show Semitic merchants doing business with Egyptians and wearing multi-colored wraparound knee-length tunics. Clothing signaled status and played a major role in Joseph's story (37:3, 23; 39:12; 41:14, 42). The reaction of Joseph's brothers to his preferential treatment is candidly described by the author—they hated him and could not speak to him peacefully or kindly (37:4). Hebrew grammar allows for two interpretations of the object of their hatred, with "him" referring to either Jacob or Joseph. Most likely, the brothers hated both and treated them accordingly. Yet more hatred was to come (vv. 5, 8).

Joseph was not only the favorite. He was also a dreamer. Up to this point in Genesis, God has been the source of all dreams. While v. 5 does not explicitly specify God as the dream-giver, this is silently assumed since dreams were considered to be messages from the gods in the ANE. The term translated “bowed” (v. 7) reappears significantly in 42:6 when the brothers bowed to the Egyptian governor they did not recognize as their brother Joseph. Jacob recognized the potential explosiveness of the reversal of social order (v. 10), yet he kept this dream in mind as a revelation of Joseph’s future (cf. Luke 2:19; 51).

Pastoral serenity is suggested at the opening of the next scene. Joseph’s brothers went to feed the family’s flock in Shechem (v. 12). The location is an ominous harbinger of disaster to readers of Genesis (cf. Gen. 34). However, the brothers had moved from Shechem to Dothan, about 13 miles (21 km) northwest of Shechem. All in all, Joseph traveled 65 miles (104 km) from Hebron to find his brothers. The reader may wonder why they had pastured the animals so far from the family home. Distance and location in Genesis are often used to indicate proximity to divine blessings—Joseph’s brothers surely were keeping their distance. The appearance of Joseph in the distance triggered an evil scheme in the minds of the brothers, and they nakal, “plotted” or “conspired,” to kill him (v. 18). The Hebrew term appears only three more times in the OT and marks deceitful action (Num. 25:18; Ps. 105:25; Mal. 1:14). The description of Joseph as a dreamer (lit. “the lord of dreams”) was a sarcastic one (v. 19). The plan to kill their brother was a collective decision (v. 20). However, Reuben, Jacob’s firstborn, intervened to rescue him (v. 21). The language of deliverance used here (natsal) is often linked to divine intervention (Ex. 18:4, 8; 1 Sam. 26:24), yet Reuben’s impotence soon became apparent (Gen. 37:26–28).

Joseph was stripped of his robe, the symbol of his preferred status and then thrown into a bor (“pit” or “cistern”), which was most likely a dry well that had been dug to collect rainwater for use during the dry season (vv. 23–24). The callous nature of Joseph’s brothers became evident when they sat down to eat a meal while Joseph was left terrified in the pit nearby. Next, a caravan of Ishmaelites appeared on the scene (v. 25). Ishmaelites and Midianites (v. 28) were related to Abraham (Midianites through Keturah [25:1–2]; Ishmaelites through Hagar). Joseph was sold for twenty shekels (v. 28), which seems to have been a traditional price for a slave (cf. Lev. 27:5).

The final scene returns the focus to Joseph’s garment, which was presented as evidence of his death to Jacob (Gen. 37:31–35). Meanwhile, unbeknown to Jacob, Joseph had been sold in Egypt by the Midianites to Potiphar, a high official at Pharaoh’s court. The name Potiphar means “he whom Ra has given” and is one that is known from Egyptian texts.

38:1–30. Judah and Tamar. The phrase “at that time” (38:1) locates the chapter within the Joseph narrative even though it does not provide clear chronological information. Judah’s departure from his family recalls Eve’s separation from Adam and Lot’s move toward the lush plain of the Jordan (13:11). Judah saw a certain Canaanite woman and married (lit. “took”) her, against all previous counsel (24:3; 26:35; 27:46). This same verbal sequence was used earlier to describe action in opposition to God’s guidance (3:6; 6:2; 12:15; 34:2). Shua conceived three times, and she and Judah had three sons. Judah took Tamar as a wife for his firstborn, Er (v. 6). The biblical text does not provide further information as to Er’s wickedness, yet the divine judgment is immediate; the Lord killed Er (v. 7). This is the first reference to God putting an individual to death (cf. v. 10).

After Judah’s second son was struck down by God, Judah refused to give Tamar his third son to be her husband. When Judah’s wife died, he had sexual relations with Tamar (although he did not know it was her). Three months after the sexual encounter, Judah was told that Tamar was pregnant by means of prostitution (v. 24). Later law required adulterers to be put to death (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:22). The Mosaic law prescribed public stoning for some sexual sins (Deut. 22:21, 24) while other crimes were punishable by burning (Lev. 20:14; 21:9). Some scholars consider the sentence for adultery a two-level procedure, according to which the involved parties were first stoned and then burned.

The dialogue between Tamar and Judah focused upon the pledge items (sources of identification) that Judah had left with the supposed prostitute. Judah admitted that Tamar was more in the right than he was (v. 26). Judah’s relative righteousness contrasted with God’s absolute righteousness (cf. Jer. 33:15; Rom. 3:25–26). The focus of the chapter is on what motivated Tamar—the fulfillment of the Levirate law—rather than on her actions. Levirate marriage required the brother of a deceased Israelite to produce a son with the widow of the deceased brother (Deut. 25:5–10) in order to assure an heir and the future of that family line. The practice is also known from Hittite and Middle Assyrian laws, the main difference being that in biblical law, the brother-in-law was responsible for providing an heir. Tamar, a Canaanite woman, became part of the messianic line (Ruth 4:12, 18–22; Matt. 1:3–6). The birth of male twins (Gen. 38:27–30) compensated Tamar for her forced barrenness (cf. 25:22–26).

39:1–23. Joseph in Potiphar's House. Giving a glimpse of divine righteousness in a surprising way, 39:1 picks up the story line from 37:36. Joseph had arrived in Egypt and had been sold. The chapter reminds the reader that God is in control, and yet mountains and valleys are part of the Christian's daily journey with the Creator and Savior of the universe.

In spite of miserable circumstances, the Lord was with Joseph (39:2)—a statement that becomes the refrain of Joseph's story. Joseph undoubtedly felt alone many times in his suffering, but God was always close to him, as He is with all of those who suffer, to strengthen them. Tsalakh ("to prosper," "to be successful") is one of the key words in this story, and it is always connected to God's presence (vv. 2–3, 23). Potiphar is described as an officer of Pharaoh and captain of the guard (37:36; 39:1). The Hebrew term saris ("official" or "officer") appears over forty times in the OT and has been translated "eunuch," "court official," and "chamberlain" (1 Sam. 8:15; Is. 56:3–5; etc.). Clearly, in Potiphar's case, the classic sense of "eunuch" would not apply since he was married. Rather, he was a high official in Pharaoh's court. The second title, captain of the guard, is also a generic title that could be applied to a number of Egyptian offices.

Responding to Potiphar's trust, Joseph worked faithfully for him (39:4). The Hebrew term here denotes personal service instead of the generic word for a servant (Ex. 24:13; 1 Kin. 19:21). As the parallel texts suggest, this type of service involved grooming for leadership. Potiphar's household was blessed by the Lord because of Joseph (v. 5). The reference to blessing would serve to remind the reader of a key element of God's covenant with Abraham (12:3), as well as a key theme of Genesis. God blesses people in order for them to be a blessing to others (see v. 5).

God blessed Joseph with success and an attractive physical appearance (39:5–6). The words used to describe Joseph's handsome form are uniquely applied to a male here (cf. 1 Sam. 16:18). It is naturally assumed that this combination made him desirable to Potiphar's wife (39:7), although the text does not explicitly say this. The context of the story suggests that there was some evil power tempting Joseph to sin, not only against Potiphar but also, more importantly, against God. Had he fallen into temptation, the narrative would have taken an unexpected turn, and perhaps the story of Joseph would never have been written. Wrong decisions can alter one's life in radical ways.

Potiphar's wife's continual pressure for Joseph to lie with her demonstrates Joseph's absolute commitment to God's moral values, even under great temptation. The garment left behind as a sign of refusal was used by the woman to construct a story aimed at destroying the one who refused her (Gen. 39:11–19). Joseph had gone into the house to do his work—not to invite temptation (v. 11). Potiphar's wife caught him, described with a verb (tapas) implying violence (Deut. 9:17; 22:28; 1 Kin. 11:30). Upon the return of her husband, she accused Joseph of attempted sexual assault. Her reference to Joseph's ethnicity (Gen. 39:17) implied a racial slur, not only to inflame racial tensions but to defend herself from any accusation of sexually provoking this particular foreign man. Her implication was that her husband was ultimately responsible for this "travesty." This is only the second time in Genesis that a member of Abraham's family is described as Hebrew (14:13).

Potiphar's response was rapid. He threw Joseph into Pharaoh's prison (v. 20). Yet in spite

Joseph in Egypt

There are two main theories regarding the time period when Joseph was in Egypt. One suggests that he was in Egypt during the Middle Kingdom (approx. 20th–17th centuries B.C.) and the other that he was there during the Second Intermediate Period (approx. 17th–16th centuries B.C.), a difference of approximately two hundred years.

1. Origin of the Theories. The Middle Kingdom theory (hereafter, MK) exists primarily because the Masoretic version of Exodus 12:40 pushes the Joseph narrative back to that period. Most modern translations of the Bible reflect this in the text. The Second Intermediate Period theory (hereafter, 2IP) exists primarily because the Septuagint and Samaritan Pentateuch versions of Exodus 12:40 include time lived in Canaan before coming to Egypt. Most modern translations of the Bible include this option in the margin notes. Other chronological statements in the Bible (Ex. 6:14–25; 7:7; Gal. 3:16–17) seem to reflect this although there is debate on the issue.

2. Semitic People in Egypt. During the MK, a single ruler mostly controlled all of Egypt from the capital, first in the south at Thebes and later in the north near the Faiyum region at Itjtawy. During the 2IP, which followed the MK, more than one person claimed to be king, partly because armies of Semitic people invaded the land. Due to their more advanced weapon technology (compound bow, chariot, and battle-ax) and use of horses (apparently not in Egypt before this period), the Semitic people conquered the north and set up their capital at Avaris, while Egyptians ruled from the south at Thebes. The southern Egyptian rulers eventually pushed the northern Semitics out of Egypt, unifying the country in a new period call the New Kingdom (approx. 16th–11th centuries B.C.), which was the time of the Exodus.

3. Key Issues in the Debate. The two possible time periods during which Joseph may have resided in Egypt, according to these two theories, are about two hundred years apart. The two periods represent very different cultural realities in Egypt that affect one’s understanding of the story in a number of key areas.

A. Location of the Land of Goshen. Joseph stated that his family would live near to him (Gen. 45:10). It can be assumed that Joseph’s seat of authority was near the royal court. The MK theory puts that court in the south. The 2IP theory puts it in the north. If the land of Goshen is in the northeastern delta, as is generally believed, Joseph’s claim that they would be near to him can be interpreted to support either theory. “Near” could mean that his family was at least in the same country that he was, as opposed to still living in the Holy Land (MK), or it could mean literal geographic closeness to the royal court in the north (2IP).

B. Horses and Chariots. Joseph was given a chariot to ride in, and horses were part of the livestock exchanged for food (Gen. 41:43; 46:29; 47:17). The MK theory argues that these details were later editorial additions that were not actually part of the reality of the story but were added for other reasons or that archaeological evidence for horses is simply incomplete (MK). The 2IP theory argues that these details were actually part of the story and help to place it historically according to the available archaeological evidence.

C. Abominable Shepherds. Joseph instructed his brothers to tell Pharaoh that they were shepherds so he could put them in a part of Egypt removed from the rest of the Egyptian population because shepherds were abominable to Egyptians (46:34). Archaeologists have discovered that the ancient Egyptians were prejudiced against foreigners. However, there were Egyptians who owned flocks and herds (47:16–17; Ex. 9:1–7; 19–21). The MK theory argues that this statement by Joseph (46:34) means that foreign shepherds only were detested. The 2IP theory argues that there was a foreign ruling class Joseph’s brothers would have been prejudicially associated with that all owned flocks and herds (47:6), and thus Pharaoh would have understood their need for separation (2IP).

4. Further Elements in the Debate. Beyond these three main interpretive issues, the debate continues. Supporters of the MK theory point to Semitic names on papyri from the MK—a canal dug in the MK that today is called Bar Yoseph, suggesting a potential memory—and records of officials from the MK who helped people during times of famine.

Supporters of the 2IP theory point to the change in land ownership from the people in the MK to the king in the New Kingdom as evidence that something happened during the 2IP famine to facilitate the switch (possibly the events of Gen. 47:18–26); archaeological evidence of Semitic people moving in to the Wadi Tumilat (the area generally accepted to be the land of Goshen) during the 2IP and various statements in Scripture can be interpreted to mean that Semitic people were ruling at the time (Gen. 39:1, 7, 14; 40:1, 22; 42:8; 43:32; 44:5; 45:2).

The difference between the two theories (approximately two hundred years) affects one’s understanding of biblical chronology, particularly as it relates to interpreting other biblical statements about the length of time the Hebrews were in captivity (see “The Four-Hundred-Thirty-Year Sojourn,” p. 211).

of his anger (v. 19), one gets the impression that he actually wanted to get Joseph out of harm's way (i.e., out of his wife's way). Biblical (and Egyptian) law demanded that a convicted rapist should be executed (Deut. 22:23–27), particularly in a situation involving distinct social classes, such as those of Joseph and Potiphar's wife. As the captain of the guard, Potiphar still controlled Joseph's destiny (or so he may have thought). The fact that the keeper of the prison committed all prisoners into Joseph's care (Gen. 39:21–23) may ultimately suggest Potiphar's influence over the prison, which was also under his jurisdiction. Yet neither Potiphar nor any other person controlled Joseph's life. The Lord was with Joseph and showed him khesed ("mercy," "kindness," "covenant faithfulness"; v. 21). In the midst of injustice and persecution, God's presence lightens even the darkest prison cell.

40:1–23. Joseph Interprets the Dreams of Pharaoh's Servants. The next chapter opens to a different scene, detailing the positive and negative turns in Joseph's story. From slave to second-in-command of Potiphar's house to prisoner to right hand of the prison warden was a journey that required longsuffering and inner strength. Joseph's interpretation of the dreams of two high court officials opened the way for God to save not only Joseph and his family but also Egypt and its neighboring countries. The two officials placed in prison were to be served and attended to by Joseph (40:1–4). Both the chief butler (or cupbearer) and the chief baker would have been responsible for preparing Pharaoh's food and protecting him from poisoning. These positions formed part of the inner circle of ancient kings. The biblical text does not contain any indications as to the cause of Pharaoh's anger (v. 2). But their roles in relationship to food and the penalty for failure to protect the pharaoh suggest that they may have been charged with a crime related to the food of the king, even attempted murder.

Dreams and their interpretation, an important ingredient of Joseph's story, reappear at this point (cf. 37:5–11). Both high-ranking prisoners had dreams and shared them with Joseph, who, in turn, interpreted them. The question "Do not interpretations belong to God?" was in itself a polemic against the Egyptian methods of interpreting dreams. Joseph was stating that only God, his God, could provide accurate interpretations of dreams (41:16, 25, 28; Dan. 2:22, 28, 47). Following the retelling of the dreams by both officials, Joseph quickly offered their meaning. The biblical text does not specifically mention a time of prayer (as in Dan. 2:18). Joseph's admonition to the chief cupbearer to remember him (v. 14) indicated his confidence in the interpretation and represented the first expression of frustration on Joseph's part. Up to this point, Joseph had been quiet in the face of injustice and displayed a distinct character change from the self-important seventeen-year-old from Canaan (Gen. 37).

While the interpretation of the butler's dream promised restoration, the interpretation of the baker's dream suggested complete disaster. His execution was described in terms that an Egyptian would consider to indicate death without an afterlife, the worst that could happen to the baker. A brief summary statement (vv. 20–22) describes the fulfillment of the dreams and confirms Joseph's interpretation (on the importance of the third day, see 22:3–6). Egyptian sources provide no evidence for the celebration of the birthdays of pharaohs before the first millennium B.C. However, it may be possible that the "day of birth" refers to Pharaoh's ascension to the throne, a celebration that is evidenced in contemporary sources. In spite of the fact that the chief butler forgot Joseph (v. 23), God continued to work behind the scenes.

41:1–36. Joseph Interprets Pharaoh's Dreams. Two additional dreams marked the pivotal point of Joseph's life. Pharaoh's need for reliable interpretation required a capable interpreter. Joseph, long forgotten by the chief butler, was brought before Pharaoh and provided the interpretation of the two dreams. Joseph's unsolicited counsel paved the way for the great reversal. No prison, no chief butler, and no pharaoh could obstruct God's plans.

Pharaoh's two dreams disturbed the Egyptian king—particularly because no one could interpret them (v. 8; cf. Job 7:14; Dan 2:1, 3, 10; 4:5, 19). Unlike Nebuchadnezzar many centuries later, Pharaoh at least described his dreams to his magicians. Double dreams appear in other ANE contexts (e.g., Gilgamesh epic, Gudea of Lagash). This repetition heightened the importance of the dream's content. Pharaoh's dreams (Gen. 41:1–7) first involved seven healthy-looking, well-fed cows being devoured by seven ugly and gaunt cows. In the second dream, seven plump and ripe heads of grain were devoured by seven thin and scorched heads of grain. Pharaoh's dream was bizarre. Even in ancient Egypt, cows did not eat cows, and heads of grain did not devour other heads of grain.

In this dramatic moment, the chief butler remembered (cf. 40:14) his error (lit. “sins”) in forgetting Joseph, and he came to recall Joseph’s skill as a dream interpreter (41:9–13). The main point of his concise summary of chapter 40 is that Joseph’s interpretation came to pass just as he had said it would (41:13). From the butler’s perspective, Joseph was someone who truly knew the art and the science of dream interpretation.

Pharaoh’s reaction was quick and immediate: Joseph was brought into the royal presence after he had shaved and changed into clean clothing. Male Egyptians usually shaved their faces and sometimes also their heads while Asiatics (or Semites) wore beards. The implied washing, shaving, and clothing rites often marked the transition from one state to another (e.g., the sons of Aaron during the priestly ordination ritual [Lev. 8:6–13]). Joseph’s reply to Pharaoh’s question was bold, considering the fact that the pharaohs were considered gods (v. 16). Joseph’s denial that he could interpret dreams on his own was a clear indication of the divine source of Joseph’s capability (cf. 40:8; Dan. 2:27–28; 2 Cor. 3:5). Joseph averred that “God” would give the answer (v. 16), and thus he introduced the Egyptian ruler to ’elohim, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Joseph seems to have used a generic term for God in an effort to speak in a manner that Pharaoh could relate to. The story is an excellent blueprint for missiologically sound communication.

Following Pharaoh’s retelling of the two dreams (41:17–24), Joseph began his point-by-point interpretation with another statement of faith: he declared that in these dreams, God had shown Pharaoh what He was about to do (41:25). Pharaoh needed to know that his country was under the domain of Joseph’s God and part of a larger plan that involved Egypt’s survival through its connection to the covenant family. Both dreams communicated the same reality of seven years of plenty, followed by seven years of famine and hunger (41:25–32). In both dreams, the fat and plentiful were devoured by the lean and famished. The Nile flooded every year, depositing rich silt from upriver on the fields of Egypt. This natural fertilizer resulted in an excess of produce. However, if the annual Nile flooding was too high or too low, a famine was sure to follow. Too much water, and the rich silt would be washed downriver into the Mediterranean Sea. Too little, and the water carrying the silt would not reach the fields. It is not clear which was the case during this period.

Joseph’s unsolicited counsel was fronted by the particle ’atah, “now,” which is sometimes used to introduce a new idea or section (41:33–36). It is also often used in the OT to introduce the lesson of a story (cf. Is. 5:3, 5). Here the particle introduces the new ideas that Joseph would offer to Pharaoh. Confronted with the magicians’ inability to interpret the dreams, Pharaoh realized that he did not have a “discerning and wise man” (41:33; cf. Deut. 4:6; Prov. 10:13; 14:33; 16:21; Hos. 14:9). In order to face this extraordinary drought, Pharaoh needed someone whom he could trust.

41:37–57. Joseph’s Rise to Power. Joseph’s rise to power was unprecedented and functioned as an illustration of divine deliverance. Thirteen years after his arrival in Egypt (41:46), Joseph’s life had gone from slave to supervisor and from prisoner to second-in-command in Egypt. From a human standpoint, this was something that would have been unimaginable if the ruling class were made up of Egyptians. It is slightly more possible if they were also Semitic (i.e., the Hyksos), as Joseph was. Whichever group was then in power, God’s providence was advancing Joseph’s standing.

Joseph’s counsel (lit. “word”) was well received by Pharaoh and his court (v. 37). Pharaoh’s rhetorical question emphasized the presence of the spirit of God in Joseph (v. 38). Pharaoh’s observation recognized Joseph’s premise—that is, that he had not relied on his own intelligence to interpret Pharaoh’s dreams. The reference to Pharaoh’s house/palace (v. 40) marks the third “house” that Joseph supervised (Potiphar’s house, the prison, and then a palace). The exact nature of Joseph’s title has been debated, but it appears that it was not that of vizier. Perhaps Pharaoh created a new position—something that the court would undoubtedly be more tolerant of than the demotion of an existing official. That Joseph was set over the entire “land” of Egypt (v. 41) might serve to highlight the agricultural focus of Joseph’s service. A signet ring, new clothing, a gold chain, and the right to ride in the second chariot (see “Joseph in Egypt,” p. 183) all functioned as markers of Joseph’s new status (vv. 42–43). It was common in the ANE to have servants precede a dignitary to draw attention to his presence (cf. 2 Sam. 15:1; 1 Kin. 1:5; Esth. 6:9). The term abrek (v. 43) is a rare Hebrew term that may be related to an Egyptian term indicating homage, and it is translated variously as “bow the knee,” “make way” or “attention.” A name change indicated authority and also a new identity (Dan 1:7). Joseph used this Egyptian name, but the available evidence in Genesis points toward his retention of his faith in God.

The seven years of plenty were also reflected in Joseph's personal life (Gen. 41:46–52): he married the daughter of an influential official and had two sons. The high priest of On (Heliopolis in Greek and Iunu in Egyptian, the cult center for the worship of Ra) held the title "Greatest of Seers." Together with Memphis and Thebes, On was one of the most revered cities of ancient Egypt. While previous children had been named by the family matriarchs, Joseph named his boys himself (vv. 51–52). That Joseph was fruitful (v. 52) marked God's partial fulfillment of His promise to the patriarchs (17:6, 20; 28:3). The text does not indicate whether Joseph influenced his wife to become a believer in Yahweh, but given Joseph's overall faithfulness to God, it is possible.

According to schedule, the years of plenty ended (41:53). The divine prediction, given to the pharaoh in a dream and interpreted by Joseph, was finally fulfilled, but Egypt had an abundance of food, thanks to the wisdom God had given to His servant. The stage was set for the encounter with Joseph's brothers.

42:1–38. Jacob's Sons Buy Grain in Egypt.

After the great bounty followed the great hunger. Jacob's sons came to Egypt in search of food and, without recognizing him, encountered their brother Joseph. The chapter describes people in transition and their relationships to one another.

This is the first appearance of Jacob following the loss of Joseph. Though old and bereaved, Jacob was still the head of his household. He discovered (lit. "saw," 42:1, and "heard," v. 2) that Egypt had grain and ordered his sons to go down to buy food in order to assure the family's survival. The last part of v. 1 contains a perplexing phrase. Most translations read something like, "Why are you looking at each other?" The root ra'ah, "to see," is well known; however, the verbal form used here means elsewhere "to meet in combat" or "face one another in battle" (2 Kin. 14:8, 11; 2 Chr. 25:17, 21). The author may have used the phrase to highlight the continued strife in Jacob's household. Jacob sent only ten brothers and kept Benjamin at home.

Joseph's introduction as governor (v. 6) explains why the brothers bowed down to him (in partial fulfillment of 37:7–10). The Hebrew term shallit, which is usually translated as "governor," is very rare and may reflect the author's challenge to find an appropriate Hebrew equivalent for Joseph's position in Egypt. Joseph pretended not to know them and spoke brusquely to the brothers (vv. 7, 30). Speaking through an interpreter in a different language (v. 23), the adult Joseph was in an unexpected position of power. He saw his brothers and recognized them immediately while they did not recognize him (cf. 37:32–33; see "Joseph in Egypt," p. 183). About twenty-one years had passed since they had sold him into slavery, when all of them had been in their late teens and early twenties. In their late thirties and early forties by this point, all had changed significantly. Joseph was dressed as an Egyptian leader speaking to them in the Egyptian language. Recognizing somebody or something is a key concept in this chapter (42:7–8). Joseph not only recognized his brothers. He also remembered the dreams God had given him about them (v. 9). He knowingly tested the moral fiber of the hapless brothers.

Joseph's charge that his brothers were spies (v. 9) was a serious accusation, but it provided the occasion for the brothers of Joseph to give him information he wanted about the family. The brothers were then put into prison for three days to await a final decision. On the third day, Joseph modified his plan: he would detain only one of the brothers, but they would be required to return with their youngest brother to demonstrate the truthfulness of their account. Joseph introduced an important element in the tense conversation. He mentioned that his fear of God (v. 18) was the rationale for his changed plan. Invoking God reassured his brothers and also introduced God into the conversation. The brothers then talked amongst themselves about their guilt; they imagined their current situation to be a punishment for their treatment of Joseph (v. 21). This realization was theologically significant because it highlighted a clear relationship between guilt (or sin) and punishment. Time had not taken away their guilt but had only amplified it.

Upon hearing their conversation, Joseph turned away and wept (v. 24). The brothers' confession of guilt moved him. The text did not provide an explicit rationale for the selection of Simeon (v. 24) as the hostage. However, since Reuben as the firstborn had sought to intervene on Joseph's behalf (v. 22), the second oldest son was to stand surety. Simeon had also been one of two leaders in the cruel revenge on the Shechemites (34:25; cf. 49:5–7).

On their return trip, the brothers found their payment (lit. "silver") in their grain sacks (42:25–28). This may have been a conscious nod to their earlier greed, selling Joseph for twenty shekels (in weight) of silver (37:28). Upon their arrival in Jacob's camp in Canaan, the brothers reported all that had happened to Jacob. His reaction revealed his pain, and he felt bereaved because he assumed that Joseph was dead and that Simeon might die too (or remain in prison), and he thus refused to allow Benjamin to be lost also (v. 36). His resolute rejection of the idea of Reuben's two sons (v. 37) or Benjamin going to Egypt was accompanied by the observation that Benjamin was the only one of Rachel's sons left (v. 38). It was not a secret in the family that Rachel was the favored wife and that hers were the favored sons. Jacob's family remained divided and in need of healing.

43:1–34. Benjamin Travels with His Brothers to Egypt. Facing an increasingly devastating drought, Jacob finally agreed to allow Benjamin to travel with his brothers to Egypt as their only chance of survival. In Egypt, Joseph's encounter with his brothers culminated in a feast. The extensive dialogues in this chapter form the backdrop to the coming final test of Joseph's brothers in chapter 44.

Surviving the severe (lit. "heavy") famine (cf. 41:56–57) in Canaan (i.e., the land) required a concerted effort. However, unlike his response in 42:1, Jacob was not proactive (cf. 43:10–11). He wavered. The dialogue between Judah and Jacob revisited the known facts (vv. 3–10): in order to demonstrate their integrity, the brothers could return to Egypt only with Benjamin in tow. Israel seems to have concluded that his sons had given information to the Egyptian man that he had not requested from them, namely, that they had another brother. In doing this, they had increased his fears. Judah clarified that the man specifically asked them whether they had another brother, making it impossible for them to hide the fact. Judah offered himself as surety (Gen. 43:9), willing to carry the blame. In this exchange, Judah revealed his deepening character transformation; his tribe would become prominent among Israel's sons (49:8–10) and would include the Messiah (Matt. 1:1–16; Luke 3:23–38).

Finally, Israel agreed to let Benjamin travel with his brothers to Egypt (vv. 11–14)—with a gift in hand (Heb. minkhah; cf. 32:13 and sidebar on 4:3–5). Judah referred to Benjamin as a na'ar (43:8). This word can encompass a whole range of ages, from a boy to a young man. Based on the internal chronology of Genesis, Benjamin must have been in his twenties since he was born prior to Joseph's trip to Egypt (Gen. 37) yet after the family dwelt in and fled from Shechem (Gen. 34–35; cf. 30:25–43; 31:41). Jacob sent the brothers with the prayer that 'el shaddai (17:1) would grant them mercy from the ruler of Egypt.

The "men" (not "the brothers" or "the sons") went to Egypt and appeared before Joseph (43:15). Joseph was most interested in the presence of his brother Benjamin, not the gift or the returned payment, and he ordered his steward to prepare a feast in his home (vv. 15–17). Joseph's brothers immediately recognized this as an abnormality and were afraid (v. 18); they decided to make a clean slate regarding the return of their payment (vv. 19–22). Unbeknownst to them, they had passed a character test. The Egyptian steward, a foreigner, ultimately affirmed the God of Jacob's sons: he said that God had given them "treasure" (v. 23; cf. Job 3:21; Prov. 2:4; Is. 45:3) in their sacks. The opening phrase is shalom lakem—"peace to you" (translated contextually in this verse variously as "be at ease," "it is alright," "rest assured," etc.). These Hebrew words are a typical Eastern greeting. The word shalom is another significant key word in this section (cf. its appearance in vv. 27–28) and implies more than the absence of war. Finally, Simeon was released to his brothers—all seemed well.

Verses 26–30 include an important dialogue between Joseph and his (unsuspecting) brothers after they had given him their gifts and bowed down (vv. 26, 28; cf. 37:7–10). Moved by the sight of Benjamin and the good news about his father's well-being, Joseph slipped out and wept (v. 30). The opening words of v. 30—that Joseph hurried away because kamar rakhamim—literally mean that his "compassion/mercy warmed" toward his brother. This phrase is used elsewhere to describe a mother's feeling for her dying child (1 Kin. 3:26), which demonstrates the deeply emotional nature of the interaction.

The seating arrangements at the meal included three groups: (1) the brothers, seated in their birth order; (2) Joseph seated alone; and (3) the Egyptians, who also ate by themselves. To eat with Hebrews was considered to be a to'ebah ("an abomination," "detestable," "loathsome"; v. 32; see "Joseph in Egypt," p. 183). This comment both anticipated the changed relationship between Hebrews and Egyptians in Exodus 1 and, at the same time, emphasized the fact that Israel would not be absorbed and integrated into Egyptian society. Benjamin's fivefold portion did not result in envy—the brothers thus passed another character test (v. 34).

44:1–34. Joseph's Cup and Judah's Intervention. Prior to reconciliation, there is conflict. Crises bring out the best (and the worst) in people—as exemplified in Genesis 44. Judah's transformation was illustrated in his speech and represented the change in the characters of Joseph's brothers.

The idyllic meal concluded with the ultimate test of genuineness: Joseph's silver cup. The Hebrew term suggests a large vessel; there is another word for a smaller "cup" (Ex. 25:31, 33–34). In Mesopotamia, divination was performed by observing liquids being mixed in a large cup (e.g., oil poured into water or milk is one example from Mesopotamian sources; cf. Lev. 19:26; Deut. 18:10 for the biblical prohibition of divination). In Egypt, gods were consulted in other ways. Divination by cup is not indicated in the archaeological record in Egypt, but this does not exclude its practice. It would seem unlikely that Joseph actually practiced divination, but the cup may have been designed for that purpose, even if Joseph did not use it in this way.

Judah's increasing preeminence among the brothers is highlighted in 44:14, where he is mentioned first in the list. The description of the brothers' prostration before Joseph employs a stronger term (napal) than the one used in 43:26, one that expresses complete submission. Joseph's rhetorical question in 44:15 highlighted the hopelessness of the situation for Jacob's sons: they were foreigners without any rights caught stealing the divination cup of the second-in-command of Egypt. Judah's response included an acknowledgment of their desperate situation, leading to a theologically important moment in the Joseph narrative: Judah declared that God had disclosed their guilt (v. 16). It is possible that this comment points to an admission of earlier guilt. Judah's recognition underlined the biblical notion that sin is foremost an affront to God (Is. 59:2), as Joseph's earlier reply to Potiphar's wife indicated (39:9). Both Judah and Joseph had reached the same point independently in moments of crisis. Judah's offer of collective slavery was rejected by Joseph (44:17), using oath language (cf. v. 7).

Judah's speech not only effectively communicated the grief and mourning of the father but also represented a high point in the transformation of Judah himself from a selfish man into one who was ready to take the place of another in suffering.

45:1–28. Joseph's Encounters in Egypt. Reconciliation and forgiveness are the key words of this chapter. Joseph's self-disclosure created tension and fear in his brothers that was ultimately alleviated by locating everything within the greater picture of God's actions (often behind the scenes of history) for His covenant people.

The tension that had built up in the Joseph narrative was about to be released. Genesis 45 is the theological center of the story. Following Judah's moving speech, Joseph could no longer contain himself (v. 1). While he had been able to show restraint in 43:31, this time he was unable to do so. Once the Egyptian attendants had been ushered out, it was time to make himself known to his brothers. Men become brothers when grace and mercy are extended (cf. 44:1, 3). Joseph's weeping (cf. 42:24; 43:30) was heard even by Pharaoh's household (45:2; see "Joseph in Egypt," p. 183)—a significant detail picked up in v. 16, anticipating the official resolution involving the settlement of Jacob's family.

The shocking and staccato "I am Joseph" (a nominal sentence lit. translated "I Joseph") was followed by the seemingly superfluous question about whether Jacob was still alive (v. 3; cf. 43:27–28; 44:18–34). "Your father" (43:27) becomes "my father." However, his brothers could not answer him, for they were quite fearful. Joseph's second self-disclosure contained the apposition "your brother" (Gen. 45:4) as well as the one piece of information (that he had been "sold into Egypt") that only his brothers would have known.

"God sent me" (v. 5), a phrase expressed three times in varied forms, represents the theological center of Joseph's story (vv. 7, 8; cf. 50:19–21; Acts 7:9–10). The term shalakh, "sent," is used to describe somebody sent on a specific mission (Gen. 28:5; Deut. 34:11; Neh. 6:5; Jer. 19:14). It speaks in a unique way about divine providence in the life of His servants. They may not hear His voice, but He is constantly present, leading them in His wisdom according to what is best for them. Joseph's ability to provide a safe haven for God's covenant people for the remaining five years of severe famine (v. 6) was part of God's design.

Joseph's next imperatives in v. 9 emphasized both his longing as well as the seriousness of the situation. Joseph's affirmation that it was God who had made him lord of Egypt (v. 9) reminded the brothers, and reminds the reader, of the God of history who was and is active in the affairs of this planet. Similar to the earlier detailed instruction to the steward (44:4–5), Joseph sent a very specific message to his father (45:9). After his speech, Joseph embraced his brothers and kissed them—two important activities expressing love and concern in Eastern cultures. Only then did his brothers converse with him (v. 15).

Once Pharaoh heard the report (lit. the “sound” or “voice”) concerning the presence of Joseph’s brothers in Egypt, he supported Joseph’s plans (vv. 16–20). The “fat [kheleb] of the land” (cf. Is. 1:19) metaphorically describes the ideal conditions of the richness of the land (kheleb is often used to describe the best produce or animals; cf. Num. 18:12; Deut. 32:14). Carts (Gen. 45:19) refer most likely to wagons used for transporting goods and drawn by oxen. The reference to clothing (v. 22) completes the transformation of Joseph’s brothers and links this section to the opening of the Joseph story. Benjamin’s five garments, as well as the three hundred shekels in weight of silver that Joseph gave him, apparently did not generate the same jealous response from the brothers as the robe of many colors (37:3) so many years before. The final instruction in v. 24 from Joseph was to not ragaz. This has been variously translated as “become troubled,” “quarrel,” “worry,” or “be angry.” This is the only occurrence of the verb in Genesis. Elsewhere, its more literal meaning involves shaking—in fear (Ex. 15:14) or in rage (Prov. 29:9). The final verses of the chapter mark a wonderful contrast to the two previous returns of Jacob’s sons, which had caused grief and heartache (37:33–35; 42:36–38). Jacob’s reaction is described in terms of physical phenomena. Verse 26 reads literally that “his heart became numb,” and v. 27 refers to his spirit (ruakh, the same word for “breath”) being revived. The final words of the story are Jacob’s. The transformation of Joseph’s brothers was significant: their first word to their father was concerning Joseph (and not about the gifts, invitation, etc.).

46:1—47:12. Jacob and His Family Move to Egypt. This account of Jacob’s journey to Egypt also includes a detailed listing of the names of his male descendants who accompanied him to Goshen. Before initiating the travel to Egypt, sacrifices were offered, and God’s voice was heard again. In a night vision (v. 2; 15:5, 12; 20:6; 26:24; 28:12; etc.), God addressed the patriarch using his original name. The usage of the two names Israel and Jacob in this section reminds the reader of the weakness of human design as well as God’s power to transform a situation. The Lord’s declaration, “I am God” (46:3), provided Jacob with the credentials needed to assure him that God’s divine presence would accompany the family to Egypt. The imagery here is of a bodyguard guaranteeing protection and the fulfillment of earlier promises. The prediction that Joseph’s hand would be on his father’s eyes (v. 4) was a divine promise of a peaceful death.

Following divine encouragement, there was human engagement. Jacob left Beersheba and, together with the entire family, was carried in the carts to Egypt (vv. 5–7). The mention of Jacob’s daughters (v. 7) in the list of people going to Egypt suggests that Jacob had more than one daughter (besides Dinah). The migration of Jacob’s household included all his descendants.

Verses 8–27 list the names of Jacob’s offspring up to the third generation, thus identifying all who went into Egypt. The mention of the children of Israel (lit. “sons of Israel”; v. 8) anticipates Exodus 1:7, where the people had grown into a nation whose size threatened Egypt. Leah’s children and grandchildren are listed first (vv. 8–15), followed by Zilpah’s (vv. 16–18), Rachel’s (vv. 19–22), and finally Bilhah’s (vv. 23–25). Ohad, a son of Simeon, is not included in the lists of Num. 26:12 and 1 Chr. 4:24—it is possible that he died without leaving any descendants. In the list of Judah’s offspring, Er and Onan are still included (Gen. 46:12) even though they had already died in Canaan (38:6–10; 46:12). The final two verses of this section include relative and grand totals (vv. 26–27). In total, sixty-six descendants (two of them female) born to Jacob and his sons traveled to Egypt. Seventy (Ex. 1:5) represents the grand total, which includes the three living mothers and Jacob himself. Stephen in Acts (Acts 7:14) stated that the total was seventy-five, which may reflect the Septuagint, which has that number both here and in Exodus 1:5. Joseph and his two sons were not counted in the seventy but may have been counted in the seventy-five. The remaining two could be the two sons of Judah who had died (Gen. 46:12). The Septuagint in 46:20, 27 speaks about other sons of Joseph, who could have been added to the list in the Hebrew text to reach the number seventy.

The final section, describing the emotional encounter between father and long-lost son, as well as the presentation of the members of Joseph’s family before Pharaoh, concludes most of the action in Joseph’s story (46:28—47:12). Joseph took his chariot to meet his father, Israel (see the Excursus “Joseph in Egypt,” p. 183), which marked his high status. Father and son embraced, and Joseph wept on his father’s neck (46:29). Joseph’s repeated reference to the historic occupation of his family captured the Egyptian distrust of Semitic seminomadic people (46:34). The benefit of a clear separation between Jacob's family and the Egyptians was twofold: first, by maintaining their distinct lifestyle and expertise, Israel would remain a foreign people group (cf. Gen. 15:13; 17:8; Deut. 10:19; 26:5; Ps. 105:23) and would not assimilate into the Egyptian culture; second, it would help Israel remember the divine promises involving Canaan. Egypt was not their land.

Joseph presented five (unnamed) brothers as well as his father to Pharaoh (Gen. 47:1–10). He particularly emphasized the fact that they had arrived with their flocks and their herds (v. 1) and had moved to Goshen (cf. 45:10; 46:34). Pharaoh's first question involved the occupation of the brothers (47:3). The brothers' reply, that they were shepherds, was different from the description that Joseph had suggested (46:34)—that is, that they worked with livestock. They used the exact term that had earlier been identified as abhorrent to the Egyptians. Pharaoh told them that the land of Egypt was before them (47:6). This represented an open invitation to choose the land that was best suited for the needs of Joseph's family. Pharaoh's search for competent men for his livestock (see "Joseph in Egypt," p. 183) was another open door and offered Joseph's brothers legal protection. Pharaoh's hospitality was based on his high regard for Joseph. Finally, Jacob was brought before Pharaoh, who showed great respect to the aged man, who was, at this point, 130 years old. Jacob blessed Pharaoh. Jacob's reference to his "pilgrimage" made use of the same Hebrew root that marks sojourning as a foreigner (e.g., 12:10; 47:4). Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph were all foreigners and pilgrims waiting to see the fulfillment of God's promises (cf. Heb. 11:8–16). The summary clause of this section describes how Joseph provided his family with property, or a possession (a legal title to a piece of ground; v. 11). God had promised Abraham possession of Canaan (17:8). The inclusion of the name of the land of Rameses (v. 11) as another term for Goshen occurs only here (when they arrived in the land) and in Exodus 12:37 (when they left). In Exodus 1:11, the Hebrews built a supply city with a similar name. In Hebrew, the spelling of the name of the supply city (Ex. 1:11) is different than the spelling of the name of the land (Gen. 47:11; Ex. 12:37), and they were certainly not in the same location. Jacob and his family did not live in the city that later generations of Hebrews built.

47:13–26. Joseph's Wise Administration of the Famine. From Goshen's relative safety and comfort, the reader's view is directed to the larger picture of the massive famine. Joseph's astute management made it possible for the Egyptians to use their silver (vv. 13–14), their herds (vv. 15–17), and their land rights (vv. 18–26) to buy back the grain they had been required to pay as a tax during the years of plenty. Horses are mentioned (v. 17) as one type of animal that Joseph was willing to trade for food. The archaeological record does not indicate that horses were in Egypt before the Second Intermediate Period (17th to 16th centuries B.C.), when they appeared in burials. After this (in the New Kingdom [16th to 11th centuries B.C.] and following), horses are represented in iconography with the Egyptian military and as a status symbol for kings. The horse was associated with nobility, so this indicates that even those of status were in need of food.

There are two possible ways of translating Genesis 47:21. The Hebrew text reads, "He removed them to the cities," perhaps meaning that Joseph reorganized the population, probably temporarily, according to the cities in which the grain was stored. The Septuagint and the Samaritan Pentateuch read, "He made them slaves," meaning that the people were indebted to or working for the pharaoh. The difference can be explained by a scribal error confusing two Hebrew consonants that look very much alike.

The tax exemption of the powerful Egyptian priestly class (v. 22) highlighted their importance and corresponded to known periods from Egyptian history where the Egyptian crown did not tax priestly estates (the most famous is recorded on the Rosetta Stone from the Ptolemaic Period). The 20 percent tax rate on the produce of the land was the same during the famine as it had been during the years of plenty (v. 24; cf. 41:34). Joseph readily acknowledged "buying" both the people and their land (v. 23). Thus, despite the huge economic shift away from private ownership by the people to ownership by the government, the people expressed gratitude to Joseph for saving their lives (47:25; cf. 45:7; 50:20). This highlighted the severity of the crisis and Joseph's effective management of it. Thus, the picture of the people becoming Pharaoh's slaves/servants must be understood in the framework of ancient societies: the patronage system provided protection and security in an interconnected world.

47:27–31. Jacob Prepares for His Death. A description of seventeen years of peaceful living in Egypt (47:28) is followed by Jacob's preparation for his death.

The description of Israel's growth (v. 27) utilizes creation language (Gen. 1:28; cf. notes on Ex. 1:7). The death of Jacob is mentioned several times and brings to an end the patriarchal narrative (47:28–31; 48:21–22; 49:29–32). This section functions as the introductory summary statement, prior to more detailed descriptions. Note the distinction between Israel, the people, (47:27) and Jacob, the patriarch (v. 28). God's promises had been fulfilled: Jacob had seen his family safely established in Egypt, and they were multiplying greatly (v. 27), which is later highlighted in the transition chapter of Exodus 1 (Ex. 1:7, 12, 20).

48:1–22. Jacob Blesses Joseph and His Sons.

The visit of Joseph and his two sons marks the beginning of the end. Jacob was settling his affairs and preparing for the important final blessings. A historic review is often part of rituals involving blessings or covenants.

Jacob's adoption of the two sons of Joseph was unexpected (v. 5). Reuben and Simeon, although mentioned, would lose their prominence among the descendants of Jacob (Gen. 49:3–7). Joseph, who was the firstborn of Jacob's favorite wife (although his eleventh son), received the double blessing of the birthright by the inclusion of his two sons. In the adoption process, children were placed upon or close to one's knees to symbolize giving birth. To remind all that Joseph was considered his firstborn and thus received the birthright, Jacob recalled the death of his beloved favorite wife Rachel.

"Who are these?" (48:8) was not only a question stemming from Jacob's poor eyesight but was also most likely an expression related to the adoption process. The practice may have required the verbal identification of those being adopted. Joseph's response was part of the official adoption ritual, leading to Jacob's blessing. The scene contains clear echoes of the earlier scene in which Jacob "stole" Esau's blessing from his father, Isaac (cf. Gen. 27). Common elements include an introductory question (27:18; 48:8), the reference to eye trouble (27:1; 48:10), and the embrace and kiss that is part of the blessing (27:27; 48:10). However, while Isaac had blessed Jacob unwittingly, Jacob's blessing was deliberate. Joseph's response to his father's blessing (he bowed down; v. 12) reflected his respect and love.

Jacob, contrary to Joseph's expectation, placed the right hand not on the firstborn but on Ephraim while Joseph himself received the blessing of his father as the firstborn of Rachel. The practice of assigning the blessing of the firstborn to the second son appears several times in Genesis and reveals God's freedom to elect whomever He wants according to His purpose. Jacob's blessing was prophetically significant. Ephraim did become more prominent than Manasseh. His tribe came to represent the whole northern kingdom (Is. 7:2, 5; Hos. 9:13). Jacob's blessing highlights two important divine characteristics. Because God had fed Jacob (using a verb associated with shepherding) and redeemed him, He would do the same for Joseph's two sons (vv. 15–16). The reference to redemption or deliverance is the first occurrence of this theologically important term (go'el), one which is used repeatedly to refer to God's redemptive activity (cf. Ruth 4:1, 6, 8; Ps. 71:4; Jer. 31:10–11).

Joseph reacted to Jacob's apparent error, and his attempt to correct the order was met by strong insistence. While Joseph was displeased, Jacob refused to surrender his prerogative and choice (48:17–20). Distinct from the Genesis 27 story, God's will is not specifically made clear in the narrative.

49:1–28. Jacob's Final Words to His Sons.

Jacob's last words are in the form of a testament to his sons written in poetry. It is prophetic in nature. See "The Sons of Jacob and His Final Blessing" (p. 193) for a summary of the most important facts of this testament.

Most of the testaments are comprised of one or two verses. However, the extent and content of Jacob's final words emphasized the importance of two sons in particular—Judah (vv. 8–12) and Joseph (vv. 22–26). While not the firstborn, Judah's character transformation, described in the previous chapters in the Joseph narrative, had prepared him for a more significant leadership role. This, combined with the fact that Reuben (Gen. 35:22; 49:3–4) and Simeon and Levi (Gen. 34:25, 30; 49:5) had all been found wanting, left Judah as the next in line. Although he made poor choices early in life (Gen. 37:26; 38:1–18), he allowed the Tamar incident (Gen. 38:24–26) to humble and transform him. Jesus's messianic title of "the Lion of the tribe of Judah" (Rev. 5:5) is based on this text and the fact that lions were symbols of kingship in the ANE. The scepter (shebet) of the first line of v. 10 is parallel to the mekhogueq (variously rendered as "lawgiver," "ruler's staff," "prince") in the second line of the verse. Overall, the text of 49:10 represents a challenge for translators, particularly the phrase mentioning Shiloh. Some render it as "until Shiloh comes."

Other suggested translations include “until he to whom it belongs shall come” or (based on a textual change) “until tribute comes to him.” The Hebrew term is the same as the place name Shiloh but seems to hint at a future powerful leader of Judah. The text is practically quoted in Ezekiel 21:27 to describe a Davidic King. The passage in Genesis announces the arrival of a future king from Judah and points beyond David to Christ as the true messianic King (see “Introduction to the Pentateuch,” p. 120).

The imagery of the even longer section describing the blessing of Joseph is varied and includes images denoting agricultural fertility (v. 22) and military prowess (vv. 23–24). The divine epithet ’abir, “mighty,” appears repeatedly in the OT (Ps. 132:2, 5; Is. 49:26; 60:16) and is followed by two additional metaphors: the Shepherd (cf. Gen. 48:15; Pss. 23:1; 80:1; Heb. 13:20) and the unique “Stone of Israel,” which is distinct from the more often used “Rock” (Heb. tsor) of Israel (Deut. 32:15, 18, 30–31). Jacob’s God had many characteristics and metaphorical names, but ultimately, He was the familiar God of his father (v. 25; cf. Gen. 49:25).

49:29—50:14. Jacob’s Death and Burial.

Following Jacob’s final words, this section describes Jacob’s death and internment in Canaan. The final scene recounting Jacob’s death echoes his final words of admonition regarding his burial place (cf. 47:29–30). Interestingly, this death scene is referred to in the list of faith heroes in Hebrews 11:21. Jacob’s expression of faith involved his blessings as well as his worship. He recognized that the land of God’s promise was not in Egypt but in Canaan. After he had finished instructing his sons, he drew his feet up and died. Breathing one’s last breath and being gathered to one’s people is a formulaic expression marking death in Genesis (cf. 25:8, 17; 35:29). Jacob's fetal-like position reflects Scripture's understanding of death as sleep (e.g., Pss. 6:5; 115:17; Eccl. 9:5; Dan. 12:2; John 11:11–13).

At Jacob's death, Joseph collapsed onto his father, wept over him, and kissed him (Gen. 50:1). The strength of the emotional bond between Joseph and his father is highlighted by the minimal role that Joseph's brothers played. They first appear in v. 8, describing the large procession that traveled to Canaan for Jacob's burial. Joseph's order to embalm his father (v. 2) reflected the high status of Joseph's family in Egyptian society. Jacob was treated as nobility. Ancient Egyptians believed that to have eternal life, one needed to retain the body, which is why they practiced mummification. In Jacob's case, embalming was required for his journey to his burial site in Canaan. The physicians (lit. "those who healed") needed forty days to complete their task (v. 3)—a time period that appears repeatedly in the OT (Gen. 7:17; Ex. 24:18; 34:28; Deut. 9:9; 1 Kin. 19:8). Following the forty days of embalming was a thirty-day period of mourning, for a total of seventy days. The nation of Israel, much later, grieved the deaths of Aaron and Moses for thirty days (Num. 20:29; Deut. 34:8). The mourning period would eventually involve only seven days (1 Sam. 31:13).

Authorized by Pharaoh, Joseph, his brothers, and a number of officials of Pharaoh traveled to Canaan to bury Jacob. He had requested to be placed in the tomb he had made for himself (v. 5). Joseph's unusual use of messengers when communicating with Pharaoh may have been a clear recognition of his state of impurity following his contact with a corpse (vv. 4–5; cf. similarly Esth. 4:2). The military presence (marked by the reference to chariots and horsemen in Gen. 50:9) was a harbinger of future events associated with the Exodus, using similar language (Ex. 14:9, 17–18, 23, 26, 28).

The seven days of mourning at the threshing floor of Atad (Gen. 50:10) is an example of an important Israelite ritual practice (e.g., Ex. 12:15; Lev. 13:4–5; 14:8) and is associated with mourning rites elsewhere in Scripture (1 Sam. 31:13; Job 2:13). The recognition of Jacob's burial party as Egyptian (Gen. 50:11) by the local Canaanites highlighted the adaptation of Joseph's family in Egypt and was a marker of irony, considering the opening verses of Exodus, describing a completely different reality. The Egyptian entourage and the fact that Jacob's sons were probably wearing Egyptian clothing would have led those looking at the mourning ritual from a distance to identify them as Egyptians. The location was renamed Abel Mizraim (lit. "mourning of Egypt"), which reechoed the grievous sorrow that Jacob had felt earlier over his loss of Joseph (37:35).

50:15–21. Joseph Assures His Brothers. The need for the assurance of Joseph's forgiveness highlights the challenge of true reconciliation. Seventeen years (Gen. 47:9, 28) after the emotional reunion between Joseph and his brothers, a lingering doubt remained. This illustrates the common struggle to accept God's grace, compassion, and pardon.

When the brothers twice reported to Joseph their father's plea that Joseph would forgive them (v. 17), Joseph reciprocated by twice encouraging his brothers not to be afraid (vv. 19, 21). Joseph had recognized God's involvement in his personal history, as well as the history of the people surrounding him (cf. 45:5–8). The full significance of Jacob's death weighed upon Joseph's brothers following their return to Egypt (50:15), and they projected malevolent motives on Joseph. Joseph's reaction reflected concern and empathy. He spoke kindly and reassuringly to them (50:21; lit. "he spoke to their hearts"; cf. 34:3); he had recognized their evil intent (50:20), but God had meant it for good. Genuine forgiveness toward others is grounded in God's forgiveness (Eph. 4:32).

50:22–26. Joseph's Death. Joseph's death set the stage for a new chapter in God's story. Israel's slavery and liberation from Egypt (Ex. 1) was not yet on the horizon, but Joseph's last words referring to Israel's return to Canaan represent the introduction to God's story of redemption.

There is a general decrease in the longevity of the patriarchs, culminating with Joseph at the end of Genesis. Joseph's age was considered the ideal age in Egyptian sources, but his decreased life span (when compared to his ancestors) underscores an important theme in Genesis: following the Fall, life on earth has been on a downward trajectory, moving further and further away from the Creator's ideal for humanity. Yet, God was on the move. Joseph said that God would surely paqad ("take care of," "come to aid"; lit. "visit") them (50:24–25). This word appears twice in Joseph's final statement and later reappears in a similar context in Exodus 3:16, 4:31, and 13:19. He also promised that God would bring them out of Egypt. The word here is a verbal form of 'alah, used forty-two times in the OT to describe Israel's rescue from Egypt; the phrase functions as an important bridge to God's future acts of salvation. God's oath (v. 24) suggested the assurance of the fulfillment of His promises. Similarly, the oath of Joseph's brothers to bring Joseph's bones back to Canaan (v. 25) would ultimately be fulfilled during the time of Joshua (Ex. 13:19; Josh. 24:32).

Genesis began with the fullness of life: human life to be enjoyed in fellowship with God. It closes with a corpse: the embalmed body of Joseph. The bones were a symbol not only of death but also of hope (Ezek. 37:11-14). In this case, their presence anticipated a journey to Canaan. The story was not finished. It would continue to unfold throughout the rest of Scripture and will lead to everlasting hope for those who wait for the heavenly Canaan.

EXODUS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The name “Exodus” derives from the LXX translation, abbreviated from a fuller title “The Exodus of the Children of Israel from Egypt” and adopted by the Latin Vulgate as “Exodus.” The original Hebrew name is we’elleh shemot, “and these are the names of” (or simply shemot, “names”), taken from the opening words of the Hebrew text, as was customary for the books of the Pentateuch.

The author is identified as Moses in several explicit statements where he was told by God to write certain things down in a scroll (sometimes translated as “book”) so they could be remembered (Ex. 17:14; 24:4; cf. 34:27). It is also stated that he read to the people from the covenant scroll (book) that he had written (24:7). The authorship by Moses is confirmed in later OT books where reference is made to the “law of Moses” (Josh. 8:31–32; 1 Kin. 2:3; 2 Kin. 14:6; 21:8; Ezra 6:18; Neh. 13:1; Dan. 9:11–13; Mal. 4:4). In the NT, Jesus specifically referred to Moses as the author of Exodus 3:6 (Mark 12:26) and the Torah (John 5:46–47; 7:19), as did also the apostles (Acts 3:22; Rom. 10:5).

The internal evidences of the book attest that the author was someone who was well acquainted with the language and customs of Egypt, was a contemporary eyewitness of the wilderness wanderings, and possessed a high level of education and literary skill. Moses, who received the highest education and military training in the court of Pharaoh, possessed these characteristics.

Date. If the biblical premise that Moses was the author of Exodus is accepted, then the date of the event of the Exodus provides the date for its composition. That date is evidenced by several key chronological passages (Judg. 11:26; 1 Kin. 6:1) and the nineteen generations enumerated between Korah and Solomon in 1 Chronicles 6:33–37.

These internal chronological data together with the Jubilee cycle recorded in the Talmud point to a date in the fifteenth century B.C.

Backgrounds. Genesis provides a foundational setting, encompassing God’s Creation, the Flood and dispersal of nations, the specific call of Abraham, and the covenant promise to establish great nations through his descendants. The book establishes how, in God’s providence, a faithful Joseph, followed by his father and brothers, was saved in the land of Egypt in the historical turmoil of hardship and famine. Exodus continues this history of God’s people in Egypt. It spans the gap from the death of Joseph to the birth of Moses, Moses’s exile and return, the miraculous events leading up to the deliverance of the Hebrews from Egypt in the event of the Exodus, the codification of the law, the construction of the sanctuary, and culminates in God’s divine presence entering into the wilderness tabernacle upon its completion.

The chronology of Egyptian kings of the Eighteenth Dynasty has not yet been firmly established, but based on the internal biblical evidence and its approximate correlation with Egyptian history, the events of the first two chapters correspond to the beginning of that dynasty. Many have suggested that Thutmose I might have issued the death decree for all the Hebrew male children and that his daughter Hatshepsut could have been the princess who rescued Moses from the Nile River. While names of the royal family are not given in the Pentateuch, this theory is made more plausible by the dynastic crisis that enveloped the royal family in the first several generations because no male heir was born to the chief queens. After the death of her father, Thutmose I, and the short reign of her husband Thutmose II, Hatshepsut assumed kingship over Egypt as coregent with her half brother and nephew, Thutmose III. In this correlation of events, it would have been from Thutmose III that Moses fled after killing the Egyptian taskmaster. During Moses's forty years in the wilderness of Sinai, not only did Thutmose III conduct a record sixteen military campaigns in the territory of Canaan, perhaps partly in search of Moses, but his stepmother Hatshepsut died a few years after Moses fled. Moses would have returned to face either Thutmose III or his son Amenhotep II. The systematic proscription (destruction) of all records of Hatshepsut at the end of Thutmose III's or the beginning of Amenhotep II's reign suggests the threat of a rival and corresponds to the return of Moses.

Historical records of the early Eighteenth Dynasty hint at the plagues, the Exodus, and the death of the Egyptian army in the Red Sea, but these are few. The Egyptians of the New Kingdom who left vivid pictorial and historical records of their military campaigns never recorded a defeat, only victories. There is no reason to expect that the administration of Egypt would record on its temple walls a history of the most devastating series of judgments on Egypt and its gods or the defeat of their army in the Red Sea (Ps. 78:43–51; 105:26–36; 135:8–9; 136:10–15).

Theology and Purpose. The book of Exodus is theologically very rich and diverse, making it difficult to identify a particular theme as its center. The following survey identifies the theology of God's presence as one of the most important refrains in Exodus. The narrative is focused upon God's desire and willingness to dwell among His people, and the book closes when God is, in fact, dwelling among them in the sanctuary.

1. God's Presence in the Midst of Affliction. The book opens with a reminder to the reader that only seventy Israelites had descended to Egypt and that they had all died there. But the intention is to contrast the past with the present. While in Egypt, the people had been blessed by the Lord and, in fulfillment of the promises He made to Abraham, they multiplied considerably. God was with them, making them fruitful and transforming twelve small tribes into a people. The divine blessing was opposed by Pharaoh, who tried to control the population growth through the oppression of excessive work and then by asking the Hebrew midwives to kill newborn male children. Both attempts failed because the Lord was with His people, and in a special way, He blessed the midwives who disobeyed Pharaoh. The silent presence of God with His people in Egypt preserved them and caused them to grow. It was through His protective care that the life of the child Moses was preserved and he became the son of the daughter of Pharaoh.

2. God and Moses Descend to Egypt. After leaving Egypt and perhaps feeling abandoned by God, Moses met the Lord at the base of Mount Sinai. The divine presence revealed itself for the first time in the book of Exodus to one person, Moses, and in a strange form: "In a flame of fire from the midst of a bush" (3:2). Very often in the Bible, the manifestation of God's presence is accompanied by fire to indicate that God is unapproachable to humans. God remains the transcendental God. The divine presence is holy, unique, distinct, and should be approached with reverence (3:3–5). God expressed to Moses His concern for what was happening to the Israelites in Egypt (v. 7). This divine interest is dynamic and expresses itself in salvific action: God wanted Moses to go with Him to Egypt. God was searching for an instrument through whom He would accomplish His plan. He told Moses that He would be with him (v. 12). The Lord was going down to Egypt, to the place of enslavement, to the place where His people were.

God's visit to Egypt had two main purposes. First, He was going to destroy the Egyptians' sources of security, which were the powers of their gods and the economic production of the country. Through the ten plagues, the Lord brought Egypt to its knees and left the country in economic ruin. The situation became so desperate that Pharaoh's officials told him to let the Israelites go because the land was destroyed (10:7). The Egyptians had used the Israelites for their own benefit, but now the presence of the Israelites' God devastated them. God's judgment was also against the Egyptian gods (12:12). These gods, whom the Egyptians believed would protect them from plagues, were impotent before the Lord.

The second reason for God going down to Egypt was to redeem His people from the powerful hand of Pharaoh (3:8, 17). This redemption was possible through the blood of a lamb (Ex. 12). The Passover lamb was a reminder to the Israelites that their redemption from Egypt was possible through a bloody sacrifice. The life of the Passover lamb substituted for the life of the firstborn. During the plagues, God's presence among His people protected them, and He finally led them out of Egypt.

3. God's Presence during the Exodus. Moses received a very specific assignment from the Lord: "When you have brought the people out of Egypt, you [pl.] should serve God on this mountain" (3:12). God made an appointment with the people of Israel. In Egypt, He would speak to them through Moses, but on Sinai, He would speak to them personally, and they would experience God's majestic presence in a unique way.

After leaving Egypt, God's presence became visible, powerful, and providential. It was visible in a pillar of cloud during the day and in a pillar of fire during the night (13:22). He mysteriously hid Himself in order to reveal Himself. The cloud and the fire represented the mystery of God's constant presence and His transcendence—there is a natural distance between the Creator and His creatures. The divine presence was also powerful. He protected His people and overcame their enemies (14:4). The Egyptian armies drew near to attack Israel, but the Lord fought for them and sheltered His people (v. 19). The Lord looked down from the pillar of cloud and destroyed their enemies, forcing the Egyptians to confess that the Lord was fighting against them (v. 25). God's presence among His people was also providential. During the Israelites' trek through the wilderness, He supplied water (15:23–25) and bread for them (16:4). The Israelites saw the glory of the Lord through His provision of food for them (16:10–13). The wilderness was a place of danger for the people, but there they were learning to depend exclusively on the power of the divine presence among them.

4. God's Presence in the Tabernacle. Approaching the next climax of their journey, the Israelites reached Mount Sinai to meet with the Lord (cf. 3:12). In preparation for the meeting, they were to consecrate themselves to Him, and then Moses was to lead them to the foot of Mount Sinai to meet with God (19:17). The Lord descended on Mount Sinai with power accompanied by thunder, lightning, a thick cloud, and the sound of a trumpet (19:16, 18). Yahweh and His people met together in the most glorious experience of God's presence and nearness the Israelites would ever have. This event transformed Sinai into the first Israelite sanctuary. According to the instructions God gave to Moses, the people were not to have access to the mountain (19:12) because it had become holy through God's presence. A fence was placed around the mountain to avoid any violation of its holiness.

At the foot of the mountain, an altar was built (24:4), and only a limited group of young men could approach the altar to offer sacrifices (24:5; similar to the court of the sanctuary). Access to the mountain was limited to Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and the seventy elders (24:1). They could go up to the mountain only after the covenant had been ratified (24:6–8), to worship the Lord "from afar" (24:1; equivalent to the Holy Place). Only Moses was allowed to approach the Lord (24:2) at the top of the mountain (the Most Holy Place). There the glory of the Lord was revealed to him in a special way, and there he received from the Lord the Ten Commandments (24:12). Sinai indeed became a sanctuary. Later the Lord told Moses that Sinai was not His permanent dwelling place and that He wanted to dwell among His people. They were to build a sanctuary so that He could dwell among them (25:8).

Sanctuary theology plays an important role in Exodus. First, according to this theology, access to the sanctuary presupposes redemption. God redeemed Israel from Egypt, entered into a covenant with them, and then asked them to build Him a sanctuary. The divine intention was, from the very beginning of the narrative, for God to be near them by dwelling among them (29:45–46). As already indicated, the book looks forward to that moment and ends when that goal is achieved (40:34–38). This suggests that access to the sanctuary assumes harmony between God and the worshipers. Sin is alien to the divine dwelling.

Second, the sanctuary theology of Exodus reveals that God's presence in the sanctuary was a manifestation of divine condescension. During their journey to the promised land, every Israelite resided in a tent. Similarly, the Lord wanted to make His home in a tent—to be among His people. He chose this dwelling not because He had physical needs that they could satisfy but in order to identify with His people. The sacrifices were not food for Him; when the Israelites adopted the pagan idea that the sacrifices were food for the gods, He rejected their offerings (Ps. 50:7–15). They had nothing with which to enrich or bribe Him. Rather, it was Yahweh who was the giver. His presence among them blessed Israel by providing for them a religious and national identity (33:16). Through the sanctuary, the Lord gave Himself to Israel, revealing His nature as a loving and just God who should be worshiped. The sanctuary was the expression of a divine longing: His desire to be near and among His people.

Third, the sanctuary was a meeting place. Mount Sinai was the first Israelite sanctuary where God met with His people (3:12), and what happened there was to be perpetuated in the tabernacle. The sanctuary would be the place where God would connect with His children, a place made holy by His glory (29:43). The structure inside the courtyard was called the tent or tabernacle of meeting because it was the meeting place for God and His people. Their coming together had the purpose of revealing to the Israelites that Yahweh was their God (29:45–46).

Fourth, the theology of the sanctuary in Exodus indicates that the sanctuary is the center of divine activity. It was located in the heart of the camp as a place where God revealed His will to His people. On Sinai, He proclaimed to Israel the Ten Commandments of the covenant (20:1–20) and later, the law would be located in the Most Holy Place. From there the Lord would continue to reveal His will to the people (25:22). In the sanctuary, God reigned as king over the entire world. There was a divine movement from this central location to all the earth. The Lord as a warrior (15:3) fought for His people and caused the nations of Canaan to be afraid of Him (15:14, 15). The sanctuary was also the place from which God blessed (20:24) and guided Israel (40:36–38). For the Israelites, it was the source of life for individuals as well as the nation and where they could go to express their gratitude to God.

Fifth, the sanctuary is a place of forgiveness. Although the sanctuary and sin were incompatible, the incident of the golden calf indicated that the merciful God who would soon dwell there dispensed forgiveness from His dwelling place. The worship of the golden calf was a violation of the covenant, and the Lord treated it as such. His presence was unable to coexist with sin and threatened to consume His rebellious people (32:9, 10). When God appeared to Moses in the midst of the bush, the bush was burning, and yet it was not burned up (3:2) because the presence of the Lord sanctified it. But at Sinai, because of Israel's sin, they were imperiled by God's presence.

It was only because of the mediation of Moses that God, from His dwelling place, decided to reveal His loving and merciful character by forgiving His people. He, not Moses (32:32–33), would bear the sins of the people in order for them to remain in His presence (34:7). Forgiveness was granted, and the covenant was renewed. Moses went to the top of Sinai, and there he heard the voice of the Lord proclaiming not the law but His willingness to forgive His people for their sins, rebellions, and iniquities. He was willing to bear their sins. The sanctuary became not only the meeting place for Yahweh and His redeemed people but also a place of atonement. God was willing to deal with the sin problem from His own dwelling place. There, He and the repentant sinner could meet in order for Him to remove the sin from His presence but not the sinner.

5. The Earthly and Heavenly Dwellings. According to Exodus, the Israelite sanctuary points to a greater heavenly one. The Lord showed Moses a model of the sanctuary he was going to build (e.g., 25:9, 40). Most likely, Moses saw the heavenly sanctuary (the original) and/or a miniature model of it adapted to the needs of the Israelites. There are several reasons to support this suggestion. First, according to ANE religions, the earthly temples of the gods were considered to be a representation of the heavenly temple. Second, the OT itself indicates that there is a temple in heaven, in which Yahweh dwells. There was a connection between this earthly dwelling and the heavenly one. According to 1 Kings 8:30, when God's people pray in the earthly sanctuary/temple, God will hear their prayers in the heavenly one. The Psalms also testify about a heavenly temple where God listens to our prayers (18:6) and from where He descends to help us (vv. 9–10). God is clearly perceived in the OT as dwelling in a heavenly temple (e.g., Ps. 11:4; 102:18–19; Mic. 1:2–3). It is this dwelling that served as a pattern for the earthly one.

Third, the biblical concept of a heavenly sanctuary is also found in the NT. Hebrews argues, referring back to Exodus 25:9, that the earthly sanctuary was a copy/model of the heavenly one and, therefore, the heavenly is superior to the earthly (8:1–2, 5). The same applies to the description of the sanctuary in the book of Revelation (e.g., 11:19; 15:5, 8).

The book of Exodus indicates that behind the Israelites' sanctuary there was a sublime reality—God's heavenly abode. This is the place in heaven where God dwells among His creation. From there, He rules over creation, blesses and judges His creatures, and reveals His will to them. It is the center of worship in the universe. This is also the place where God applies the benefit of the atonement to repentant sinners, made possible through the mediation of Christ, and where the mystery of atonement will reach its consummation, resulting in the cleansing of the universe (cf. Dan. 8:14; Heb. 9:23; for more on the theology of the sanctuary in Exodus, see "Sanctuary, Covenant, Worship, and Forgiveness" (p. 226) and "Creation, Sabbath, and the Sanctuary" (p. 231).

DELIVERANCE FROM EGYPT

The Exodus is the most remembered divine act of deliverance recorded in Scripture. In this first section of the book of Exodus, the historical events leading to Israel's departure from Egypt are described, from their suffering at the hands of Pharaoh to their arrival at Mount Sinai. Chapters 1–4 describe the sojourn in Egypt and the birth of Moses, his rescue from the Nile River, his youth and eventual exile from Egypt. Taking things into one's own hands, without trusting in the timing of God, never works out well. But Moses grew into a person God could use, and He spoke to him from the burning bush, calling him to prophetic leadership. Chapters 5:1—15:21 recount Moses's journey back to Goshen, God's miraculous judgments of salvation in the ten plagues, and the Exodus from Egypt, culminating in the crossing of the Red Sea. With God all things are possible, and what He says will come to pass. Chapters 15:22—18:27 provide the itinerary and challenges the Hebrews faced as they traveled to Sinai, recounting the miraculous care of a loving God who provided fresh water to drink, manna from heaven, and victory over the Amalekites.

Condition of the People in Egypt

The first chapter of Exodus serves as a transition from the death of Jacob and Joseph in Genesis to the generations in the period of the sojourn and their descent into slavery. God had not forsaken His people. Just as God's providence had provided salvation through the faithfulness of Joseph, the birth of Moses ushered in a new chapter for the descendants of Abraham.

1:1–6. Sojourn in Egypt. The length of time between the entrance of Israel into Egypt (Gen. 46) and the return of Moses to Egypt ahead of the Exodus event—the period of the Egyptian sojourn—has been a matter of debate, with two lines of thought concerning how this should be understood (see “The Four-Hundred-Thirty-Year Sojourn,” p. 211). In Exodus 1, the movement from those years when the people were favored by the king of Egypt to those years when they suffered under a Pharaoh who did not know Joseph (Ex. 1:8) reminds us of the changing circumstances in life that are often beyond one's control.

1:7–14. God's Blessing in the Midst of Slavery.

God blessed Jacob's descendants in Egypt—they were fruitful and grew strong and numerous (Ex. 1:7). The three verbs used here are taken from Genesis 1:21, 22, and 28 and emphasize the rapid growth of the tribe of Jacob under the blessings and presence of the Creator. Even though Joseph and his brothers had died, God was faithful to His promise and blessed their descendants. This king who was unfamiliar with Joseph probably refers to a king of the newly established Eighteenth Dynasty of Egypt. The previous generation of Asiatic Hyksos rulers who had infiltrated the ranks of the Egyptians had been expelled. This dynasty instilled a fear of foreigners and built on a general disdain for other ethnicities that had existed since Egypt's earliest history. This included the Hebrews.

If Joseph lived during the Twelfth Dynasty of the Middle Kingdom, his contribution to saving Egypt from the seven-year famine would have long been forgotten. If he lived during the Fifteenth Dynasty of the Second Intermediate Period under the Asiatic Hyksos, the events might still be in the collective memory but simply ignored. Accordingly, some translators render the Hebrew lo'yada' as “meant nothing” instead of “did not know”; yada' can refer to relationships that transcend mere intellectual knowledge (e.g., Gen. 4:1). Either way, the new king would not have had a relationship with Joseph that tied the king to any previous administration's goodwill. The new king, once subjugated by the Asiatic Hyksos, became the oppressor of the Hebrews. This reflects the human condition. If given a chance, the oppressed often becomes the oppressor. The cities that the Hebrews built, Pithom and Raamses (v. 11), were storage cities made out of mud brick, as all cities in ancient Egypt were. It is nearly certain that Raamses was located at modern Tal ed-Dab'a/Qantir (for more information, see “Archaeology and the Bible,” p. 77). Here, construction of a major city began in the period of the Hyksos and continued into the early Eighteenth Dynasty before it was abandoned in the first part of Amenhotep II's reign. Construction began again in the late Eighteenth Dynasty and continued into the early Nineteenth Dynasty. It is theorized that the name was later updated to reflect the location of a major palace there in the time of Ramesses II (see commentary on Gen. 46:1—47:12 for a discussion of the land with a similar name). While this slavery aimed at controlling population, the subjugation of the Hebrews did not put an end to the divine blessing. God strengthens His children in the midst of their weakness (2 Cor. 12:9–10).

1:15–22. God’s Blessing and the Threat of Genocide. The Pharaoh, possibly Thutmose I, resorted to ordering the extermination of all newborn males. In this case, genocide was used for population control (Ex. 1:15–20). He began by ordering the Hebrew midwives to execute the babies at childbirth, but the Bible reports that the women feared God (v. 17) and honored the sanctity of life. The fact that the term “midwives” is mentioned seven times and their names are recorded while the king of Egypt remains nameless testifies to the power of moral right over civil might. God honored these women and provided for their basic needs. Pharaoh finally commanded his people to cast every Hebrew male infant into the river. One cannot help but be reminded of the command by Herod the Great when he sent his soldiers to Bethlehem over 1,500 years later (Matt. 2:16–18). Neither decree could keep God from fulfilling His ultimate plan of raising up a deliverer.

2:1—4:31

The Birth, Life, and Call of Moses

Considering the internal biblical chronology, Moses was born around 1527 B.C., the youngest son of Amram and Jochebed. He was born into slavery under a death decree, but God would dramatically alter history by ensuring his rescue and subsequent training in the court of Pharaoh. God is always sovereign, regardless of the plans of the enemy of God’s people (epitomized here by Pharaoh).

2:1–10. Hidden for the Service of God. Following his birth, Moses was first kept at home quietly for three months until another means for his safety could be planned. The Hebrew terminology for the box in which Moses was placed is tebat (construct form of tebah) gome’. These are Egyptian loanwords describing a basket made from the papyrus plant. Papyrus was often employed to construct small water vessels used along the Nile (which can be seen depicted in Egyptian paintings). The term sup is also an Egyptian word that is used to refer to the reeds where Moses was placed. This is the second and only other use of the Hebrew term tebah, which first appeared in the Flood story in Genesis 6, where it is used seven times (6:14 [2x], 15, 16, [2x], 18, 19). The use of this unique word reminds the reader of God’s providence and salvation during the universal Flood and anticipates Moses’s rescue. In both cases, God used tebat to protect His people from water and guarantee their survival. Under the watchful eye of his sister Miriam, Moses was placed in the marshy tracts of the Nile (2:1–5).

The princess who rescued Moses is not named, but she may well have been Hatshepsut, who some twenty years later would become Pharaoh over Egypt due to the dynastic crisis surrounding the lack of a male heir. Archaeological evidence indicates that two palaces along the Pelusiac branch of the Nile near Avaris, known later as Pi-Ramesses, were built at the beginning of the Eighteenth Dynasty and may have been the location from which the princess went out to bathe. The Nile was sanctified as the Egyptian god Hapi, who unified Upper and Lower Egypt, and was the source of life for the nation. It may well have been that the daughter of Pharaoh, knowing that there was no male heir, perceived this child to be a gift of the Nile god to solve Egypt’s dilemma of dynastic succession. Later, after Moses had been brought up by his mother until the age of twelve (cf. PP 244) and presented at the palace, his adoptive mother named him Moses because she drew him out of the water.

Moses is an Egyptian name, mes or mesi meaning “son of” or “the one born of.” This was appropriate for a dynasty where the kings were named Ka-mose (“son of Ka”), Ah-mose (“son of Akh”), and Thut-mose (“son of Thoth”)—each portrayed as the son of one of the gods of Egypt. Moses refused the divine element of his name when he ultimately rejected the crown (Heb. 11:24–25). He modified his Egyptian name and rendered it in Hebrew as mosheh, which is from the verb meaning “to draw out.” Pharaoh’s daughter snatched him from death so that he might accomplish God’s plan for his life.

2:11–15. Not by Human Strength. Moses was forty years of age when he slew the Egyptian taskmaster and buried his body in the sand (Acts 7:23). Groomed and educated to be the next king of Egypt (PP 245), he saw what was taking place and had compassion for his brothers, just as the princess who rescued him was moved to compassion for him. He confronted the oppressor and took the side of the enslaved and destitute. Moses believed that the Hebrews would declare him their new leader (Acts 7:25), but instead, they turned on him. The enslaved did not realize their plight and were not ready for freedom. How often do those enslaved by sin prefer their dark situation over the freedom offered by the Deliverer!

Which pharaoh attempted to have Moses killed? It is unlikely to have been Hatshepsut, Moses's adoptive mother, who reigned as full regent. In the dynastic crisis that followed the death of her husband Thutmose II, his son Thutmose III was declared king, but being too young to rule, Hatshepsut had taken power on his behalf and later usurped all authority from him. When Thutmose III did come of age, Hatshepsut retained that position as full regent and declared that because she was the daughter of Thutmose I she was his rightful heir. The temple at Deir el-Bahri declared her to be the divine daughter of Amun and Hathor. She took on royal titles and became the first female ruler of the New Kingdom of Egypt. It is not difficult to imagine the rivalry and jealousy that must have developed between Thutmose III and Moses. Moses's slaying of the Egyptian taskmaster and his subsequent flight from Egypt gave Thutmose III the opportunity to become the sole heir of the mightiest power on earth.

As this earthly struggle for power was taking place, there was another controversy taking place in the heart of Moses. To be king of Egypt meant to be inducted into the rituals of Egypt—to accept that he was a son of the gods, the divine pharaoh, Horus incarnate. He wrestled with issues of allegiance and loyalty. This was a test of faith. He did not flee for his life in fear of the king's anger (Heb. 11:27). He understood that his act had ruined his opportunity to free his people by his own mighty hand (cf. Ex. 3:19; 4:13; Acts 7:22). By faith, he was led by God into the wilderness where he could unlearn the sophisticated and mysterious refinements of Egyptian court life. Moses was not yet prepared to lead the people out of Egypt. He needed to learn to rely not on himself but solely on God, who would accomplish the deliverance of Israel through His own power and strength. For Moses, this would take another forty years. The exercise of daily self-denial and constant dependence on God remains a challenge for all Christians.

2:16–22. God Provides. Eventually, Moses arrived in Midian. In this period of history, the Midianites lived as nomads and moved between the territories to the east of the Gulf of Aqaba (modern Jordan and Saudi Arabia) and to the west (the Sinai Peninsula). It is to Sinai where Moses fled, and he eventually arrived at a well in Midian (see 3:1; cf. PP 247). It is customary still today for Bedouin women, not men, to draw water for their flocks. Here Moses once again delivered the weak from the hand of the strong—the Midianite priest's daughters from the shepherds—but this time he took the role of a servant and watered the women's flocks for them, an act unusual both then and today. Notice that he was identified by Reuel's daughters as an Egyptian. Perhaps on account of his dress, hairstyle, demeanor, and speech, Moses appeared to be Egyptian, but he was, in fact, their distant relative. Moses agreed to dwell with Reuel and subsequently entered into marriage with Zipporah. The name of their son Gershom means "banishment," an expression of how Moses felt living in the wilderness, separated from his people and the land that he had known.

2:23–25. God and the Suffering of Israel. For Moses, the time of banishment was a period of approximately forty years (Acts 7:30). He would be eighty years of age when he returned to Egypt (7:7). All this time, he lived as a shepherd in the desert, removed from the temples and palaces created by the Egyptians and surrounded by the majestic mountains and open plains of his Creator. During this time, the king of Egypt died (2:23). Some have suggested that it was Thutmose III (who died ca. 1450 B.C.), who had sought to kill Moses (4:19). Others have suggested it was Hatshepsut (who died ca. 1482 B.C.). After the death of the pharaoh, the exploitation of the children of Israel became even more severe. But God was still with His people—He heard their cry for deliverance, saw them, and recognized their plight (2:25). The Hebrew term used in v. 25, yada' ("to know"), suggests that God experienced and understood their suffering in a relational way (cf. 1:8). God remembered His covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob and acted accordingly. He is a God who initiates and remains faithful to His covenant. This covenant would become the major focus of God's interaction with Israel in Exodus 19–24 and is the central motivation for God to commence a rescue plan for His people.

3:1–4:17. God Calls Moses. God's call was dramatic and arrested Moses's attention. The Angel of the Lord appeared to him when he came to Horeb, the mountain of God (v. 1). "Horeb" means literally "dry place" and appears also in Exodus 17:6 and 33:6. God's mountain was also known as Sinai (Ex. 19:1, 18, 20, 23; 24:16). Both names may have been associated with the same larger mountain range.

The Being that appeared in a flame of fire placed in the midst of a bush that would not be consumed was none other than Yahweh, the Lord God. The three terms (Angel, Yahweh, God) are used interchangeably in this passage to describe the One who appeared and spoke to Moses (see Gen. 18; 22:11–18; 23:20–23; 31:11–13; Judg. 2:1–5; 13:2–23; Hos. 12:3–5; Mal. 3:1 [“messenger” is a translation of the same Hebrew word for “angel”]). The ground was made holy by the presence of God, and Moses was instructed to remove his sandals (v. 5). By removing his sandals and hiding his face, Moses honored the God of the covenant with awe and reverence. This passage is reminiscent of the seraphim who stand by the throne of God. Each has six wings: two covering their faces, two covering their feet, and two used for flying (Is. 6:2). Here Moses’s actions are a demonstration of the honor, awe, and reverence due to the God of the universe.

God would reveal to Moses His plan for the deliverance of His people from Egypt (3:7–12). In fulfillment of the covenant promise made to Abram (Gen. 13:15), God would “come down” to deliver Israel and bring them to a “good and large land” (v. 8). Compared with the area of Goshen, the land of Israel would be enormous. While Israel today includes some desert areas, most of the land west of the peaks of the central hill country is lush, supporting extensive agriculture. The north has flowing rivers from Mount Hermon, which fill the Sea of Galilee, emptying into the Dead Sea via the Jordan River. Here there are waterfalls and rapids. The Carmel Mountains in the north central part of the country contain springs of water. The term “milk and honey” refers to the pastoralist (goat milk) and agricultural (fruit bearing) land and to the lifestyle of the future inhabitants of Canaan. Moses’s objection, “Who am I?” (v. 11), is set in contrast to his earlier high position in the palace of Pharaoh. By this time, he was a lowly shepherd and filled with self-distrust. But God assured Moses that He would certainly be with him (v. 12). When God calls people to overwhelming tasks, He always enables them to accomplish His purpose.

Moses asked God to tell him what response should be given if the Israelites were to ask for His name. In response, God revealed Himself to Moses as “I AM WHO I AM,” alternatively rendered as “I WILL BE WHAT I WILL BE” (v. 14). The sentence expresses “being” not as “pure being” in the Greek philosophical sense but as “active being,” in terms of revelation. God has been in the past, is in the present, and will be in the future. The great I AM was sending Moses. The eternal, self-existent One (John 8:58; cf. DA 469) would accompany him. The derived form “Yahweh” is the sacred covenant name of God who makes Himself known through the act of redemption. He set Israel free from bondage, made them His special covenant people, and provided the means for them to remain His covenant people through His grace and enabling power.

To encourage Moses, Yahweh told him that He would stretch out His hand and strike Egypt with “wonders” (v. 20). The mention of stretching out the hand is a direct reference to a phrase in Egyptian used often to describe the pharaoh, who is said “to stretch out his hand” against his enemies in battle. But Moses, like most human beings, asked for evidence that appealed to his senses, and God provided him with three proofs so that the people would know that he was the Lord’s representative (4:1–9). Perhaps in the back of his mind, Moses remembered the accusation of his fellow Israelites when they tauntingly asked him who had appointed him to be their ruler (or “prince,” Heb. sar) and judge (2:14). The rod would be a symbol of God’s power in the hands of Moses (7:15; 17:5) and Aaron (7:9; 8:5; 8:16). As Creator, God could fashion a serpent out of the rod and use the rod to perform wonders. The second sign indicated that Moses’s hand would be empowered by God to perform His actions. The third sign gave evidence of God’s authority over life and death. Moses was simply to be God’s servant and rely on His strength.

Moses provided another reason for not wanting to return to Egypt, namely, that he was slow of speech (4:10–17). After forty years, had he forgotten the Egyptian language? Moses later repeated the response in part when he referred to his ‘arel—literally “uncircumcised” lips (6:12)—which contextually referred to his lacking eloquence. Other prophets (Jer. 1:6) and apostles like Paul (2 Cor. 10:10) would make similar statements. God’s response is clear: when He calls individuals to deliver a message, He who created their mouths will give them the words to say (vv. 11–12). The reality is that Moses simply did not want to go. This speaks to Christians today who are called to witness for the One who saved them. They should remember that the God who spoke to Moses will always go before them.

4:18–31. Back to Egypt. When the time arrived for Moses to return to Egypt, God reassured him that it was safe—everyone who had sought his life was dead (4:19). As Moses set out, God explained his mission: to display the wonders that had been revealed to him (v. 21) and to speak the words God would give him (vv. 22–23). The hardening of Pharaoh's heart (v. 21) must be understood concretely in the idiomatic sense of Hebrew thought. In the Hebrew way of thinking, whatever God allows, He does. God predicted that He would harden Pharaoh's heart through the course of the ten plagues (which are also described as "signs" or "works" of God [7:3; 8:19; 10:1–2], "wonders" [4:21; 7:3; 11:9–10], and "extraordinary deeds/wonders" [15:11; 34:10]). This is something the Lord discerned because of His foreknowledge. But this did not remove Pharaoh's freedom of choice. Ten times during the initial five plagues where the phrase is used, Pharaoh is said to have hardened his own heart (e.g., 8:15, 32; 9:34). Rather than allowing God to soften his heart, the king became more determined and resolute with every demonstration of God's power. This was a deliberate decision on his part. During the last five plagues, God is said to have hardened Pharaoh's heart (e.g., 9:12; 11:10; 14:8). God provided the circumstances and the occasion for Pharaoh to be forced into making a decision. God was the instigator and initiator of the dilemma, but He was not the author of Pharaoh's defiance.

Moses had to spiritually and physically prepare his family for his mission (4:24–26). The sign of the Lord's covenant with Israel was shown through the rite of circumcision (Gen. 17:10–14). One son, presumably Gershom, the eldest, had been circumcised, but the younger son Eliezer had not been (cf. PP 256). This duty needed to be carried out before Moses could act as leader of the covenant people. The immediate act of circumcision evidently satisfied the Lord, and they were allowed to continue on their journey. Soon Moses met Aaron and told him all that the Lord had done (Ex. 4:27–28), and they traveled on to Goshen together. Faithful to God's assignment to act as Moses's spokesman, Aaron related Moses's experience to the elders of the people. The three signs were performed by God in their midst, and they bowed their heads in belief and reverence and worshiped God (vv. 29–31).

5:1—7:13

Judgment on Egypt and the Deliverance of Israel

Moses's journey of forty years transformed him from a self-sufficient and confident prince of Egypt (Acts 7:22) to a humble shepherd, dependent on God. The people of Israel changed from being passive slaves to crying out to the Lord for deliverance. The circumstances in Egypt had also changed, and the men who had sought Moses's life were dead, which would have included Pharaoh himself (Ex. 2:15; 23). The prophecy related to the affliction of the descendants of Abraham (Gen. 15:13) was coming to a close. God had a plan, which He set in motion at the proper time. Even though followers of God may not always see the end from the beginning, they are called to trust Him patiently. The justice of God, longed for by the Israelites for so many years, would be meted out, not only in their deliverance and salvation but also in the judgment and punishment of their oppressors. These judgments preceded deliverance and anticipated God's judgment at Christ's return in the eschaton.

5:1—6:13. Confrontations with Pharaoh.

Moses was instructed by God to confront the king of Egypt. Perhaps this was what Moses feared most, given his former background. How would the king view the former successor to the throne? As a threat? As a laughing stock, given his new life as a shepherd? But the controversy that was about to unfold was not about Moses. It was about God's presence in Egypt and His demonstration of sovereignty, power, and judgment upon the nation. God chose people as His instruments to confront evil. God's love for the Egyptians had been demonstrated by sending Joseph to witness about a holy God who knows the future and is able to save a nation from famine. But several generations later, Egypt, so long steeped in pagan religious practices, had finally rejected the God of Israel and Joseph. Left to their own designs for power and supremacy, they had sunk deeper into darkness over the ensuing centuries. God desired to reach the great nation by humbling their self-reliance and challenging their worship of false gods, revealing to them His power and majesty.

Moses and Aaron entered the courts of Pharaoh as the ambassadors of the Lord (5:1–5). Moses identifies himself as a representative of the Lord God of Israel, a title that challenged the very core of the king's authority. Pharaoh's sarcastic response was a direct challenge to God: "Who is the Lord?" (v. 2). Bringing up the God of an enslaved people as a challenge to Pharaoh's absolute position as a son of the gods must have seemed absurd. The confidence of Moses and Aaron stemmed from their knowledge of who

God is while the king's sarcasm resulted from his ignorance. Notice the contrast in Moses's response when receiving the call from God: "Who am I?" (3:11) rather than "Who is the Lord?"

Pharaoh's response was to require the Israelites to construct their bricks without the government supply of straw (5:6–13). Not only did the king refuse Moses's request, but he also added to the burden of the Israelites—requiring them to obtain their own straw while still meeting the same quota of bricks. After the enlightenment, scholars questioned whether bricks were made with straw in Egypt—they were not in Europe and the Americas—and many doubted the historical accuracy of this statement. However, Egyptian texts and tomb paintings illustrating that the process involved the use of straw have since been discovered. Bricks from the Ramesseum in Thebes still have straw preserved in them after 3,200 years. The technology has not changed, for along the Nile, Egyptians still build their houses of sun-dried bricks made with straw.

Pharaoh had made the work of the Israelites almost impossible, and the result was conflict among them (5:14–21). The people cried out that God should judge Moses and Aaron for making them ba'ash—"abhorrent" or "odious," literally "to stink"—before the king (v. 21). The officials of Israel thought they were doomed to die under the new workload and blamed Moses and Aaron, a pattern that began here and would continue throughout their wanderings. Moses talked to God, seeking answers (vv. 22–23). To Moses, the situation seemed to be deteriorating because he had been rejected not only by Pharaoh but also by his own people. Moses did not realize that the difficulties he was facing would prepare him for some greater manifestation of God's strength.

In His response to Moses, God used the phrase "I am the LORD [Yahweh]" four times (6:1–13). His discourse was foundational in His continued self-revelation to Moses and the generations reading the story. He was the One who established the covenant. He is the One who hears and responds, the One who redeems with great judgment. From here on, the Lord would be the One to "remember" the covenant. In these verses, there is no reference to a three-day journey for the purpose of worshiping God; this time, their departure from Egypt would be permanent.

6:14—7:13. Moses's Genealogy and His Return to Pharaoh. In the middle of the narrative is the genealogy of Moses. It is provided in order to establish his credentials as a legitimate leader of Israel. The genealogy indicates that Israel was organized under tribes and that record of their divisions and subdivisions was kept. This genealogy concentrates on the tribe of Levi (v. 16), Moses's tribe. Therefore, it progresses quickly to the family of Aaron and Moses (v. 20). Since Aaron was the older of the two, he is mentioned first several times (vv. 20, 23, 26). But by the end, when the narrative resumes, Moses is mentioned first to identify him as God's chosen leader (v. 27).

When God ordered Moses to go back to Pharaoh, Moses showed self-distrust. The term 'aral sepatayim—literally "uncircumcised lips," which is used here to express Moses's lack of speaking ability (6:12, 30)—is similar to that found in Exodus 4:10: "slow of speech." This time God overcame Moses's deficiency by telling him that He would make him like God to Pharaoh. Pharaoh assumed he himself was God, but Moses, as the representative of Yahweh, would be superior to the king. He would appear before Pharaoh with greater authority, and Aaron would function as his prophet. This authority was demonstrated in the miracle of the rod becoming a serpent (7:9–12). In Egypt, the uraeus-goddess Wadjet personified the cobra and represented all strength, power, and sovereignty over Lower Egypt. Pharaoh was imbued with the power of the goddess and was, thereby, able to rule over all the land. Wadjet appeared on his crown, at his forehead, as a cobra spitting venom at the enemies of Pharaoh. The cobra became the emblem of the pharaoh's power. In death, it was the serpent that guided the deceased king into the afterlife. The power of the serpent was observed in all aspects of Egyptian life and death.

For Moses's rod to have become a serpent and to have devoured all the other serpents before Pharaoh not only manifested the supremacy of Yahweh but also challenged the sorcery and magic of Egypt. The Egyptians loved to manipulate serpents, but Moses and Aaron could "create" (through the power of God) the serpent that devoured the Egyptian counterfeits (cf. PP 264). Finally, Moses and Aaron cast down to the ground the very symbol that gave Pharaoh power, and they were able to take it up again as a rod. But Pharaoh's heart was hardened, and he rejected this sign.

7:14—12:30

The Ten Plagues

God initiated His request for the deliverance of His people with the simple command to let His people go (5:1; 7:16). Not only were the words rejected, but their Source was scoffed at as well. God knew that this would be Pharaoh's response (3:19–20), and He determined to use it to show Pharaoh who He is by demonstrating His power through the ten plagues (see below, "The Ten Plagues and the Religion of Egypt").

7:14–25. First Plague: Water to Blood. Herodotus, a Greek historian in the fifth century B.C., called Egypt "the gift of the Nile." The annual inundation of the Nile, caused by floodwaters deep in the heart of Africa, added richness to the soil that was indispensable for agriculture. Moses did not tell Pharaoh that the Nile would appear to be red like blood but that the Nile would be turned into blood. When this happened, the contamination spread not only through their water supply but also to one of their main food sources—fish. The Nile lost its capacity to sustain Egypt. But this was not limited to the Nile. The references to this plague affecting other bodies of water (v. 19) indicate an accurate knowledge of Egypt, where tributaries of the Nile, artificial canals, and reservoirs were also affected. The text also indicates that this was not some "red tide" or algae affecting only the river. All of the water of the Egyptians turned to blood. Khnum, the creator god, who was guardian of the Nile, could not change what Moses had commanded. The plague demonstrated that all sustenance comes from the Lord who spoke water and fish into existence, not the deities of Egypt. In desperation, the Egyptians dug for water. No mention is made here of the Israelites, suggesting that this plague did not affect them or their families. This is a repeated pattern:

the plagues fell on the Egyptians but not on the land of Goshen. This is another indication that these were miraculous judgments of God specifically for Egypt.

8:1–15. Second Plague: Frogs. As water was restored by the God of heaven, not Khnum, the protector of the Nile, the next plague was a polemic against Khnum's spouse Hekhet, one of the primary deities of Egypt, who was depicted as a female with a frog's head. While Khnum formed human bodies on the potter's wheel, Hekhet was the goddess of childbirth, who gave life to those bodies. As a result of this plague, the lives of the Egyptians were made miserable by the frogs they worshiped, and consequently they despised and hated them. After the plague, the putrid stench of dead frogs testified against the supposed life-giving "breath" that Hekhet was thought to provide.

8:16–32. Third and Fourth Plagues: Lice and Biting Flies. The next two pestilences that were brought on by the Lord involved insects. The first (ken) has been interpreted as either lice or gnats. Since they were found on both people and animals, lice may be a better explanation. The second was 'arob, which was an insect with a venomous bite that inflicted great pain (PP 266). These plagues could have been a polemic against the self-generating god of the resurrection, Kheper, who was depicted in Egyptian reliefs as the dung or scarab beetle. The female scarab beetle was worshiped because it formed

The Ten Plagues and the Religion of Egypt

The plagues were an attack against the Egyptian source of power. The Egyptians had deified nature to such an extent that their religion had become a type of pantheism with a pantheon of about two thousand gods and goddesses. In a sense, the plagues were successive acts of divine de-creation, the undoing of the creation order and of the people's understanding of the origin of Egypt. For the Egyptians, the concept of ma'at ("truth," "justice," and "order") portrayed the universe as the harmonious coexistence of all elements. Pharaoh himself was given responsibility by the gods to maintain this universal order. This was accomplished by subduing the forces of chaos. The Egyptian concept of ma'at was thrown into chaos during the ten plagues as a direct challenge to the authority and ability of the king of Egypt.

Before nearly every plague, Moses was instructed to relate to Pharaoh the exact manner and effects of what would take place. He did this for two reasons: (1) to give the king the opportunity to avert the consequences, and (2) to make it impossible for the king to deny that the plagues had come from the Lord (PP 263). The plagues began with the most powerful force of life in Egypt (i.e., water) but had the least devastating impact on Egypt. As each plague came upon Egypt, the effects on the land and the people would become more severe. It was through this manifestation of His divine presence and power that God hoped to reveal the deficiencies of the religious beliefs of Egypt and draw the people to worship and honor Him.

The theory that the plagues could be explained as natural disasters rather than divine interventions is not supported by the biblical text. God announced that He would bring these wonders upon Egypt (Ex. 3:20), and they took place as He stated. In no instance was one plague the source of the next one. The hail of the seventh plague had no relationship to the boils of plague six. The tenth plague had no link to the previous plagues. The plagues are related in direct historical narrative and are not to be understood as metaphor or simple literary creations.

with its front legs a perfect sphere of dung, where it placed its eggs, and eventually life sprang forth spontaneously as the eggs hatched. The Egyptians believed this sphere represented the life-giving sun, which Kheper gave rise to in the morning and pushed from the east across the horizon. The Egyptian magicians could not reproduce this miracle and identified it as “the finger of God” (v. 19). This recognition is not necessarily an expression of faith by the magicians, but rather it highlights the divine origins of the plague (cf. 31:18; Deut. 9:10). Miraculously, the fourth plague did not affect the land of Goshen (cf. Gen. 45:9–13).

9:1–7. Fifth Plague: Livestock Diseased. The pestilence that fell on the domesticated animals struck at the property of the Egyptians—their livelihood. It included camels, donkeys, cattle, and horses, which had been introduced to Egypt by the Asiatic Hyksos (v. 3). Again, the livestock of Israel were spared (v. 4). Cattle were worshiped in two ways in Egypt. The bull cult included the worship of Apis, who epitomized the virility of life-giving strength. In Memphis, he was represented by Ptah, the divine father of Pharaoh. His consort was Hathor, the goddess embodied as a cow. Hatshepsut was depicted at her temple at Deir el-Bahri nursing from the cow Hathor, who was being led by her consort Amun-Re. The fifth plague struck at the heart of the divine origin of the king. Pharaoh set out to determine whether it was true that none of the Israelite livestock had died. Even when faced with the truth, his heart was hardened.

9:8–12. Sixth Plague: Boils. The exact nature of the disease that next fell on the Egyptians is not precisely known. Perhaps this was a boil that broke forth in blisters when fine dust fell on the skin. Even the magicians abandoned Pharaoh and fled to their homes in misery. Sekhmet was the most important of Egypt’s cat deities, represented by a woman’s body with the head of a lioness. She had the power to ward off pestilence and was a healing goddess, “the mistress of life.” While some Egyptian texts describe the scattering of ashes as a means to end pestilence, here God used the same method to cause it.

9:13–35. Seventh Plague: Hail. In this long discourse of God with Moses, explicit detail is given regarding the hail and fire that would fall on Egypt and God’s reason for not already destroying Pharaoh—namely, that as a result of the plagues, His name would be known in all the earth (v. 16). The hail destroyed man, beast, and every herb of the field, but the land of Goshen was spared (vv. 23–26). Hail is often associated with divine judgment (Is. 28:2, 17; 30:30–31; Ezek. 13:11–13; 38:22–23). This polemic was aimed against the celestial deities Nut, the goddess of the sky; Shu, the supporter of the heavens; and Tefnut, the goddess of moisture. Intriguingly, the biblical text indicates a polarization of Egyptian society: those who began to take the Lord seriously (perhaps some of those Egyptians, mentioned in Ex. 12:38, who went with the Israelites) and prepared for the plague and those who did not. The plague was directed against Egypt so that Pharaoh would know that the earth belongs to the Lord (v. 29). For the first time, the king admitted that he had sinned, that the Lord is righteous, and that he and his people were wrong (v. 27). But after the storm was called off, he hardened his heart (v. 34).

10:1–20. Eighth Plague: Locusts. Locusts were always a threat in the Mediterranean region. They could eat their own body weight in one day and could swarm in by the millions, consuming everything in their path (on locusts, see Joel 1:1–12). This was the next peril facing Egypt if Pharaoh did not let the people go. What vegetation was left after the storm would be devoured. The locusts came with an east wind from the territory of Arabia. The Tanis stele of Taharqa reads, “A fine field, which the gods protected against grasshoppers.” This may suggest that this was the function of many gods, not merely one god. Pharaoh’s servants tried to convince him to let the people go—Egypt was already destroyed. The persistence of the king’s stubbornness would ultimately bring about Egypt’s ruin. This is one of the reasons for the plagues—that they might be a testimony for generations signifying that He is indeed the Lord.

10:21–29. Ninth Plague: Darkness. The chief deity of the Egyptians was the sun god, Re. The rising of Re in the east symbolized new life and resurrection—the cyclical nature of rejuvenated life. When the sun set in the west, it entered the underworld, representing death, before it was reborn in the morning. In a land where there were rarely clouds, the sun was the constant source of life-giving power. The king’s titles included “son of Re.” Even during the reign of Amenhotep IV—who limited the worship of the Egyptians to the Aten sun-disk, changed his name to Akhenaten, and relocated to a newly built capital all in Aten’s honor—the sun was the primary deity of Egypt. When Re was hidden by the might of Yahweh, Pharaoh’s realm and, by extension, all of Egypt were plunged into symbolic death and nothingness. A deep foreboding settled over the land. Nothing like this had ever happened in the history of Egypt. What did it mean? The Lord, who had created the greater and lesser lights in the heaven on the fourth day, had never intended that they be worshiped, and He demonstrated once again that He alone is the source of light and life (cf. John 1:1–4). The darkness was so thick that it could be felt by the inhabitants of Egypt. But the children of Israel had light in their homes. No matter how dark the circumstances may become, how oppressing the situation may be, the Creator will supply light to those who trust in Him.

11:1–3. Israel Will Be Compensated. God announced to His people that they would soon leave Egypt, fully compensated for the years of slave labor they had provided to the Egyptians. God had foretold this future event to Abraham—that after the oppression of his descendants, the oppressing nation would be judged and that Israel would come out with great possessions (Gen. 15:14). The Hebrews had labored for the Egyptians for generations. They had been subjected to brutality and injustice, compelled to build Egypt’s public works while receiving minimal remuneration. The time had come to ask the Egyptians for their rightful payment. The inhabitants of Egypt, so overcome by the devastating plagues, paid their debt to the Israelites and urged them to leave the land (Ex. 12:35–36). Moses had obtained great respect as the messenger of the God through whom He performed such great signs. The Lord thus communicated to Moses that all their needs would be supplied through His power.

11:4–10. Announcement of Death of the Firstborn. Moses announced to Pharaoh the final judgment of death to the firstborn. Because the king did not let God’s firstborn son, Israel (Ex. 4:22–23), depart from the land, God would strike the firstborn of all Egypt. This would occur at midnight, in the darkest moment of night, marked by vulnerability and defenselessness. Moses predicted that this would be the final blow, causing all Egypt to beg for Israel’s departure. Moses turned to leave in anger (11:8), frustrated perhaps at the needless judgment of death that would soon take place because of Pharaoh’s stubborn heart yet triumphantly certain that the trials of Egypt would soon come to an end.

12:1–28. Institution of Passover. Once again, as in the previous judgments against Egypt, the Lord made provision for the salvation of His people. The ordinance of the Passover came prior to the plague directed against the firstborn of Egypt. The people were to take a lamb without blemish (v. 5). Animals that had not experienced injury, were perfect in shape, and had simple coloring without complex spots or other markings were later required as the offerings of Israel (Lev. 22:20–23; Mal. 1:8). The Passover lamb was to be a type of the Promised One, who though without sin (Heb. 4:15), would die as the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world (John 1:29).

The sacrifice was to take place at twilight or in the evening (v. 6), or “between the two evenings,” a literal translation of the Hebrew phrase. In Egypt, this would have been done before the night of the tenth plague. So, when was Passover kept throughout history? Based on Leviticus 23:5 and Numbers 9:3, which refer to Passover on the date of Nisan 14, it seems likely that Passover lambs were slain in the late afternoon, after the sun began to visibly settle in the horizon and sunset. This time lines up well with the death of the antitypical “Lamb of God,” who died on the cross at the ninth hour (Matt. 27:46–50; Mark 15:34–37).

The instruction to take some of the blood (v. 7) is a reminder that it is only the “blood of the Lamb” that saves and provides redemption (1 Pet. 1:18–19) and by which the Christian might overcome (Rev. 12:11). The blood is life (Lev. 17:11). The unleavened bread (v. 8) is significant because yeast caused the dough to ferment and came to represent corruption. Jesus applied the two Passover symbols of unleavened bread and unfermented wine (grape juice) to Himself when He said, “Take, eat; this is My body” and “Drink from it, all of you. For this is My blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many for the remission of sins” (Matt. 26:26–28). For this reason, the Passover became a day to remember (v. 14), which pointed back to the great day of deliverance in Egypt and pointed forward to the great event when the “firstborn Son” of Mary (Matt. 1:25; Luke 2:7), indeed “the firstborn over all creation” (Col. 1:15) and “the firstborn from the dead” (Rev. 1:5), would shed His innocent blood that all might have eternal life (John 3:16). The divine “passing over” is not based on human efforts (even though it requires obedience) but, rather, on God’s active protection and grace (Ex. 12:23, 27).

12:29–30. Tenth Plague: Death of the Firstborn.

The death of the firstborn was the final blow to Egypt’s dynastic legacy. Pharaoh was the son of Re, and his heir too would one day lead Egypt. The one who was groomed to be king was slain. The successor of Amenhotep II was not his firstborn son. Amenhotep II was likely placed as coregent to his father Thutmose III a few years prior to the king’s death, suggesting that Thutmose III wanted to avoid a dynastic crisis at the end of his reign. Hatshepsut’s image was erased from many of her monuments throughout Egypt, suggesting that there might have been a rival to the throne. Could it be that Moses, arriving in Egypt after forty years in the wilderness, was perceived as one reclaiming his right to the throne? Why else would Thutmose III have waited so long to have Hatshepsut’s image removed? The intrigue surrounding the succession indicates that something unusual was taking place in Egypt. Extraordinary measures were taken in order to secure Egypt’s future.

12:31—15:21

The Exodus and Red Sea Crossing

The miraculous judgments of God on Egyptian ideology found their final expression in the deliverance of the children of Israel through the Red Sea and the destruction of Pharaoh’s armies. Under the Eighteenth Dynasty, Egypt had developed into one of the world’s most advanced military powers. Through the sixteen campaigns of Thutmose III into the Holy Land, the army of Egypt, with its chariots and horses, its infantry and navy, had been tactically refined. In Egyptian military records, Egypt was always victorious, given success by Amun-Re, the god of Thebes and divine father of the king. Israel would face this formidable force in a final showdown between the powers of Egypt and the God of heaven.

12:31–42. Exodus from Egypt. Urged by Pharaoh and the Egyptians to leave with haste, the Israelites were not even able to finish baking their bread. The total number of Israelites given is about six hundred thousand men on foot, besides women and children (v. 37; see “The Number of Israelites Who Left Egypt,” p. 210). The ’ereb rab—variously translated as “mixed multitude,” “many other people,” or the “ethnically diverse crowd” (v. 38)—that accompanied Israel witnessed the power of the plagues and the protection of Israel and decided to put their trust in God and the leadership of Moses. At this point, Egypt was devastated, and little remained for them in the land of the pharaohs.

12:43–51. Further Passover Regulations. The Passover was to be observed only by Israel and their future generations. Strangers, non-Hebrew servants, and hirelings who desired to become part of this covenant community did so through the act of circumcision. Only then could they take part in the Passover. The command to not break the bones of the paschal lamb (v. 46) was typologically fulfilled in Jesus (John 19:36). The consecration of the firstborn would remind the Israelites of the redemption of grace that they had experienced during the Passover in Egypt (13:1–2). They were the firstborn of God (Ex. 4:22–23), and as such, they belonged to God because of His saving grace.

13:3–16. Festival of Unleavened Bread. This festival would be a memorial of the day when Israel left Egypt in haste. It was to be passed down from generation to generation as a reminder of the historical event. The instruction to wear the story as a sign on the hand and as a reminder between the eyes has been applied in a very literal way by Jews of the first century onward. A box or phylactery with passages from Exodus and Deuteronomy are placed on the forehead, between the eyes, and bound with black leather strips. Likewise, these are also bound around the arms during prayer. This literal interpretation was not the intention of the text, and even Jesus seemed to have criticized the motives behind the outward display of this application (Matt. 23:5). Celebrating the festival would remind the people to serve the Lord who had brought them out of Egypt with a powerful hand (v. 9). It would also be a memorial between their eyes that would orient their journey through life by reminding them of what God had done for them in the past. Consequently, they would often speak of the law of the Lord. In Revelation 14:9, the hand and the mind become the focus of true worship because one's actions and decisions determine whether a person remains faithful to God's commands or follows human inventions.

All the firstborn of the animals were to be allocated for the Lord (v. 12). If they were clean sacrificial animals, they could be offered as sacrifices to God (v. 12). Unclean animals (e.g., donkeys) and firstborn sons were to be redeemed with a lamb (v. 13; cf. Lev. 27:26–27). This ritual commemorated the salvation experienced in Egypt at the Passover when the firstborn sons of Israel were spared.

The Number of Israelites Who Left Egypt

Numbers are common in the Bible, and in most cases, they are not a matter of serious concern. Questions are raised with respect to large numbers, such as the ones given for the Exodus from Egypt. The matter is somewhat complex, and the numbers have been interpreted in different ways. Here only two of them will be mentioned.

1. Consistency of the Numbers. The number of people who left Egypt under the leadership of Moses is given in several places and is consistent. Exodus 12:37 reports that there were about 600,000 men on foot, besides women and children (see also Num. 11:21, where the same number is given). This number of people is confirmed in Exodus 38:25–26, when the number of men (age twenty and above) who gave half a shekel to the sanctuary is listed as 603,550. The census taken before leaving Mount Sinai, which did not include the Levites, indicated that the number of all those at least twenty years old who were able to go to war was 603,550 (Num. 1:45–46). This is a military census, and the 603,550 were men who could still function as soldiers, implying that there were other older male Israelites, besides the Levites, not included in the number. This could also be the case with respect to the number given in Exodus 12:37, where about 600,000 are identified as “men on foot,” or infantry. Shortly before entering Canaan, after the previous generation had died during the forty years between censuses, another military census was taken and the number given was 601,730 (Num. 26:2, 51). One has to conclude that the numbers are significantly consistent. Therefore, a nonliteral interpretation would require new evidence that, at present, does not seem to be available (cf. PP 334, 410).

2. A Smaller Number. In spite of the information discussed above, some still argue that the number of Israelites who left Egypt was not that large. It is suggested that the term “thousand” is sometimes used to refer to large military units and is not to be taken literally. However, this explanation is not able to solve the computational difficulties of Exodus 38 and Numbers 1 and 26. Some scholars propose that Deuteronomy can be understood to suggest that Israel was not “more in number than any other people,” but rather that they “were the least [the fewest] of all peoples” (Deut. 7:7). To this is added that the Israelites considered the nations of Canaan to be greater than them and, therefore, difficult to dispossess (Deut. 7:17, 22). Besides, if the Lord were to drive out the people of Canaan, there would not be enough Israelites to inhabit the land. It would then become desolate, and the wild animals would become too numerous for them. Accordingly, God promised to drive out the Canaanites gradually (Ex. 23:29–30). Additional concerns about survival conditions in the wilderness are often raised, but one should take into consideration God's miraculous interventions. Although these arguments are worth reflection, the main challenge to this approach to the question is the consistent use of the number 600,000 in the Bible.

13:17—14:20. The Journey Begins. The Israelites were to avoid the area where the Philistines lived—v. 17 (called the “Ways of Horus” by the Egyptians and later the Via Maris). The Lord did not want the Israelites to be discouraged by the Egyptian garrisons that lined the shortest route to Canaan. He sent them around by way of the wilderness of the Red Sea (v. 18) to the south instead of along the northern trade and campaign route. Sometimes, God sends His children the “long way” around situations, an approach that often seems illogical. God’s ultimate goal is to build up their faith through their experience of His mighty works.

The Israelites went up from Egypt in organized military formation (v. 18; cf. 12:51). The original Hebrew verb in 13:18 derives from the number five and could be translated “and the

The Four-Hundred-Thirty-Year Sojourn

The chronology of the sojourn for the people of Israel has been a matter of debate. Part of the problem is that the Bible presents two different but related numbers of years: 400 years of affliction, according to Genesis 15:13 and Acts 7:6, and 430 years of sojourn, according to Exodus 12:40–41 and Galatians 3:16–17. If both ended in the same year as the Exodus event, when did both time periods begin?

1. Chronology of Exodus. The Masoretic texts of Exodus 12:40–41 give the impression that the 430 years covered the time from Jacob’s migration to Egypt until the Exodus. This would mean that the people of Israel lived in Egypt a total of 430 years. Those who hold this view argue that 400 is simply a round number and that the distinction between affliction and sojourn is a matter of semantics, thus allowing 430 years for the fulfillment of the prophecy.

2. Contribution of Paul. Paul discusses the connection between God’s promises to Abraham and the giving of the law at Sinai (Gal. 3:16–17), which was three months after the Exodus event (Ex. 19:1). Paul totals the years between the two occurrences at 430, the same number as Exodus 12:40–41. The promises are those of the covenant God, made to Abraham based on his faith. Consequently, the law, added 430 years later, does not change the promises received by faith. Although Paul is not dealing here with the chronology of the 430 years, he does provide for us the historical event that initiates the time period. It is the moment when God made and ratified His covenant with Abram as recorded in Genesis 15, which itself was promised in Ur some years earlier (Gen. 11:31–12:3). The only existing texts today that reflect this understanding are the Septuagint and the Samaritan Pentateuch. Both state that the 430 years were split between Canaan and Egypt.

3. Proposed Solutions. Looking a little more carefully at the chronological details, one notes that Abram was called by the Lord to leave Ur (Gen. 11:31–12:1) sometime before he was 75 years old (his age when he left Haran; Gen. 12:4). This was the beginning of the 430 years, according to Paul (Gal. 3:16–17). Isaac was born when Abraham was 100 years old (Gen. 21:5). The Bible mentions that during the celebration of Isaac’s weaning, he was despised by Hagar (an Egyptian) and her son Ishmael. As a result of the conflict (Gen. 21:8–12), Isaac was confirmed as the true seed of Abraham, and Hagar and her son were cast out. Weaning generally happened three years after birth. Thus, it is reasonable to expect that there were about thirty years between Abram’s call in Ur and the weaning of Isaac. This would make the weaning celebration the beginning of the 400-year affliction of Abraham’s descendants (through Sarah) by the Egyptians (Ishmael was half-Egyptian).

Isaac was 60 years old when Jacob and Esau were born (Gen. 25:26), and Jacob was 130 years old when he migrated to Egypt and referred to his years as a sojourn/pilgrimage (Gen. 47:9). The patriarchal period that began when Abram left Haran lasted 215 years ( $25 + 60 + 130 = 215$ ). If this is a correct reading of the biblical text, then the Israelites were in Egypt a total of about 215 years, beginning with Jacob’s migration to Egypt and ending with the Exodus. Although the biblical text seems to lean toward a shorter sojourn, it is best to avoid being dogmatic about whatever position is taken.

sons of Israel went up in fives”—that is, the people were divided into five major divisions. The Bible does not indicate the size of the divisions or the way in which they were organized, but it is important to remember that Moses, who was a prince of Egypt, was militarily trained and would have known how to organize a large group in military formation (PP 245). The same term is used in Joshua 1:14 and 4:12 to describe the organization of Israel before crossing the Jordan River to take possession of the promised land.

The location for the crossing of the sea that fits the biblical descriptions (see below, “The Route of the Exodus and Mount Sinai”) places the crossing at the Gulf of Suez where Jebel ‘Ataqah reaches down to the gulf. According to Numbers 33:7, the Israelites moved from Etham and turned back to Pi-Hahiroth (Ex. 14:1–9).

This could mean that they first moved down and camped southeast of the northern tip of the Gulf of Suez. Later realizing that they were trapped by the massive mountain range, they turned back to go around Pi-Hahiroth—“the mouth of the water”—toward the Sinai.

The Egyptian army was mobilized with chariots led by their king. The chariot was one of the most effective war machines, one which led to Egyptian supremacy throughout Asia. During the sixteen military campaigns of Thutmose III, innovators had perfected the lightweight and thereby easily maneuverable chariot, and these would be hastened to meet the Israelites.

As the Israelites made preparations to turn back from their dead-end position, they suddenly saw the army of Pharaoh and were terrified. But Moses encouraged them and told them to not be

The Route of the Exodus and Mount Sinai

The route of the Exodus and the location of Mount Sinai have been debated for centuries. The fact remains that Mount Sinai has never been positively identified. What follows is a review and evaluation of four of the major proposals made for the location of the Red Sea crossing.

1. Balah Lakes (South Central Route). The first proposal interprets the Hebrew phrase yam sup as “Reed Sea” instead of “Red Sea” (10:19; 13:18; 15:4, 22; 23:31). This is based on four arguments. First, the term sup derives from the Egyptian twf(y), “papyrus reeds.” Second, sup, when used alone without yam, refers to “reeds” (2:3). Third, reeds only grow along marshy freshwater banks, not at the Red Sea. Fourth, sup does not mean “red,” which was a mistranslation in the LXX. While it is true that sup when used alone means “reed,” recent studies have shown that when the OT refers to yam sup as a combined designation, it consistently refers to the Red Sea, as all modern translations of the Bible attest. Solomon refers to a fleet of his ships being stationed at Elath on the shore of the yam sup near Edom (1 Kin. 9:26), or the northern tip of the Gulf of Aqaba. Moses likewise refers to the Gulf of Aqaba as the Red Sea in Deuteronomy 1:40 and 2:1. These three biblical texts make it certain that the Red Sea was understood as the two fingers or gulfs of Suez and Aqaba and not a lake system on the border of Egypt.

The origin point of the Red Sea crossing is specified with geographical designations: Pi Hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, opposite Baal-Zephon (Ex. 14:2; Num. 33:7). These locations have been difficult to identify. Some have suggested that these points refer to actual Egyptian place names located in the north, near the beginning of the “Ways of Horus,” where the term migdol, “tower,” appears with a toponym later in the Nineteenth Dynasty reliefs of Seti I. But there remain several problems. (1) If the Red Sea and not the Reed Sea is meant, then the crossing must have been at either the Gulf of Suez or the Gulf of Aqaba. (2) The journey from Ramesses (Ex. 12:37) took the children of Israel to Succoth, which is identified as Tjaru, the Egyptian border town near the el-Balah lake district in the north. (3) According to Exodus 13:17–18, God did not lead them by the “way of the Philistines,” the biblical equivalent to the “Ways of Horus,” but sent Israel around by the wilderness of the Red Sea to the south, where they camped at Etham. (4) Crossing at the el-Balah lakes would have been the logical and shortest route, but the Lord told Moses that Pharaoh, noting the circuitous route of the Israelites, would conclude that they were confused by the land and had become enclosed by the wilderness (14:3). The route south and to the west of the Red Sea better fits this description.

2. Mediterranean (Northern Route). An extreme northern crossing over the spit of land separating the Mediterranean Sea from Lake Sirbonis has been suggested in connection with a natural tide of waters that would have swallowed the Egyptian army. But there are complications with this suggestion as well. (1) The route lies too close to the “Ways of Horus,” which the Lord told Israel to avoid. (2) Deuteronomy 1:2 states that Kadesh-barnea was an eleven-day march from Mount Sinai. This would suggest a location for Mount Sinai in the south, further from Kadesh-barnea. (3) This is the shortest route to Canaan, but the Israelites were expressly told to take a different route.

3. Gulf of Aqaba (East Central Route). Another theory is that the Israelites wandered across the Sinai Peninsula and crossed the Gulf of Aqaba into the Arabian Desert, where Mount Sinai was located at Gebel el-Lawz. Some proponents maintain that the Sinai belonged to Egypt and that Israel could not have wandered there because the text says they had left Egypt. Others claim they have located an underwater shelf from Nuweiba beach in Sinai extending across the gulf, and this was where the Israelites crossed. This theory is unlikely for several reasons. (1) The purported underwater shelf between Sinai and Arabia does not exist, according to soundings of the British Admiralty. (2) Chariot wheels in the Gulf of Aqaba have not been confirmed. (3) The distances between Succoth, Etham, and the Red Sea indicate a three-day journey, but the Israelites could not have covered 180 miles (290 km) to reach the Gulf of Aqaba in three days. (4) The biblical account clearly locates Mount Sinai/Horeb in the Sinai, not in Midian or Arabia (3:12; 19:1–2). To use the Galatians 4:25 reference to identify Mount Sinai as being in Arabia and to extend the understanding of geography in NT times back to the second millennium B.C. ignores the fact that in Paul’s time, Arabia included the Sinai Peninsula. (5) Although Egypt had copper mining activities at locations like Serabit el-Khadem, in the Sinai, the border of Egypt was at Tjaru/Succoth. The Egyptians did not consider Sinai as part of their territory in the Eighteenth or Nineteenth dynasties.

4. Gulf of Suez (Southern Route). Others have suggested a southern route that took the Israelites west of the Gulf of Suez. They understand the terms Pi Hahiroth, Migdol, and Baal Zephon as geographical or topographical features. Pi Hahiroth may refer to the “opening/mouth of the canal or water,” according to one etymology. The term migdol, “tower,” could refer to a mountain, as could Baal Zephon. If this is the case, then Pi Hahiroth may designate the opening mouth of the northern tip of the Gulf of Suez. If the Israelites camped to the east of the mountain range of Jebel ‘Ataqah, perhaps designated migdol as these were the closest mountains to the Nile delta to the south (Num. 33:7), their camp would have been located in between the mountains and the sea. As one writer observed, “The Hebrews were encamped beside the sea, whose waters presented a seemingly impassible barrier before them, while on the south a rugged mountain obstructed further progress” (PP 283–84). This description corresponds well with the location southwest of Suez and seems to be the best option. On the other hand, there are no mountains in the north around the el-Balah lake system or the “Ways of Horus,” which rules out the northern locations.

afraid (v. 13). Was not the pillar of cloud-encased fire with them (13:21–22; 14:19–20)? Was not the Angel of the Lord moving between them and the armies of Egypt (14:19; 23:20–23; 33:2)? Moses adjured the people to stand firmly still (v. 13). How often do followers of Christ fail to stand still but instead try to work out their own salvation? God instructs, “Be still and know that I am God” (Ps. 46:10a). Moses reassured the Israelites that the Lord would fight for them and that they should simply be silent (v. 14). The Christian can have a true sense of shalom—“peace,” “health,” “well-being”—even amid the greatest threats and trials, for God is stronger than any opponent.

14:21–30. The Parting of the Sea. A way is made as the sea is divided, or split open (v. 21). The verb baqa’ here indicates a violent, sudden action, such as splitting wood (Eccl. 10:9) or splitting a rock (Judg. 15:19). The waters were walls on their right hand and on their left (v. 22). It is unclear how high these walls of water were, but a natural explanation does not seem to fit the violent description of the “split” or “cleaved” waters and the resulting walls. The Lord then caused a strong east wind to dry a passage through the sea.

As the pillar of cloud-encased fire followed the Israelites into the sea, the Egyptians followed them. The terms used here are comprehensive: the text mentions that all of Pharaoh’s horses, chariots, and horsemen (v. 23) pursued the Israelites. If true to Egyptian military practice, Pharaoh would have led the pursuit up to the point of attack, at which point he would have held back. Egyptian armies consistently appear in Egyptian art in perfect order and symmetry while their enemies are in disarray. But suddenly, the roles were reversed (v. 24). Charioteers veered off to the right and left as chariot wheels fell off (v. 25). Horses stumbled. The God who ordered creation was fighting for Israel, as Israel moved on in martial array. The Egyptians attempted to turn and run. Moses raised his hand once again, and the waters surged back over the Egyptians (v. 27). Not one Egyptian who entered the Red Sea survived, and not one Israelite was lost (vv. 28–29). The emphasis in vv. 30–31 is that Israel “saw”; they witnessed the destruction of their feared enemy. The final triumph of the Lord over Egypt was at that point accomplished. Pharaoh, the god-king, was defeated (Ps. 136:15). So it will be at the close of the cosmic conflict, when all evil powers will be overcome and the enemy will be defeated. God saves those who trust His word and fear Him.

15:1–19. Song of Moses. This song is the poetic recounting of God’s saving act at the Red Sea. The people could not have helped but sing and make a joyful noise after God’s miraculous intervention. This is the earliest song recorded in Scripture and consists of three stanzas. Each stanza begins with praises to the Lord and ends with the reasons for praising the Lord. The Lord is praised because He is our salvation (v. 2). His name is powerful, and by that power, Pharaoh’s armies are no more (v. 4). Though the forces of evil may plot the destruction of God’s children, God’s right hand delivers them, overthrowing their enemies. The motif of the right hand of Pharaoh as that which delivers Egypt’s enemy is often found in Egyptian texts. Here, this image is contrasted with the right hand of the Lord, which is glorious and majestic in power (v. 6).

The certainty of this redemptive act of God in history assures us that we have nothing to fear for the future. The last stanza focuses on future enemies who would be faced in the conquest of Canaan. Because of God’s powerful “arm,” they would be “as still as a stone” (v. 16). When we face certain impossibilities, when we feel cornered and do not know which way to turn, we can find assurance in “The Song of Moses,” for it commemorates a great event in the history of God’s people. God’s past intervention in our lives assures us that He will carry us and plant us on the “mountain of His inheritance,” where the Lord reigns forever and ever (vv. 17–18). Women participated in the singing (vv. 20–21). Miriam prophesied to the women, and the women responded in a refrain with dances and timbrels. Dancing was an expression of holy joy (Ps. 149:3; 150:4), not to be confused with the

Crossing the Sea

The logistics of leading two million Israelites across the Red Sea in one night are not difficult to conceive. The Israelites were not an unorganized group of men, women, and children moving through the desert in a haphazard manner. They were organized in martial array, perhaps in five divisions (13:18). It should not be assumed that they left Egypt in single file. The width of the dry land God created in the midst of the sea is not known, but given Israel’s formation, it might have been one mile (1.6 km) wide. Divided into five divisions, the Israelites may have stood 600 abreast, which would have been less than half a mile (.8 km) wide. Thus, each of the five divisions of 402,000 (600 abreast and 670 deep) could have occupied less than four miles (in length, adding another mile (1.6 km) for flocks and herds. Given that the rate of walking would not have exceeded more than thirty minutes for one mile (1.6 km), and the length of the sea crossing at that location was about ten miles (16 km), the crossing could have been accomplished within eight hours, or in one night.

licentious dancing of Herodias's daughter before Herod (Matt. 14:6; Mark 6:22). This song points to the one that will be sung by all those who, in the final day of deliverance, will stand on the sea of glass with Jesus (Rev. 15:3).

15:22—18:27

The Journey to Sinai

The deliverance of Israel from Pharaoh's army at the Red Sea indicated that the people were free from the threat of Egypt at last. After the plagues, this marked the final victory of God over the gods and powers of Egypt. From this moment on, Israel would journey with God as their King. Under this theocracy, God wanted Israel to learn total dependence upon Him and to walk by faith. The journey to Sinai was marked by the itinerary described in Exodus 15 and elaborated upon in more detail in Numbers 33. Moses kept meticulous records of the camping locations until they reached Mount Sinai/Horeb. Egyptian texts suggest that this type of record-keeping was practiced during this period by scribes recording Egyptian military campaigns. Over the course of time, many of these oases have disappeared, making it very difficult to reconstruct the journey precisely. Taking into consideration the rate of travel per day, it seems most likely that Mount Sinai/Horeb was located in the southern part of the Sinai Peninsula (see "The Route of the Exodus and Mount Sinai," p. 212).

15:22—17:16. Miracles of Deliverance. By leading them through the wilderness, God was teaching Israel to trust in Him. The Red Sea seemed to be immovable obstacle, but they would face further impossibilities to test their faith. Each time, God would show them that He could and would supply their needs.

First, God provided water for them (vv. 22–27). For a large group of people, donkeys, cattle, and sheep in a parched desert, water was vital, and after three days it was running out. The first oasis Israel came to after traveling for some forty-seven miles (75 km) south of Suez may have been 'Ain Hawdrah, although the exact itinerary is not certain. Its water is still bitter today, a fact which (if this is the same location) indicates that the miracle of God through Moses was not of a permanent nature. When the people tasted the water, they grumbled to Moses (v. 24). How typical of human nature! God had just delivered Israel from the Red Sea less than forty-eight hours before, and when faced with the first test, they complained. Interestingly, the Hebrew word referring to God's "test" of the people in v. 25 can also mean "trained" (cf. notes on Gen. 22:1). There is potential for growth in adversity.

Moses was instructed to find a tree and throw it into the water. This was a miracle from God, who used the tree to do what a tree by itself could not achieve. This experience illustrates the correlation between serving the Lord and health. If the people of Israel would have listened to Him by doing what was right in His estimation, God promised to keep them from all the diseases of the Egyptians, for He is the God who heals (v. 26). This promise underlines the significant concern for health visible in the Pentateuchal laws. A similar promise is repeated on the border to Canaan (Deut. 32:39).

The Miracle of the Manna

Some commentators have suggested a natural explanation for the manna, such as the gum secretions of the tamarisk bush. However, there are many indications that the provision of the manna was, in fact, a supernatural act of God. (1) The tamarisk bush only makes these secretions in June and July, while the manna was continuous for forty years. (2) The timing of delivery of the manna was unique. It was provided six days a week, and on the sixth day, twice as much was available. The double portion of manna from the sixth day would not spoil but would be preserved until the seventh day. On any other day, the manna would spoil if saved overnight. On the seventh-day Sabbath, no manna would fall. These specific sequences suggest a miraculous event. (3) The gift of the manna was so significant that Moses commanded Aaron to place an omer of manna in the ark of the covenant. (4) In the NT, Paul calls manna a supernatural food (1 Cor. 10:3). (5) Jesus compared the miraculous gift of Himself as the bread of life with manna that had come down from heaven (John 6:31–63).

God desired to save Israel, not only from Egyptian servitude but also from the diseases of the Egyptians (Deut. 7:15; 28:27, 35). Forensic studies of ancient Egyptian mummies indicate that the upper classes of Egyptian society suffered from the same diseases that plague the affluent today. If a mummy recently identified as Hatshepsut is genuine, then later in life she was obese, suffering from clogged arteries and diabetes. God had previously demonstrated His desire to save His people during the plagues, when disease fell on the Egyptians and their domesticated animals, but Israel and their livestock were protected. In this same manner, God here shared His plan to promote the Israelites' future health. Had they obeyed, they might have given both spiritual and physical light to the nations in truth and well-being (cf. PP 378).

Second, God provided food for the people (16:1–21). The people said man hu' ("What is it?"). This became the name of the food—man in Hebrew and manna in the Greek LXX and NT. The manna was similar to white coriander seed with a taste like honey, flaky, and as fine as frost (16:14, 31; Num. 11:8). It could be ground into a kind of flour, boiled, or made into cakes. It is often described as "heaven's grain" (Deut. 8:3, 16; Neh. 9:20; Ps. 78:24; see "The Miracle of the Manna," p. 215). Through this miracle, God demonstrated to Israel—as well as to future believers—crucial lessons for their journey to the promised land. He will abundantly provide for the needs of His children according to what He knows is best. The human tendency is to long for and return to familiar habits, and Israel was no exception. God indulged their desires but worked out a better plan that would train them to trust and depend on Him. He would provide them with sustenance for their bodies that was superior to the diet of Egypt, which included meat.

Third, God reaffirmed the importance of rest (16:22–30). The daily gift of manna served to train the Israelites concerning proper Sabbath observance. The instruction to gather what they needed in the first days of the week and the miracle of a double provision on the sixth day were given to test them in regard to whether they would follow His torah—"law" or "instruction" (vv. 4–5). The text clearly suggests that the Sabbath had been observed since the creation of the world and did not originate during the giving of the law at Sinai. Despite those who did not follow God's instructions, His plan for the Sabbath did not change but became normative throughout their journeys. God provides for His children according to their needs. It is easy to worry about the future, but God's care is sufficient for each day, teaching constant reliance on Him (Matt. 6:11).

Fourth, God wanted the people to remember His blessings (vv. 31–36). The manna was to be kept as a perpetual reminder of God's deliverance and to be put before the Lord, to be kept for subsequent generations (v. 33).

Fifth, God provided water for a second time (17:1–7). After the provision of the manna, there arose another crisis of faith over water. The Lord was teaching His children total dependence on Him. The question raised by Moses is notable: What should I do with these people (v. 4)? During his forty years of exile from Egypt, Moses had learned implicit confidence in the One who had led him from pasture to pasture with his flocks. His question demonstrates the exemplary posture of a leader of God's people. Rather than depend on his own abilities, Moses asked, "What shall I do?" When humanity solicits God's help, He intervenes. In providing the water from the rock at Rephidim, God demonstrated His sovereignty before the elders of Israel so that they could then go and witness to the people. Just as the manna was a type for Christ (John 6:31–63), so also was the water (John 4:14).

Sixth, God blessed the people with victory over their enemies (Ex. 17:8–16). The battle with the Amalekites, the descendants of Esau, initiated a feud that would last through the generations to the establishment of the monarchy under Saul (1 Sam. 15:2–3). This was the first battle Israel was to fight against another nation and would test their reliance on God. The Amalekites used guerilla tactics, fighting the Israelites from behind, where the weak and feeble were easy prey (Deut. 25:18). Joshua appeared here for the first time and commanded the forces against the enemy while Moses stood upon the mountain with the rod of God outstretched. Moses once again demonstrated his absolute dependence on God; however, he did not act alone—he was assisted by others. Here lies a lesson for the Christian today. One cannot prevail in the battles of this life without trusted companions for support. Moses was in earnest prayer on behalf of God's people, supported by Aaron and Hur (vv. 10–13).

18:1–27. Visit of Jethro. The visit of Jethro marked an important development in Moses's leadership effectiveness and Israel's organizational structure. Through the wise counsel of Jethro, God was able to preserve the energies of His chosen leader. Moses had sent Zipporah and their sons back to her father for safety before his confrontations with Pharaoh in Egypt, and the time had come for them to be reunited. Jethro escorted Moses's family to Mount Sinai/Horeb. Jethro's response on hearing about God's deliverance of the Hebrews from Egypt demonstrated that he was truly a righteous man who recognized the uniqueness of the Lord and His superiority to all other gods (v. 11).

As godly priest of Midian, Jethro offered Moses sage advice as he watched a day in the life of God's chosen leader. From morning until evening, people came to Moses with complaints or problems to resolve (v. 14). Why not delegate his burdens by establishing leadership positions over groups of a thousand, groups of a hundred, groups of fifty, and groups of ten? These rulers were not merely judges but heads over their companies in times of peace and war. Their positions involved both civil and military aspects. These men were to be competent, God-fearing, honest men who were not greedy (v. 21). Under God's approval, Moses would be able to endure and serve His people more effectively. Moses did everything Jethro advised (v. 24). Effective leadership cannot be accomplished by one person alone. Responsibilities must be delegated. Courageous servant-leaders share their duties with others and work in harmony to bring about the ultimate goal, namely, that of entering the promised land.

GOD ESTABLISHES HIS COVENANT PEOPLE

This central section of Exodus describes the arrival of the people at Sinai (19:1–9) and their meeting with the Lord (19:10–25). In preparation for entering into a covenant with His people, God majestically promulgated the Ten Commandments (20:1–17), gave additional laws—the book of the covenant (20:22–23:19)—and called the people to covenant faithfulness (23:20–33). The covenant was formally made between God and His people (24:1–8), and the section concludes with a meeting between Moses and the Lord on the mountain (24:9–18).

This section reveals that the invincible God who was active in salvation is a God who was also willing to dwell close to His people and who wanted to formalize His relationship with them. The Sinai covenant was decisive for both Israel and for humanity as a whole (see “Covenant,” p. 905). It was essentially a continuation, enlargement, and particularization of God's earlier covenants, containing, in essence, the same design, purpose, and goal of redemption for the human race. The Sinai covenant was not a covenant of works aimed at teaching the Israelites salvation through obedience to the law. Like the covenant that God made with Abraham and the other patriarchs, this one was also a covenant of grace. Surely it demanded obedience, but this obedience was not a way to gain salvation. It was a way to express gratitude to God for the salvation already provided and experienced—redemption from Egypt.

Arrival at Sinai

As Israel established camp at the base of Mount Sinai, the God who had revealed Himself in judgments against Egypt would reveal Himself to His redeemed people as the covenant Lord. The giving of the law is one of the major focal points of the Torah, if not the entire OT. Although the law was recognized in Genesis (PP 363), here it would be formally written by God's own finger for the children of Israel.

19:1–8. A Peculiar People. The journey of the Israelites through the wilderness took them to the mountain of God, located in the wilderness of Sinai. This is in agreement with other passages that locate Mount Sinai/Horeb in the Sinai Peninsula (3:12; Num. 10:12). The journey may have taken about forty-five days, which suggests that they camped for considerable time at certain locations before moving to the place where they would remain for the remaining events recounted in the book. At Mount Sinai, the Lord revealed His plan and purpose for Israel (vv. 3–8). This was the first time that God personally (through Moses) instructed Israel since carrying them on eagles' wings from Egypt (v. 4; Deut. 32:11–12). Three unique statements were made concerning God's covenant people.

First, they were to become God's own possession, a special treasure (v. 5). In contrast to other types of possessions, such as real estate, Israel became God's personally obtained and privately owned treasure because of His love and affection (cf. Deut. 7:6; 14:2; 26:18, 19), which implies deep value and a special relationship. Second, they were set apart as a kingdom of priests (v. 6). This phrase is found only here in the entire OT. God's particular choice of one people had universal implications. While not every Israelite was a priest, as a nation they were to function, in one way or another, as God's priestly agents, to bless all the nations of the world. Third, Israel was to become a holy nation, specially dedicated to God (cf. 1 Pet. 2:9). Again, this phrase is used only once in the OT although the modified expression "holy people" can be found a number of times in Deuteronomy (Deut. 7:6; 14:2, 21; 26:19; 28:9). It was God's promise and design to make them holy by separating them from all other nations. The Israel of the covenant was to be primarily a religious entity (see Lev. 19:2; Ezek. 36:25–28).

Obedience to God's commandments, included in the terms of the covenant, made the holiness of the people visible. The Lord planned to establish Israel as His own holy people (Deut. 28:9; cf. 7:6–9), and to that end, He called them to keep His commandments. In fulfillment of His covenant promises, He made obedience possible by dwelling among them. In this sense, holiness is not something humans can achieve through their own strength but rather something received and reflected in a life of faith and obedience. The response of the people to God's gracious offer, grounded in their redemption from Egypt, is clear: they promised to do everything the Lord had said (v. 8; cf. Ex. 24:7). But the eagerness of the people to do so is ironic when compared with their subsequent failures.

19:9–25. Meeting a Holy God. God gave specific instructions for how Israel should prepare to meet Him. They were to sanctify themselves through outward ritual purification reflecting inner conviction. This included washing their garments (v. 14; cf. Num. 8:21), abstaining from sexual relations as part of the purification required (v. 15; cf. Lev. 15:18), and building a fence around the mountain (v. 12). The Lord's presence made the mountain holy. There is hardly any reason to believe that the mountain was volcanic and that God's presence caused an eruption. This naturalistic interpretation should not be imposed on a supernatural event. Throughout the OT, theophanies or powerful manifestations of God coming down to earth are associated with earthquakes (Ps. 77:18; Is. 29:6; Amos 8:8; Nah. 1:4), lightning (Zech. 9:14), and smoke or clouds (Is. 6:4; 19:1). The Second Coming will likewise be accompanied by an earthquake, lightning, and Jesus riding on a cloud (Matt. 24:27; Luke 21:27; Rev. 14:14; 16:18) together with a voice and the sound of a trumpet (Matt. 24:31; 1 Cor. 15:52; Rev. 4:1).

Moses and Aaron were called up to the mountain to speak with God, but the priests and the people were to stay within the boundaries (v. 24; see the section on Theology in the Introduction). Order is part of the nature of God's people. They were to stand within the camp and not cross the boundaries, for if they did, death would ensue (v. 12). As the Lord came down, Moses went up (v. 20). It was only because God came down that Moses was able to approach.

The Ten Commandments

Here is found the most important piece of legislation in human history. The law came out of the mouth of the Lord and was written by His own finger; therefore, this religious/moral code is immovable and unchangeable. It determines how humans should relate to God and to each other (see "The Decalogue in Deuteronomy and Exodus," p. 322). There is no evidence in the OT or the NT that God intended to modify or abolish the Ten Commandments. Submission to them constitutes a joy and a pleasure for Christian believers.

20:1–2. Preamble. The Ten Commandments, or ten words, are located within the context of God's redeeming grace that freed His people from the bondage of Egypt. God revealed Himself in this tangible demonstration of love—not in abstract or philosophical terms, but as a God who acts in history. Only love can produce a response of love and obedience (Deut. 5:6). The experience and memory of redemption brings together gospel and law. Only the Redeemer can call His people to love Him with all their hearts (Deut. 6:5; cf. Ps. 18:1; Jer. 2:2; Matt. 22:37). Thus, the first four commandments focus on our worship of God (Rev. 14:7), for it is only in the context of loving worship that we will be able to live in harmony with those around us. The law then defines our relationship with God on the vertical level and our relationship with humanity on the horizontal. The last six commandments are summarized in the words "Love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev. 19:18; Matt. 19:19). Jesus revealed the relational nature of the Decalogue when He said that those who love Him will obey His commands (John 14:15).

Eight of the Ten Commandments are often interpreted as being negative: "Do not...." But in the context of the introduction, which reveals God as the great deliverer, these may also be interpreted in the following way: "Because I am the Lord who brought you out of the land of Egypt.... You will have no other gods before me.” This reveals the reason for keeping the commandments—out of love and devotion for the One who created and redeemed humanity. The Hebrew negative term lo’—“do not”—is to be understood not only as a prohibition but also as an enabling promise.

20:3. First Commandment. Although Israel came out of the polytheistic world of ancient Egypt and would enter the polytheistic world of Canaan, they were set apart to worship the one true and living God. The Lord who made heaven and earth will not share worship with any other, for there is no other (see Is. 37:19). In fashioning for themselves gods, the surrounding nations came to worship nature and themselves. Little has changed in the modern scientific age, which is focused on autonomous reason and experience. Humanity is placed at the center of the universe, and we degrade ourselves when we worship nature and the works of our minds and hands (Rom. 1:22–25).

20:4–6. Second Commandment. The ancient Egyptians believed that by following the activities portrayed on tomb reliefs, images, and statues, the soul of the deceased could experience the afterlife. They deified all aspects of nature, such as the sun and the moon “in heaven above,” the animals and trees “on earth beneath,” and the Nile River, which was the sea of “water beneath.” These images lowered humanity’s conception of God (PP 373). Idolatry was a phenomenon practiced not only in the ancient world but also throughout human history, even in modern times. Paul was greatly disturbed when he observed the pervasive idolatry in Athens (Acts 17:16). Paul’s message to the Areopagus, the philosophical leaders of Athens, was that God cannot be reduced to a mere object.

The Lord God, the Creator of all things, alone deserves worship and honor. By worshiping nature rather than the Creator, humanity places itself under the control of demonic deception. We are not to attempt to fashion God’s image, we are to be restored to God’s image. It is in this context that many OT passages equate Israel to a harlot, or an unfaithful wife, for pursuing foreign gods (Ex. 34:15–16; Jer. 3:1; Hos. 2:5). We are called to be exclusively faithful to God, who longs to show us His divine mercy and love (v. 6). The commandment states that unfaithfulness to God will impact the third and fourth generations. Through hereditary tendencies and the imitation of parents and culture, the sin is passed down. Today, idols can be anything to which we assign the priority and commitment that belong only to God. In popular culture, movie stars, athletes, and musicians receive the honor, respect, and admiration that only God deserves, as our Redeemer. Furthermore, time spent in the use of contemporary means of communication bombards the senses with the unimportant and desensitizes the mind. The focus has shifted away from the infinite God who created the universe. God’s word alone provides an accurate image of who He is and what He has done for us.

20:7. Third Commandment. The name of the Lord is to be respected, honored, and revered. It should not be spoken carelessly. It should not be invoked in a dishonest oath. The name of the Lord is awesome in significance. It is by His name that He reveals Himself (3:13; 33:19) and by invoking His name that people are blessed (Num. 6:27). His name is to be praised (Ps. 145:2), for it is exalted (Ps. 148:13). Engaging in false worship profanes His name (Lev. 20:3; 21:6). Those who enter into a covenant relationship with the Lord are also called by His name. If they are known as followers of God but do not live as followers of God, then their witness (James 1:26) and their worship are in vain (Is. 1:11; Matt. 15:7–9). Believers represent God in every aspect of their lives.

20:8–11. Fourth Commandment. The Sabbath is a gift from God to humanity, instituted at Creation (see “The Sabbath Commandment in Deuteronomy,” p. 323). This commandment stands at the center of the ten words as a reminder of God’s creative act and His relational nature in our lives. It is the longest commandment. It has a distinct syntactic structure and specifies the what, when, how, and why of Sabbath observation. First, we are instructed what to do. We are to remember the Sabbath day. There is a double meaning here. On the one hand, we are pointed back to Creation week to recall what God accomplished. We are also reminded to keep the Sabbath holy. We are to sanctify it, or set it apart for holy use. Thus, by remembering that on the seventh day of Creation God blessed and made holy the Sabbath, setting it for communion with Him, we continue worshiping the One who is the giver of all life.

Second, the commandment specifies when we are to remember: the seventh day is a Sabbath of our God (v. 10). The seven-day cycle of the week was instituted at Creation. The week was not related to any other natural order (the earth rotating on its axis for a 24-hour day, or revolving around the sun for the year). This measurement of time was ordained by the Creator, and we are invited to commemorate this great event with Him every week on the seventh day. That God Himself rested on the Sabbath (Gen. 2:2) and that the Sabbath was observed by the Israelites in their weekly collection of manna (Ex. 16:23–26) demonstrates that the commandment of the seventh-day Sabbath was established and known long before Sinai.

Third, the commandment describes how we are to keep the Sabbath. We are to do no work (v. 10; cf. Ex. 23:12), “to desist,” “to cease” (which is what the verb form shabat—a term related to the noun shabbat—means) from our daily labor. We work during the first six days of the week, but the seventh day is a divinely instituted time reserved for God. The command to rest extends to the entire household. The whole family, as well as servants, livestock, and guests, are to enjoy the peace of the Sabbath. The extended household also should enjoy the rejuvenation of resting in the Lord as part of the family of God.

Finally, the commandment tells us why we are to keep the Sabbath. “In six days the LORD made the heavens and the earth, the sea, and all that is in them.” Then He rested on the seventh day, as an example to us (v. 11). But He also spent that day enjoying the fellowship of Adam and Eve. Therefore, He blessed the Sabbath day and sanctified it, or made it holy (v. 11; cf. Gen. 2:3). It is blessed because this relational God desires communion with us. It is holy because He set it apart for us. Spending time with our Creator renews us spiritually and physically. Calling the world to worship the Creator (Rev. 14:7) and to keep His commandments will be a special characteristic of the remnant living just before Jesus returns (Rev. 12:17; 14:12; see “Creation, Sabbath, and the Sanctuary,” p. 231).

20:12. Fifth Commandment. Our relationship with God, as prescribed in the first four commandments, is here brought to bear on the single most important relational unit on earth—the family. Both the fourth and fifth commandments begin with positive injunctions. God’s plan for preserving the family is foundational to the church and society. Here, children receive their first instruction in obedience, courtesy, respect, and honor. All of life’s most important lessons are to be initially taught in the home.

God emphasizes this relationship with the words “Honor your father and your mother.” This honor and respect for properly instituted authority will spill over into the way we relate to society.

Here, the verb “to honor” (Heb. kabad) implies a continuous action and attitude, indicating that to honor one’s parents is not a onetime event. As long as one’s parents are alive, they are worthy of honor. “Honor” also means “heavy” or “weighty” and is the word used when God is given glory. How we honor our parents is a very weighty matter. Fathers and mothers carry the authority of governance in the home. How do children give their parents honor? By caring for them and obeying them “in all things, for this is well pleasing to the Lord” (Col. 3:20; cf. Eph. 6:1).

There is a promise associated with honor and obedience. The children of Israel had just come out of Egypt and were entering a new land. God promised them that if they honored their parents, their days would be long in the new land of Canaan. This promise is also for us. Even though disobedience to parents is one of the characteristics of people living in the last days (Rom. 1:30; 2 Tim. 3:2), there will also be those who remain in an honorable relationship with their parents, willing to listen to their instruction in the ways of God, His love, and His salvation. They too will enjoy a long life in the heavenly kingdom.

20:13. Sixth Commandment. Honoring the life of our neighbor is one of the sacred duties of humanity (Gen. 9:5–6). Jesus extended this commandment to incorporate not only the physical act of murder but also anger (Matt. 5:21–22). John the apostle included hatred (1 John 3:14–15). The story of Cain and Abel indicates not only how rapidly sin infected the first family of God but also how anger toward a brother can lead to murder (Gen. 4:5–8). Our thoughts and words must be guarded and focused on the respect and honor due to others because they were also created in the image of God.

20:14. Seventh Commandment. Instituted at Creation, marriage is the most sacred trust instituted by God between man and woman (Gen. 1:27–28; 2:21–23). The union between husband and wife forms the bond that holds the family together (Gen. 2:24) and exemplifies the union between Christ and the church (Eph. 5:31–32). This commandment protects marriage and trust, which adultery destroys. The commandment also extends to other forms of sexual immorality, such as premarital sex (called “fornication”; 1 Cor. 6:13–17; Eph. 5:3–4). Sexual purity is a matter of the heart. Jesus warns against the lust of the flesh and committing adultery in one’s heart (Matt. 5:28). In our media-driven society, sexual immorality has become a multibillion-dollar industry. Faithful vigilance on the part of Christians protects not only the sacred bonds of marriage but also their own souls (cf. Prov. 6:32–33), or their connection to God and the salvation it brings (1 Cor. 6:9–10). As far-reaching as the impact of sexual sin is, the grace of God offers the sinner redemption (1 Cor. 6:11) as well as the power to leave sin behind (John 8:11).

20:15. Eighth Commandment. Faithful stewardship and selfless giving are essential to the life of a follower of God and greatly impact relationships between neighbors and with God. Stealing breaks these relationships. When we take what is not ours, we exhibit a lack of trust in God to care for our needs, and we deprive our neighbors of God’s providence for them. Stealing does not simply involve property theft but also extends to other practices in society. Greed has led companies to cheat employees by downsizing their workforces and forcing the remaining employees to do more work than they are being paid for. It has led employees to help themselves to office supplies and cheat on their time cards. This commandment protects people from being the victim of theft and from acting the part of the perpetrator. Our time and talents are gifts from God. We are accountable not only to God but also to our families and employers. Whenever we seek to gain from the loss of others or are more devoted to our private advantage than to equity, we infringe on the government of God.

One of the great responsibilities God gave humanity at Creation was the stewardship of the world (Gen. 1:26, 28). Good stewardship requires hard work and dedication (Prov. 6:10–11) to maintaining and increasing our God-given gifts and talents (Matt. 25:14–30). It shapes our characters into the likeness of God, who is the most sublime Giver. Everything we own belongs to Him, and we have been called to share it with those who are less fortunate than we are (Deut. 10:18; Acts 6:1–2). The rich young ruler was instructed by Jesus to give all that he had to the poor, to take up the cross and follow Him (Mark 10:21). When we find joy in giving, we will be less inclined to take or hoard what ultimately belongs to God.

20:16. Ninth Commandment. Honesty and integrity, or truthfulness, is the basis for trust in human relationships and is the core of God’s character. He is truth (Deut. 32:4; Ps. 31:5), and everything He does is true and faithful (Heb. ’emunah; Ps. 33:4). The entirety of His word is truth (Ps. 119:160; John 17:17), and His truth or fidelity (’emunah) continues throughout all generations (Ps. 100:5; cf. 117:2). Jesus is the way, the truth, and the life (John 14:6), and He sent His Spirit, who would guide us into all truth (John 16:13). Because the followers of Christ are to be transformed into His likeness, Paul urges Christians to be honest with one another—for we are members of each other in the same body (Eph. 4:25)—and to learn truth (1 Tim. 2:4).

The commandment addresses perjury in a court of law (23:1) but applies to speaking falsely about others, damaging their character, or slandering their reputation through falsehood and gossip (Ps. 31:13; 101:5; Prov. 10:18). Focusing on an individual’s faults, having a critical attitude, or gossiping can give one a sense of superiority, but it essentially destroys another person for the sake of one’s own ego. Character assassination does not foster positive relationships, nor does it draw the individual or neighbor closer to God. Remaining silent when others take part in these actions, rather than standing up for the individual, is also being dishonest, for it allows lies and deceit to go unchecked. The suppression of truth is not worthy of a disciple of the God who is truth.

20:17. Tenth Commandment. This commandment stands at the root of the other nine because it addresses the heart, where thoughts determine actions. Most other ancient laws dealt with actions, but not the motives behind those actions. God sees the heart (Gen. 6:5; 1 Sam. 16:7; Heb. 4:13), and it is upon our hearts that God desires to place His character (2 Cor. 3:3). Desiring that which is not ours, whether a neighbor’s property, wife, servants, or anything that we do not possess, can lead us to break the preceding commandments. We are called to be content with what God gives us and employ those gifts to honor Him for the glory of His kingdom. In a world that is obsessed with materialism, the challenge for the believer is to be fully content in Him. True contentment requires submission and obedience to His will (1 Tim. 6:6–10).

20:18–20. The People’s Response. God’s presence on the mountain impressed the people with its power and magnificence. They were terrified at the sights and sounds coming from the mountain. The Lord had spoken directly to them, and the experience was terrifying, partly because they recognized that they were sinners. Their sense of wretchedness in the presence of God's holiness caused them to tremble (cf. Is. 6:4–5). But Moses instructed them not to be afraid or to forget this experience because this had happened so that reverence for God would keep them from sin (v. 20). How often humans become arrogant and sin boldly, forgetting the almighty power of the Creator who is able, through His everlasting love, to empower us to live holy lives!

The Book of the Covenant

There are several legal sections in the Pentateuch, built upon the principles of the Decalogue, that serve to instruct God's people regarding the application of the law of God in daily life. Many of these laws could be referred to as law cases, where God deals with issues that His people are likely to face. In the next three chapters, some of these situations are described in what is called the "book of the covenant" (24:7). In contrast to the Ten Commandments, these were given to Moses privately, to be communicated to the people. These laws provided the new nation of Israel with God's perspective on many issues, such as the sanctity of life, marriage, commemorative holy days, the Sabbath, and personal rights. Through these laws, God created within the covenant a social and religious order—one that, if followed, would result in a righteous society with its members at peace with God and each other.

20:22–26. Law of the Altar. Verses 22 and 23 serve as a transition to the new regulations. God spoke to the people from heaven without being seen; therefore, they were not to make any image of Him. How should they worship Him? At this point, the Lord asked them to worship Him by offering sacrifices to Him on an altar made of earth. It would be a place of meeting for God and His people, chosen by Him, where He would bless them. In the ancient world, there were many types of altars and associated modes of worship. Excavations have revealed altars dating back to the earliest periods of history. God instructed that if the altars were made of stone, they were not to be finished with tools but were to be built of unhewn stone so that the craftsmanship would not become an object of worship. The focus would remain on God and the sacrificial victim that pointed to Christ. In order to preserve proper decorum, there should not be many steps leading up to the altar.

21:1. Ordinances Set before Them. Some have suggested that many of the laws in Exodus 21–23 and other parts of the Pentateuch were borrowed from ancient extrabiblical law codes (Eshnunna, Hammurabi, Hittite, and Assyrian). Although similarities may be expected since most societies have legislation against murder, theft, and other crimes, comparisons must also take into account the differences between these sources. No other law code was based on a covenant relationship between a god or gods and a people. Additionally, all the other known law codes were produced by a particular culture, whereas Hebrew legislation came through divine revelation. Further comparisons suggest that biblical laws were less harsh in the treatment of women and servants.

21:2–11. Rights of Slaves. Israel had come out of slavery from Egypt, and they were here given strict laws that protected slaves from the cruelty they themselves had experienced. Sometimes poverty forced people to sell themselves or their children into slavery. Debtors were sold by their creditors, but under no circumstances were Hebrew slaves to serve in perpetuity against their will; they were to be released after six years (v. 2). Only if servants wished to continue serving their masters would they be allowed to do so (vv. 5–6). The rights given to servants under these circumstances protected them from injustice.

21:12–32. Laws Concerning Physical Violence and Lex Talionis. These law cases parallel the fifth and sixth commandments. Dishonoring parents by physically striking them was a most serious capital offense (Deut. 21:18–21). Cursing parents was equated with blaspheming God (Lev. 24:16). This law reflects the honor and dignity due to parents, who stand before their children in the place of God (cf. PP 308). Murderers were to be punished based on intentionality. Premeditated murder was punishable by death (v. 14), but asylum in the "cities of refuge" was offered in cases that were not premeditated (v. 13; Num. 35:9–28; Deut. 19:1–13). Slaves or servants in the ANE were the sole property of their owners, who had complete control in decisions of life and death. Biblical legislation gave slaves certain legal rights. Justice and mercy were demonstrated in these legislations. The principle of

“an eye for an eye” is found throughout vv. 23–32 and in two additional passages in the Pentateuch (Lev. 24:17–22; Deut. 19:15–21), and Jesus also referred to it (Matt. 5:38–41). The action itself was never carried out literally in the Bible (the exception being “a life for a life”). The principle implied is that punishment for injuries done to a person or an animal is to be commensurate with the harm done. Revenge, which often escalated a situation and led to more harm, was forbidden. The punishment for children and adults was the same, underlining the high level of value placed on children (vv. 22–25).

21:33–22:15. Laws Concerning Property.

In an agricultural economy, where animals were considered indispensable to the landowner, this category of property was especially protected in the cases of accidental harm, injury, or loss. According to the circumstances, the appropriate compensation was specified. The specific law cases dealing with theft indicate how seriously the offense is regarded by God. The owner was to be compensated fivefold for a stolen ox, fourfold for a lamb (22:1), and twofold if the thief were caught within twenty-four hours with the stolen animal (v. 4). The restitution was comparable to the value of the animal and, in the latter case, how long the offender had deprived the owner from the service of the animal.

Property damage to fields, either by animals or fire, was to be fully compensated by those responsible (22:5–6). The person owning the animal causing the damage or responsible for starting the fire was to make restitution, even if the act was unintentional or due to negligence.

Before there were lockable storage facilities or banks, it was common in the ancient world to entrust property to a neighbor, friend, or relative (vv. 7–15). This set of legislation deals with cases where silver or gold, animals, clothing, or other valuable items were stolen, lost, damaged or hurt in some way while in the trusted possession of someone other than the owner. In situations of theft, the thief had to repay double what was stolen. In the case of inadvertent loss or death by wild animal, an oath was given of no ill intent, the owner was to accept that oath, and no restitution was required.

22:16–17. Laws Concerning Seduction. The honor of young women was protected by legislation dealing with enticement. The Hebrew verb patah can mean “to seduce” or “allure” and indicates that both participants consent to a sexual act. The law required that a man who seduced a virgin must marry her, with her father’s permission. The right of the father to refuse her hand in marriage remained, but in that case, the woman was to be compensated by a full bride-price, or dowry, to support her future. These laws were meant to govern proper acts of courtship, marriage, and sex, and the order in which they were to take place. Even if both individuals were equally guilty, the man was to marry the woman because they had acted as if they were married by having premarital sex. The father was to make the final verdict because he was obliged to protect his daughter from decisions that could permanently damage her future.

22:18–20. Three Capital Crimes. These death penalties were legislated for abhorrent crimes that challenged the order of God’s creation. Each also involved false worship. The first addressed witchcraft and sorcery. God’s people were not to allow a sorceress, a woman who practiced magic, among them. Both men and women involved in the occult were to be put to death (Lev. 20:27). Practices such as fortune-telling, conjuring spells, attempted communication with the dead, acting as a medium, or participating in other magical occupations were strictly forbidden (Deut. 18:9–14). God’s plan and purposes would not be manipulated. The second abhorrent crime was bestiality, or intercourse with an animal. Such an act defied God’s created order in nature and defiled God’s image in creating humanity as man and woman. This was attested in Canaanite religious practice where deities were worshiped in the form of animals. The third capital offense was offering up sacrifices to pagan deities. Each of these violations was extremely serious in the eyes of God. Today, these activities are becoming increasingly more common. Best-selling books and media for children and teens are saturated with the occult. In Europe and America, there are a growing number of Wiccan practitioners, and in Africa and Asia, ancestor worship remains prevalent. In some places in the Caribbean and South America, macumba, voodoo, and other African religious traditions are popular and are even integrated into certain branches of Christianity. The text reminds us that God detests such practices.

22:21–27. Laws Involving Social Obligations. The laws concerning strangers, widows, orphans, and the poor revealed God’s concern for the vulnerable in society. The foreigner or stranger was not to be mistreated but was to be honored because the children of Israel knew what it was like to live as strangers in the land of Egypt (v. 21). The alien was to be loved (Deut. 10:19) and treated like those who were native born (Lev. 19:34). Oppression of the weak was a trademark of Egypt in Scripture and found its strongest expression in the enslavement of the Israelites. Widows and orphans were to be cared for and not abandoned. They were to be protected and provided with clothing and food (vv. 22–24; Deut. 10:18). Those who have been in these situations, as Israel was in Egypt, will understand how important the church is in providing a sense of family and home to those who have neither. We are not to take advantage of the poor by making a profit from their misfortune (v. 25). God's passion for the disadvantaged is visible in the usage of "I" or "me" in this section. The mission of God's people is to ease the suffering of the world.

22:28—23:9. Religious and Social Obligations.

Proper respect was to be shown to God and to the leaders of the people, applying concepts contained in the third commandment (v. 28; 20:7). Speaking in a way that insulted, blasphemed, or applied the prerogatives of God to oneself was not permitted. God instructed Israel to give the first and best of their agricultural and animal products to Him (vv. 29–30). This included the redemption of the firstborn son by a money payment (13:13; Num. 3:46–48). Israel was to be a holy people unto God (v. 31; Ex. 19:6; Lev. 11:44–45; 19:2; Deut. 7:6), which was connected to food prohibitions here and elsewhere (Deut. 14:21).

Living a life of honesty and integrity is an application of the ninth commandment (Ex. 20:16; 23:1). Peer pressure must be avoided when seeking justice (23:2). Sympathy toward the poor is not to distort justice when the person has committed a crime. The reason given is that God Himself will not justify the wicked (v. 7), for ultimately, all will face His judgment.

23:10–19. Sabbatical Laws and the Festivals.

The fourth commandment (20:8–11) was the focus of law cases dealing with the sabbatical year and the seventh-day Sabbath. During the sabbatical year, landowners were instructed to let the land rest by not plowing it—a beneficial agricultural practice. There was also a social interest in the legislation: the practice provided food for the poor and for the animals. Orchards, vineyards, and fields were not to be harvested, allowing those in need to take what they required for sustenance (23:11). It is reiterated here that the seventh day was for rest, not work (v. 12; cf. 16:22–30; 20:9; Deut. 5:13–14). This rest means "to cease" from work for the benefit of animals, servants, and strangers. It is God's desire that all have this seventh day to rest.

23:20–33. Divine Guidance and Obedience.

God ratified the covenant by sending His Angel, His Son Jesus Christ (Mal. 3:1; cf. PP 352, 366), for only Christ was able to pardon transgressions (v. 21). God declares, "My Name is in Him," which indicates that He is coequal with God (John 1:1–31; Col. 1:13–19; Heb. 1:8). God through His Son is always the initiator of the covenant relationship, but this covenant—like the ones in Genesis—was conditional: it depended on whether the people would obey Him and do all that He instructed them (v. 22). If the people upheld their part of the covenant, then God would fulfill His promises and provide blessings. God promised to drive out the inhabitants of the land of Canaan using fear, confusion, and hornets (vv. 27–28), but this would take longer than a year, in order to preserve the ecological balance of the land (v. 29). This is what might have been had this generation believed in the promises of God rather than the report of the ten spies who returned from Canaan (Num. 13:26–33; see "The Extermination of the Canaanites" [p. 330] and "Holy Warfare" [p. 372]). God stipulated that His covenant was between Him and His people, not with other nations (v. 32).

24:1–18. Covenant and the Tablets of Stone.

God wrote the Ten Commandments with His finger, and Moses transcribed all the words of the book of the covenant (v. 4) before reading them to the people (v. 7). The Hebrew terms found in conjunction here (karat and berit) literally mean to "cut a covenant." In the ancient world, it was a common practice in treaty-making to kill and "cut" an animal or animals in order to establish or ratify a covenant. The covenant with Abram in Genesis 15:7–21 was ratified by cutting animals in two. Then God, represented by the smoke/cloud and torch, passed between the divided pieces. Moses requested that young Israelite men sacrifice oxen as burnt and peace or fellowship offerings to the Lord, and he sprinkled the blood on the altar and on the people (vv. 6, 8). This represented the establishment of a covenant relationship between God and Israel. Israel declared that they would do everything the Lord had said to do.

Thus, they affirmed their commitment to the conditions (see Ex. 19:5–8).

Moses ascended the mountain once more to receive from the Lord the tablets of stone and the statutes. The tablets of stone were written by God for the purpose of instructing them (v. 12). The word torah, “law,” means, in its broadest sense, “teaching” or “instruction” and refers to all the revealed will of God. Here it is used in its narrow sense to designate the Ten Commandments. Their all-inclusive purpose was to govern the covenant between God and the people. Moses stayed with God on the mountain for forty days and forty nights (v. 18). This foreshadowed Christ’s experience immediately after His baptism, before beginning His earthly ministry that would bring reconciliation and the establishment of a new covenant (Matt. 4:2; Luke 4:1–2).

THE SANCTUARY: GOD’S PRESENCE AMONG HIS PEOPLE

The main topic of Exodus 25–40 is the sanctuary and its construction and significance. The chapters could be divided into three sections: instructions related to the building of all key aspects of the sanctuary (25:1—31:18), the episode of the golden calf (32:1—34:35), and the construction of the sanctuary and its inauguration (35:1—40:38). The instructions given to Moses for the creation of the sanctuary, its tabernacle, its furniture, the courtyard, the incense and oil, and the clothing and implements of the priests underlined the significance of having the covenant Lord dwelling among them and the seriousness of that privilege. The explicit attention to detail also highlights the importance that God places on worship and how it is to take place. Since the later construction account (chaps. 35–40) closely parallels the wording of the initial one (chaps. 25–31), they will be treated together here, as indicated with parentheses in each relevant heading.

Instructions for the Construction of the Sanctuary

The instructions given for the building of the sanctuary begin with the ark of the covenant (25:10–22), where God’s divine presence would reside, then move to two of the articles of furniture in the Holy Place (25:23–40). This is followed by the construction of the tabernacle (26:1–37), one of the articles of furniture in the courtyard

(27:1–8), and the courtyard itself (27:9–19). Directions are also provided for the care of the lampstand (27:20–21). The clothing for the priests and their consecration, along with offerings, are then described (chaps. 28–29). Finally, the altar of incense, the issue of ransom money, the laver (also called the basin), and recipes for the oil and incense are discussed (chap. 30). The instruction ends with guidelines for the artisans and a review of the Sabbath law (chap. 31). This systematic presentation indicates the structure and order of God’s design (for a discussion of the literary structure of this section and its significance, see “Creation, Sabbath, and the Sanctuary,” p. 231).

25:1–9. Make Me a Sanctuary. The construction of the sanctuary would require the people to provide resources in the form of an offering to the Lord. Their offerings were to be given, presumably, from the plunder that the defeated Egyptians had conferred on them when leaving Egypt (Ex. 12:36) as back pay for their years of labor. Offerings then and today are to spring from a thankful and responsive heart (v. 2; 2 Cor. 9:6–7), otherwise they lack true spiritual value. Part of worship is returning to God a portion of the many blessings He has given us. Every member of the community was, in this way, a participant in the construction of the sanctuary. The response of the people was so overwhelming that they were restrained from giving more (Ex. 35:21–29; 36:3–7).

From the time of Creation, when He walked in the Garden with Adam and Eve, God has always been interested in being close to humans, even dwelling with them. The sanctuary provided the means by which God could dwell among the Israelites. The term mishkan means “tabernacle” or “dwelling.” This is expressed in other places as well (Lev. 15:31; 26:11). It points to the incarnation of Christ, when the Word became flesh and made His dwelling among us (John 1:14). This theme of God’s nearness anticipates the new earth, where God’s dwelling and tabernacle will be with His people (Rev. 21:3; see “Sanctuary, Covenant, Worship, and Forgiveness,” p. 226).

While on the mountain, God presented Moses with the pattern of the sanctuary and its furnishings (v. 9), and Moses was directed to follow the divine instructions. The Hebrew term for “pattern” (tabnit) can also be translated as “model” (2 Kin. 16:10) or “plan” (1 Chr. 28:19). A functional model of the heavenly sanctuary was to be used in the construction of the earthly sanctuary. God dwells in the original heavenly sanctuary, where Christ mediates for us (Acts 7:44; Heb. 8:2; 9:23–24).

25:10–22 (37:1–9). The Ark of the Covenant.

The ark of the covenant, with its cherubim, was the focal point of the sanctuary, representing the throne of God. The ark was made of acacia wood overlaid with gold. It would contain the tablets of stone and, eventually, the budding rod of Aaron and a bowl of manna. Above the ark was the mercy seat, or “atonement cover,” serving as the resting place of the Shekinah glory of God. Its position over the ark and the Ten Commandments indicated that mercy and justice are inseparable from each other (Ps. 85:10; 89:14)—mercy and justice perfectly reflect God’s character. Thus, the blood sprinkled on the mercy seat on the Day of Atonement symbolized God’s mediation of mercy toward the sinner who had transgressed the law (Rom. 3:25; 8:34; Heb. 7:25).

The cherubim fashioned of solid gold stood on either side of the throne of God as guardians of holiness and perfection (Gen. 3:24; Is. 6:2; Ezek. 1:11) and were intimately connected with the heavenly sanctuary, from where angels

Sanctuary, Covenant, Worship, and Forgiveness

Most of the second half of the book of Exodus concerns itself with the wilderness sanctuary, detailing the instructions from God to Moses and the implementation of those instructions in its construction and services. The narrative is interrupted by the worship of the golden calf and its implications. There are several important concepts related to the sanctuary that would be useful to explore.

1. A Place of Meeting. The sanctuary remained central throughout the history of Israel concerning the covenant. Within the covenant relationship, it was essential for the Lord to be close to His people. The central purpose of the sanctuary was to provide a particular place for God to dwell among them. In fact, the Hebrew term for “tabernacle” (mishkan) is related to Shekinah, God’s glorious presence (Ex. 25:8). Divine love moved God to dwell in a tent, among His people. As Messiah, He became human and dwelt among us (John 1:14; see the section on Theology in the Introduction).

2. Redemption, Covenant, and Tabernacle. The construction of the sanctuary was preceded by a divine act of redemption, namely, the deliverance of Israel from the enslaving power of Egypt. This, in turn, was followed by God’s willingness to enter into a permanent covenant relationship with His people. He would be their God, and they would become His people (Ex. 6:7). The way they would relate to Him and to each other was defined by the covenant law. The tabernacle was indeed a place of meeting, a place where God and humans came together. It was only after redemption and the establishment of a permanent union with God through the covenant that the people had access to God in His dwelling place.

3. The Tabernacle, Worship, and Forgiveness. Through the sacrificial services, Israel would express to the covenant Lord, who dwelled among them, their love, gratitude, devotion, and joy, thus strengthening the covenant relationship. But the sanctuary would also be the place where, in cases of covenant violations, the people could find reconciliation and forgiveness of sin by bringing to the covenant Lord a sacrificial victim. The sanctuary was the place where the sin problem was resolved through sacrificial blood and the priestly work on behalf of the people. It was through the daily and annual services performed in the sanctuary courtyard outside of the tabernacle that the problem of sin and impurity was resolved and the covenant relationship preserved or reestablished.

It was through the blood of the innocent sacrificial animal that sin was expiated (Lev. 17:11). The sanctuary services illustrate God’s plan of redemption, the symbols and shadows pointing to the sinless Redeemer who one day would come to offer His life as a sacrifice and substitute for the sins of the world (Is. 53; John 3:16). He would also become our High Priest, who ministers in the heavenly sanctuary as our Mediator before the Father (Heb. 7:25; 9:11–12). The Israelite sanctuary and its services encapsulate a complete system of divinely-revealed truth, connected and harmonious, illuminating the plan of redemption and the mission and message of God’s people to the world (cf. GC 23).

The Current Location of the Ark of the Covenant

What happened to the ark of the covenant? The last mention of the ark is after the refurbishing of the temple, when Josiah instructs the Levites to bring it into the temple (2 Chr. 35:3). It is never mentioned again. Today, there are at least fifteen theories about the location of the ark, with possible whereabouts ranging from Babylon to Egypt, Ethiopia to Mount Nebo, and multiple sites in and around Jerusalem. The apocryphal book 2 Maccabees 2:4–8 states that the ark was hidden by Jeremiah on Mount Nebo. But the book was written 500 years after the event. Ellen White provides the insight that the ark was hidden in a cave by the priests just before the Babylonian destruction of the temple and that it remains there today (PK 453). While many claims have been made concerning the discovery of the ark, these claims have not been verified by credible archaeological investigation and remain uncertain.

minister to God's people on earth (cf. PP 345). With one set of wings, they covered their bodies, representing humility and reverence, and their other wings were raised toward the center above the mercy seat.

25:23–30 (37:10–16). The Table of Showbread.

This is the table where “the bread of the presence” or “showbread” was placed. This terminology was used because the bread was placed before God in the Holy Place. As one entered the tabernacle, it would have been on the right side, to the north (Ex. 40:22). Like the ark, the table was made of acacia wood covered with hammered gold. Twelve loaves of showbread were set upon the table every Sabbath and were to be eaten by the priests (Lev. 24:5–9). The bread represented the twelve tribes of Israel and pointed toward Christ, “the bread of life” (John 6:35).

25:31–40 (37:17–24). The Seven-branched Candle. The lampstand (v. 31) was called a “menorah,” formed from the noun ner, “light,” and nur, “to shine, blaze.” It was built of solid gold, weighing a talent, which is about 75.38 pounds (34.19 kg), and was engraved with almond blossoms. The almond was the first tree to blossom in the springtime, thus exemplifying

Christ, the first fruit of the resurrection. Christ, who is also the light of the world (John 1:4; 8:12; 12:46), is represented as standing at the center of the lampstand, whose lamps represented the people of God disseminating His light to the world (see Rev. 1:12, 20). The lamp oil symbolized the power of the Holy Spirit to illuminate His truth through the church (Zech. 4:2–6).

26:1–37 (36:8–38). The Furnishings of the Tabernacle and the Veil. The tabernacle was to be a portable building that could be moved as the people journeyed from Sinai to Canaan. For this reason, it was made of individual parts that could be disassembled and reassembled. The ten curtains, two rows of five, were made of linen and colored thread (gold/blue/purple/scarlet). They were intricately woven by skilled craftsmen and embroidered with cherubim (Ex. 36:8). This was the layer that could be seen from inside the tabernacle by the priests who ministered there. The workmanship style reported in the Hebrew text involving the tabernacle and the priestly clothing corresponds to grades of holiness. The high priest's clothing was more elaborate than that of the other priests, just as the designs and the curtain of the Most Holy Place were more elaborate than those in other parts of the sanctuary.

The roofing was composed of a layer of goat hair coverings, then ram skins, followed by an outer layer. The outer layer was made of takhash (v. 14), which has been interpreted and translated variously as “badger skins,” “goatskins,” or “porpoise skins” from the dugong or sea cow. These durable leathers were used to make the outer layer waterproof. The Red Sea is still heavily populated with sea cows today, and porpoises would also have been available at that time. These curtains were fastened together with gold rings. The combined effect would have made the interior very dark. The frames of the tabernacle were made of acacia wood, covered in gold (v. 15). These planks would have been heavy to transport, so Moses instructed four wagons and eight oxen to be given to the sons of Merari of the Levites for their transport (Num. 7:7–8).

The veil separating the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place was made of the same material as the curtains—blue, purple, and scarlet, with embroidered cherubim. The veil in the Jerusalem temple was torn at the moment of Christ's death on Calvary, which symbolized the end of the sacrificial system (Matt. 27:51; Heb. 9). The curtain covering the entrance was made of similar woven materials and hung on pillars (Ex. 36:37–38).

27:1–8 (38:1–7). Altar of Burnt Offering. This altar was located in the courtyard and measured 7 feet, 4 inches (2.22 m) square by 4 feet, 5 inches (1.33 m) high. It was made from acacia wood and bronze, an alloy of tin and copper. It was probably hollow, which allowed for easier transport. The Hebrew term qeren, “horn,” symbolized strength and power (Ps. 75:10). These horns have been found on altars in many archaeological contexts, including the Judean sites of Arad and Beersheba and the northern site of Dan. The horns protruded outward from the four square corners of the altar. The priests dipped their fingers in blood and applied it on the horns during the atonement process (Lev. 8:15; 9:9). Criminals seeking refuge in the temple would cling to them (1 Kin. 1:50–51). The blood of the burnt offering represented the atoning blood of Jesus Christ for sin (Is. 53:4–7; Eph. 1:5–7; 1 Pet. 1:18; Rev. 5:9). Tools were fashioned for use in offering sacrifices on the altar—shovels to remove the ash, three-pronged forks to arrange the pieces of the offering on the altar, and fire pans to dispense the coals from the fire (Ex. 27:3).

27:9–19 (38:9–17). Outer Court. It was in the court that the altar of burnt offering and the laver (or basin) were located. The outer court measured about 150 feet (44.45 m) in length and 75 feet (22.86 m) wide. The hangings or curtains surrounding the court were 7 feet, 4 inches (3.46 m) high, half the height of the tabernacle, so that it was clearly visible from outside the enclosure. They were hung from pillars of bronze (vv. 10–11) surrounding the tabernacle. The entryway to the court faced east and had a screen that was composed of the same materials as the veil separating the Most Holy Place from the Holy Place (v. 16) although the quality was not as refined as that of the tabernacle veil. The courtyard represented the death of Christ on the cross.

27:20–21. Oil for the Lamp. The oil was to be supplied by the people. Here there is a shift in focus from the apportionments of the tabernacle and the description of its furniture to the people. The subject addressed here is their obligation and involvement in the sanctuary services. Clear, pure oil of olives was collected, the olives having been beaten with a mortar rather than crushed in a press (v. 20). This provided the finest fuel. The lamps of the menorah were to be kept burning by Aaron and his sons from evening until morning or continually (v. 21). The priest was required to reside in the sanctuary throughout the twenty-four-hour period. The light represented God’s eternal presence, reciprocated by the priest’s continual worship. Perhaps this imagery was what Christ had in mind in his parable of the ten virgins when he admonished his followers, “Keep your lamps burning” (Luke 12:35).

28:1–6 (39:1). The Priests: Aaron and His Sons. The priesthood was not a position that Aaron and his sons aspired to; it was ordained by God. To minister as priests required being set apart for their duties by God (see 1 Sam. 2:28a). God chooses whom He will appoint. One recalls, in contrast, Jeroboam’s appointment of his own priests, including himself, to serve in the apostate high places of Dan and Bethel in the northern kingdom of Israel (1 Kin. 12:32; 13:33; 2 Chr. 11:14). The results of this decision led to widespread apostasy and finally defeat and exile at the hand of the Assyrians. Just as the priests kept the lamps trimmed in the Holy Place, they were to approach God continuously, wearing unique clothes that God designated for their high office.

28:7–30 (39:1–21). The Ephod and Breastplate. The ephod was the symbol of the high office of the priest. The ephod is described in more detail than any other article of clothing. This emphasizes its significance. It was made of fine linen by skilled craftsmen who wove in the colors and threads used for the veil (v. 6). It was worn as an apron or vest. Two semiprecious onyx stones were fixed on the shoulders of the ephod (v. 9). The names of the twelve tribes of Israel inscribed on these stones signified the high priest’s intercessory role (v. 12). When the high priest entered the tabernacle, he stood before the Lord as the representative of the twelve tribes whose names he bore.

The breastplate was attached to the ephod by strands of gold cord (v. 24). It was made of similar cloth as the ephod but measured about 10 inches (25.4 cm) square (v. 16), for placement over the heart of the high priest (v. 29). Twelve precious stones, each engraved with the name of a tribe of Israel, were fastened to the breastplate (vv. 17–20). Whereas the two onyx stones were placed on the shoulders (vv. 9–12), the twelve stones were positioned over the heart, the main organ of life. The instruction to place it over the heart was repeated three times for emphasis (vv. 29–30). It is interesting that in Egyptian embalming practices, the heart was never removed from the corpse. It was the heart that was evaluated in the judgment and weighed in the balances. The heart was considered the place where decisions between right and wrong were made. The Urim and Thummim were placed on either side of the breastplate. God's will was made known to the people through these stones (1 Sam. 23:9–12; 30:7–8). The Urim illuminated by light indicated divine approval while a cloud over the Thummim denoted disapproval (cf. PP 351). The twelve stones placed over the heart of the high priest probably pointed to the heart relationship Christ desires to have with His people, exemplified in both the old and new covenants (Deut. 6:5–6; Jer. 31:33).

28:31–43 (39:22–31). The Clothing of Aaron and His Sons. The text here shifts from the most important element of the priestly vestments, the ephod, to the clothing underneath. A fine robe of blue linen was to offset the brilliant colors of the ephod and its precious stones (v. 31). The color blue may have symbolized the law. The people wore garments fringed with tassels in blue to remind them of the law of God (Num. 15:37–40), and the high priest was completely covered in blue, signifying submission to God's will. It was to be made without seam, indicating its perfection. Later, the redeemed are described as being dressed in robes of righteousness, worn by the faithful who have been cleansed in the blood of Christ (cf. Zech. 3:4). Pomegranates were to hang from the hem of the robe, interspersed with bells of pure gold (vv. 33–34). The pomegranate signified life and fertility. The priest standing in the presence of God represented the lives of those he interceded for. The bells rang constantly while the high priest carried out his work. The sounds from his ornaments were constant reminders of the need for the people to be in prayer and worship during his ministration on their behalf.

The gold-plated inscription with the words HOLINESS (or HOLY) TO THE LORD indicated the most sacred task of the priesthood. It was to be placed on the high priest's forehead so all could be reminded of who God was and their relationship to Him as sinners. Only through the work of their Redeemer could the penalty of sin be atoned for. The symbolism of the priestly garments provided significant types pointing to a high priest whose messianic mission is a superior ministry because He is the Mediator of a better covenant established upon better promises (Heb. 8:6).

29:1–37. Ordination of the Priests. This passage begins with a list of items needed for the service: a young bull, two rams, and three types of flatbread (vv. 1–2). They were to be brought with Aaron and his sons to the entrance of the tabernacle (v. 4). Aaron and his sons were not allowed to enter the tabernacle until their consecration had been completed. Three rituals were performed, namely, rituals of cleansing, clothing, and anointing. The instruction to wash the men (v. 4) implied cleansing. The Hebrew term rakhats suggests a complete submersion or bath in water, not a mere sprinkling (Ex. 30:18–20; 40:30–32). Ritual bathing became an important representation of cleansing from sin and impurities. Standing in the presence of God as mediator required purity. After the priests were cleansed by Moses, who acted as God's representative (Ex. 4:16; 7:1), they were clothed in their holy vestments (vv. 5–6). Finally, the priests were anointed with oil, an act that probably signified consecration to their function through the Holy Spirit. The same anointing oil was also used to consecrate the tabernacle and its utensils during the ordination ritual, reflecting the unity of sacred space and personnel (see Lev. 8–9). A similar pattern is seen with Christ, who was baptized in the Jordan and anointed by the Holy Spirit descending as a dove over Him (Matt. 3:17; 2 Pet. 1:17).

A series of offerings was required to complete the consecration. The first was the sin offering (v. 14), which the high priest and his sons presented every day for seven days. Typically, a bull was offered for the congregation or for the high priest (Lev. 4:1–12). Smaller animals, such as female goats, were offered for individuals (Lev. 4:28). On the Day of Atonement, the high priest would lay both hands on the goat and confess the sins of the people over it (Lev. 16; see "The Laying On of Hands," p. 243). Aaron and his sons placed their hands on the sacrificial victim, and the blood of the bull was placed on the horns of the altar, purifying the high priest (v. 12). The second offering was the ram for a burnt offering (vv. 15–18; cf. Lev. 1), a sweet aroma or pleasing fragrance before the Lord (v. 18). This was a gift offering and was therefore pleasing to God. The third offering was the ordination or consecration offering (v. 22). The blood of this offering was applied to the right ears of the priests, that they might hear the instructions of the Lord, upon their right thumbs, that they might perform the work of the Lord, and upon their right toes, that they might go in the way of the Lord (v. 20). The final step was for Aaron and his sons to eat the bread and the flesh of the ram to consecrate and sanctify themselves (vv. 32–33). In this way, Aaron and his sons were to be set apart to do the work of priests, teaching and leading God's people in truth and righteousness (Mal. 2:6–7).

29:38—30:10 (37:25–28). The Continual Burnt Offering and the Altar of Incense. The burnt offering was to take place in the evenings and the mornings (v. 39), perhaps in connection with the trimming of the menorah and the burning of the incense (30:1–10). A yearling lamb was to be placed on the altar first in the morning and then in the evening, left to burn throughout the night. Although two sacrificial victims are mentioned, one offered in the evening and the other in the morning, the two constitute one single sacrifice called the continual burnt offering (see Num. 28:3, 6). God promised that He would meet with His people at the altar, suggesting that it was a symbol of His presence and accessibility to the people in the courtyard. The Hebrew term tamid, continual or regular (v. 38), pointed to the continual or daily mediation of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary (see Lev. 6:8–13; Heb. 7:25; see also notes on Heb. 7:23–25).

The altar of incense was to be placed before the veil separating the Most Holy Place from the Holy Place. It was to be centered between the menorah and the table of showbread and, like them, was made of acacia wood covered in pure gold with horns. Incense was to be burned on it, morning and evening, before the Lord. The incense represented the prayers of the people ascending to God, mingled with the merits of Christ, the perfect sacrifice. The heavenly altar of incense was seen by John in his visions (Rev. 8:3–4).

30:11–16. The Half-Shekel of Atonement. The Lord required from the people a specific sum to be used for the maintenance and upkeep of the sanctuary. The same amount was required from the rich and the poor alike. This tax was to be a ransom for their lives. The Hebrew term koper, ransom (v. 12), and the phrase kesep hakkipurim, “atonement money” (v. 16), seem to indicate the importance of this tax. It was brought so that there would be no plague when the census was conducted. It was a legal way of counting the people and of reminding them that their lives could be preserved only by the Lord and not by their collective strength. This brings to mind the later consequences of David's census taken for reasons of personal interest and military gain (2 Sam. 24).

30:17–38 (37:29; 38:8; 40:7, 30). Bronze Laver (or Basin) and Anointing Oil. The laver (or basin) was placed in the courtyard between the altar of burnt offering and the entrance to the tabernacle. Its function was to provide water for the cleansing of the priests' hands and feet before they entered the tabernacle. On the Day of Atonement, this cleansing was also to take place upon completing the work (Lev. 16:24). The anointing oil was composed of specific ingredients (myrrh, cinnamon, cane or calamus, cassia, and olive oil) and was for the anointing of the priests, the tabernacle, and its furniture, for all generations (vv. 25–31). The incense was aromatic (Ex. 30:7) and composed of certain key ingredients. The importance of this composition is highlighted in the experience of Nadab and Abihu, who burned profane, unauthorized fire upon this altar (Lev. 10:1).

31:1–11 (35:30—36:7). The Artisans: Bezalel and Aholiab. The calling of these two individuals indicates that priests were not the only ones called by name to service. These two men were filled with the spirit of God, and God put the wisdom of skillful artistry in their hearts (vv. 3, 6). In highlighting this special calling, God established art and creativity as important ways to reflect His image. God then enumerated the types of abilities that Bezalel and Aholiab would be endowed with: wisdom, understanding, knowledge, and all kinds of craftsmanship (v. 3). Wisdom, knowledge, and understanding were to be combined with skill. All aspects were necessary for these men to accomplish their work. God did not simply call them to the task, but He also provided the means and abilities needed to fulfill His calling. All of these gifts were given for a specific purpose, namely, to honor God in building the sanctuary as a glorious place of worship. Thus, art is defined in Scripture as having a purpose: art is for God's sake. This stands in stark contrast to contemporary movements where “art is for art's sake.” Everything that God does has a purpose and should draw others to Him. Thus, art as defined in these verses is for service.

31:12–18. Keeping the Sabbath Holy. This passage on the Sabbath concludes the instructions given for the building of the sanctuary. It also forms part of the chiasmic structure that begins later with the renewal of the covenant and the actual construction of the sanctuary (see “Creation, Sabbath, and the Sanctuary,” p. 231). While circumcision was given as an outward sign, the Sabbath was the internal sign of the heart (v. 13), indicating the loyalty of God's people to His covenant (see Ezek. 20:12, 20). The death penalty for its violation emphasized its holiness and functioned as a deterrent (v. 14). The nature of the Sabbath, on the seventh day, is emphasized by a reference back to the Creation week (v. 15). The permanence of the Sabbath is also emphasized in vv. 16–17. It is the longest of the commandments, and it was the only one repeated and emphasized just before Moses was given the two tablets of testimony (v. 18).

32:1—34:35

Violation of the Covenant: The Golden Calf

This account is placed after the instructions to build the sanctuary but before its actual construction because this was when the event took place. What follows is a description of an act of open rebellion against the covenant Lord, an offense that He took very seriously.

32:1–6. Back to Egypt. Moses's long stay on the mountain caused unrest among the people. Fearing the permanent absence of their leader, they fell back into the idolatry that perhaps many of them had practiced in Egypt. The Hebrews and the mixed multitude had come out of Egypt, where nature was worshiped in the form of hundreds of gods, within a complex, spiritualistic religion. In this moment of anxiety, they demanded a visual representation of that which their finite minds could not conceive: "Make us gods," they demanded (v. 1). The golden calf could have represented any number of Egyptian deities. The Apis bull was worshiped in Memphis as Ptah, the god of life. Hathor, the cow goddess, was worshiped in Thebes as the goddess of motherhood, beauty, love, and joy. The description of the activities of the people in vv. 6 and 25 contains clear sexual overtones that might be equated with the rituals surrounding Hathor worship. Aaron, their spiritual leader, who was to be inaugurated as high priest, even built an altar before the image and offered up burnt offerings and incense, proclaiming that this calf was the god who had brought them out of the land of Egypt (v. 4). When the kingdom of Israel later divided in 931/30 B.C., Jeroboam also made two calves, placed them in Dan and Bethel, and quoted the same phrase from Aaron to legitimize his actions (1 Kin. 12:28).

32:7–14. God's Reaction and Moses's Intercession. From the mountain, the Lord saw what was happening and told Moses that He was ready

Sabbath, Creation, and the Tabernacle

Scholars commonly find in the book of Exodus a connection between the construction of the sanctuary, Creation, and the Sabbath. This is indeed the case in the instructions to build the sanctuary and its actual construction.

1. Tabernacle and the Sabbath. It is significant that in the midst of the sanctuary narrative of Exodus, the Sabbath appears, the sign of the covenant relationship (Ex. 31:12–18). Not even the construction of a holy place for God (i.e., the sanctuary) would justify the violation of the Sabbath. Its violation would be an intolerable rebellion against the loving covenant relationship God had established with them. Such rebellion would indicate that the violators are no longer identifying themselves with the covenant community because of their rejection of the sign of the covenant. They would be excluded from the community and from having access to God's presence in the sanctuary. In this way, God was emphasizing the importance of faithfulness to Him in the context of the sanctuary and its services. The sanctuary in space (the tabernacle) did not replace the sanctuary in time (the Sabbath).

2. Sanctuary, Sabbath, and Forgiveness. Notice how the literary structure of Exodus 24–40 combines the sanctuary, the Sabbath, and forgiveness into a unified whole.

- A Theophany/Moses goes up to the mountain (24:13–18)
- B Instructions for the construction of the sanctuary (25:1—31:11)
- C Sabbath (31:12–18)
  - D Apostasy, forgiveness, covenant renewal (32–34)
  - C' Sabbath (35:1–3)
- B' Construction of the sanctuary (35:4—40:33)
- A' Theophany/Moses could not enter the tabernacle (40:34–48)

The narrative about the construction of the sanctuary is interrupted by the worship of the golden calf. The Sabbath commandment, which should have reminded the people to worship God as Creator, preceded and followed the act of idolatry. The people repented and God forgave them, thus restoring the people to the covenant relationship with God. The Sabbath was then reaffirmed in the context of the construction of the sanctuary.

3. Sanctuary and the Garden of Eden. The emphasis on the sanctuary, the Sabbath, and forgiveness of sin reminds us of the Garden of Eden. The Garden was not only the dwelling place of Adam and Eve (Gen. 2:8) but was also the place where God came to meet with them (3:8). This was where God instituted and gave the seventh-day Sabbath to humanity (2:1-2). In addition, it was the place where sin entered into the world (3:1-8), where an investigative judgment took place (3:9-19), and where God offered to humanity forgiveness of sin through the coming Seed of the woman (3:15), represented by the sacrificial victims (cf. 3:21). It would be correct to say that when the Israelites came to the holy sanctuary to worship God and to seek forgiveness, they were returning spiritually to the union and perfect harmony with the Creator that characterized the life of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden.

There is a connection between the construction of the sanctuary and the Creation narrative in Genesis. In Genesis there were seven days, and in Exodus there are seven divine speeches, introduced by the phrase "The Lord said to Moses" (25:1; 30:11, 17, 22, 34; 31:1, 12), that instructed Moses how to construct the sanctuary. The seventh speech is about the Sabbath and references Creation (31:1-12). The narrative regarding the actual construction of the sanctuary begins with the Sabbath commandment (35:1-3), and the phrase "as the Lord commanded" is used seven times to affirm compliance with God's will (40:17-33). It was in obedience to God's commands, to His word, that the sanctuary was built. In Genesis, God created by separating elements and assigning to them specific functions (Gen. 1:4, 6, 7, 14, 18). The same happened in the building of the tabernacle. For instance, the veil divided the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place (Ex. 26:33), and the priests were to separate or distinguish between the holy and the common, the clean and the unclean (Lev. 10:10). The emphasis on creation through separation and the cycle of seven, culminating with the Sabbath, indicates that the building of the sanctuary was a divine activity through which God was creating a holy space within a world of sin and uncleanness. There He would meet with His people to sanctify them. It could be suggested that the tabernacle was the beginning of a new creation that will reach a cosmic dimension. The original relationship between God and humans in the Garden of Eden was being restored, and this restoration would reach its climax on the Day of Atonement (see Lev. 16).

to consume the people on account of the violation of the covenant. God no longer referred to them as His people but as the people Moses had brought out of Egypt (v. 7). As intercessor, Moses reminded the Lord that He was the One who brought them out of Egypt and they were, in fact, His people (v. 11). God listened to Moses and did not destroy the people. After descending, Moses saw what was happening and broke the two tables of the law in recognition that the covenant had been broken (Deut. 9:17). Nevertheless, so deep was Moses's love for these people that he offered his life for theirs and asked that his name be blotted from the Book of Life (v. 32; cf. Rev. 3:5; 13:8; 20:12-15). But God rejected his offer because only His Son's death would be an acceptable substitution (see Is. 52:14-53:12).

33:1-6. Command to Leave Sinai. The Lord was willing to let the people leave Sinai to head to the promised land, but at a cost: He would not be with them. The sanctuary building project, which had not yet begun, was set aside during this crisis. Although the covenant had been broken, God would keep His promise to defeat the enemies of the people and grant them a new home in the promised land, but they would enter the land without Him. This raises a major question for Israel and for Christians today. Is anything worth doing without God's presence and blessing? He had brought them out of Egypt, but He would not go with them into Canaan. Canaan, the land flowing with milk and honey (v. 3), would be meaningless without God. This was the greatest moment of crisis for Israel. Even in Egypt, when the people were slaves, God had been attentive to their cries for help. But if they moved forward without God, their cries would go unheeded.

The reaction of the people was to strip themselves of their ornaments (v. 6). The Hebrew may imply that they did this at Mount Horeb or, as some translations indicate, that they removed their ornaments at Mount Horeb and did not don them again. In other words, the Israelites did not wear jewelry after this point. Why? There could be several reasons. (1) They were acting in obedience to what God had asked (v. 5). (2) Some of the jewelry had been used to make the golden calf (Ex. 32:2–4). (3) It was common in ancient Egypt for jewelry to be fashioned to resemble foreign gods. Jewelry could also include amulets, which were thought to carry inherent magic. (4) Or this was a sign of contrition, repentance, and humility. Judges 8:24 seems to indicate that, at that time, the Israelites were still not wearing earrings, in contrast to the custom of the Ishmaelites. During times of apostasy, Israelites again wore jewelry, and God warned the people He would remove their jewelry as part of His judgment (Is. 3:16–23). Paul and Peter affirm this position and encourage modesty, good actions, and the inward beauty of gentleness instead of jewelry (1 Tim. 2:9–10; 1 Pet. 3:3–4).

33:7–23. Moses Again Intercedes for the People. Since the sanctuary was not yet built, Moses placed the temporary tent of worship well outside the camp (v. 7). The people had removed themselves so far from God's will that, in His holiness, He could not dwell near them. But Moses could approach Him. The pillar of cloud descended, and the divine presence spoke face-to-face with Moses (vv. 9–11). This figure of speech does not mean that Moses saw God's face (see v. 20), but it emphasizes the direct communication Moses had with God. God had not completely forsaken the people. He was willing to speak to their leader, Moses. Sinners can find comfort in knowing that, in spite of their sin, their heavenly Mediator can approach the Father on their behalf. Therefore, Moses continued to intercede, asking God not

The Sanctuary/Temple and Ancient Near Eastern Parallels

The sanctuary and the subsequent temple are often compared with the long tradition of temple buildings in the various ANE cultures. Some critical scholars suggest that the tripartite design (courtyard–Holy Place–Most Holy Place) was copied directly from the Egyptian, Canaanite, or Assyrian world. Others further argue that the technologies and design of the sanctuary resembles Bronze Age Egyptian parallels. A number of parallels have been documented. However, there also exist three fundamental distinctions. (1) There was no representation of the deity in the Hebrew sanctuary/temple. The Lord was not to be depicted in images. (2) The sacrificial system with its goal of atonement for the individual and corporate body was unique to the Hebrew sanctuary/temple. (3) Dedicating a temple to one god alone was not practiced by the polytheistic nations surrounding Israel. Egyptian temples frequently depicted multiple gods interacting with the king. Canaanite temples could have been dedicated to any number of gods in the pantheon. Despite these major differences, why are there so many similarities between the sanctuary/temple and ANE temple designs? In Exodus 25:9, Moses was shown the sanctuary according to a heavenly pattern. Lucifer was once a covering cherub in the heavenly sanctuary before the throne of God (see Ezek. 28:14–17). He was cast down because of his pride and rebellion (Is. 14:12–14). His attempt ever since has been to counterfeit God's plan. Would it not be natural for him to imitate and adapt God's plan for salvation as taught through the sanctuary service? Could not Lucifer have inspired false worship in these "sanctuaries" of Egypt, Canaan, and Assyria while God inspired Moses and Solomon to remain faithful to the heavenly pattern? Worship and whom we worship are central to the conflict in Exodus and the rest of Scripture (e.g., Rev. 12, 14). This may be a possible reason for the similarities between the Hebrew sanctuary/temple and ANE parallels. It is at least worth considering by those who are well-acquainted with the biblical concept of the cosmic conflict.

to abandon His people but to go with them to Canaan (33:12–13). God agreed to go with Moses but not with the people (v. 14). Moses was not satisfied with this answer. In the end, the Lord pronounced that He would accompany the people—because of His relationship with Moses (v. 17). In order to confirm that the Lord would escort the people to Canaan, Moses requested God to allow him to see His glory (v. 18). This time, the Lord could not grant him the request, but He could let Moses see His love, goodness, and compassion (vv. 19–23).

34:1–9. Moses Goes Up to the Mountain.

Moses was instructed to cut two tablets of stone identical to the first ones (v. 4) and to carry them to the top of the mountain. The Lord would again inscribe the Decalogue with His finger. These tablets would be placed in a box of acacia wood (Deut. 10:3–5) and later within the ark of the covenant (Ex. 37:1; 1 Kin. 8:9; 2 Chr. 5:10). When Moses reached the mountaintop, the Lord descended in a cloud (v. 5), revealing Himself as “the LORD, the LORD God” (v. 6), identifying Himself as Yahweh ’elohim (“God”), the Creator and covenant God. On this occasion, He revealed to Moses seven aspects of His character. He is merciful and compassionate. He draws near to His children in sympathy and cares about their struggles. He is gracious, a word that describes undeserved mercy. He is longsuffering, slow to anger, and patient with them in their mistakes. He is abounding in (Heb.) khesed—“goodness,” “loving-kindness,” or “mercy” and overflows with emet—“truth” and/or “faithfulness.” His love and faithfulness are without bounds. His khesed (v. 7), repeated again for emphasis, is available to “thousands.” Finally, He is forgiving of ’awon—“iniquity” or “wickedness,” pesha—“transgression” or “rebellion,” and sin. The Hebrew word nasa—usually translated as “forgive”—also means literally “to lift up, to carry,” which is what God does with the sins of His people. He lifts their burdens and casts them “into the depths of the sea” (Mic. 7:19). In legal contexts, the term nasa also means to assume responsibility for sin. God forgives by assuming responsibility and taking sin upon Himself. He did this through Christ. Yet those who persistently reject Him will experience divine judgment. All of God’s gracious, loving, merciful, and forgiving characteristics can only truly be appreciated by fallen, sinful beings in the context of God’s just wrath against sin. All of us fully deserve eternal death if we are without Christ and His forgiveness.

34:10–35. Covenant Renewal. God had revealed Himself as a forgiving God, and this was shown in His pardon of the covenant violation of His people. His relationship with His people was restored: He promised to make a covenant with the same promises and conditions He had stated earlier (vv. 11–28; Ex. 23:10–33). He is a jealous God (v. 14) who demands sole worship and allegiance. He still requires from His covenant partners obedience to the covenant law. After descending from the mountain, with his face shining with the glory of the Lord, Moses reported to the people the divine decision. His shining face confirmed that he had been in the presence of God and that he was God’s appointed leader.

The Building of the Sanctuary

The worship of the golden calf had nearly eliminated the divine assurance of God’s dwelling among His people. Had it not been for a persistent leader and intercessor and for the gracious and longsuffering Redeemer, Israel would have entered the promised land alone and left to their own devices. The renewal of the covenant reminds us that we serve a God of second chances. Where we are unfaithful, He is faithful; where we are impatient, He is patient. Once the covenant relationship had been restored, this Holy God was ready to fulfill His promises and His ultimate desire to dwell with His people. The construction of the sanctuary was about to begin. (In this section, less detailed explanations will be provided because of the repetitive nature of Exodus 36–39, which mirrors much of Exodus 24–31. The reader will be referred back to the comments made previously.)

35:1–3. Sabbath Commandment. Moses then gathered or assembled the whole people of Israel. The Hebrew verb qakhal, “to gather, assemble” is used here and in 32:1, when the people demanded the golden calf from Aaron. But the contrast between the two gatherings is stark. The first assembly was a gathering of a people rising up against God. The second gathering was an attempt to lead the people to obediently follow God’s instructions. In this new gathering, Moses emphasized the Sabbath (vv. 2–3), which would guide the people’s focus back to the Creator. Previously, they worshiped a calf of their own creation, but this time, through the Sabbath, they would acknowledge the God who created all things. The Sabbath closed the chiasm of covenant broken and covenant restored, becoming a sign that the people were in fellowship and communion with the covenant Lord.

35:4—36:7. Offerings from the People. The overflow of the offering was an expression of their gratitude to God not only for saving them from Egypt but also for reconciling them to Himself after their idolatry. Everyone whose hearts were impressed to contribute came with willingness (v. 21). The construction of the greatest visual representation of God's plan of salvation was possible only through the gifts of these worshippers. The Holy Spirit not only filled Bezalel and Aholiab with wisdom and understanding to build the sanctuary (see Ex. 31:1–11) but also put in their hearts the ability to teach the other craftsmen and artisans who were to work under their supervision (35:34). Men and women who are given gifts to accomplish great things are to work together with others and teach them what God has given them for His honor and glory. It is significant that when God gives instructions, in this case for the construction of the sanctuary, He also provides the means to accomplish it. He does so by giving individuals the necessary skills and by providing, through His people, the needed materials and funds. The people wanted God to dwell among them and were willing to do whatever it took to make this happen. Eventually, the builders had more than enough, and the people had to be restrained from bringing any further donations. How refreshing to see such an outpouring of sacrificial love toward God! How different churches would be if believers would consistently give freely of themselves and the means at their disposal so that God's message could go out to the world!

36:8—39:31. Construction of the Sanctuary. The instructions given in Exodus 25–31 are largely repeated here in their execution, and some may wonder about this redundancy. In the Bible, repetitions are significant. In the Creation narrative of Genesis 1, God gives a command, and this is consistently followed by a description of how His command was enacted (e.g., Gen. 1:3). This was done to demonstrate that God does what He says. In Exodus 25–31, the instructions were given by God, according to the pattern shown to Moses, in explicit detail. After the disruption of the golden calf rebellion and the covenant renewal, this information is repeated to indicate what was done. Several purposes are accomplished within this narrative. First, this account serves to verify that Moses was faithful in delivering God's commands to the people. The phrase "as the Lord [had] commanded Moses" is repeated twelve times in Exodus 38–39. Second, this testimony highlights the fact that the Spirit-filled work of Bezalel, Aholiab, the craftsmen, and the people of Israel was an expression of God's wisdom and power. Third, this record indicates that what God predicts for the future will be fulfilled in every detail through the outworking of His Spirit. Finally, it emphasizes that when the people followed God's plan, they accomplished even more than they had ever imagined.

39:32—40:33. The Work Is Completed. In vv. 31–43, it is indicated three times in different ways that the people of Israel did everything according to the Lord's commands to Moses. This is repeated to signify that all was done according to God's will. The rebellion of the golden calf is here contrasted with the obedience in carrying out the plans of God. And Moses blessed them (v. 43). This is the only time in Exodus where Moses blesses anyone. Moses's anger at seeing the calf turned into a blessing at seeing the completed sanctuary. Previous curses because of a broken covenant were, at this point, turned to blessings in response to obedience to the covenant.

The tabernacle was next erected and anointed, and Aaron and his sons were ordained (40:1–16). All of the tabernacle and its furnishings were to be anointed with oil (v. 9). The altar of the burnt offering was to be set apart, consecrated, and made most holy, or "utterly holy" (v. 10). The priests were also to be anointed and consecrated (vv. 13–15), an activity that is described in more detail in Leviticus 8. The fact that this was an anointing for a continuous or eternal priesthood throughout the generations suggests that it was an ordination service with permanence as long as the sanctuary and later the temple services functioned in Israel (v. 15).

The tabernacle was erected on the first day of the first month of the second year, precisely one year since the Exodus from Egypt (Ex. 12:2) and nine months after Israel arrived at Sinai (Ex. 19:1). Moses and the people erected the tent of meeting (the tabernacle) and carefully placed the furniture in the designated locations. They finished their work faithfully.

40:34–38. God Descends to His Tabernacle. The filling of the tabernacle with the glory of the Lord was the ultimate reward for a work well done, but above all, it was the realization of God's longing to be near His people. Moses and the people had done what the Lord had commanded, and as a result, God resided among them. These concluding verses recapitulate the Exodus theme. The covenant had been established, God was now dwelling among His people, and He would guide Israel in all their ways. The light of God's presence would be in the sight of all Israel (v. 38), reminding them that they were not an ordinary people but a God-led people. The promise of Exodus 25:9 was fulfilled. Their future journey would be with a God who would dwell among them. Their journey to the promised land was ready to begin. The hearts of the people throbbed with hope as they faced the future, knowing that the Lord was in their midst. The Christian reader also looks forward, knowing that Christ is present in the church and leading it in its journey toward the heavenly promised land (John 16:13–15; Heb. 12:1–2). The One who has begun a good work in us will bring it to completion (Phil. 1:6). This is the promise we embrace in hope.

LEVITICUS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The English name of the third book of the Bible is based on the name of the book in the Latin Vulgate: Liber Leviticus. In fact, the name “Leviticus” goes back to the Greek translation of the OT (LXX), where the book is called Leuitikon. This suggests that, for the translators, the book was about matters related to the Levites. However, the Levites are rarely mentioned in the book. It could be that the title refers to the Levitical priests, and in that case, it would be closer to the truth. This idea is found in Jewish writings where the book is called “The Priest’s Manual” or “Priestly Torah/Instructions” although the book is hardly a manual.

The Hebrew name is taken from the opening word of the book, wayyiqra’ (“and He called”). It was a common ancient practice to name a book after its first words. In this particular case, the name corresponds well with the content of the book. Wayyiqra’ introduces God as the speaker—“and He [God] called” Moses—and, as will be demonstrated, the book consists primarily of a series of divine speeches addressed to Moses, or to Aaron, and to the people. Moses has traditionally been identified as the author of the book, and there is no persuasive argument to the contrary. This is principally the case at a time when critical scholars are reexamining the origin and authorship of the Pentateuch (see “Introduction to the Pentateuch,” p. 120). There is also the testimony of Jesus, who, when referencing Leviticus, identified Moses as the author (see Matt. 8:4; Mark 7:10; Luke 5:14).

Date. The book is a literary unit in itself, but it is part of the history of the Israelites during their sojourn near Mount Sinai. This helps date the book. The title “and/then He called” points back to Exodus 40:34–35, when God’s glory descended on the tabernacle after it was built. At that moment, the Lord called on Moses and gave him instructions concerning the services to be performed in the sanctuary (Lev. 1:1). This suggests that the book was written in the fifteenth century B.C.

Theology and Purpose. When attempting to understand the theological message of Leviticus, its connection to the book of Exodus must not be overlooked. The construction of the sanctuary had just been completed, and the glory of the Lord had filled the place (Ex. 40:34; cf. 25:8). This sanctuary was defined as holy space, made holy by the presence of a holy God (Ex. 29:43).

1. Only God Is Holy. The concept of holiness is very prominent in Leviticus and conveys two basic ideas. First, the holy is not part of the world as such. There is only One who is by nature holy: the Lord (Lev. 11:44; see also 11:45; 19:2; 20:26). Since nothing else is holy in and of itself, holiness refers to God as He is in Himself. Holiness points to the uniqueness of God and to His incomparability, completely distinct from His creation. It points to the mystery of His nature. Simply put, there is nothing and no one like Him. Second, and almost paradoxically, God’s holiness also speaks to His closeness to humans as their only source of life (17:11). He brought the Israelites out of Egypt (11:45) and made them His people (20:26). Therefore, divine holiness is demonstrated by God’s uniqueness and His willingness to enter into a unique relationship with humans. In the midst of a world damaged by the presence of sin and evil, a holy God created a space to dwell among His people. Now the question is: How could sinful human beings, who are not holy by nature, relate to this majestic God who dwelled among them? It is this question that the sanctuary services, as described in Leviticus, seek to answer.

2. Sin, the Unclean, the Common, and the Clean. Since only God is holy, in what condition is His creation? According to Leviticus, the world is characterized by sin, the unclean or impure, the common or profane, and the clean or pure. Since nothing on earth is considered holy, everything is in a state of separation from God. The sanctuary services described God's way of ordering the world, similar to His actions at Creation (Gen. 1–2), by establishing distinctions and boundaries that the Israelites were to respect in order to exist in harmony with Him and with each other (see "Creation, Sabbath, and the Sanctuary," p. 231). At the center of this order was the Holy God of Israel. But as indicated, there were other forces at play in the world—sin, the unclean, the common, and the clean. The Israelites were to relate to these elements in certain ways in order to preserve the order established by God.

The unclean/impure signifies death and is, by nature, incompatible with the Holy One, the fountain of life. The common/profane was not to come into contact with the holy because it would profane the holy or make it common. However, the common, the clean, and even the unclean/impure were sanctified through cleansing and sanctification rituals.

It is correct to suggest that, in Leviticus, the world is fundamentally divided into two realms, namely, the holy and the sinful/impure. In other words, there was the divine realm of life and the sphere of sin and death. There was also the common and clean, indicating that not everything was under the absolute control of sin and impurity. There were to be clean places (4:12) and clean animals (chap. 11). Even the common was not necessarily evil unless it was improperly brought into contact with the holy (Ex. 3:2–5; Num. 18:15–18). But ultimately, all living creatures come under the power of the unclean by descending into the sphere of death; everyone and everything dies (cf. Eccl. 9:2–6). The ultimate source of death is not God but Azazel (see chap. 16). Leviticus appears to indicate that humans, in themselves, are in a state of sinfulness and impurity and are, therefore, in constant need of divine grace to be cleansed, forgiven, and sanctified. Within the divine order established by God are means to deal with this existential problem.

3. God Shares His Holiness. The holy God placed His dwelling in the midst of a world characterized by sin, the unclean, the common, and the clean. He sanctified the people of Israel by redeeming them from Egypt and by entering into a covenant relationship with them. Israel became holy in the sense of belonging to God, and therefore, they were a unique people—a holy nation and a kingdom of priests (Ex. 19:6). In this context, being holy means that the Lord had set them apart to be His people (Deut. 7:6; 14:2). This is the relational side of the covenant, but there is also an ethical side to it. They were also holy in the sense of being under God's jurisdiction through obedient service to Him and to His covenant law (see Lev. 11:44, 45; 20:6–8, 22–26). Holiness is a gift and, at the same time, a task. The Israelites were to be holy as God is holy (19:2). He is the model to be followed, the image to be reflected.

Within Israel, God also set apart (sanctified) priests and Levites for a particular purpose (8:12, 30; 21:8). Additionally, portions of time were consecrated by the Lord for specific service to Him: the Sabbath (23:3), the celebration of the festivals (23:4, 7, 8, 37), and the Jubilee (25:12). There were holy things, like offerings (see 2:3; 6:17; 7:1; 21:21–22), tithes (27:30), utensils (8:9, 11), clothing (16:4, 32), the altar (8:11, 15; 16:19), and the furniture of the sanctuary (8:10). The tabernacle, in particular, was a holy space, forming the center of the sanctuary with its Holy and Most Holy Places (16:2). All of these persons, things, and times were set apart for a divine purpose, and all of them were equally threatened by the incursion of sin and impurity. When the divine order was disrupted, death threatened the covenant relationship.

4. Holiness and Covenant Violations. Obedience to the covenant law was, in a sense, the ethical expression of the holiness of God in the life of the people. Therefore, the violation of the moral or ritual aspects of the law was a serious act that required the exclusion of the violator from the sphere of holiness and life. Such individuals found themselves in the sphere of death, moving inexorably toward destruction. The violation of the laws of cleanliness resulted in a state of impurity. To be unclean was to be alienated from God's dwelling and from others. Unclean persons were not in the sphere of fullness of life but under the influence and power of the sphere of death. This is suggested by the fact that the sources of impurity were associated with death. These sources include dead bodies (Num. 6:6, 7, 11), diseases (Lev. 13; 14), blood discharge (chap. 15), and semen (15:16; which could be called the "seed" of life). Impurity was associated with the realm of death and, as illustrated in the experience of the leper, the individuals were separated from God and others. They were considered to be under the power of death (Num. 12:9–12). These individuals were headed toward absolute alienation from the holy community and from God. Death was their final destination unless something was done to remove them from the fatal sphere.

Disobeying the moral aspects of the covenant law—that is, sinning against God and others—resulted in moral impurity, and the outcome was alienation from God. Sin was not a physical impurity but a burden that left sinners in a state of guilt (Lev. 5:1–2). The Hebrew nasa' awon—translated as “to bear guilt,” “to bear iniquity,” or “to be held responsible”—refers to a legal declaration, indicating that sinners were responsible for their specific sin and that they were liable to a punishment or penalty (see 5:1; 20:20; 24:14, 15; Ex. 28:42, 43; Num. 9:13). The ultimate result of this condition was death, which was suggested by the fact that in order to free sinners from this condition, a sacrificial victim was to die in their place (Lev. 5:1, 5, 6; 17:11).

God's holiness cannot peacefully coexist with sin or impurity (death). Even after God sanctified His people, the presence of impurity among them was not totally eradicated. Impurity was, in some instances, inevitable, as in the case of menstruation (15:25–27). Consequently, the Lord developed and established a system that addressed the needs of His people and that strengthened and preserved or restored their moral and ritual purity. In other words, God instituted a sacrificial, priestly, and atoning system that aimed at separating impurity and sin from His people in order for them to continue to exist in His holy presence, within the order He had established for their fellowship.

5. Holiness and Atonement. According to Leviticus, atonement is a divine gift through which God ransoms the life of repentant sinners, restoring them to covenant fellowship with Him. Leviticus 17:11 establishes a direct connection between sacrifices, the use of blood, and the atoning process. It assumes that because of sin and impurity, human life is endangered and needs deliverance, which God provided in the form of blood. The blood of the animal—that is to say, its life (17:14; Gen. 9:4; Deut. 12:23)—was to represent the life of the sinner. In His grace, God, as the proprietor of blood/life, accepted the life of the animal instead of the life of the sinner.

The Hebrew verb kipper (“to make atonement”) expresses the idea of removing sin or impurity from people or objects (“to perform a rite of cleansing”). In the case of persons, kipper removes the obstacle that obstructs a proper relationship with the Lord and, thus, conveys a sense of expiation. The verb is probably derived from the noun koper (“ransom”), indicating that the barrier between God and humans is removed by giving “a ransom” for the endangered life of the person. The concept of substitution is clearly indicated because the life of the sacrificial victim stands in for the life of the sinner (see Lev. 17:10–11). The process of atonement is seen in the verb kipper, which is directly associated with the sacrificial victim (5:10, 18; 7:7), the laying on of hands (1:4), the use of the blood (6:30; 8:15), the eating of the flesh of the sacrificial victim by the priest (10:19), and the Day of Atonement (16:16, 20). The atoning process consisted of two services, the daily and the annual (the Day of Atonement; chap. 16), during which different rituals were performed.

During the daily services, the Israelites were to approach the Lord to express their joy and gratitude, thus strengthening their communion with Him, but were also to seek cleansing and forgiveness. Two different atoning sacrifices were to be offered by the Israelites for violations of the covenant law: the sin/purification offering (Lev. 4) and the guilt offering (5:14–6:7). A specific, unblemished sacrificial victim was required, and the offerers were to lay their hands on the animal. Through the laying on of hands, the individuals were to identify themselves with the sacrificial victim, transferring onto it their sin/impurity (see “The Laying On of Hands,” p. 243). After the animal was slaughtered, a complex application of the blood (ritual blood manipulation) was required. The blood, which belonged to the Lord, was to be given back to Him through the ritual process and would become a vehicle for transferring the sin/impurity from sinners to the sanctuary. There were two other important sacrifices, whose primary function was not expiatory: the burnt offering (chap. 1) and the peace/fellowship offering (chap. 3). In both sacrifices, the blood manipulation was simplified, indicating that their primary function was not to atone for sin/impurity. The burnt offering was to be offered to make atonement for a person (1:4). The use of the peace offering for atonement is not specified in Leviticus, but Ezekiel indicates that this offering also had an atoning function (Ezek. 45:15, 17). Besides, Leviticus 17:11 indicates that the blood of all sacrifices had an atoning purpose. The implication is that when God's people come before Him, they are always in need of divine cleansing and forgiveness.

The annual service, or the Day of Atonement (chap. 16), brought the circle of the process of atonement to its close. The rites that were to be performed on that day had the specific purpose of removing from the sanctuary the sins and impurities of the people of Israel that had accumulated there through the daily services over the course of the previous year (16:16). The Holy and Most Holy Places of the tabernacle, as well as the altar of burnt offering, were to be cleansed and reconsecrated; atonement was to be made for them (16:33). During the performance of the ritual, the true source of sin and impurity (Satan) was symbolically identified and made responsible (16:21–22). The Day of Atonement was a day of judgment (see “The Theology of the Day of Atonement,” p. 264). It was not when the sins of the Israelites were forgiven but when their forgiveness was made complete or finished. For a brief period of time, holiness reigned in the absence of sin/impurity in Israel.

6. The Work of Christ and Leviticus. Christians have generally found in the Levitical sacrificial system and its priestly services a prefiguration or a type of the sacrifice and the high priestly ministry of Jesus. The NT uses the sacrificial system to interpret the meaning of the sacrificial death of Jesus. This is particularly the case in Ephesians 1:7, which states that Christ provides redemption and forgiveness of sins through His blood. Redemption, which is at the heart of atonement in the OT, is now the result of the death of Christ. As in Leviticus 4, this passage in Ephesians brings together redemption, blood, and divine forgiveness. Peter adds that this redemption was accomplished with “the precious blood of Christ,” who is the Lamb without blemish (1 Pet. 1:19). Jesus Himself stated, “For even the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give His life a ransom for many” (Mark 10:45). Redemption is now a gift from God through Christ. In this particular passage, the idea of substitution is explicitly indicated through the use of the Greek preposition anti (“in place of” or “instead of”). This was to be the role of the Servant of the Lord in Isaiah (Is. 53:11–12; see “The Servant of the Lord in Isaiah,” p. 885). The idea of substitution is even stronger in 1 Timothy 2:6: Jesus “gave Himself a ransom [antilytron, a “substitutive ransom”] for [hyper, “on behalf, for the benefit of”] all.” Paul adds that Christ “redeemed us from the curse of the law” by having become “a curse for us” (Gal. 3:13). He took upon Himself what was ours—the curse—and freed us from it. He took our place and our death. It is only through the sacrificial death of Christ that atonement is possible for repentant sinners. There is no need for any other sacrifice because He accomplished what every sacrifice in the OT pointed to: redemption, reconciliation, forgiveness of sin, cleansing (Heb. 7:27; 9:14, 26, 28; 10:5–14).

Christ is now the believers’ high priest before the Father: He is able to forever and completely (Gk. pantelēs) save those who come to God through Him, since He lives to intercede for them (Heb. 7:25; cf. Rom. 8:34; 1 Tim. 2:5; 1 John 2:1–2). He officiates, not in the earthly sanctuary but in the heavenly one (Heb. 8:1, 2, 5; 9:12, 24; 10:19, 20; Rev. 11:19; 14:17; 15:5; see also Psalms: Introduction). He began His priestly mediation after His ascension by asking the Father for the Holy Spirit on behalf of the disciples (John 14:16, 26; 15:26; Acts 1:4–5), and His request was granted (Acts 2:33). In fulfillment of the typological function of the daily services in the earthly sanctuary, Christ is interceding for His people by applying to them all the benefits of His saving sacrifice on the cross for their forgiveness, cleansing, and sanctification. The typological significance of the Day of Atonement is to be fulfilled in the consummation of the saving work of Christ before and at His Second Coming (Dan. 8:13–14; Heb. 9:23–28; Rev. 11:19). The ritual of the Day of Atonement was a day of judgment that proclaimed the coming of a day when the cosmos would be utterly free from the miasma of sin and death (impurity). The OT also anticipated a time when the holiness of God would be victorious (e.g., Zech. 14:20). Likewise, Christians look forward to the consummation of the redemptive work of Christ at the close of His priestly work before the Father in the heavenly sanctuary (see Dan. 8:14; Heb. 9:23).

Literary Features. There are four important literary features in Leviticus: divine speeches, literary structure, descriptions of rituals, and narratives. The book is chiefly made up of divine speeches given to Moses to instruct the people and the priests concerning the sanctuary services and their covenant responsibilities as a holy community. In some cases, the Lord gave private instructions to Moses (5:14; 6:1; 6:19; 8:1; 14:1; 23:26; 24:13) or to Aaron (10:8). He also spoke to Moses and Aaron together (11:1; 13:1; 14:33; 15:1). In most cases, God addressed Moses with directives for Aaron (16:1; 21:16; 22:1), for Aaron and his sons (6:8, 24; 21:1), and for all the Israelites (1:1; 4:1; 7:22, 28; 12:1; 15:1; 17:1; 18:1; 19:1; 20:1; 22:17; 23:1, 23, 33; 24:1, 25; 27:1). The only sections that are not divine speeches are the narratives. This literary feature emphasizes, in a particular way, the divine origin of the book, making absolutely clear its authoritative nature.

Overall, Leviticus is well structured. It opens with the Lord speaking to Moses, giving him instructions for the people of Israel (1:1–2), and closes with a summary statement that the book contains the instructions from the Lord to Israel at Mount Sinai (27:34). The book is a single literary unit. It is located at the center of the Pentateuch, flanked on each side by two books: Genesis/Exodus-Leviticus-Numbers/Deuteronomy. It places in the center of the five books of Moses the important topics of holiness and atonement. At the center of Leviticus itself is the chapter on the Day of Atonement (chap. 16)—a placement which accentuates its significance. The structure of the book chapters can be represented as follows:

- A Laws Related to the People and the Sanctuary (1–7)
- B Laws Related to the Priesthood (8–10)
  - C Laws Related to the Individual (11–15)
  - D Day of Atonement (16)
  - C' Laws Related to the Individual (17–20)
  - B' Laws Related to the Priesthood (21–22)
- A' Laws Related to the People and the Sanctuary (23–27)

Leviticus contains ritual laws and a handful of narratives. The narratives include the ordination of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood (chaps. 8–9), the experience of Nadab and Abihu (10:1–7), the incident between Moses and Eleazar and Ithamar (10:12–20), and the account of the blasphemer (24:10–14). The stories generate insight into some of the ritual laws and, in some cases, lead to the formulation of new legislation.

Most of the book is about rituals and their proper performance. In Leviticus, a ritual was basically an act of worship intended to strengthen or restore/renew the relationship between God, the individual, and the community. It usually resulted in ritual cleansing or in atonement. It was an action to be performed in a certain place (mainly in the courtyard of the sanctuary or inside of it), at a particular moment (daily, during festivals, once a year), and according to some specific instructions (bringing the offering to the Lord, laying on of hands, slaughtering, etc.). The ritual was intended to introduce change (such as forgiveness of sin or cleansing) or to express individual or communal feelings/convictions (joy, gratitude, faith) in a particular situation (after sinning, after an answer to prayer, after receiving a blessing, etc.).

The Christian ritual of the Lord's Supper illustrates how rituals function. Many conservative Christians gather together once every three months (time) inside the church (place) to partake of the bread and the grape juice (action). This is reverently done (following specific instructions) and is an individual and collective expression of our common union with the risen Lord (expressing religious convictions). Participants seek spiritual renewal (change), and this is done in obedience to the Lord (a particular situation).

Rituals are often formed by combining numerous rites. For instance, the Day of Atonement was a ritual that aimed at the cleansing of the sanctuary. But this ritual was formed by a number of rites: a cleansing rite for the high priest, another for the altar of burnt offering, and further cleansing rites for the Holy and Most Holy Places. The combination of these rites resulted in the ritual of the Day of Atonement. Rites carry symbolic meanings. For instance, the rite of sprinkling blood on the altar signified that the altar was being purified and sanctified (16:18–19). The symbolic meaning of a rite is not always clear. In order to uncover its meaning, the context, the nature of the ritual, and parallel passages need to be examined.

HOLINESS PRESERVED AND RESTORED

The first major division of Leviticus begins with a brief introduction, situating the book within the narrative flow of the Pentateuch (1:1–2a). The section contains instructions given to the people for worship through sacrifices and offerings that aimed at strengthening or preserving their relationship with the Lord (1:2b–3:17). There are also guidelines for how to restore a broken relationship with the Lord through required expiatory sacrifices (4:1–6:7). Further direction is given concerning the proper handling of the sacrificial offerings by the priests and the people (6:8–7:36). The section concludes with a brief summary (7:37–38). The first task of the book is to institute the sacrificial system, through which the order established by the Lord was strengthened, preserved, and, if broken, reestablished. The activities associated with this system took place in the presence of the holy God of Israel, who dwelled among His people.

Voluntary Offerings

The divine speech begins with instructions concerning the burnt (chap. 1), the grain (chap. 2), and the peace/fellowship offerings (chap. 3). These were voluntary offerings and, as such, expressed the willingness of the people to worship the Lord with thanksgivings and gratitude for His blessings. Bringing these offerings manifested the person's desire to enjoy fellowship with the covenant God and with others.

1:1–2a. Moses as Mediator. The Lord, who descended from Sinai to dwell in the sanctuary (Ex. 40:34–38), now addressed Moses from the tabernacle/tent of meeting. Two important ideas were being expressed. First, the tabernacle was by nature the dwelling place of God where His people would come to worship Him (e.g., Lev. 26:11, 12; Ex. 25:8; 29:45, 46; Ps. 132:7). He had become accessible to them in a unique way (Deut. 4:7). Second, the tabernacle was the place from which God spoke to Moses, giving him instructions to convey to the people of Israel (v. 2; cf. Ex. 25:22). Moses was God's messenger and the mediator between a holy God and humans damaged by sin and impurity. The sacrificial system itself had a mediatorial function. Through it, the Israelites expressed their inner feelings and needs to the Lord and sought forgiveness. The priestly system was established to provide an additional form of intercession between the people and their God (Lev. 8–9). The concept of mediation runs throughout Leviticus as a type of the mediation of Christ. God has spoken through Him to us in "these last days" and has appointed Him as our Mediator before the Father in the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 1:2; 7:25; 8:6; 9:15; 12:24).

1:2b–17. Burnt Offering. The instructions for the burnt offering (Heb. 'olah, "ascending/rising offering;" Gr. holokautōma, from which the word "holocaust" originated), are organized by the type of sacrificial victim: animals from the herd (vv. 3–9), animals from the flocks (vv. 10–13), and birds (vv. 14–17). The specific instruction is preceded by a statement about the animals to be brought to the Lord as an offering (qorban, "what is brought near" to the Lord, designates animal and nonanimal offerings). The sacrificial victim was to be from the herd or the flock (not a wild animal), and it was to be without blemish or physical defects and in good health (v. 3; cf. 22:20–25; Mal. 1:8–14). What was morally and spiritually expected from the people was to be a physical reality in the sacrificial animal (Deut.

18:13). Anyone (v. 2; Heb. 'adam, "a person," used in a generic sense) could bring a burnt offering, but if it were from the herd, it had to be male—an expensive animal, demonstrating the person's willingness to give to the Lord the very best. The ritual took place in the space between the altar and the entrance to the courtyard in the presence of the Lord. The altar represented God's presence and was accessible to the common Israelites to grant them forgiveness and to accept their expressions of gratitude, joy, and worship (Ps. 43:4). The closest they could come to the Lord was to the altar. The burnt offering was to be voluntary and assumed that the occasion for the sacrifice was one of gladness and thankfulness. It was a votive offering to be brought after a vow was fulfilled (Lev. 22:18).

The ritual required the participation of the offerer and the priest according to a set of specific instructions. Worshipers were to firmly place their hands upon the head of the animal for it to be accepted and to make atonement on their behalf (v. 4; on the verb "to atone," see the section on Theology in Leviticus: Introduction). A profound relationship was to be established between the offerer and the sacrifice to the degree that when the Lord accepted the sacrifice, He was accepting the person (cf. Lev. 7:18; see "The Laying On of Hands," p. 243). The burnt offering operated under the assumption that humans are not holy by nature and, consequently, when they approach the Lord, even to express gratitude, joy, and thanksgiving, they are in need of forgiveness.

Next, the offerer was to kill the sacrifice. The verb shakhat ("kill") refers to slaughtering the victim by slitting the throat to reduce the pain and to let the animal bleed out and die. The priest was to gather and present the blood to the Lord and sprinkle or splash (Heb. zaraq, "to toss, throw") it around the sides of the altar (v. 5). Then the worshiper skinned the animal, cut it into pieces, and washed its entrails and legs with water (vv. 6, 9). The priests were to prepare the altar for the sacrifice, then place everything on it and burn the offering (vv. 7–9). By burning, the offering was permanently given to the Lord; it became irretrievable. This sacrifice was one of the most significant Israelite offerings in that all of it was given to the Lord, indicating the willingness of the offerer to surrender all to God in an act of worship.

The section concludes with a statement indicating the aim of the sacrifice: it was a burnt offering and an 'isheh, which is usually rendered as "an offering made by fire" or "fire offering," but it probably means "gift" or "food gift," as suggested by the fact that the wine libation

(Num. 15:10) and the showbread (Lev. 24:7, 9) are called 'isheh, but no portion of them was burned on the altar. The burnt offering is further defined as a sweet or pleasing aroma to the Lord (v. 9). This last phrase could mean that the sacrifice pleased the Lord, was pleasant to Him, or that it pacified/soothed Him by its “aroma” (e.g., Gen. 8:21; Ex. 29:18; 2 Cor. 2:15; Eph. 5:2). These ideas are not mutually exclusive. When God voluntarily “smelled the aroma” of the sacrifice, He was choosing to express His acceptance of the worshipers and not His wrath or rejection (Lev. 26:31). God chose to preserve a harmonious and peaceful relationship with them.

If the sacrifice were from the flocks (vv. 10–13), the animal was to be a male without blemish or defect (v. 10). The instructions are significantly shortened, which indicates that the procedure used was to be the same as in the previous verses. The animal was to be killed on the north side of the altar (v. 11), probably the location where all burnt offerings were killed. The section ends with an indication of the ultimate purpose for the ritual: it was a burnt offering, a gift, a sweet or pleasing aroma to the Lord (v. 13; see v. 9).

The poor could offer doves or young pigeons (vv. 14–17). No one was to be excluded from the benefits of the burnt offering. In this case, since the victim was a bird, particular instructions were given. The priest was to wring off the head of the bird, burn it on the altar, and then drain its blood at the side of the altar (v. 15). He also was to remove its crop and feathers and place them on the east side, where the ashes were (v. 16). In other words, these elements were not to be placed on the altar. Finally, the priests were to split the bird, without dividing it into two parts, and burn it on the altar (v. 17). The purpose of the burnt offering of birds was the same as in the other two cases.

In the NT, the burnt offering finds its fulfillment in the unblemished sacrifice of Christ (1 Pet. 1:19). Jesus gave His blood and flesh, His whole person, to the Lord (1 Cor. 11:23–25; Heb. 7:27) in order to cleanse us from sin, making it possible for us to approach the throne of God with joy and gratitude (Heb. 4:16). Jesus is indeed a sacrifice of pleasing aroma to God (Eph. 5:2). In the acceptance of the sacrifice of His Son, God accepts us as well. Christ’s sacrifice also signals our need for sanctification (1 Thess. 5:23).

The Laying On of Hands

The Hebrew phrase samak yad 'al means “to press the hand on” the sacrificial victim and was used in the cultic (sanctuary services) and in some noncultic cases. It was required for the burnt (Lev. 1:4), peace/fellowship (3:2), sin (4:4, 15, 33), and guilt offerings (7:7); it was to be part of the ritual of ordination for Aaron and his sons (8:14, 18, 22); and Aaron was to take the same action on the Day of Atonement (16:21). This essay will examine both the cultic and noncultic passages.

1. Laying On of “Hand” or “Hands”? When an individual brought a sacrifice, he or she was to lay a “hand” on the animal (Lev. 1:4; 3:2, 8, 13; 4:4, 24, 29, 33), but when the subject is plural, the text reads “hands” (4:15; 8:14, 18, 22; Ex. 29:10, 15, 19; Num. 8:12; 2 Chr. 29:23). This has led some to conclude that there were two different rituals, one to be performed using one hand, to express the idea of ownership (“This is my animal”), the other to employ two hands, expressing the idea of transfer. Support for these two rituals is allegedly found in Leviticus 16:21, where Aaron placed two hands on the scapegoat and transferred to it the sins and impurities of the people, and in Numbers 27:23 (cf. Deut. 34:9), when Moses transferred to Joshua the role of leader of the people of Israel. Several comments can be made in the evaluation of this theory.

First, the use of “hands” when the subject is plural is clearly ambiguous because it could designate one or two hands from each person. Second, in other contexts, the singular and the plural are sometimes used interchangeably to designate the same action. For instance, Moses raised his “hand” in prayer, but Aaron and Hur helped to hold up his “hands” (Ex. 17:11–12). In other words, the use of the plural or the singular is not especially important. Third, the phrase “to lay hands on” shows the same shift from the singular to the plural. According to Numbers 27:18, the Lord commanded Moses, “Lay your hand on him [Joshua],” but in v. 23, when Moses obeyed the Lord, the text states that “he laid his hands on him” (see Deut. 34:9). This suggests that the use of one or two hands was not significant. Fourth, Leviticus 16:21 alone is not strong enough to prove the argument that there were two different rituals. The proposed existence of two rituals with two different meanings is a scholarly invention.

2. Nonsacrificial Use. The first nonsacrificial use of the ritual is found in Leviticus 24:14. Those who heard a person blaspheme the name of the Lord were to place their hands on the blasphemer before she or he was executed. The meaning of the ritual is not stated. It can be speculated that as witnesses, they were identifying the guilty one before the execution, but there seems to be more to it than mere identification. The individuals who heard the blasphemer were somehow implicated in the sin. This seems to be what Leviticus 5:1 is also suggesting. This passage has been understood as referring to cases in which people knew something about a crime or a sin and were adjured to tell the truth about the matter (as in a modern court trial, where witnesses testify under oath). If they knew something but did not testify, they would be also held responsible for the crime committed. Others believe that it refers more specifically to the type of case described here in Leviticus 24:14—if a person blasphemed, anyone who heard was to speak up; if not, the hearer would also be held responsible for the sin. In both cases, the crime committed impacted the person who knew about it, requiring that he or she expose the criminal. The case of the blasphemer demonstrates that, in such cases, those who witnessed what happened were to symbolically transfer to the criminal the guilt that otherwise would have permanently adhered to them.

The second case involves the ordination of Joshua. Moses laid hands on him to give to him some of Moses's authority (Num. 27:20). The idea of transfer is also present here, and since Joshua was taking Moses's role as leader, the idea of substitution is present.

The third case is recorded in Numbers 8:10. Representatives from the people were to lay hands on the Levites as they were set apart to officiate in the sanctuary. They were chosen by the Lord to serve Him in place of the firstborn of all the people of Israel (v. 16). We have here a delegation of responsibility and the concept of substitution. These cases demonstrate that, through the laying on of hands, a relationship was established between the subject and the object (witness-accused, leader-successor/substitute, firstborn-substitute), that something was transferred from one to the other, and that in some cases, the idea of substitution was present.

3. Meaning of the Ritual. With respect to sacrificial offerings, the meaning of the ritual is not explicitly stated, but there is enough information to postulate that it expresses at least the idea of transfer. First, the only place where the meaning of the laying on of hands is interpreted in a cultic setting is in Leviticus 16:20. It refers to the transfer of sin and impurity to an animal. It has been suggested that since the scapegoat was not a sacrifice, this meaning should not be assigned to sacrifices in general. But this is an arbitrary restriction because, as noted earlier, there are other passages in which the laying on of hands consistently expresses the idea of the transfer of something from a subject to an object. Obviously, the context establishes what was being transferred. With this biblical evidence at hand, one should feel safe to argue that Leviticus 16:21 serves as an interpretational link that connects the meaning of the ritual in noncultic passages with its practice in the Israelite cultus. This is supported by other biblical evidence.

Second, Leviticus establishes a deep connection between the laying on of hands, the sacrifice, and the offerers. Individuals were to bring the sacrifice and place their hand(s) on it, and the offering was to be accepted to make atonement on their behalf (lit. "for him"; 1:4). God's acceptance of this sacrifice was equivalent to His acceptance of the one who offered it (7:18). The connection was produced through the laying on of hands. It was through this action that the victim became the substitute onto which the sinfulness and deepest feelings of the worshiper were transferred in the case of the burnt and peace/fellowship offerings.

Third, those who brought an expiatory sacrifice had violated one of the commandments of the Lord (Lev. 4:2) and bore their sin or guilt (5:1–3). Through the atoning sacrifice, the sin they committed was removed from them (4:35; see also v. 26). In the case of impurity, the atoning sacrifice removed the uncleanness "from" the person (12:7). There was clearly a transfer from the repentant sinner to the sacrificial victim. The only rite that signaled the transfer was the laying on of hands. This implies that the expiatory sacrifices were likely rituals of elimination (removal of sin and impurity).

Fourth, the life of the unblemished sacrificial victim was directly associated with the endangered life of the sinner—one stood for the other in order to bring atonement/expiation through a ransom/substitute (see 17:10–14). Atonement occurred at the cost of the life of the animal that carried the sin, transferred to it by the laying on of hands, thus removing the person's sin and guilt.

Fifth, the sin of repentant sinners reached the horns of the altar (cf. Jer. 17:1). During the atonement process, the priest was to put some of the blood of the offering on the horns of the altar (Lev. 4:7, 25). The blood/life of the sacrifice stood for the blood/life of the repentant sinner, and it carried his or her sin. It was to be transferred to the altar, which represented the very presence of God (see 1:5). This explains why a garment on which the blood of a sin offering fell was to be washed (6:27).

Sixth, the rite in which the priests ate the flesh of the most holy offerings assumes that sin/impurity was transferred to the sacrificial victim. As part of the atoning process, the priest was to eat the flesh of the sacrifice in order to bear the sin of the people (see 10:12–20). Therefore, sin “moved” from the sinner to the sacrificial victim to the priest. Whenever the priest himself was in need of atonement, he was not to eat the flesh of his own sacrifice, but his sin was to be transferred to the tabernacle through the blood manipulation in the Holy Place, where he, as a priest, had access to God (4:6–7).

Seventh, the transfer of sin/impurity to the sacrificial victim, whose flesh was considered most holy, points to the paradoxical nature of the atonement process. The process brought into direct contact sin/impurity and holiness/life, and the result was atonement—that is, the removal of sin/impurity from the sinner. This was possible only because the Lord allowed for it to happen via the altar (17:10–11). Thus, the holy priest was to eat the most holy flesh of the sacrifice and yet, in so doing, was to bear the sin of the people (10:17). The flesh of the sin offering was most holy (6:24–30), but the fact that the person who burned its flesh needed a purification bath shows that the most holy was bearing sin/impurity (4:12). The holy and the unclean stood together, but the holy was not damaged by it. This connection was broken or came to an end through the ritual of the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16), when all the sins and impurities of the children of Israel, transferred there through the daily sacrifices, were to be removed from the holy tabernacle (16:16). The modern reader cannot avoid noticing the parallels to Jesus, the Holy One (Luke 1:35), who was also the Lamb of God and who bore humanity's sins yet remained holy (John 1:29; 2 Cor. 5:21; Heb. 4:15).

Eighth, the idea of an innocent victim bearing the sins of others in order to atone for them is clearly found in Isaiah 52:13–53:12 (see “The Servant of the Lord in Isaiah,” p. 885). The Servant of the Lord, a messianic figure, is described as the ultimate sacrificial victim (Is. 53:10), who gives His life as a substitute for the life of many (vv. 6, 11). The transfer of sin in the sacrificial system pointed typologically to Christ as the substitute sin-bearer.

4. Contamination of the Sanctuary. The transfer of sin/impurity to the sanctuary through the sacrificial system freed the person from spiritual corruption and resulted in forgiveness or cleansing. Not so for the person who contaminated the sanctuary through the violation of the covenant law. Such individuals bore their own sin and died for it. For example, the person who, after offering a son to Molech, contaminated the sanctuary was to be put to death (see Lev. 20:1–3; cf. 18:21). The sin of Nadab and Abihu was also resolved through their death and not through a sacrificial substitute (10:1–2). The priest who ate the holy offerings while unclean was to be put to death (22:2–9). The contamination of the temple by kings, priests, and the people shortly before the exile was removed by their destruction (see Ezek. 8:5–18). The only sin/impurity that was to be removed from the tabernacle was that which, through the laying on of hands, was transferred to the sacrificial offering and, ultimately, to the tabernacle itself. Thus was sin/impurity removed from the person according to God's will.

2:1–16. Grain Offering. The instructions related to the grain offering are organized on the basis of uncooked (2:1–3) and cooked grain (2:4–10, 14–15). Additional instructions are added in 2:11–13. The Hebrew name for this offering, minkhah, designates both grain and animal offerings (Judg. 6:18, 19; 1 Sam. 2:15–17). It refers to a gift or tribute given to a superior as an act of homage or gratitude (e.g., Gen. 32:13–21; 1 Sam. 26:19). In Leviticus, minkhah is a technical term designating a “grain offering” brought on different occasions as an act of homage to the covenant Lord (see Gen. 4:3). It was always to accompany the burnt (e.g., Num. 15:2–12, 28–29) and peace/fellowship offerings (e.g., Lev. 7:11–14; Num. 15:3). It was a voluntary offering that anyone (nepesh, “person”) could bring to the court of the sanctuary. The uncooked offering (see 2:1–2) was to be made of fine flour, semolina of wheat (see Ex. 29:2), accompanied by olive oil and incense (made of a costly dried tree resin). These were all symbols of blessing, joy, gladness, and devotion to God (Deut. 11:14; Pss. 104:15; 141:2; Is. 61:3; Joel 2:24; Acts 10:4). The priest was to burn on the altar a handful of the flour mixed with oil and all the frankincense as a memorial on the altar (Lev. 2:2), which meant that the portion burned on the altar was a token portion of the totality of the offering given to the Lord. As a memorial, it could also be an act of remembrance—that is to say, the worshipers were indicating that they had not forgotten the Lord’s goodness in providing food for them. They had not forgotten His grace. It is specifically called an ’isheh, a “gift” or “food offering” offered as a pleasant aroma (vv. 2, 9; see 1:9). The rest of the flour and oil was to go to the priests to provide for their needs. The offering was most holy (v. 3), meaning that the Lord set it apart to be eaten only by the priests in the sanctuary, not by their family members at home.

The cooked grain offering was to be baked in an oven (v. 4) in the form of thick unleavened cakes made of semolina mixed with oil. It could also be in the form of thin wafers smeared with oil. A third possibility was to cook the offering on a flat pan or griddle, which produced a type of pancake that was then broken into pieces to facilitate the burning of a portion of it (v. 6; cf. 1:6). The fourth option was to deep-fry the semolina in a covered pan (v. 7). The cooked grain offering was to be given to the Lord through the mediation of the priest, who took it to the altar to burn a portion of it (vv. 8–9).

Two additional regulations were given. First, the use of leaven or honey (Heb. debash, “honey” or “fruit syrup”) was forbidden (v. 11). These were fermenting agents associated with death and, therefore, incompatible with God’s holiness. The exception was the offering of firstfruits (v. 12; Heb. qarban re’shit, “first offering”), but no portion of it was to go on the altar. The firstfruits refer to the first processed foods of the harvest (Num. 18:12–13), which the Lord assigned to the priests (Num. 15:19–21). Second, the grain offering, and in fact all offerings, were to be seasoned with salt (v. 13; cf. 2 Chr. 13:5). Since salt conveyed the idea of preservation or permanency (Num. 18:19), the salt emphasized the permanent nature of God’s covenant. Adding salt to the offerings may have expressed covenant loyalty, thus strengthening the covenant relationship between God and the Israelites.

The last type of cooked grain offering consisted of the firstfruits (Heb. bikkurim, “first produce”; v. 12 uses a different Heb. term), probably barley (v. 14; cf. Ex. 9:31). In this particular case, the green head of the grain was to be roasted and crushed, with oil added to it and incense placed on it (vv. 14–15).

Leviticus 2 suggests some important theological and spiritual lessons. First, it demonstrates that God is the Lord of His people and that He abundantly provides for them. The offering was an act of joyful gratitude, homage, and adoration to the covenant Lord. Second, the uncooked grain was untouched by human hands. The people were to bring the grain to God as they received it from Him, without processing it, because it was in itself a revelation of His goodness. But they could also bring it cooked; that is to say, through the cooked grain, they were consecrating their work and service to God. Third, the exclusion of leaven and honey (used for fermentation) as symbols of death and sin (see Matt. 16:6, 11; 1 Cor. 5:6–8) symbolizes that God does not want spiritual fermenting agents to alter His children’s relationship with Him. Fourth, this offering was a plant-based meal, a fact that is often ignored. It has been suggested that perhaps this offering was a reference to the original plant-based diet of humans (Gen. 1:29–30). In that case, it was pointing back to the Edenic ideal and to the future peaceful coexistence of humans and animals (see Is. 11:6–9; 65:25). Finally, since this is about grain, from which bread is made, it is a reminder of Jesus, the true Bread of Life, who nurtures our spiritual life and preserves our physical existence (John 6:35). He should therefore be the Lord of our lives.

3:1–16. Peace/Fellowship/Communion Offerings. This chapter could be divided into two main discussions regarding peace offerings: those from the herd (3:1–5) and those from the flock (3:6–16), subdivided into sheep and goats. The chapter concludes with a regulation about animal blood and fat (v. 17).

The proper translation of the Hebrew zebakh shelamim is debated. Some translate the term as “peace [or well-being] offering” and others as “fellowship offering.” Zebakh means “to kill/slaughter” and could refer to sacrifices, as is the case here, or to the common killing of animals (Deut. 12:15) and even humans (2 Kin. 23:20). The term shelamim appears to be derived from shalom, “peace,” and thus refers to a peace/well-being sacrifice that would include the ideas of communion and covenant fellowship. Accordingly, both “peace” and “fellowship” are appropriate translations. This sacrifice belongs to the category of voluntary sacrifices introduced in Leviticus 1:2.

If the sacrificial victim (male or female) came from the herd (v. 1), it was to be without blemish or defect (see Lev. 1:3). The sacrificial procedure was very similar to the burnt offering (see chap. 1), the main difference being that the sacrifice was not to be burned on the altar. Since it was a voluntary offering, no specific occasion is mentioned. The procedure was as follows: the offerer was to lay her or his hand on the head of the animal (see “The Laying On of Hands,” p. 243) and slaughter it by the entrance to the courtyard, and the priest was to collect the blood and splash it around the altar (in regard to ’isheh [“food offering” or “fire offering”] and the “aroma,” see commentary on 1:2b–17). The fat of the inner organs and the kidneys (vv. 3–4; see v. 9) were to be given to the Lord, placed on the burnt offering of the daily sacrifice.

If the sacrifice was from the flock (sheep, ewes, goats, and she-goats), the requirements were the same as for the cattle (3:6–16). In the case of the sheep, the fatty tail was also to be placed on the altar. The large fat tail of the sheep was considered a delicacy, the most delicious part of the sheep (v. 9). In fact, the Hebrew term kheleb (“fat”) is metaphorically used to designate “the best” (e.g., Num. 18:12; Deut. 32:14; for the possible connection between this legislation and health concerns, see “Health and Hygiene in Leviticus,” p. 272). In giving it to the Lord, the offerer was giving to Him the very best. It is clear that the main emphasis was on the blood and fat of the sacrifice, as the closing legislation illustrates (v. 17). They belonged to the Lord, and no one was to consume them (on blood, see Lev. 17).

The purpose of the peace offering is not explicitly stated in the text, but according to 7:11–20, it could be brought as an offering of gratitude (7:12–15; 22:29–30), a freewill offering (7:16–17; 22:17–23), and a votive offering (7:16–17). It was fundamentally understood to be a religious meal in which the food would not be consumed by God—the priest was given a portion of the meat (7:31–32), and the offerer was to eat the rest of it with relatives and friends in the presence of the Lord (7:15). It seems that the meal was to be an expression of fellowship with the covenant Lord and of the desire of the offerer to strengthen the covenant relationship with Him, as well as a deep expression of joy in the presence of God (Pss. 54:6; 107:22). Although Leviticus 3 does not speak about the atoning function of the peace offering, according to Leviticus 17:11 and Ezekiel 45:15, 17, it did have this function. Since its primary purpose was not expiatory, the blood manipulation, like that of the burnt offering, was significantly simpler than that of the sin offering. But the fact that blood was to be returned to the Lord via the altar suggests that whenever a person approached the Lord, cleansing/forgiveness was needed (see Leviticus: Introduction). The acceptance of the offering signified the acceptance of the offerer. The sacrifice finds its fulfillment in Jesus who, through His broken body, offers the bread of life to all who believe (Matt. 26:26; John 6:53–56) and grants them peace (John 14:27; Eph. 2:14).

Required Offerings

The required offerings were those that redressed violations of the covenant law, namely, the sin/purification offering (4:1—5:13) and the guilt offering (5:14–19). These offerings assumed that God’s people wanted to preserve the covenant relationship with Him and that they occasionally violated it. The dilemma was resolved through expiatory sacrifices. The multiplicity of sacrifices points to the inadequacy of the system. There was no single sacrifice able to satisfy all the spiritual and emotional needs of the people. This would be possible only through the sacrifice of Christ.

4:1—5:13. Sin/Purification Offering. This section discusses the sin offering both for the inadvertent sins of the priest, the community, the ruler, and the individual (4:1–35) and for intentional offenses (5:1–13). In a sense, this is about accountability for sins based on a person's sphere of influence. The proper translation of the Hebrew term khatta't is still debated; some retain the traditional "sin offering" while others argue for "purification offering" or other terms. The first claim is based on the literal meaning of the Hebrew term, while the second is primarily based on the function of the offering. The second possibility is also acceptable as long as the sinner is recognized as the one who needed cleansing from sin or impurity.

The sin offering was to be brought when a person sinned unintentionally (shagagah) and violated any of the commands of the Lord (v. 2). The Hebrew term shagagah designated unintentional sin (Gen. 43:12) as well as consciously committed sins (1 Sam. 26:21). This is suggested by Leviticus 4:22–23 and 27–28, where sinners were to bring the sacrifice because they were guilty (vv. 22, 27) or because they came to know that they had sinned (vv. 23, 28). This type of sin was contrasted with open rebellion against God, which is called "high-handed sin," for which there was no atonement available (Num. 15:30–31). The term could then include the idea of sin as a result of human frailty.

Sin of the Priest and the Community (4:1–21). The phrase "the anointed priest" appears to designate the high priest, but since all priests were anointed and there is no other legislation dealing with the sin of a regular priest, it may be better to interpret the phrase as referring to any member of the priestly family (cf. Lev. 10:6–7). In this case, the priest was aware of his sin and brought the offering. The congregation, however, was not aware of their sin (4:13). Once they did become aware of their sin, they were to offer a sin offering (vv. 13–14). A sin of the congregation implicated the priest, for he was part of the congregation. Consequently, he could not eat of the flesh of the sacrificial victim. The priest and the congregation brought an unblemished and expensive young bull (or perhaps, "an animal from the herd") for the sin offering (vv. 3, 14; see 1:3). The rest of the ritual procedure was to be basically the same for both the priest and the community: (1) laying hands on the sacrificial animal (v. 4), (2) slaying the sacrifice (v. 4), (3) sprinkling the blood inside the tent (v. 6), (4) placing blood on the horns of the altar of incense (v. 7), (5) pouring out the blood at the base of the altar of burnt offering (v. 7), (6) burning the fat on the altar (vv. 8–10), and (7) burning the flesh of the animal (v. 12). The laying on of hands indicates that sin was transferred to the sacrificial victim, and it died in place of the sinner (see "The Laying On of Hands," p. 243). The sin was to be transferred to the tabernacle by sprinkling blood seven times in the Holy Place toward the veil and by putting some of the blood on the horns of the altar (v. 7)—a place of refuge for sinners (1 Kin. 1:50–51; 2:28) and where their sin was recorded (Jer. 17:1). Notice that during the Day of Atonement, blood was applied to the horns of the altar to cleanse it, but a different phrase is used: literally "on the horns of the altar all around" (16:18), which, in Leviticus, always expresses the idea of cleansing. One could then suggest that placing some blood on the horns indicates transfer, while placing blood on the horns all around could mean cleansing; the last is the undoing of the first. The fat also belonged to God and was given to Him via the altar. Since the priests could not profit from their own atoning offerings, the rest of the flesh of the animal was burned (cf. Lev. 6:23, 29–30). According to 4:20, forgiveness is a divine prerogative and not the automatic result of the atoning ritual (also in vv. 26, 31, 35). The book of Hebrews argues that because the priests had to offer a sacrifice for their sins, they belonged to a defective priesthood to be superseded by Christ's. This is because Jesus did not have to offer a sacrifice for His sin; He was without sin (Heb. 4:14–16; 5:3). But the fact that even the most important spiritual leader in Israel was in need of atonement is a reminder that the need for Christ is universal.

Sin of the Leader and the Individual (4:22–35). The most important difference between the offering of the leader and that of the individual was the value of the victim—a more valuable male goat for the leader and a female goat or a female lamb for the individual (vv. 23, 28, 32). The term nasi' is vague but most likely refers to a civic, tribal representative (though it is used for the unique prince or king/priest figure of Ezek. 45–46). The most important difference between this sin offering and the one offered for the priest and congregation is that, in this case, no blood was to be taken inside the tent (vv. 25, 30, 34). Instead, the priest was to eat the flesh of the animal (6:26); he was not implicated in the sin of the leader. The meaning of the ritual of eating the flesh of the sin offering is given in 10:17: by eating it, the priests bore (nasa') the guilt of the people. Sin was to be transferred to the tabernacle through the priest, who assumed responsibility for it. The burning of the fat of the animal is described as a sweet or pleasing aroma to the Lord (v. 31; see 1:9). This demonstrated that God was willing to accept both the offering and the offerer. This was possible because the offerer's sins had been removed. The text explicitly states that atonement would be made for both the offerer and his or her sin (vv. 26, 35). In v. 26, the Hebrew reads "from his sin," clarifying that the purpose of the atonement was to free the person "from" sin, indicating that this is an expiatory sacrifice. It was not the sanctuary that needed to be cleansed from sin but the repentant sinner (see also 5:6, 10; on the removal of impurity, see 12:7; 14:19).

The sin offering was a prefiguration of the sacrificial death of Christ, who offered Himself as a sin offering for humanity's sins: Romans 8:3 says that the Father sent Jesus "in the likeness of sinful flesh" (peri hamartias, "because of/for sin" or, according to some translations, "as a sin offering"; peri hamartias was used in the LXX to translate the Hebrew khatta't ["sin offering"]). He took upon Himself our sins and voluntarily and vicariously accepted responsibility for them, dying in our place (2 Cor. 5:21). He is the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world (John 1:29; cf. Gal. 3:13; 1 Pet. 2:24). Through Christ, God provided the sin offering that cleanses all who seek Him (Rom. 3:25; Eph. 5:2). This is the ultimate sacrifice that cleanses humanity once and for all. The atoning work of Christ continues to be effective, even for postbaptismal sins committed as a result of human frailty (1 John 2:1–2). The proper response to such a display of love is loyalty and gratitude to Him.

Other Offenses (5:1–13). This section contains a list of sins, followed by the required sin offering. Four specific sins are mentioned, and the first and the last were definitively intentional, with the persons fully aware of what they had done. The first was the sin of someone who hears another person pronouncing a curse and does not report it (v. 1; see Prov. 29:24); that is to say, she or he ignores it. It is also possible to interpret the text as referring to the witness of a crime who is unwilling to testify when called or adjured to do so. The Hebrew text speaks about a person who sins by not testifying against someone whom they heard curse. By not reporting the crime, the person participates in it and is perhaps considered an accomplice (cf. Prov. 29:24) and bears the sin or iniquity. The Hebrew expression nasa' 'awon, usually translated "to bear iniquity," is a legal phrase meaning "to be responsible for the crime and liable to punishment."

The second sin involved becoming unclean by touching the carcass of unclean animals (v. 2; see 11:8). Even if the offenders were unaware of their sin (lit. "it is hidden from him"), they were still considered unclean (lit. "and/ but he is unclean") and guilty. The last verb is a legal statement expressing the same idea as nasa' 'awon (see v. 1). Since touching the unclean did not require a sin offering (11:24–28), something else must have happened after the person became unclean. The phrase referring to the individual being "unaware" is puzzling because the verb means "to hide" (lit. "it is hidden from him"). Many scholars prefer to translate it as "to forget," but the Hebrew verb does not appear to carry this meaning anywhere else in the Hebrew Bible. It is probable that the phrase "it is hidden from him" is an idiomatic expression that conveys the idea of hiding by choosing to ignore something or by being negligent (cf. Lev. 20:4; Deut. 22:1, 3–4; Is. 58:7). If this suggestion is accepted, the person who became unclean ignored the violation of the law of cleanness; and by not performing the required cleansing rite, his or her spiritual condition was compromised. Consequently, a sin offering was required.

The third case addressed coming into contact with human uncleanness (see Lev. 15), resulting in ritual contamination (v. 3). Once again, the text explains that this act "was hidden from him" (i.e., the person ignored his or her condition and did not perform the required cleansing rite). The end of the verse has been understood in various ways—for example, that the person becomes guilty upon realizing what had happened or (perhaps, as all major translations suggest) that the person has come to know or recognize her or his guilt after being initially unaware of it. A literal translation of the Hebrew text reads, "And he knows and is guilty." This is not a matter of ignorance but a case of knowingly violating the law of cleanness.

The fourth case concerned a person who uttered a promissory oath without seriously considering it first (v. 4). According to the law, the sin does not consist of making a thoughtless oath but of not fulfilling it (Deut. 23:22–24; Eccl. 5:3–5). Some Bible translations render the passage "and he is unaware of it—when he realizes it, then he shall be guilty." But such a translation and similar ones do not make sense within the context because a person who pronounces an oath is fully aware of what she or he is doing. In fact, the Hebrew text reads literally

“and he knows.” The only possible interpretation is that the person simply ignored the oath and did not fulfill it. This was not an involuntary violation of the law, so consequently it required a sin offering.

The resolution of the problem began with a confession of negligence due to intentionally ignoring the law (v. 5). Translators and commentators differ over how to translate the first part of v. 6. The Hebrew term ’asham could refer to a trespass offering (v. 15), but in this context, the topic is the sin offering (vv. 9, 11–12). ’Asham could also be translated “reparation, penalty” (i.e., the penalty/reparation for the violation of the law is a sin offering). The sacrificial victim chosen for the sin offering was based on the financial status of the person. Some were to bring a female from the flock or a lamb or a goat, and others two turtle doves, one for a sin offering and the other for a burnt offering (vv. 7–10; cf. Luke 2:22–24). Since the amount of blood from a bird was very small, the blood application was simplified. If the persons were very poor, they were to bring a meal offering as a sin offering (vv. 11–13). In this case, oil and incense were to be excluded (cf. 2:1), perhaps as a sign of contrition and to distinguish it from the regular meal offering. Obviously, not everything was cleansed through blood (Heb. 9:22). This exemption was made in order to assure those facing financial difficulties that God’s atoning grace is for all.

The sacrifice required to atone for human sin would cost more than anyone could pay. But God supplied it through the “precious [timios, “costly, of incomparable value”] blood of Christ,” the Lamb without blemish or defect (1 Pet. 1:19). Christ paid the full penalty for our sins by bearing them upon Himself, and therefore, if there is repentance, there is no sin that He cannot forgive through His gracious provision (Rom. 5:20).

5:14—6:7. Guilt/Reparation Offering. “Reparation offering” is becoming a more common way of referring to this sacrifice, but it does not correspond well to the case described in 5:17–19, in which reparation was not required. This legislation lists two main reasons for bringing a guilt offering but does not describe in detail the procedure to be followed. This is provided in 7:1–7, where it is stated that it was to be like the sin offering. The only difference is the blood manipulation of the guilt offering, which was to be dashed on the sides of the altar of the burnt offering. The atoning significance of the blood was probably less emphasized because there was to be restitution and a 20 percent penalty given to the priest before the sacrifice was to be performed.

The first occasion for this offering was for cases of inadvertent sacrilege (v. 15). The misappropriation of God’s property—sinning in regard to the holy things of the Lord—was an extremely serious matter (cf. Josh. 7). Such a sin included, for instance, eating the tithe after setting it apart for the Lord. Nothing is said about how the person realized that he or she sinned, which may suggest that the person was not totally unaware of what happened. In any case, three things were required: restitution of what was taken, paying an additional 20 percent of the value, and bringing a ram for the guilt offering. The person could bring the equivalent of the cost of the ram to the sanctuary to buy it from the priest (v. 18). As the mediator for the people, the priest was to perform the atoning ritual, and the sin was to be forgiven (see 4:21).

According to 5:17–19, the guilt offering was to be brought when a person suspected he or she had committed an unknown sin. Since the sin was never identified, the remedy was to treat it as a sacrilege. For this unknown sin, a guilt offering was required, but without restitution. God indeed cares for the psychological and spiritual well-being of His children. Verse 19 could perhaps be translated “It is a guilt offering; he is guilty to the Lord.”

The second occasion for bringing a guilt offering was for deliberate misappropriation of human property aggravated by taking a false oath before the Lord (6:1–7). The offenses listed are deception in matters of deposit, investment, robbery, withholding goods, and finding something lost and lying about it. The charges were denied under a false oath that desecrated the name of the Lord. At some point, the person realizing or acknowledging her or his guilt was allowed to bring a guilt offering and make restitution (v. 5). This was a very atrocious sin that came very close to a high-handed sin, and surprisingly, it was forgivable. The most logical explanation is that the sinner, at a particular moment, realized that he or she was indeed guilty, found refuge in God’s mercy, and brought a guilt offering. The legislation itself encouraged the person to do this.

6:8—7:38

Sacrifices, the Priests, and the People

This section of Leviticus supplements the legislations found in 1:2—6:7 and places a more specific emphasis on the role of the priests, the portions that belonged to them, and the responsibility of the people in preserving the holiness of the offerings. It is organized in terms of the laws related to the burnt offering (6:8–13), grain offering (6:14–23), sin offering (6:24–30), guilt offering (7:1–10), and peace offerings (7:11–21), with emphases on the prohibition against eating fat and blood (7:22–27) and the proper distribution of the flesh of the animal (7:28–36), concluding with a summary (vv. 37–38).

6:8–13. Law of the Burnt Offering. This legislation concentrated on the proper handling of the ashes of the burnt offering. The reference was to the daily burnt offering, which was to be kept burning all night (v. 9) and day (v. 12; see Ex. 29:38–42). The priest was to provide the wood to keep the fire burning. When removing the ashes from the altar, the priest was to put on his holy, priestly linen garments and underpants to prevent exposure of his genitalia when ascending the steps to the altar (Ex. 28:42–43). The ashes were to be placed beside the altar while the priest changed into his common clothes to go outside the sanctuary. He was to deposit the ashes in a clean place outside the camp. The fire was to be kept burning because it was originally ignited by the Lord (Lev. 9:24). The fat of the peace offering was also to be burned on it. The daily burnt offering (Heb. tamid) pointed to the peoples' constant dependence on God's forgiving grace that would be fully manifested through the blood of Christ (see Ex. 29:38).

6:14–23. Law of the Grain Offering. The legislation repeated part of what is found in chapter 2 but clarified who should eat the meal offering as well as the reason. It was declared to be most holy (v. 17), and therefore, only the priests (not their families) were to eat a portion of it, in a holy place in the courtyard of the sanctuary. When the grain offering was brought by the priest, no portion of it was to go to him, but it was to be wholly burned on the altar (cf. v. 30). The grain offering of the priests was to be offered every day from the moment of their anointing. For them, it was not voluntary. They were required to honor God personally, not solely through the sacrifices of the people. The end of v. 18 is understood in a variety of ways by translators and commentators. According to some, whatever or whoever (the Heb. 'asher could be referring to either persons or objects) touched the grain offering became holy. According to others (and this is likely the more accurate interpretation), only those who were already holy could touch the grain offering. In this case, the implication is that holiness is not transferable through touch.

6:24–30. Law of the Sin Offering. The law clarified some aspects of the sin offering not mentioned before, with particular emphasis on its holiness. First, it was to be killed, like the burnt offering, on the north side of the altar (1:11). No reason is given for this specific requirement. Again, the translations and commentaries differ over whether the meaning of the first part of v. 27 is that the person who touched the flesh became holy or that the person who did so must have been holy already—that is to say, a priest. Another option, again, is to render the phrase as “whatever [not whoever] touches its flesh will be [become] holy.” The basic question is whether holiness is transferrable through contact. In the present context, it is explicitly said that only the holy priests were to handle the holy, implying that only holy persons or objects could come into contact with the holy. The ritual of the eating of the flesh was an important one (see 6:26; 10:17). It is again stated that when the priest was involved in the sin that was being expiated, he was not to eat of the meat of the sacrifice (6:30). If the blood of the offering spattered on a garment, the item was to be washed in a holy place (v. 27). Ritual washing was done to remove impurity, and if this were the case here, then the blood of the sin offering, by carrying the sin of the repentant person, transferred impurity, not holiness, by contact. If it were boiled in a clay pot, the pot was to be broken because washing was not enough to cleanse it—it was too porous. If boiled in a bronze pot, then washing was enough to remove contagion (v. 28).

7:1–10. Law of the Guilt Offering. Previously, the instructions about the guilt offering were about the sins expiated and the procedure (5:14–6:7). Here the interest is defining the portion of it that went to the priest. There is some repetition related to blood manipulation and the fat of the animal (vv. 3–4). It is further established that the ritual procedure for this offering was to be the same as for the sin offering with respect to the flesh of the animal, declared to be most holy and, therefore, belonging to the officiating priest only (v. 6). The priest was also to have for himself the skin of the sacrifice of the burnt offering (not mentioned in chap. 1) and the grain offering baked in the oven or prepared in a pan or griddle (vv.

8–9; see 2:4–7). Uncooked grain offerings were to belong to all the priests (v. 10).

7:11–21. Law of the Peace/Fellowship Offering.

A specific distinction is made between the peace offering as thanksgiving and the peace offering as votive or freewill. The peace/fellowship offering involved thanksgiving, and it was to be brought with grains in the form of unleavened wafers/cakes and leavened bread. One cake was offered as a heave offering—a contribution set apart—to the Lord, and it went to the priest; the rest probably went to the offerer. The leavened bread was not to go to the altar (2:11). The flesh of the animal was to be eaten the same day it was brought to the Lord, but if it were brought for a vow or voluntary, whatever was left over could be eaten the next day (vv. 16–17). After that, it was not good for human consumption. Whatever remained was to be burned.

If any of the meat were eaten on the third day, the offering and the offerer were rejected by the Lord, and the benefits were not credited or imputed to the person. In fact, the person was responsible for the desecration and liable to punishment (see 5:1). Another reason for not eating the meat was if it had come into contact with the unclean. Only those who were in a state of cleanness were to partake of it (v. 19). But if by any chance the unclean person ate of it, then he or she was to be cut off from the people (vv. 20–21). This is the most severe penalty for sin in the OT because the person was permanently banished or excommunicated from the covenant people. The ultimate punishment was in God's hands, although, in a few cases, He used humans to accomplish His purpose (20:2; Ex. 31:14). But even when humans failed, God Himself still cut off the person (20:2–3), which suggests that the penalty impacted the afterlife.

7:22–27. Prohibition of Fat and Blood. This parenthesis is a development of the regulation against eating fat and blood (3:16–17). Since this was required from all, the divine speech was addressed to the people through Moses (7:22; in chaps. 1–5, the people were addressed, and in chaps. 6–7, the priests). The text establishes that the fat of sacrificial animals was not to be consumed, and neither was the fat of animals that die of natural causes or that have been killed by other animals. In the last two cases, the fat could be used for some other purpose (e.g., to polish or grease instruments) but not for food. The penalty for eating the fat of sacrifices was serious—the offender was to be cut off from the people (v. 25; see v. 21). The prohibition against consuming blood applied to any kind of animal or bird, even at home, and the penalty was the same (vv. 26–27; see “Health and Hygiene in Leviticus,” p. 272).

7:28–36. Meat Portions for the Priests. The main interest of this section is to identify the portion of the flesh that was to go to the priest. Offerings made by fire refer to the portions that were to be given to God as a gift from the worshiper (see 1:9). In this case, those offerings designate the fat that was to go to the altar and the breast of the animal that was to be “raised” (from the Heb. verb nup, not “waved”) before the Lord as an “elevated offering” (tenupah) dedicated to Him (v. 30). The breast was to be for the priest, as was also the right thigh, set apart as a “contribution” (Heb. terumah) or “heave” (raised) offering (v. 32). These were considered the most valuable portions of the flesh that the Israelites gave to the Lord, and He, in turn, gave them to the priests as a permanent mandate (v. 34). The Lord required this same type of sacrifice from the Israelites when the priests were consecrated to minister in the sanctuary (v. 35; this prepares the way for chap. 8).

The section dealing with voluntary and required sacrifices closes with a summary stating that the previous discussion was about the burnt, the grain, the sin, the guilt, the consecration, and the peace offerings, concerning which the Lord instructed Moses on Mount Sinai (v. 38). A new offering is introduced that had not been mentioned before—the consecration or ordination offering (v. 37), which referred to the offerings brought during the consecration of the priests, to be discussed in chapter 8. These instructions were given to the people of Israel when they were ordered to bring their offerings to the Lord in the Sinai Desert (v. 38), which indicates that these sacrificial regulations were placed within a narrative, as indicated in 1:1. The meticulous instructions given by the Lord to the Israelites reveal how important order is in the eyes of the Lord. By being so specific, He was establishing boundaries that would contribute to the preservation of spiritual order in the life of His people. Order continues to be significant in the life of the church in the preservation of its unity and the fulfillment of its mission.

A HOLY PRIESTHOOD

Leviticus begins with a reference to the sanctuary that had just been built and progresses to the different types of sacrifices to be offered there. The most natural next step was to identify and enable those who would minister in the sanctuary. Chapter 8 outlines the complex ritual of the ordination of Aaron and his sons as priests and the anointing of the tabernacle itself (see Ex. 29:1–37). Chapter 9 describes the beginning of the priestly system. The narrative found in chapter 10 illustrates the serious responsibility of the priests as they operated within the sphere of holiness.

Anointing of Aaron, His Sons, and the Tabernacle

The priesthood in Israel was of divine origin. God selected and appointed Aaron and his sons to minister as priests on behalf of the people of Israel. This is emphasized throughout the text by the repetition of the compliance formula and its variations: “Moses did as the Lord commanded him” (vv. 4, 9, 13, 17, 21, 29, 31, 34, 35). Moses performed the priestly role before the priesthood was formally instituted. The anointing was a public meeting. It is likely that the representatives of the people were invited to be present. The ceremony was well organized: the first part had to do with the investiture of Aaron and his sons and the setting apart of Aaron and the sanctuary for God (vv. 6–13). This was followed by the offering of three sacrifices for the cleansing and consecration of the future priests (vv. 14–32). The anointing service was extended for seven days (vv. 33–36).

8:1–13. Investiture and Consecration. The complexity of the ritual was, in part, related to the fact that Aaron, his sons, and the sanctuary were in a state of transition as they moved from the sphere of the common to the sphere of the holy. They were not the subjects of the action but the objects—they were not yet priests. Later traditions indicate that there were specific areas within the courtyard, protected by a curtain, where the full washings took place. The change of clothing indicated a new status for Aaron; he was being invested as high priest (vv. 7–9; see Ex. 28). He was transitioning to a different role.

At this point in the narrative, the tabernacle, its furniture, and the altar were sprinkled with oil to set them apart for the Lord. Some oil was also poured out on Aaron’s head (representing his whole person) to set him apart for the service of the tabernacle (vv. 10–12). Both personnel and location were finally ready for service because they had both been marked by the special anointing oil, which exuded a fragrant aroma. This was another step in the process of transition. The section concludes with the investiture of the sons of Aaron as priests. Moses put on them a priestly dress that was less embellished in order to establish a difference in priestly functions. This was done in accordance with what the Lord commanded Moses to do. Later, oil was also placed on the sons (v. 30).

8:14–22. Sin and Burnt Offerings. Although Aaron and his sons had been set apart, they and the tabernacle needed to go through a cleansing ritual. This was the function of the sin offering (vv. 14–17). Since the tabernacle was not yet functioning and this offering was part of the anointing of the priests, it was different from the regular sin offerings (chap. 4). The ritual emphasized the use of the blood in connection to the altar and the disposition of the flesh of the sacrifice. Since it was an atoning sacrifice (Ex. 29:36), in this particular case, it cleansed the priests (through the laying on of hands) and the altar (blood was applied all around the horns; see 4:7). The altar seems to have stood for the cleansing of the whole sanctuary complex. Since no specific violation of the law of impurity is mentioned, it follows that anyone or anything that was to be in the service of God was, by nature, in need of purification. The burnt offering (vv. 18–21) was to follow the general procedure of a regular burnt offering (see Lev. 1). The sequence of this procedure was important. First, the sin offering cleansed. Second, the burnt offering expressed, along with atonement, the total dedication of Aaron and his sons to the Lord. Cleansing both precedes and accompanies true worship.

The consecration/ordination offering (lit. “filling [offering]”; v. 31) was unique. The literal translation is related to the phrase mille’yad, “to fill the hand” (which occurs in the Hebrew text of Ex. 29:9, 33, 35), and refers to an act by which a new status was given to someone—for example, consecration. In fact, parts of this offering were placed in the hands of Aaron and his sons (Lev. 8:27–29). Since their hands were filled, they could not use them to do anything else but the service of the Lord. Although the sacrifice was unique, it was similar to the peace offering and was to be accompanied by unleavened bread. The main difference was the complex use of the blood. Some of the blood was applied to the tip of the right ear (perhaps signaling a willingness to listen to/obey the Lord), on the thumb of the right hand (suggesting readiness to serve), and on the big toe of the right foot (indicating a desire to walk in the way of the Lord) of Aaron and his sons (vv. 23–24). This was probably an act of cleansing and dedication (cf. 14:14, 17, 25), similar to what was done to the altar (v. 15). The portions that were placed on the altar, together with the right thigh that was for the priests (7:32–33), were put into the hands or palms of Aaron and his sons and raised before the Lord as a wave offering (see 7:30); then the portions were incinerated (in regard to the aroma of the sacrifice, see notes on 1:9.) In this case, Moses received the breast of the animal (v. 29).

The oil and blood of the consecration sacrifice were mixed and sprinkled on Aaron, his sons, and their garments to contribute to their ordination (v. 30). The anointing oil was a symbol of consecration, and the blood suggested the idea of cleansing. Since the consecration offering was similar to the peace offering of thanksgiving (7:11–15), the priests could eat it as other Israelites would. Moses gave them the breast of the sacrifice that belonged to him and told them to eat it together with the unleavened bread within the precincts of the tabernacle. Whatever was left was to be immediately incinerated (vv. 31–32).

At the end of the day, the ritual of anointing was still unfinished. Aaron and his sons were required to stay by the entrance of the tabernacle for seven days in order for their consecration to be complete. Interestingly, all the elements of the consecration ritual performed during that day are interpreted or summarized as making atonement for Aaron and his sons (v. 34). The ordination ritual of the priests was a way of cleansing them in order to serve a holy God.

The complexity of the ritual of ordination illustrates the distance that exists between a holy God and beings that are in constant need of cleansing. One is almost led to ask, Who can approach the Holy One? The answer is found in the divine disposition to interact with humans and to draw them into the sphere of His holiness. He is constantly willing to remove that which impedes fellowship with Him, and consequently, He creates a way through the atoning sacrifice, which makes heaven accessible to all, not only to priests. This requires the Christian to go through a rite of transition—moving from the secular (the world) to the sphere of salvation in Christ. This takes place through the rite of baptism, which leads to life in harmony with God, a transition from a life of enslavement to sin to a new life of service to God and fellow human beings (Rom. 6:1–11). Christ indeed opened a way (Heb. 10:19–22).

Beginning of the Priestly Ministry

After seven days had elapsed, on the eighth day, Moses instructed Aaron and his sons about what to do as they began their priestly work and provided a list of the sacrifices to be offered. This was followed by the sin and burnt offerings of Aaron (vv. 8–14) and the sin, burnt, and peace offerings of the people (vv. 15–21). The section concludes with a double blessing and the manifestation of the glory of God (vv. 22–24).

9:1–14. Moses's Instructions and Aaron's Sacrifices.

Moses informed Aaron that this day he would receive direct confirmation from God of his role as high priest: the glory of the Lord would appear to him (v. 6; see v. 4). The inauguration of the priestly ministry was also a public ceremony, and the elders were present. They were expected to provide animals for the sacrifices of the people. Moses also told Aaron that he should offer a sin and a burnt offering for himself as well as sin, burnt, grain, and peace offerings for the people. He clarified that the purpose of the sin and burnt offerings was to make atonement for all of them.

Verse 3 contains abbreviated instructions for the sin offering (cf. 4:3–12) and the burnt offering (1:3–9). The text emphasizes the expiatory function of both sacrifices. The cleansing rituals for Aaron and his sons performed during their ordination were intended to install them as priests, but here they went through another set of cleansing rituals as they began their priestly responsibilities. This reinforces the fact that uncleanness is practically a constant in human life and that humans never reach a moment when they can stand by themselves before God.

9:15–21. Sacrifices of the People. The inauguration of the worship system in Israel began with the cleansing of the people, suggesting that worship includes the need for atonement. The procedure for the different offerings brought by the people is not given in detail. It is simply stated that they were offered in the prescribed manner (v. 16). In this case, two sacrificial victims were brought for the burnt offering and two for the peace offering. The disposition of the fat of the peace offering is repeated in more detail to stress the importance of having given it to the Lord (v. 21).

After the sacrifices were offered, Aaron performed for the first time one of his most important responsibilities, namely, blessing the people (Num. 6:23; Deut. 21:5). He did this from the altar, and then he and Moses went into the tabernacle, perhaps to ask the Lord to accept the sacrifices. As they came out, they blessed the people (cf. 1 Kin. 8:14–21, 54–61). It was at this moment that the promised theophany occurred. The glory of the Lord appeared to all the people, and fire came out from the tabernacle and burned all the sacrifices that were on the altar. God provided the fire to demonstrate His acceptance of the sacrifices, thus inaugurating the sacrificial system and legitimizing Aaron's priestly ministry. As the consecration ceremony implies, the fire previously present on the altar was God's fire that officially inaugurated the sacrificial system, and from this moment on, no other fire would be accepted by the Lord. The people responded to the divine presence with a cry of joy and prostrated themselves before the Lord. Something wonderful and unique had occurred on earth. God had established a particular space to dwell among His creation, consecrated the place through cleansing rituals and through His presence, organized a priestly system to mediate the benefits of His presence among His people, and created a sacrificial system to strengthen and renew His covenant relationship with His people. This was the cosmic center from which God's presence would irradiate the world and restore order.

The priestly system, once established, would operate until the coming of the true High Priest, Jesus Christ, whose arrival was announced by the Lord through Daniel (Dan. 9:24–27). He offered the sacrifice on the cross and ascended to the Father, where He was installed as High Priest according to the order of Melchizedek (Heb. 6:19–20; 7:15–17) in the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 9:11–22), and as a result of His mediation, the Spirit descended on the disciples in the form of fire (Acts 2:3, 33). He is High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary, offering before the Father the merits of His sacrificial death on behalf of humanity (Heb. 8:1–3; 9:11–12). Since Jesus Christ possesses life in Himself, He remains Priest forever (7:22–25). No other being can occupy His priestly role as Mediator between God and humans (1 Tim. 2:5–6). It will be from the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 8–10) that He will come back to earth “a second time” to appear to those who have been relying on His work of mediation on their behalf before the Father and who are eagerly waiting for His return (Heb. 9:28).

Sacredness of the Priesthood

The main purpose of this narrative is to underline the sacred responsibility of the priests. It narrates the death of Nadab and Abihu (vv. 1–5), contains two prohibitions (vv. 6–11), and includes instructions about the consumption of holy flesh (vv. 12–20).

10:1–5. Death of Nadab and Abihu. This incident occurred on the day the priestly services were inaugurated (chap. 9). The two oldest sons of Aaron burned incense using unauthorized fire—that is, not from the altar. This likely took place in the courtyard of the sanctuary (“before the LORD,” v. 1). God destroyed them with the same fire that had come from heaven and burned the sacrifices (9:24). The Lord, through Moses, interpreted for Aaron what had happened. God considered the priests to be servants of the Most High, responsible for revealing to others His holy character (or before whom He displayed His magnificent holiness; v. 3). God was glorified—acknowledged as right—by the people for punishing priests who did not respect His holiness (see Num. 20:13). Aaron's silence indicated that he accepted the justice of God. No atoning sacrifice was needed because they had borne their own sin and died for it.

10:6–10. Two Prohibitions. The first was given by Moses to Aaron and his sons: they were not to mourn for the death of Nadab and Abihu, possibly because this could be perceived as support for their conduct. Mourning rituals included tearing the garments; but in the case of the priests, this would have been sacrilegious and would have spiritually damaged the congregation because their garments had been sanctified by the Lord. The priests were to remain in their posts, officiating in the tabernacle (vv. 6–7). The Lord gave the second prohibition directly to Aaron. It forbade the priests to drink intoxicating beverages while officiating in the sanctuary. Such drinks would have clouded their judgment, and they would not have been able to distinguish between the holy and unholy (or common) or between the unclean and clean. They would not have been effective teachers of God's laws (v. 10). This is an excellent description of the damaging effects of alcohol.

10:11–20. Handling Holy and Most Holy Flesh. Perhaps another reason for asking the priests to continue to officiate was that their responsibilities for the day had not yet ended. They had to eat the grain offering, which is most holy. Moses reminded them that the flesh of the peace offerings was holy and they could eat it with the members of their families (for more on the heave contribution and wave offerings, see 7:30, 32). At first, Moses did not say anything about the flesh of the sin offering.

But when he realized that its flesh was incinerated instead of being eaten by the priests, he became upset. For him, this was another violation of God's will. He reminded them that they should have eaten it, and in the process, he provided a valuable interpretation of the rite of eating the flesh of the sin offering: it was most holy, and God had given it to them to bear (nasa') the guilt of the people of Israel and make atonement for them (v. 17; see 5:1).

The discussion is about the eating of the flesh of the sin offering and not about the atoning function of the sin offering as such. Therefore, the connection between the two phrases—"to bear guilt" and "to make atonement"—is significant and indicates that eating the flesh was part of the atoning ritual; it contributed to the removal of sin. It did so by transferring it to the priest. This explains why the priest could not eat the flesh of his own sin offering—he could not bear his own sin and at the same time atone for it. To bear sin means to be responsible for sin and liable to punishment. The person who came to the sanctuary bearing his or her sin (see 5:1) offered a sacrifice to which the sin was transferred, and by eating of its flesh, the priest became the one who bore it. This ritual capacity of the priest was symbolized by the plate of pure gold placed on the turban of the high priest, inscribed with the phrase, "HOLY [OR HOLINESS] TO THE LORD" (Ex. 28:36–37). Exodus 28:38 explains that this plate was to be on Aaron's forehead with the intention that he would bear all the iniquity ritually associated with the holy offerings of the Israelites and, thus, render the people acceptable to the Lord. Holiness is stronger than sin. Aaron could bear the iniquity of the people and not perish because he was shielded by God's holiness. It was through this process that sin in the person of the priest was transferred to the tabernacle. What is perhaps surprising is that the atoning process brought sin/impurity/death into contact with the holiness, purity, and life of God, and holiness remained undamaged by sin. It overcame everything (see "The Laying On of Hands," p. 243). This finds its ultimate expression in Christ, who became human and bore the world's sin, yet His holiness and purity were not compromised. He defeated sin and death and freed humanity from their enslaving power (see Is. 53:5–6; Col. 1:13–14, 19–22; 2:13–15).

11:1—17:16

HOLINESS AND CLEANNESS/UNCLEANNESS

The topic of clean and unclean was introduced in the previous chapter when God reminded Aaron that he should distinguish between the two (10:10–11). The topic is important because impurity brought people into the realm of death and separated them from access to the sanctuary. Unless a cleansing ritual were performed, the separation could have been permanent. Impurity is, in principle, a metaphor for death as that which separates individuals from God. The God who dwells among His people as the source of life expects them to be holy. The intention of the instructions was to teach the people how to avoid becoming unclean and what to do once a person became unclean. This section discusses clean and unclean animals (Lev. 11:1–47) and the uncleanness of childbirth (12:1–8), skin diseases (13:1–14:32), houses with mold and mildew (14:33–57), and bodily discharges (15:1–33). It culminates in the Day of Atonement, the center of the book of Leviticus (16:1–34). Chapter 17 is included in this section because it thematically deals with the question of blood while raising topics to be discussed in the following chapters.

Clean and Unclean Creatures

The introduction to the speech indicates that this was a dietary law (v. 2). This concern for diet reached back to the Garden of Eden (Gen. 1:29; 3:18). Using the categories and language of the Creation narrative in Genesis 1, the chapter discusses the allowance or prohibition of consuming certain land animals (vv. 2–8), sea creatures (vv. 9–12), flying creatures (vv. 13–19), winged insects (vv. 20–25), carcasses (vv. 24–40), and swarming land creatures (vv. 41–45; see "Clean and Unclean Animals," p. 257).

11:1–28. Criteria for Clean Animals. Clean (tahor, "clean, pure") land animals had cloven hooves and chew the cud. If they had only one of these characteristics, they were unclean (tame', "to be unclean, impure") and, consequently, were not to be eaten, and their carcasses were not to be touched (v. 8). The criteria for the category of clean sea creatures was fins and scales, while those without them were considered to be shegets. The noun shegets ("a detestable thing" or "an abomination") and its related verb (shaqats, "to detest") seem to express, in this chapter, the same ideas as the adjective tame' ("unclean, impure"; see Lev. 11:8, 11, 43; 7:21). These creatures were not to be eaten, and neither were their carcasses to be touched (vv. 9–12). With respect to flying creatures, no specific criteria are given, but instead, the text contains a list of those that should not be eaten—those considered to be unclean, or an abomination. Many of the Hebrew names for the birds are obscure, which makes it difficult to identify the specific creature (vv. 13–19). Most, if not all of them, were birds of prey, and this characteristic has traditionally been used to identify those that cannot be eaten. Flying insects with four feet and that walk on the earth were clean if they had jointed legs with which to jump (vv. 20–23). Among them were locusts and different types of grasshoppers. If they lacked these characteristics, they were not to be eaten; they were an unclean (detestable) abomination (v. 23).

The list is interrupted by a discussion of uncleanness through touch (vv. 24–28). Touching the carcass of any of the unclean animals made a person unclean until evening (the end of the day). But if the person also carried part of it, then the individual was unclean until the evening and had to wash his or her clothes to remove the impurity (cf. 13:6). Animals with paws were unclean, and touching or carrying their carcasses was also prohibited (vv. 27–28).

11:29–47. Swarming Land Creatures. These were mainly reptiles and small mammals that multiplied quickly. A list is provided, but in many of the cases, the meaning of the Hebrew term is not clear. Touching them when they were dead made the person unclean until evening (v. 31). When the carcass fell on clothing, skins, sacks, or anything made of wood, the item it touched became unclean and was to be put in water until evening. If the carcass fell into a clay vessel, what was inside the container became unclean, and the object was to be broken. The uncleanness is viewed as penetrating porous vessels, making it impossible to remove. If the carcass fell into a spring of water or a large cistern, the water remained clean (v. 36), probably because the body of a small animal could not contaminate the entire body of water. The same happened if it fell on planting seed, perhaps inside a vessel, but if it fell on damp seed, the seed became unclean (vv. 37–38). Even clean animals became unclean after they died, and touching their carcasses made a person unclean until evening. Those who ate of their flesh or carried them were unclean until evening and had to wash their clothes (vv. 39–41). Since all these animals, to some extent, competed with humans for space, it was difficult to avoid impurity. Accordingly, it was necessary to develop ways to eliminate it from objects and humans. In most cases, these were minor impurities that were removed at the end of the day and did not require a sacrifice.

All creeping things were considered an abomination that could make God's people unclean. The reason provided for this law was that God is holy and they should be holy as He is holy (v. 44). This call to holiness was grounded in God's redemptive power, manifested in the liberation of the people from Egypt (v. 45). God invaded the world with His holiness, and He began to transform it by making His people holy. At the end, in a summary, it is stated that this law is about clean and unclean animals—animals that can and cannot be eaten (vv. 46–47; see below, "Clean and Unclean Animals").

Uncleanness and Childbirth

Leviticus moves now from the uncleanness of animals (chap. 11), to human uncleanness, beginning with the mystery of childbirth, which combines the start of a new life with the phenomenon of impurity as a symbol of death. The legislation deals first with impurity caused by childbirth and concludes with the atoning ritual.

Clean and Unclean Animals

The nature of the law of clean and unclean animals, as well as its purpose, continues to be debated among biblical interpreters. This commentary maintains the idea that it is primarily a health law and is still valid for God's people.

1. The Motivation Is Holiness. The reason provided by the biblical text to justify this unique regulation is holiness (11:44). The implicit contrast is between the unclean and the holy. The unclean is a metaphor for the realm of death while, the holy is what belongs to God and is an appropriate expression of life. The law of clean and unclean animals sought to preserve the life of the people by keeping them as far as possible from the sphere of death, including the sphere of sickness and suffering.

2. Uniqueness of the Law. According to Leviticus, ritual uncleanness had two basic characteristics. First, it was acquired through the direct or perhaps indirect contact with the unclean (blood, a dead body, a carcass, etc.). Second, this type of impurity could be removed from the individual through the performance of a particular ritual (hence the designation “ritual uncleanness” that is sometimes used by commentators). Those two characteristics do not apply to the uncleanness of the unclean animals, which indicates that the nature of their impurity is essentially different from ritual impurity. First, the impurity of the animals was not acquired but was part of the very nature of the animal. They did not become unclean by coming into contact with a source of impurity. Since these animals were permanently unclean, there was no particular ritual capable of removing their uncleanness from them.

Second, the uncleanness of these animals was not transferable through contact. The Israelites could come into direct or indirect contact with an unclean animal without becoming unclean. In fact, they reared unclean animals and used them for a variety of tasks. For instance, they used donkeys, horses, and camels for transportation and to carry loads. The impurity of these animals did not affect the Israelites in any way. People became unclean only by eating the flesh of the animal, but no ritual was prescribed to remove this impurity from them. The Israelites were simply expected to obey the Lord and not eat unclean animals. Of course, an animal could become ritually unclean after it died, and this impurity was transferable through touch. Touching the carcass of a clean or unclean animal made a person unclean, and a ritual had to be performed in order to cleanse the individual. Here, the natural and ritual uncleanness of an animal are clearly distinguished.

3. The Distinction Clean/Unclean is Pre-Mosaic. The law classifying clean and unclean animals is mentioned for the first time in the Bible in the Flood narrative, before there was an Israelite (Gen. 7:2–3). In the context, a change in the human diet was introduced. While only two pairs of the unclean animals entered the ark, seven of each clean animal were preserved. This suggests that some of the clean animals were to be used for sacrifices, and any of them could be used as food by Noah and his family without the risk of extinguishing any particular species.

Therefore, the permission to eat all moving things that are alive in 9:3 is to be interpreted contextually as restricted to clean animals that neither died of natural causes nor were torn by wild beasts—in both instances, the animals’ blood was not properly drained (cf. 7:2). The early biblical narratives indicate that the patriarchs consumed the flesh of clean animals only (e.g., Gen. 18:7; 25:27–28; 27:3–4, 9–10, 14, 30–31). This universal law was incorporated into the Israelite covenant law for preservation and as guidance for God’s people.

4. Context of the Law in Deuteronomy 14. The fact that this law is recorded in Deuteronomy is significant because Deuteronomy (with its focus on the covenant) generally does not deal with ceremonial laws. In this particular passage, there is no contextual discussion of ritual uncleanness. Deuteronomy 13 is an exhortation to worship only the Lord, and the last part of chapter 14 deals with tithing laws. In between them is found the law of unclean animals. This implies that the law of unclean animals was not considered a ceremonial law but a dietary one.

5. It Is a Dietary Law. One should not ignore the fact that the law of clean/unclean animals regulated the animal flesh that the Israelites were allowed to consume as food and, as such, forms part of a long tradition of dietary regulations given by God to His people. God has always been interested in the diet of humans. To Adam and Eve, He gave seed-bearing plants or herbs—that is, fruits, vegetables, and grains (Gen. 1:29). After the Fall, He modified their diet to include what may have been cultivated vegetables (3:18). Finally, after the Flood, He allowed humans to eat the flesh of clean animals (9:3–4). Clean animals are relatively safer to eat than the unclean ones. The original plant-based diet continues to point to God’s ideal for His people. God allowed humans to be partially responsible for the preservation of their lives but instructed them on how to preserve it to His glory (1 Cor. 10:31). The lordship of Christ includes our bodies because He is interested in both our physical and spiritual well-being (1 Cor. 6:19–20; 3 John 2). There is no evidence in the NT that indicates that Christ eliminated, through His sacrifice, the law of clean/unclean animals (see Mark 7; Acts 10).

It leads the reader from separation to full access to the holy in the sanctuary.

At the birth of a child, a woman would become unclean because of the blood flow that accompanied the birth (v. 7). If the child was male, the woman would be initially unclean for seven days (v. 2; cf. 15:19–24). The law was based on the understanding of blood as a physical expression of life. The loss of blood/life brought the person into contact with sphere of death, which separated her from full interaction with others and with God in the sanctuary. The seven days of impurity distanced her from other human beings, allowing her to recuperate from the experience of childbearing. Obviously, there was to be limited interaction with others at home who would also become unclean through touch, but her fellowship with God did not cease. The issue was not that sex or birth were inherently sinful but rather that because of Adam's sin, humans exist in a context in which the ugliness of death is always potentially present and occasionally touches us. In the ancient world, as well as in many places around the world today, at the moment of childbirth, death occasionally manifested itself in all its power and ended a human life. Death is an enemy, but this ritual reveals that there is a remedy for it.

After seven days, her impurity was no longer contagious—she could interact freely with others and with her husband. On the eighth day, the child was to be circumcised and, thus, officially declared a member of the covenant people of God. But the woman was to go through a longer period of purification before having access to the holy. She was to wait thirty-three days for her cleansing to be final. No reason is given for this long period, and scholars have speculated about it. The total period was forty days, perhaps suggesting new beginnings, as in other contexts (e.g., Ex. 24:18). In this case, the conclusion of this interval introduces the restoration of full access to the dwelling of the Lord.

If the child was female, the waiting period was to be extended to two weeks and sixty-six days (v. 5). There have been many attempts to explain the reason for doubling the time period in the case of a girl, but none has found wide acceptance. A more popular rationalization suggests that as a result of no longer receiving maternal hormones, a newborn girl often experiences vaginal bleeding, and this bleeding, together with that of the mother, would account for the double period of impurity. The only sure conclusion is that the birth of a girl blessed the mother with a longer period of rest!

The remaining uncleanness was to be removed through a burnt and a sin offering brought by the woman to the sanctuary. Her impurity had a contamination potential above minor impurities, which were removed through a ritual bath, and consequently, a sacrifice was required in order for her to have access to the sanctuary. Women could offer sacrifices in the sanctuary, as this legislation makes absolutely clear. The sacrifices were to be offered not to remove a sin committed but to remove physical uncleanness. As a result of the ritual, she was declared clean (v. 7). The issue was not that she had committed a specific misdeed, nor had she been sick. Rather, this uncleanness was a part of the sinful state of human life, but the Lord provided cleansing even for uncleanness over which they had no control. Humanity's struggle with death in this life will come to an end at the moment of the Second Coming (1 Cor. 15:54).

Uncleanness and Skin Diseases

This section of Leviticus deals with abnormal skin conditions or diseases. The Hebrew term translated “leprosy” (tsara'at) is now commonly understood to designate multiple types of skin diseases (e.g., psoriasis, ringworm). Although many scholars believe that the designation does not include leprosy (Hansen's disease), others have correctly argued that it does. The translation of the term could be “leprosy,” as a generic term, or perhaps “skin disease.” The purpose of the discussion was not so much to identify a disease and then provide medication for it but to identify it and control its spread. Therefore, the information on how to diagnose it remains the primary concern of the text. The outbreak was to be controlled by imposing quarantine and isolating the unclean person. The people knew that the disease was contagious. In the Bible, leprosy is associated with death, as suggested by the experience of Miriam (Num. 12:10–12). In fact, lepers identified themselves as under the power of death by dressing like a person in mourning (Lev. 13:45). Since they were in the sphere of death, they were unclean, separated from social interaction, and without access to the sanctuary.

13:2–46. Symptoms and Diagnosis. The priest was to provide a rational diagnosis based on the specific instructions the Lord had given him through Moses. The priest was to examine the condition and, in most cases, to quarantine the person until it could be ascertained that the person was clean or unclean. If diagnosed with leprosy, the person was to be declared unclean (v. 3).

The chapter is organized around eight cases: (1) suspected leprosy because of certain anomalous skin conditions (v. 2); (2) skin disease (vv. 9–11; most likely Hansen’s disease); (3) a full body outbreak (vv. 12–17; possibly vitiligo); (4) a boil on the skin that had been healed and later developed a white swelling or reddish-white spot (v. 19); (5) a person whose skin had been burned and the raw flesh of the burn became a bright white or reddish-white spot (v. 24); (6) a person with a sore on the head or chin (v. 29); (7) white/bright patches on the skin (v. 38); and (8) a bald person with a reddish-white sore on the head (v. 42). In cases of leprosy, the persons’ clothes were to be torn and their heads uncovered (or hair disheveled), as if in a state of mourning; they were in the realm of death. In order to not contaminate others, they were to shout “Unclean! Unclean!” (v. 45) and live outside the camp in isolation (v. 46). This was a living experience of death: separation from others and physical distance from the holy sanctuary. In practice, the relatives and friends of the sick person provided for them. The law did not discourage such expressions of love because touching them, perhaps by accident, was not a sin but a way of contracting impurity, which was redressed through a cleansing rite.

13:47–59. Infested Garments. The description of the phenomenon indicates that the text is describing a fungal infection, usually identified as mold or mildew. It was a “disease” that contaminated fabrics (clothing made of wool, linen) and leather. In this case, the term tsara’at refers to such fungal infections. If it were suspected that a piece of clothing was contaminated, it was brought to the priest for analysis. He examined it and quarantined it for seven days, after which he might be able to determine if it was clean or unclean. If he was uncertain, it was quarantined again. Washing the clothes was part of the process which ascertained their condition. If it was declared to be unclean, then the clothing was burned. The quarantine was a preventive measure that protected the owner of the cloth from becoming unclean.

Cleansing of the Leper

The ritual described here is not therapeutic because it was to be performed after the person was healed. It was to be a ritual of transition that led lepers from their place outside the camp to the camp, then to the sanctuary, and finally to full restoration. The ritual wonderfully illustrated

God’s plan for overcoming death and moral impurity and that it is realized in stages. The resolution of the cosmic conflict is complex, but it will be resolved. There is hope for lepers.

14:1–9. Heading to the Tabernacle. If a leper concluded that he or she had been healed, the priest was asked to perform an examination. The priest was to go to the leper to carry out the cleansing ritual—a beautiful portrait of Jesus, who approaches humanity in their uncleanness. It is likely that the leper’s relatives provided the required elements for the ritual: two living clean birds, a stick of cedar wood, hyssop (a type of herb; cf. Ex. 12:22; Num. 19:6; Ps. 51:7), and a string of scarlet yarn, probably used to tie the wood and the hyssop together to create a sprinkling instrument. One of the two birds was to be killed over running water and its blood collected in a vessel. Perhaps water was added to the blood to facilitate sprinkling the blood (see v. 52). The living bird, together with the wood, the scarlet yarn, and the hyssop, was to be dipped into the blood and sprinkled seven times on the leper for cleansing. The living bird was to be set free in the open field (v. 7) as an elimination rite (see 14:49–53; 16:15, 21). Similar rituals found in some cultures in the ANE have expressed, at least in some cases, the idea of evil returning to its place of origin. Leviticus seems to be hinting at the idea that impurity found its ultimate origin outside the place where God had manifested Himself—the Israelite camp. But the symbolism could also point to the leper’s movement from the sphere of death (leprosy) to the freedom of life (i.e., the “resurrection”).

At this early stage in the ritual, the former lepers were clean but not completely clean. In order to enter the camp, they were to undergo a ritual bath, shave their bodies, and wash their clothes. They were allowed to enter the camp but not their place of residence (their tent) for seven days, probably to avoid contaminating it with the residual impurity. On the seventh day, after the they had shaved and washed their clothes and bodies, they were declared clean and were able to have full social interaction with others. On the eighth day, they were finally able to visit the tabernacle.

14:10–32. Final Cleansing in the Tabernacle.

The priest, as the mediator of those needing cleansing, was to bring the former leper to the entrance of the tabernacle and offer guilt, sin, burnt, and grain offerings on behalf of the individual. The reason for the guilt offering was probably ignorant sin (see 5:17–19). In this case, the blood of the sacrifice was also to be applied to the right ear, the right thumb, and the right toe of the person, as was done to the priest during the anointing (8:23–24), to rededicate the person to the Lord. The oil was to be consecrated to the Lord and then applied to the same parts of the body, and the rest of it was to be placed on the head of the person. The sin offering was to be sacrificed to make atonement for the person—that is to say, to remove his or her impurity. This was to be followed by the burnt and grain offerings as expressions of gratitude and full dedication to the Lord. Allowance was made for a poor person who could not afford expensive sacrifices (vv. 21–32). The summary emphasizes the importance of atonement for cleansing (v. 20; cf. v. 31). Uncleaness will be overcome.

14:33–57. Leprous House. The noun tsara'at applies also to fungus- or mold-infested houses. This section is placed last because it describes what was to be done once the people had settled in the land of Canaan. The passage is composed of two main cases: a house that was condemned (vv. 33–47) and a house that was declared clean (vv. 48–53). The Lord had control over the situation (v. 34). The owner of the house who suspected an outbreak was to ask the priest to come and examine it. The priest was to order the house to be emptied because once he declared it unclean, the house and anything inside it would be unclean. If it were diagnosed as unclean, the house would be temporarily abandoned, and if at the end of the period, the fungus had spread, the damaged stones and the plaster of the walls were to be carried away to an unclean place and replaced by new stones and plaster. It is important to remember that the text does not suggest any magic- or spirit-driven impurity. If the plague returned, then the house was to be demolished. Entering, eating, or sleeping in the house while it was unclean would contaminate the person (vv. 46–48). If after the seven days quarantine, the plague had not spread, the priest was to perform a cleansing rite similar to that of the cleansing of the leper, using only the two birds (vv. 49–53). The uncleaness was to be sent away through the living bird.

The law of the tsara'at indicates that there is something wrong with the environment in which humans live. It is under the influence and power of death and brings with it separation and pain. It causes harm to humans, clothing, and even their houses or homes. No wonder Paul conceives of death as a power that rules over humanity because of Adam's sin and from which only Jesus can deliver us (Rom. 5:12–21). We have been delivered from spiritual death through the life of Jesus (Rom. 6:5–7), but at the same time, we look forward to the moment when physical death will be vanquished forever (Rev. 21:1–4). It is this hope that the Day of Atonement announces in types and shadows (see Lev. 16).

15:1–33. Impurity and Bodily Discharges.

Contamination here is the result of something that comes out of the human body, not something that enters the body. Four cases appear: abnormal male discharge (vv. 2–15), normal male discharge (vv. 16–18), normal female discharge (vv. 19–24), and abnormal female discharge (vv. 25–30). These are followed by a theological statement and a summary (vv. 30–33). The first case is that of a man with a genital infection that caused a flow from his penis (basar—"flesh" is a euphemism for penis), which may have included pus and blood. This was highly contagious, and anyone who touched him, his bed, or where he sat became unclean until evening, and a ritual washing of clothes and bathing was required. If he touched anyone after washing his hands, the person touched did not become unclean. Once the discharge was healed, the sick person was to wait for seven days, and then he was to wash his clothes and bathe. In order for the cleansing to be final, he was to bring two turtledoves or pigeons, one for a sin offering and the other for a burnt offering, to make atonement—that is to say, to remove the impurity and recommit him to God.

The emission of semen (lit. "laying of seed"; v. 16) could have happened either during sleep or, as is commonly believed, during intercourse with a woman. There is also the possibility that the reference is to having an emission while sleeping next to a woman. In the first case of emission during sleep, the man was unclean, and in the second, both were unclean (vv. 16–18). They were unclean until evening, and a ritual bath was required. No reason is given for this legislation, but since the biblical term for semen, zera', means "seed," it could be suggested that the loss of some of the seed of life resulted in the diminution of life. Again, this is in the context of the conceptual sphere of death, and death is a result of Adam and Eve's sin (Gen. 3; Rom. 5:12–21). Death and sin are closely connected. Besides, by considering semen a contaminating agent, a clear incompatibility was established between sexual activity and the worship of God in the sanctuary, thus condemning the practice of pagan fertility rites in pagan temples.

The blood issue resulting from a woman's menstrual cycle was also a contaminating substance (vv. 19–24). Sexual intercourse during menstruation was forbidden, but if it happened that during intercourse, both parties realized that the woman was menstruating, they both became unclean (see 18:19). There was nothing intrinsically wrong or sinful about menstruation, but coming into direct or indirect contact with blood brought one close to the realm of death (see 12:2). On a more positive note, because she was considered unclean for seven days following the beginning of her menstruation, she was able to rest at a time when she was in state of physical discomfort (see 20:18). No particular cleansing ritual was legislated, but one could assume that she washed herself at the end of the period (cf. 2 Sam. 11:2, 4). The case of abnormal female blood discharge was more severe (vv. 25–30). Like in the case of the man with abnormal discharge, after seven days, she was to bring to the priest two turtledoves or pigeons, one for a sin offering and the other for a burnt offering, to cleanse her from her uncleanness.

The closing verses (15:31–33) establish that the previous regulations intended to demonstrate how the Israelites should be cleansed from impurities that were unavoidable and natural in their lives. If the impurities were not removed, then they ran the risk of contaminating the tabernacle by approaching it in a state of impurity, and they could have died (see 20:4–5). From God's perspective, life and death cannot coexist peacefully. This connection with life suggests that throughout these legislations, there is a health concern to be taken into consideration (see "Health and Hygiene in Leviticus," p. 272). These legislations are a reminder that Jesus is the ultimate healer (Is. 53:5). Healing is needed because humans exist in a condition of impurity that can be avoided in some cases but not in others. After all, everyone will die.

Day of Atonement

The shift here is from the daily services to the annual, whose goal was to restore wholeness to the Israelite camp. At the pinnacle of the Israelite sacrificial and priestly services in the sanctuary is the moment that integrated all of the elements of the worship system. The tabernacle and the people were free from impurity and sin on the Day of Atonement, which ritually expressed an eschatological hope of cosmic extent. It pointed both back to the original harmony between God and humans and, typologically, to the restoration of that harmony after the consummation of the cleansing made possible through the blood of the Son of God. The chapter, placed at the center of the literary structure of the book (see Leviticus: Introduction), is carefully arranged, beginning with the statement "The Lord spoke to Moses" (v. 1) and concluding with a formula of completion: "The Lord commanded Moses" (v. 34). The literary structure of the chapter forms a chiasm:

- A Limitations on Aaron's ability to enter the Most Holy Place (v. 2)
- B Aaron's sacrificial victim and vestments (vv. 3–4)
- C Sacrificial victims provided by the people (v. 5)
- D Aaron's bull, goat for the Lord, goat for Azazel (vv. 6–10)
- E Aaron's bull sacrificed as a sin offering (vv. 11–14)
- F Community's goat as sin offering (v. 15)
- G Atonement made (vv. 16–19)
- G' Atonement finished (v. 20a)
- F' Community's goat for Azazel sent to the wilderness (vv. 20b–22)
- E' Aaron's closing activities (vv. 23–25)
- D' Goat for Azazel, Aaron's bull, goat for sin offering (vv. 26–28)
- C' People rested and humbled themselves (vv. 29–31)
- B' Anointed priest officiated wearing special garments (vv. 29–33)
- A' Anointed priest made atonement once a year (v. 34)

At the center of the structure, the high priest makes an all-encompassing atonement for the tabernacle, the altar, the people, and himself and his family. Here, the atoning work of the priest reached its climax and came to an end (v. 20a). The chapter has an introduction (vv. 3–5), a first development (vv. 6–10), a second development (vv. 11–22), concluding ritual acts (vv. 23–28), the institutionalization of the ritual (vv. 29–34), and concluding remarks (v. 34). It combines three rites into a large ritual: a rite of entrance that prepared Aaron to go into the Most Holy Place, a cleansing rite of total atonement, and the elimination rite, in which the goat for Azazel played a particular role.

16:2–10. Introduction and First Development. The introduction lists what Aaron was to bring in order to enter the Most Holy Place: for himself, a bull for a sin offering and a ram for a burnt offering, and for the people, two male goats for a sin offering and a ram for a burnt offering. He was to take a ritual bath and put on a common priestly tunic. The first development mentions the sacrifice of the sin offering for Aaron and his house but places the main emphasis on identifying the goat for Azazel and its purpose. The two goats to be brought by the people are identified as a sin offering. After lots were cast, only one was to be offered as the sin offering, chosen for the Lord (belonging to Him). The other was for Azazel (belonging to him). The parallelism suggests that since the Lord is a person, Azazel also stands for a person. The fact that Azazel is associated with sin and impurity identifies him as a demonic being. The goat for Azazel stood before the Lord alive, which indicates that it was not a sacrificial victim to be offered to Azazel. Verse 10 states that it was to be brought near the Lord first, then sent to Azazel, to the wilderness. The goat was not Azazel, but it was to be sent to him, and in a sense, it represented him who was already in the wilderness. At this point, no reason is given for sending the goat to him.

The mention of atonement to be made over the goat for Azazel (kipper 'al) has elicited much discussion. When the object of the verb is a person, the phrase kipper 'al is often used to mean “to make atonement on behalf of,” but here the object was a goat. This is a unique usage of the phrase. This commentary has argued that making atonement meant to remove sin/impurity from the person or from the tabernacle to cleanse it (see the section on Theology in Leviticus: Introduction). This meaning is operative in v. 10 in the unique sense of removing sin/impurity by placing it upon the goat. In other words, this is the biblical way of referring to a rite of elimination. The phrase could then be translated “to perform an elimination/removal rite upon it” by placing sin/impurity upon the goat and sending it to Azazel (see vv. 21–22).

16:11–22. Second Development. Aaron was to offer the bull for the sin offering to atone for himself and his family. Absolutely nothing is said about laying hands on this sin offering, probably because its purpose was to remove sin/impurity from the tabernacle, not from the offerer. Its blood was to be transferred into the Most Holy Place. But first Aaron was to take incense and a censer with burning coals from the altar to the tabernacle, where he was to burn the incense, creating a cloud that would allow him to go into the Most Holy Place. The cloud of incense was to mediate his presence before the Lord lest he die by attempting to approach the Lord directly. The cloud must have reached the Most Holy Place before he did, to cover the mercy seat/atonement cover (v. 13), the golden slab that covered the ark of the covenant and the place God revealed His glory and forgiving grace.

Aaron was to bring the blood of his sin offering to the very presence of the Lord in the Most Holy Place, and surrounded by the cloud of incense, he was to sprinkle some of it once on the “mercy seat”/“atonement cover” (Heb. kaporet, “place of atonement”) and seven times before it—a total of eight times, as a perfect or full cleansing. Next, Aaron was to kill the goat for the sin offering of the people and to repeat the blood rite in the Most Holy Place (v. 15), thus mixing its blood with that of his own sin offering. He was to use the blood in the same way in the Holy Place (the tabernacle/tent of meeting; v. 16), meaning that it was to be applied all around the horns of the altar of incense and sprinkled seven times in front of it (cf. Ex. 30:10). The high priest was to put some blood around the horns of the altar of burnt offering (see Lev. 4:7), sprinkle some blood seven times on the altar for cleansing (taher, “to pronounce clean, to purify”), and consecrate it from the uncleanness (tum'ah, “impurity”) of the Israelites (v. 19). The meaning of the blood manipulation is explained in v. 16: (1) to make atonement for the people, the tabernacle, and Aaron and his family by removing from the tabernacle all their uncleanness (tum'ah, “impurity”), transgressions (pesha', “crimes”), and sins (khatta't, “sin”), and (2) to cleanse and consecrate the altar. The terms for sin and impurity are common in Leviticus, with the exception of pesha' (“transgression,” “crime”), which is found only in vv. 19 and 21. This term is never associated with high-handed sin. The purpose for this cluster of terms for sin is to show that all sins and impurities were removed from the sanctuary (cf. Ex. 34:7; Ps. 32:5; Is. 59:12; Jer. 14:20; see “The Theology of the Day of Atonement,” p. 264). They were transferred to the tabernacle, to the very presence of God, through the ministry of the priests during the daily services. At the end of the year, God removed the sin and impurities from His residence, demonstrating that He was not the source of evil. Azazel was.

Consequently, that day Azazel assumed responsibility for sin and impurities as their ultimate originator or source. After the atoning and purifying rites were performed, Aaron was to place his hands on the head of the goat for Azazel, confess over it the iniquity ('awon) and transgressions (pasha') and sins (khatta't), and transfer them to the goat that would transport all of them to the wilderness (v. 21). Once more the cluster of terms for sin indicates that all sins were to be transferred to the goat. "Uncleaness" is not mentioned, but the idea could be expressed through the term 'awon (see Lev. 5:2; 7:18; 17:16; 18:25; 19:8; Is. 64:6; Ezek. 9:4, 9; Hos. 8:13). In fact, this term could summarize all the other sins, as suggested in v. 22 (cf. Dan. 9:13; Hos. 5:5; 14:2; Amos 3:2).

The goat for Azazel was to bear or carry all the 'awon to a desolate place (v. 22). In this case, the "bearing" (nasa') does not mean to accept responsibility for the sins of others and be liable to punishment. It means to take something from one place to another, to transfer something. The goat is described as a vehicle transporting all the iniquities of Israel to Azazel, who, it is implied, dwells in the wilderness, which was characterized by the absence of fullness of life.

16:23–34. Concluding Ritual and Institutionalization of the Day of Atonement. Aaron was to change clothes, wash himself, offer the two burnt offerings, and burn the fat of the sin offering on the altar (vv. 24–25). There were instructions for the person who was to release the goat in the wilderness and for the disposal of the flesh of the sin offerings. The ritual was to be performed once a year, on the tenth day of the seventh month. An important detail was added related to the attitude of the people during that day: they were to te'annu (from 'anah, "to be afflicted, to be humbled") 'et napshotekhem ("your souls"). This phrase has been translated various ways—for example, "afflict your souls," "humble your souls" "deny yourselves" (v. 29). This would traditionally have included fasting and other acts of humility, expressing their total dependence on God's cleansing power. The rest of the section summarizes the most important aspects of the ritual. There is a marked emphasis on removing all the sins of the people from the tabernacle.

The Theology of the Day of Atonement

Leviticus 16 prescribes a theologically rich ritual, introducing new insights in the study of the book that help to clarify the meaning of the sacrificial system and integrate it into a theological unity. It was fundamentally a day of judgment that anticipated the eschatological day of judgment.

1. Cosmic Scope. During the Day of Atonement, the ritual polarity of the holy and the impure reached cosmic dimensions, unveiling like never before the source of both. The ritual moved from the center of holiness and life to the distant space of sin/impurity and death—the wilderness. In biblical religious geography, the two places most distant from each other are the spheres of life/holiness and sin/impurity/death. In between these two poles are the common and the clean, and they could gravitate toward one or the other. In a unique theological turn, the Day of Atonement took the priest into the very center of holiness and life, the Most Holy Place, where the kapporet, "mercy seat" or place of atonement, was found. This was the earthly location that directly connected the people to the cosmic center, the heavenly sanctuary, and where God met with Aaron as He met with Moses. There was no place on earth like this because it was located within the residence of the Holy One of Israel. This sanctuary itself was not a cosmic temple but a cosmic center from which cosmic order was established, restored, and preserved.

Then there is the realm of sin and the impure, so distant from the holy that it is described as being located outside the camp, in the wilderness. This implied that the presence of sin/impurity within the camp was the result of the incursion of the sphere of death into the life of the people. They were not completely isolated from it. Yes, the people, through their violation of the covenant law, sinned and were touched by the sphere of death, but the ultimate source of sin and impurity was located in the demonic figure called Azazel. Implicit here is the concept of a cosmic conflict between God and His enemies. This conflict is illustrated in the experience of Adam and Eve and their encounter with a dark power who questioned the integrity of the character of God, the serpent (Gen. 3:1–7). Job also provides a behind the scene perspective of this cosmic conflict between God and Satan, who is finally defeated (1:6–12; 2:1–7; 42:7–17; see “Evil and the Fallen Cherub,” p. 1008, and the Introduction to Job). The Day of Atonement pointed to the moment when the conflict will be resolved once and for all at a cosmic level.

2. Day of Judgment. The Day of Atonement could be described as a ritual or a typological expression of the final judgment. The attitude expected from the people was to demonstrate their total dependence on God as they faced the Judge of the earth. They were expected to humble themselves by, among other things, abstaining from any type of work, and, as later biblical and rabbinical sources confirm, fasting (16:29; cf. Is. 58:3, 5, 10). These two commands addressed one common concern, namely, total dependence on God by setting aside any activity that would signal self-reliance. The human concern for self-preservation finds expression in a particular way through work and food consumption. To discontinue these activities is to thrust oneself absolutely into God’s care and redemption. This total reliance on God was examined during the Day of Atonement/day of judgment (Lev. 23:29–30). There was a law that was to be obeyed, and it required total dependence on God. The law was located inside the ark of the covenant, whose cover was the kapporet (“mercy seat,” “place of atonement”; 16:13). The lives of the people were analyzed to uncover whether they were trusting in the Lord for their final deliverance from sin/impurity, and a legal verdict was pronounced against violators. For those who trusted in the Lord, there was deliverance through the work of the high priest on their behalf, but for the rebellious, there was permanent transfer to the realm of death. On this day, God called for a separation between the faithful and the unfaithful (see Ezek. 8–9).

The connection between the Day of Atonement and the day of judgment is also found in the experience of Joshua, the high priest, and the Angel of the Lord (Zech. 3:1–5). This vision was related to the Day of Atonement through the use of similar terms and images. He was the high priest and bore the people’s sin as their representative; the enemy of God (Satan) was present, but he was silenced by the Lord; the Lord removed the people’s sins; and Joshua’s priestly garments were changed. Unquestionably, the background is the Day of Atonement, and it is interpreted here as an experience of judgment.

We find a similar judgment scene in Daniel 7:9–10, 13–14, in which God was present, the legal records were opened, and a mediator approached, surrounded by the clouds of heaven, and was brought before God (Dan. 7:13). As a result of this apocalyptic judgment, the Son of Man received the kingdom. In Leviticus 16:12–13, the high priest was required to burn incense in order to draw near to the Lord. In both situations, the setting is a judgment, and the mediator approaches God in a cloud. The Son of Man is being described as a High Priest who, after the judgment, received a kingdom free from the presence of God’s enemies. This scene of judgment parallels the scene of the sanctuary in Daniel 8:9–14. There the Commander and Prince of God’s people performed the daily services while in conflict with a powerful enemy whom He would finally defeat during the Day of Atonement (see Dan. 8:12–14). There are many other places in the Bible where the judgment includes separating true worshipers of God from false ones (e.g., Ezek. 9) as well as the separation of God’s people from the wicked of the earth (e.g., Joel 3:11–16). Jesus also associates the final judgment with the separation of the righteous from the unrighteous (Matt. 13:24–30, 47–50).

The judicial examination of God’s people during the Day of Atonement resulted in their vindication by revealing that they had remained in a faith relationship with the Lord. Consequently, all their sins/impurities were removed from the sanctuary. During the year, they came to the tabernacle with expiatory sacrifices, through which sin/impurity was transferred to the sanctuary, and forgiveness and cleansing were granted to them. The Day of Atonement was a reaffirmation of the effectiveness of that daily cleansing. The tabernacle needed to be cleansed because it was defiled by the uncleanness and sins of the people (v. 16). The people's daily cleansing was consummated on the Day of Atonement (vv. 30, 33).

The ritual assumed that the sins of the people had been transferred to the tabernacle, thus justifying the need to remove the impurity, bringing to an end the process of atonement. Therefore, the cleansing of God's residence offered to the people a new beginning. For a day, they returned to life in the Garden of Eden, in perfect harmony with the order established by God at Creation, free from sin and impurity. The Day of Atonement anticipated the moment when the whole cosmos will be cleansed from the miasma of sin and set free from the contaminating power and influence of evil.

3. Vindication of God. The Day of Atonement was a theodicy (Gr. theos ["God"] and dike ["justice"]); that is to say, it was a declaration that God is just in spite of the presence of sin/impurity in the cosmos. First, the presence of the concept of judgment in Leviticus 16 suggests that the chapter is addressing the question of theodicy. A judgment seeks to uncover the truth in a situation in which it is not obviously accessible to the common observer. During the Day of Atonement, God functioned as Judge in order to demonstrate that the way He dealt with the sin/impurity of the people was legally justifiable and not an arbitrary decision on His part. He gave to each one what they legally deserved. The judgment ultimately reveals who in the cosmic conflict is right and who is wrong and will conclude with the cosmic recognition that God is indeed righteous. The NT captures this important theological concept when describing what will happen when God's righteousness is recognized by all (Phil. 2:10–11).

John saw the redeemed singing a song to the Lord and declaring His justice (Rev. 15:3–4). Angels are depicted as proclaiming God to be righteous and true in all His judgments (16:5, 7). At the revelation of God's judgment, a great multitude in heaven will proclaim this same reality (19:1–2). The final judgment will be a theodicy of the saving power of the cross on behalf of sinners that will reveal the justice and love of God at a cosmic level.

Second, the removal of sin/impurity from the dwelling of God revealed that, in spite of the fact that He allowed the people to transfer their sin to Him, God and sin are incompatible. Therefore, it was impossible for them to coexist permanently within the camp. The Day of Atonement reaffirmed the fact that when God assumed responsibility for sin/impurity in the tabernacle, He was bearing it as a manifestation of His forgiving grace and not because He was somehow directly and naturally connected to it (e.g., Ex. 34:7). His rendezvous with sin/impurity had a saving purpose and nothing else. During the Day of Atonement, the incompatibility between holiness and sin/impurity was graphically illustrated by removing the latter from the tabernacle and the camp and by sending it away into the wilderness.

Third, the rite of elimination—sending the goat to Azazel, loaded with sin/impurity—indicates that the Day of Atonement was essentially a theodicy. Without it, the significance of the expiatory sacrifices during the daily services could have been seriously misconstrued. By placing the Israelite expiatory sacrifices within their cultural context, the role of the Day of Atonement as a theodicy can perhaps be better understood. Similar elimination rites were practiced in the ANE with the purpose of removing evil and sickness from people by returning them to the place they came from, usually either to the camp of the enemy (in a military campaign) or to the underworld, the demonic realm. Without the Day of Atonement, it would have been easy to misunderstand the daily transference of sin/impurity to the tabernacle as a ritual return of wickedness and uncleanness to its place of origin, implying that the Lord was indeed the source of all evil. The rite of elimination, by pointing to a source of sin/impurity outside the camp, demonstrated that the origin of these most disturbing phenomena was not located in the Lord or His sanctuary, nor even in the camp of Israel, but in the wilderness—in Azazel. God could not be charged with sin. Within the context of the Pentateuch, the presence of evil in the world could not be assigned to God because He brought into existence a perfectly organized cosmos, but an enemy, Azazel, had been plotting to upset and even destroy the divine order. The people were not excused for their sins and impurities but were required to acknowledge them, repent, and bring a substitutive sacrifice to expiate them. The divine promise is that an eschatological Day of Atonement is coming when sin/impurity will be permanently removed from the cosmos.

Fourth, during the Day of Atonement and as part of the theodicy, God's sovereignty is powerfully proclaimed. The removal of sin/impurity from the tabernacle and the Israelite camp ritually proclaimed God's power and sovereignty over evil. It revealed that holiness was superior to sin/impurity. This was indeed a message of hope. Not even in the act of forgiving and cleansing His people was God tainted by sin/impurity. Yes, in the atonement, sin/impurity and holiness touched each other, but God's holiness remained absolutely undamaged, and He was amazingly able to restore holiness to His people (see "The Laying On of Hands," p. 243). During the Day of Atonement, God also proclaimed His sovereignty over Azazel. This character is introduced as the opposite of the Lord, but he remained in the shadows, in silence, unable to oppose the work of God during the Day of Atonement. His silence was the silence of the accused who, when confronted with the evidence against him or her, is left speechless, entirely unable to rebut it. His inactivity was not like the Sabbath rest enjoyed by the people but rather like the inactivity that characterizes the realm of death. The goat itself carried the sins and impurities of the people to Azazel in submission to God and under the guidance of His appointed instrument. One could perhaps venture to say that the silence of Azazel in the text was an acknowledgement of guilt. In this powerful display of His sovereignty, God restored things to the original order He had established. Creation through separation found its counterpart in God's work of re-creation through separation (see "Creation, Sabbath, and the Sanctuary," p. 231).

4. Reconciliation and Judgment. The work of Christ as High Priest consists of a work of reconciliation and judgment (see "The Cleansing of the Sanctuary and Judgment in Daniel," p. 1043). As a Sacrifice, He took upon Himself the sins of humanity, and as High Priest, He applies the benefits of His sacrifice to them. He provided cleansing from past sin, even those committed under the first covenant (Heb. 9:15), He continues to cleanse people from sin (Heb. 9:14), and He performs the cleansing of the antitypical Day of Atonement in the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 9:23). After finishing His work as High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary, He will return for His people (Heb. 9:28). Satan, as the antitype of Azazel, will be left in the wilderness of a planet in chaos for a thousand years (Rev. 20:1-3), after which Christ will destroy the source of sin and impurity (20:11-15). This will be the beginning of true Jubilee. There will be a new creation, free from the miasma of sin and impurity—a return to Eden (21:1-5; 22:1-4).

The Question of Blood

This is a transitional chapter dealing with topics addressed in the previous chapters (e.g., blood, uncleanness), but it also points to topics found in the next chapters. It could as well be placed within the following major section of Leviticus. It consists of three main legislations dealing with the offering of sacrifices outside the sanctuary or to demons and idols (vv. 1-9), the consumption of blood (vv. 10-14), and the eating of animals that had died of natural causes or were killed by other animals (vv. 15-16). These three elements were included in the decision of the Jerusalem Council in the same order, along with another transgression found in Leviticus 18, namely, sexual immorality (Acts 15:28-29). These legislations were not only for the Israelites but also for foreigners residing in Israel.

17:1-9. Sanctuary and Sacrifices. The legislation forcefully established that the desire to eat animal flesh was not to be satisfied by killing an animal in the camp or outside as an offering to other spiritual powers but by bringing it to the Lord as a peace offering—a portion of its meat was to be given back to the offerer (see Lev. 3).

If the animal was not brought to the sanctuary as a sacrifice to the Lord, the person who killed it was to be charged with murder (v. 4) and was to be cut off from his or her people (v. 4; see 7:20–21). The animal's life had been taken illegally if its blood was not poured out at the base of the altar. The punishment could have been considered too severe; consequently, the Lord provided a rationale for it—it functioned as a deterrent to offering sacrifices to demons (lit. “male goats”; v. 7). Male goats living in desolate places were considered symbols of demons; for example, the goat for Azazel, a demon, was sent to the wilderness (16:10; cf. 2 Chr. 11:15; Is. 13:21). Such sacrifices were an act of unfaithfulness to God, and He wanted to bring them to an end, hence the severity of the penalty. The requirement to bring a peace offering to the sanctuary was here extended to any other sacrifice the Israelites or the resident aliens may have wanted to offer. A most severe penalty was prescribed for failing to do this: being cut off from their people (v. 9; see v. 4).

17:10–14. Consuming Blood. Israelites or resident aliens who consumed blood were also to be cut off from their people. The reason given for the prohibition is theologically significant (v. 11). Three important statements were made. First, the life (nepesh) of the creature (lit. “flesh”) was in the blood. There has been some debate about the proper translation of the phrase, but it is possible to render it “the life of the flesh/animal is the blood.” The equation of both is stated in Deuteronomy 12:23 and is also affirmed in Leviticus 17:14. Blood is the tangible expression of life. Second, God gave it to the people in order for them to bring it to Him through the altar. In other words, blood belonged exclusively to God, but He gave it to the people with the understanding that they were to return it to Him via the altar of sacrifices. This was a wonderful gift in that the blood of the animal would now stand for the blood of repentant sinners. The text then proceeds to explain the significance of this ritual. Third, the purpose of returning to God, through the altar, the blood that He provided for them was to make atonement for the Israelites (nepeshotekem, “your lives”; v. 11). In the process of returning the blood to God via the altar, atonement was made for their lives. The implication was that their lives were in danger, but God had found a way to preserve them. The phrase “to make atonement [kipper] for your souls/lives” is used in other places in conjunction with the noun “ransom” (koper), meaning

“to give a ransom [kipper] for your lives” (Ex. 30:11–16; cf. Num. 31:48–54). This confirms that in this particular passage, kipper means to atone in the sense of removing sin by “giving a ransom for your lives.” The idea is that the blood/life of the sacrificial victim was given to God as a ransom/payment for the endangered life of the person. The association of the life of the animal with that of the sinner indicates that the first substituted for the second—human life was preserved through the death of the animal.

Fourth, the text indicates that it was the blood that made atonement for the soul (nepesh, “person, life”; v. 11). “For” suggests that what follows deals with what was said before, in this case emphasizing it: for it is the blood, as life, that serves as ransom/expiates. The “life” could be the life of the animal, as in the previous translation, or that of the person: “it is the blood that effects expiation/ransom in exchange for life.” Either of these two translations would be theologically sound. One could even translate the phrase as “for the blood effects atonement by the life,” but this would be done at the risk of implying that blood was an almost magical substance, able to bring about atonement because life was in it. In this case, God would be removed from the process of atonement, and blood, as the carrier of life, would be the focus.

What about the blood of clean animals or birds that were hunted for food (vv. 13–14)? In such cases, the blood was to be returned to God by pouring it on the ground and covering it with dust (earth). The reason for this legislation was the same as before: the life of every creature (lit. “flesh”) was its blood (v. 14), and the penalty for its violation was the same. But what about a person who ate from an animal found dead or one that was torn by beasts? If individuals ate the flesh, which presumably still had blood in it, they were unclean until evening and were to wash their clothes and take a ritual bath. If this was not done, they were responsible and bore their guilt (v. 16; see 5:2–6).

The legislations found in Leviticus 17 are principally addressing the proper use of blood. The understanding of sacrificial blood present in the text is applied to all atoning sacrifices, and it is based on the conviction that since blood, as life, is God's property, it was to be returned to Him. But God did the unimaginable: He allowed the Israelites to send Him this blood/life, loaded with their sins and impurities, as a ransom for their lives. Thus, sin and impurity were transferred to His dwelling place through a substitute, making it necessary to remove them during the Day of Atonement. Although this chapter displays some health concerns, its main purpose is theological and it serves to point to the blood of Christ, who died as a substitute to ransom humanity from sin and who is the only means of atonement before the Lord.

HOLY PEOPLE

The presence of a holy God dwelling among His people required them to be holy. This was possible because God sanctified them and removed their sins and impurities from them through the sacrificial system (Lev. 1–17). Now, the gift of holiness became a task, and it revealed that holiness has an ethical component. The assignment was to separate from sin and impurity in order to model God's holiness. This section provides numerous instructions about sexuality (18:1–30; 20:1–27), with several laws related to morality and holiness interjected (19:1–37).

18:1–30

Holiness and Sexuality

18:1–17. Incest. The Lord spoke through Moses to the children of Israel and identified Himself as their covenant Lord, who was leading them to the land of Canaan. The laws were not given in order for them to earn the land but because their redeemer Lord was giving it to them and wanted them to retain it. Obedience to God's laws makes life enjoyable. Therefore, these laws served to organize life by establishing boundaries and differentiations, as the Lord did during Creation (Gen. 1). The repetition of the phrase "I am the LORD" firmly grounded the laws in His authority. The laws against incest are moral laws, not restricted to any particular time or nation, as is shown by the condemnation of their practice in Egypt and Canaan and by the clarification that even the resident alien living among the Israelites was to obey them (v. 26).

The legislation forbade sexual relations (lit. "to uncover nakedness") beginning with the near of kin or blood relatives (vv. 6–17; this includes one's daughter though daughters are not mentioned specifically in this particular list; see 20:2): mother (v. 7; some versions distinguish the nakedness of the father from that of the mother [the father or the mother], while others equate the nakedness of the father with that of the mother [the father "that is to say" the mother]), suggesting that having sexual relations with the mother [uncovering the nakedness of the mother] dishonors the father by uncovering his nakedness—that is, only the father should have access to the mother's sexuality); stepmother (v. 8); sister or half sister (v. 9); granddaughter (v. 10); stepsister or daughter of the woman the father married who was also from the same clan (v. 11); paternal aunt (v. 12); maternal aunt (v. 13); paternal uncle's wife (v. 14); daughter-in-law (v. 15); fraternal sister-in-law (v. 16); a mother and her daughter (v. 17); and a mother and her granddaughter (v. 17). Incest was condemned not only because it violates the boundary of consanguinity but also because it is wickedness (v. 17); that is to say, it is lewdness—the shameful immorality that characterized the people in Egypt and Canaan (v. 3). Sexual purity is directly related to the holiness that God expects from His people. Throughout history, women have been abused by men in power at home and in society. These laws set limits to male power in the family, and by extension in society, and placed female sexuality under the protection of God, with serious consequences for any violator.

18:18–30. Other Sexual Prohibitions and the

Rationale. The cases listed here were not based on consanguinity. The first case has been interpreted as indicating that a man was not to marry the sister of his wife while the wife was living (v. 18). However, it could also be read as prohibiting polygamy. The mention of a woman as rival to her sister could be read as meaning one woman in addition to another (see, e.g., Ex. 16:15; lit. "a man to his brother"; see also Num. 14:4). This type of marriage was forbidden because it would destroy the wholeness of the home (see 1 Sam. 1:6).

Intentionally having sex with a woman during menstruation was forbidden (Lev. 18:19; see 15:24). In Leviticus 20:18, the man and the woman who had sexual intercourse during her period were both to be cut off from their people, indicating that both had consented to the act. But here, in the context of incest, the man was to be cut off from his people (18:29).

The prohibition against adultery is part of the Decalogue (v. 20; Ex. 20:14). What follows is a case of spiritual adultery or unfaithfulness: sacrificing children to Molech, probably an underworld deity (v. 21). The reason was that such an act profaned the name of God—He was treated not as holy but as a common pagan deity.

This association of His people with idolatry damaged His reputation.

Homosexuality was clearly rejected as a proper expression of any type of sexual intimacy. It was a moral defilement and a to'ebah ("abomination," "abhorrence," something "detestable"; v. 22; see 20:13); it was repugnant to God and incompatible with His character. It violated the order established by Him at Creation (Gen. 2:21–24; cf. Rom. 1:26–27).

Bestiality was condemned as a tebel ("perversion," "confusion") from the verb balal ("mix," "confuse"), a term that emphasizes even more the violation of divine order.

The chapter concludes with an admonition calling the people not to commit the discussed abominations, also identified as 'awon ("iniquity," "sin," "rebellion"; 18:25; see 16:21) because these sins defiled the land and would lead the people to be removed from it, like the previous inhabitants. The language of impurity was used to refer to moral impurity (vv. 29–30). The same high moral standards are expected from those who today claim to walk with the Lord.

19:1–37

Explicit Call to Holiness

This chapter illustrates what the Lord meant when He told His people that they were to be holy because He, the Lord their God, is holy (v. 2). The laws flowed from the basic principles of the Decalogue and touched almost every aspect of the social life of the Israelites, interspersed with laws related to God.

19:1–18. Principles, Casuistic Laws, and Respect for Others. Three of the Ten Commandments are mentioned: respect parents, keep the Sabbath, and reject idolatry (vv. 3–4). These are followed by two case laws: (1) bringing a peace/fellowship offering (see 7:11–21)—the emphasis here is on the proper use of the flesh of the animal—and (2) providing food for the poor during the harvest (vv. 9–10) by leaving the gleanings in the field for them. The next section, dealing with justice and care for others, begins with a reference to the eighth commandment (v. 11; Ex. 20:15), supplemented by a command to be truthful and a reference to the third commandment (Ex. 20:7), which prohibits a false oath—possibly taken to hide one's sin—that would profane God's name (Lev. 19:12).

The next set of laws deals with caring for the underprivileged by not defrauding them through robbery (taking their property by force) or by withholding their wages at the end of a workday. The deaf and blind (v. 14) were to be treated with respect and not abused (cf. John 9). Cursing the deaf could mean belittling the person, and placing stumbling blocks before the blind would include the idea of misleading the person. The command to care for others is grounded in the fear of or respect for God, not in natural human goodness. This respect for God was to express itself in the judicial system (v. 15). Justice was to be impartial and not controlled by bribes. Neither was one to speak unjustly before the court against someone else. If someone's brother hurt him or her, the person who was hurt was not to be hypocritical by making the brother believe that he was loved when, in fact, he was secretly hated (v. 17). It was better to rebuke or reprove the brother (v. 17); perhaps he would repent. Neither was one to seek vengeance or hold a grudge against one's brother (v. 18). God expected His people to love their neighbors as themselves (v. 18) and to care for and respect others, at least in the same way that they would like others to care for them.

19:19–30. Principles, Casuistic Laws, and More Commands.

This new section begins with an exhortation to keep the Lord's statutes, followed by a law against certain mixtures: of livestock, seeds (making the harvesting process difficult; see Deut. 22:9), and fabrics, such as in the garments worn by the priests (v. 19; cf. Ex. 28:5). The law sought to preserve the divine order of Creation and religious life by establishing proper boundaries. Another boundary was established through a case law related to a man who had sexual relations with a betrothed female slave (v. 20). Since she was still a slave, capital punishment was not to be enforced, but an inquiry was to be made to determine the facts and the punishment to be applied—the compensation to be paid. He misappropriated what was not his, thus compensation and a guilt offering (see 6:1–7) were required (assuming that he repented).

The second case law is related to agricultural practices in the land of Canaan (vv. 23–25). The fruits of newly planted trees were forbidden (lit. "uncircumcised") for three years—that is, not acceptable to the Lord or for human consumption (v. 23). They were "uncircumcised" for three years, and in the fourth year, the fruits were declared holy and given as praise to the Lord (v. 24) to express joyful gratitude to Him. This legislation vividly reminded the Israelites that the land and its fruits belonged to God.

They partook of its fruits according to His will, and they were to recognize this by rejoicing when consecrating the fruits to God. They were not owners but stewards of the land. The discussion of the relationship of the people to the land was followed by instructions regarding their relationship to the dead (vv. 26–28). Eating animals with (lit. “over”) the blood either refers to the previous prohibition discussed in chapter 17 (cf. Gen. 9:4) or to the pagan practice of pouring out blood for the spirits into a pit and eating over the pit. They were not to consult the spirits for divination purposes. Humans have always been concerned about the future and have thought that by knowing what will happen, they could, to some extent, have control over it. Verses 27–28 describe pagan mourning rites aimed at pleasing and showing respect and care to the spirits of the ancestors. The text forbade them and affirmed the importance of showing respect to God by not damaging the human body. The realm of the spirits of the dead is the realm of demons (Deut. 32:17; Ps. 106:28). Christians should mourn for their dead relatives in ways that express their hope in the resurrection (John 11:25–26; 1 Thess. 4:13–18), since the dead are resting and do not know anything (see Pss. 6:5; 115:17; Eccl. 9:5–6; Isa. 38:18; Dan. 12:2–3; John 11:11–13).

Parents were to care for their children and were never to sell a daughter into harlotry, either for financial benefit or for pagan fertility rites (v. 29). Respect was to be shown to the Lord (who sanctified them through His presence in time and in the sanctuary) by keeping the Sabbath holy and by serving and worshiping Him only (v. 30; see v. 3). This was to be done instead of seeking mediums or necromancers (Heb. yid’oni; some versions have “familiar spirits,” others have “spiritists”; v. 31). By entering the realm of death, they became unclean.

The people of God were commanded to show respect to the elderly—while they were still alive—out of respect to God. They were to care for strangers who dwelt among them in their land (vv. 32–33) by treating them well, even considering them fellow Israelites, and loving them as themselves (see v. 18). In other words, they were to not do to foreigners what had been done to them in Egypt. They were to also show respect and kindness in the business world by not deceiving or taking advantage of others—they were to use balanced weights and proper measures (vv. 35–36). This was firmly grounded in God’s previous work of salvation for His people. The chapter closes with an emphatic exhortation to submit to God’s loving will for them as their Lord (v. 37).

20:1–27

Laws and Penalties

Chapter 20 repeats many of the laws discussed first in chapter 18 but identifies specific penalties for their violation. It is organized by the type of penalty (death, vv. 9–16; exile, vv. 17–19; childlessness, vv. 20–21).

20:1–16. Introduction and Capital Punishment.

Israelites or resident aliens who worshiped Molech were to be stoned (v. 2; see 18:21). If the people failed to perform the execution, then God Himself was to cut off the idolaters (see 7:20–21), as well as the members of the family who supported them, from their people (v. 5). They dishonored the character of God, committed spiritual harlotry, and could have contaminated the tabernacle by visiting it in a state of impurity (see 15:31). This is the way Ezekiel explains the contamination of the temple through the worship of Molech (23:38–39), providing a biblical explanation for this particular case. The death penalty applied also to those who committed spiritual adultery by consulting spirits (vv. 6, 27; see 19:31) and to those who cursed, dishonored, and abused their parents (v. 9; 19:3; see Ex. 21:17; Deut. 21:18–21; 27:16). Their blood would be upon them (v. 9)—that is, this was a case of capital punishment brought by the persons upon themselves.

The list mentions other cases involving capital punishment, including adultery (v. 10; 18:20, 29), sexual relations with the wife of one’s father (v. 11; 18:8), lying with one’s daughter-in-law—a tebel (an incestuous “perversion”; v. 12; see 18:15; cf. v. 23)—and homosexual intercourse, a to’ebah (“abomination” or “detestable thing”; v. 13; 18:22, 23). In the case of a man marrying both a woman and her mother (“a wicked act”; vv. 14; 18:17), they were all to be burned, which probably meant that the corpses were burned after they were executed (e.g., Josh. 7:15, 25). The list of sexual sins concludes with bestiality (vv. 15–16; 18:23). The reference to being put to death may have referred to stoning (cf. Deut. 22:23–24).

20:17–21. Noncapital Offenses. In the case of consensual sex between a man and his sister (“a disgraceful, wicked thing”; cf. 18:9), the penalty of being cut off publicly may have referred to exiling the persons. The same penalty applied to a couple who had sex during menstruation (v. 18). The Hebrew term used here (daweh) conveys the idea of “weak” or “faint,” implying a time of discomfort for the woman (see 15:33; 18:19), and does not necessarily imply that menstruation was an illness (though some translations render the word as “sickness”). With respect to consensual sexual intercourse with an aunt, no specific penalty is mentioned except that they were to bear their guilt (v. 19; 18:12–13; see 5:1). Perhaps the punishment was also exile. The penalty for sex with an aunt (wife of an uncle) or sister-in-law was to be infertility (vv. 20–21; 18:14–16); the family name would not be perpetuated.

The chapter closes with an exhortation to abide by God’s will as expressed in His decrees and legal ordinances (v. 22). The law orders the cosmos and society by establishing distinctions in nature and roles. God was re-creating the land of Canaan by removing the cause of chaos and disorder and restoring it to order, giving it to a new people who would support His plan and preserve the distinctions He had established. He separated Israel from the nations, not on the basis of ethnic superiority but on the basis of moral regulations that were designed to instill God’s values in humans. God’s people were to be holy because He is holy. He separated them for Himself (v. 24) so that they would also separate themselves for Him. This is the way God organized their world, and they were not to upset that order. The law of clean/unclean animals is used here to illustrate the importance of being holy as God is holy. Holiness has to do with how we relate to God’s will in our daily lives—what we eat and how we interact with others and with Him. The laws discussed in this chapter were not abolished by Jesus because they are directly related to a life of moral integrity. God continues to abhor (v. 23) the violation of these and other laws found in the Pentateuch (cf. Acts 15:19–20).

The last verse builds on v. 6, establishing the punishment for any person who was a leader in the promotion of spiritualism. Such persons were to be stoned (v. 27). This instruction was probably left for the end because such practices were a rejection of the power of God to lead and protect His people and showed allegiance to evil powers that opposed Him—the forces that attempted to destroy the order established by God at Creation.

Health and Hygiene in Leviticus

The laws of uncleanness were chiefly theological in nature, but they also contained hygienic principles. The unclean was associated with the realm of death, to which all were exposed, while the holy stood for life. Therefore, the theological and hygienic interests were complementary. Those who were sick lacked fullness of life and vibrancy. They had been touched by death; they were weak. In a sense, the sick were already within the sphere of death (Ps. 88), and unless they were healed, they would die. The biblical emphasis is not so much on healing but on preventing sickness, and this is clearly demonstrated through the laws regulating impurity.

1. Obedience to God. God was not only the Healer of Israel but also the One who protected them from diseases. The well-being of the people was directly associated with the covenant relationship and required their faithfulness to the covenant law. Obedience to it resulted in divine blessings and, more specifically, in protection from illness (Ex. 23:25–26). This exemplifies the biblical understanding of human nature as an integrated system in which the physical and the spiritual are inseparable components of one single person. The divine call to observe the Sabbath as a day of rest and spiritual renewal is probably one of the best examples of God’s concern for the spiritual and physical well-being of His people (Ex. 20:8–11).

2. Avoiding the Unclean. Since uncleanness is related to the absence of life, the preservation of health required abstaining from and not coming into contact with any unclean sources. This is particularly the situation in cases related to blood flows (Lev. 15:2–30), carcasses of animals (11:24, 26, 31), dead persons (21:1–2; Num. 6:6–9; 19:11), and lepers (13:45–46). Sex during menstruation was forbidden (15:24; 18:18; 20:18). All of these were potential sources of disease. The fungi on the walls of a house could damage the health of its residents, particularly children, and would have made it necessary for the house to be renovated or demolished (14:33-47). These are extremely useful hygienic principles.

3. The Practice of Quarantine. In order to control the potential spread of diseases among the population, a period of quarantine was often required. The Lord instructed Moses to quarantine lepers, those with discharges, and those defiled by touching a dead body (Num. 5:2). The extent of the isolation varied, depending on the case, but in some situations, indefinite isolation was required until the person was healed. For instance, a house with suspected fungi was initially quarantined for seven days (Lev. 14:38), but persons with a blood discharge (15:13, 29) or leprosy (14:3-4) were required to wait to reintegrate until they had been healed and had gone through a cleansing ritual.

4. Not Eating the Unclean. The flesh of an animal which died from natural causes was not to be eaten (Lev. 17:15; Deut. 14:21). Consumption of blood or fat in meat (two potential sources of serious disease) was forbidden (Lev. 7:22-25, 27). Even eating utensils suspected of contamination were not to be used until they had been washed (11:32), and in some cases, they were destroyed (v. 33). These were important prophylactic measures that served to protect food and water from contaminating agents (vv. 31-38; see "Clean and Unclean Animals," p. 257).

5. Use of Water. Water played an important role as a hygienic agent in the discussions of uncleanness. The garment that came into contact with blood or on which semen fell was to be washed (Lev. 15:16-17). This was also the case with the garments of a person who carried the carcass of an animal (11:24-25). After emissions of semen, persons were to bathe (15:18). The man with a blood flow was to rinse his hands before touching another person (15:11), and if he spat on a clean person, that person was to wash his or her clothes and bathe (v. 8). Coming into contact with sources of impurity required washing the garments and bathing the body. This was a very effective way of controlling the spread of disease.

6. Sexual Restrictions. There are a number of laws dealing with incest intended to set limits on the physical, mental, and genetic deterioration of the people (Lev. 18:1-18).

Bestiality and homosexuality were strongly forbidden (18:22; 20:13) on the basis of morality. Furthermore, the laws would have prevented sexually-transmitted infections and other health problems threatening the well-being of God's people. The same applied to the practice of prostitution. The Israelites, particularly priests (21:9), were not to allow their daughters to become prostitutes (19:29).

7. Healthy Environment. Keeping the environment clean provided protection against infectious diseases. Instructions were given, in the context of military campaigns, for the proper disposition of human excrement. This was designed to prevent the spread of infectious diseases and odor pollutants (Deut. 23:12-14). God promised the Israelites a land that would contribute to their physical and emotional well-being (Lev. 26:4-6).

8. Mental Health. God is interested in the spiritual, physical, and mental health of His people. Very few actions upset the inner peace of human beings more than actions that damage their relationships with God and others. Guilt and shame rob humans of their inner peace. The Lord provided for the restoration of mental peace through the sacrificial system. Any Israelite who committed a sin against God or another Israelite was expected to bring a guilt or sin offering to the Lord in order for the priest to make atonement for him or her (Lev. 5; 6:24-29). Even in cases where individuals felt anxiety because they suspected that they had committed a sin which they could not recall or identify, the Lord invited them to bring a sacrifice in order to restore their inner peace (5:17-19). Divine forgiveness is the best medicine for a sense of unworthiness, regret, and guilt.

There are some important health principles present in the biblical legislations related to uncleanness. These principles are, in most cases, suggested by the text and not explicitly mentioned. The theological concern predominates, but this does not imply the exclusion of health concerns expressed in a setting in which the mechanism of infectious disease was unknown. Through these laws, God provided a way for them to prevent the inroad of disease. This demonstrates His care for the physical, mental, and spiritual health of His children.

21:1—22:33*Holiness of Priests and Sacrifices

The priests had unique access to God and were therefore called to a higher status of holiness in their lives and work than the common people. This section deals with the preservation of the holiness of the priests (vv. 2–24) and of the holiness of offerings (22:1–33). Those who served the Lord in special capacities were challenged to manifest in their lives His holiness and to become models for others while earning their respect. Whatever belonged to the Lord must be treated with respect and not dragged into a world of sin and death.

21:1–24. Holiness of the Priests. This divine speech was for the instruction of all God's people because caring for holiness is not for the priests alone. Since the common priest was holy, he was forbidden to come in contact with the dead, except for his nearest relatives (vv. 2–3). Through contamination, the priests profaned themselves. Neither were they allowed to practice pagan mourning rites, for this profaned the name of the Lord (v. 5). They were not to marry a harlot, or a defiled woman (perhaps a cultic prostitute), or a divorcee because holiness required wholeness in every form. The Israelites were to acknowledge and respect the holiness of the priest, but this holiness was to be particularly manifest within their own families. When the daughter of a priest profaned her own holiness by becoming sexually promiscuous, her conduct disqualified the priest from performing his ministry. Such a profanation of holiness was a capital offense, and she was to be burned (v. 9; see 20:14).

The holiness of the high priest was particularly important because God appointed him to unique responsibilities; he wore holy garments (v. 10). The requirements for the common priests applied to him as well, but with a few stringent additions. He was not to mourn or to defile himself by coming near a corpse, not even that of his father or mother (v. 11). In v. 11, the text literally refers to a prohibition against touching a nepesh (which could mean various things; see “Living Soul or Living Being?” p. 145)—in this case, a reference to a dead person. He was also forbidden to leave the sanctuary to engage in such acts. Death could not interrupt his life-preserving ministry. He was to marry only an Israelite virgin, a woman attuned to God's moral order, in order to not profane or defile his offspring/posterity (vv. 14–15)—that is to say, his descendants, from whom the next high priest would be selected.

In order to preserve the holiness of the tabernacle, priests with certain infirmities—mainly physical imperfections or health problems—were disqualified from service (vv. 16–21). These were people whose bodies did not express fullness of life, so they were not allowed to minister before the Lord of life. Otherwise they would profane the tabernacle (by treating it as a common building). Nevertheless, they were allowed to eat from the holy and most holy offerings.

22:1–33. Preserving the Holiness of Offerings.

It was the responsibility of the people to consecrate their offerings to the Lord and that of the priests to not desecrate them. Priests could desecrate the offerings by handling them while in a state of impurity, thus showing disrespect to the Lord. The cases of uncleanness which excluded priests included leprosy, a bodily discharge, and impurity contracted by touching a person who was unclean (v. 4; see also Lev. 11:24, 29–30; 15:15–18; Num. 19:10–12). If the impurity came through contact, the priest would be unclean until evening and could not eat from the holy things until he had washed his body (vv. 6–7). He was not to eat clean animals that had died of natural causes or had been killed by another beast (v. 8). The emphasis was on protecting the priests from coming into contact with the realm of death because they ministered before the Lord of life. The violation of these regulations was a capital offense; the priest was to bear his own sin and die for it (v. 9).

The holy offerings constituted the food of the priests and their families. It is here stipulated who within the household could eat this food (vv. 10–13). The Hebrew word zar in v. 12, which refers to the man to whom the priest's daughter was married, has been translated variously as “outsider,” “layman,” “stranger,” and so forth, and has been generally understood to refer to an Israelite from a nonpriestly line. If someone in the household ate of the holy offerings unintentionally, a guilt offering and compensation were required (vv. 14–16; see 5:14–19).

The Israelites were also instructed concerning how to safeguard the sacredness of their offerings. The preservation of the holiness of the burnt offering, brought for vows or as a freewill offering (vv. 18–20), required the proper animal, without defect. Otherwise the offering would not be acceptable on the offerer's behalf (v. 20; cf. 1:3). If a peace offering were brought, the sacrificial victim was to be without defect—a list of imperfections was provided, similar to the imperfections of the priests excluded from service but more extensive (vv. 22–23; cf. 1:2). The exceptions were a bull or a lamb with a stunted or overgrown limb, to be offered only as a free-will offering. Perhaps this was because it was a completely voluntary offering. The imperfect animals described in this passage do not represent the spiritual condition that God expected from the offerers, for they manifested the impact of death on God’s creation (vv. 24–25). But above all, they were not to be a type of Christ, “a lamb without blemish” (1 Pet. 1:19).

The next two laws demonstrated respect for animal life (vv. 27–29; cf. Ex. 22:30). The third reminded the people that a thanksgiving sacrifice was a freewill offering and the flesh of the animal was to be eaten on the same day (vv. 29–30; see 7:12–15). The chapter concludes with an exhortation to keep the commandments of God (v. 31) and not profane His holy name. The leaders were to sanctify the Lord in the eyes of the people because He sanctified the people (v. 32). The call to be holy was grounded in the fact that the Lord had redeemed the people from Egypt (v. 33).

Holy Times: The Festivals

Time flows on relentlessly, bringing change, often boredom, and it is a common human response to seek meaningful activity. The festivals were God’s way of enriching time for His people by providing celebrations and reminders of His saving acts on their behalf. These were holy occasions that stopped the common flow of time to bring the community together in worship and celebration before the Lord. They pointed to God’s mighty acts in the past and in the future and filled life with meaning and hope. They were called miqra’e qodesh (“sacred assemblies” or “holy convocations”), during which portions of time were set apart (mo’adai [plural of mo’ed] yahweh—“appointed times,” “festivals,” “seasons” of the Lord; v. 4) to worship God in a particular way, in some cases in the sanctuary and in others in the people’s dwellings (v. 3). Three of the festivals were pilgrimage festivals, requiring the people to come to the sanctuary to worship (Unleavened Bread [vv. 6–8], Weeks [vv. 15–22], and Tabernacles [vv. 33–36, 39–43]; cf. Deut. 16:16).

Many sacrifices were offered during these celebrations (cf. Num. 28), including sin, burnt, grain/food, drink, and peace/fellowship offerings. These sacrifices conveyed the conviction that atonement was needed even when the people came to worship the Lord, to recommit themselves to Him, and to express joyful gratitude. The convocations included six days of partial rest (ceremonial sabbaths), during which “laborious work” was forbidden (vv. 7, 8, 21, 24–25, 35–36), and two of full rest—the Sabbath (v. 3) and Day of Atonement (v. 27).

23:1–3. The Sabbath. The divine speech here was directed to the people who would participate in the festivals that were to be proclaimed as holy convocations or sacred assemblies for worship. The convocations required a gathering of the people. God referred to them as His appointed times or festivals (v. 3). After this, the Sabbath is mentioned as a day of total rest (shabbat shabbaton, a superlative expression meaning “the most restful rest/shabbat”) and is called a holy convocation or sacred assembly for worship. The Sabbath is never called a “festival” because its celebration is not controlled by the calendar but is based on a cycle of seven days, independent of the month or the year. As a matter of fact, in this passage, the Sabbath is not specifically called a mo’ed but is introduced in order to suggest that the holiness of the Sabbath is extended in a limited way to the festivals—the other sacred times. Immediately after the reference to the Sabbath, the introduction to the festivals is repeated again to preserve the uniqueness of the Sabbath (v. 4). Besides, at the end of the chapter, a distinction is drawn between Sabbaths and festivals (vv. 37–38). The Sabbath was instituted by God at Creation and entrusted to Adam and Eve (Gen. 2:1–3; Mark 2:27).

23:4–22. Spring Festivals. The Passover lamb was to be slain on the date of Abib 14 and eaten in the evening—that is to say, on the fifteenth of the month. It was to celebrate the departure of Israel from Egypt—the most magnificent act of divine redemption in the OT (Ex. 12; Num. 28:16–25). It was a type of the redemptive work of Christ, who became the definitive Passover sacrifice (1 Cor. 5:7), slain during the Passover season (19:14, 36; cf. Ex. 12:46, Num. 9:12, Ps. 34:20). He instituted the Lord’s Supper as a memorial of His sacrifice (Matt. 26:26–29; 1 Cor. 11:23–26). The Festival of Unleavened Bread was closely related to the Passover because it started on the fifteenth of the month and lasted for seven days. The full period was sometimes called the Passover Festival. During those days, the Israelites ate only unleavened bread to remember the food they ate when leaving Egypt (Ex. 12:39). The bread pointed to the need for believers to remove spiritual leaven from their lives. It was on the day after the Sabbath, perhaps of the first harvest week or after the ceremonial sabbath (on Nisan 16), that the people were to bring a sheaf of the firstfruits of the barley harvest. This ceremony is interpreted in the NT as a type of the resurrection of Jesus, the firstfruits from the dead (1 Cor. 15:23).

Fifty days after the Sabbath preceding the presentation of the firstfruits, the Festival of Weeks/Pentecost was celebrated (Lev. 23:15–22) for the purpose of thanking God for the harvest of wheat (see Ex. 34:22). Shabbaton can refer to seven weeks or seven Sabbaths (Lev. 23:15). The outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the disciples occurred during the Festival of Pentecost (Acts 2:1–42). The Spirit, for believers, is the firstfruits of what God will provide (Rom. 8:23). It is a gift more glorious than the literal harvest of wheat.

23:23–44. Autumn Festivals. Two festivals were celebrated during the autumn, besides the Day of Atonement. On the first day of the seventh month, there was a partial day of rest and a tiru'ah (a blast, which implies the use of the shopar [ram's horn]). The sound of the horn was most likely a reminder that God is Creator and Judge of the world and was used in preparation for the Day of Atonement (cf. 47:5–7; 81:3; 98:6–9). The NT does not mention this festival, but Revelation mentions seven trumpets that sound before the consummation of salvation, reminding people that God is Creator and Judge (Rev. 8:7–9:21; 11:15–19). The trumpets signify God's judgment upon impenitent sinners within the flow of history, preparing the way for the final judgment. In Revelation, the trumpets also culminate with a sanctuary scene related to the Day of Atonement (11:19).

The Day of Atonement took place on the tenth day of the seventh month and was not, properly speaking, a festival (see Lev. 16; Num. 29:7–11). It was a day of judgment for the people that brought about total cleansing (see "The Theology of the Day of Atonement," p. 264). The last festival was the Festival of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:33–43; see Num. 29:12–14; Deut. 16:13–17). It was to be celebrated after the harvest and lasted seven days, with a conclusion on the eighth day. During the week, there was to be a daily procession, with people waving tree branches to express their joy before the Lord (Lev. 23:40). They were to dwell in booths (sukkot) and celebrate the Festival of Tabernacles (i.e., tents/booths) so as to remember the time when they had lived in tents in the wilderness after God had brought them out of Egypt (23:42–43; Deut. 16:12–15). Later prophets announced an eschatological Festival of Tabernacles to be celebrated after the cleansing of Jerusalem that would include the nations of the earth (Zech. 14:16–21). John saw an innumerable multitude of people from all nations standing before the throne and the Lamb with palm branches, praising God and the Lamb (Rev. 7:9).

At the end of Leviticus 23, the Lord identified the festivals as occasions to worship Him through sacrifices and offerings (v. 37). These festivals were to be celebrated in addition to the Sabbath. Thus, a distinction was established between the festivals and the Sabbath (v. 38). The festivals pointed to the past—to remind the people of the goodness of God in their lives—but at the same time, they pointed to the future redemptive work of the Lord. They revealed elements of God's plan for the salvation of humanity through Christ.

Holy Place and Holy Name

The subject of holiness continues by transitioning into the Holy Place of the tabernacle, the house of the Lord (vv. 1–9), and by presenting a case in which the holiness of God's name was violated (vv. 10–23). The common theme continues to be how one should handle that which belongs to the Lord.

24:1–9. Light and Bread. In the house of the Lord there were, among other pieces of furniture, a lampstand and a table (see Ex. 25:23–40). The light of the lamps was a symbol of the presence of the Lord in the tabernacle (Pss. 18:28; 27:1; 36:9; 90:8), and therefore, the lamps were to be kept burning all night long or continually (vv. 2–4; cf. Ex. 27:20–21). Maintaining the lamps was one of the activities to be performed by the priest on a regular basis (Heb. tamid, "daily," used here adverbially, suggesting that they were to be kept burning day and night; cf. PP 348). The lamp was also a symbol of the life (Zech. 4:1–14) available through the Holy Spirit. The oil was to be provided by the people to demonstrate that the presence of the Lord among them was of utmost importance.

The table's purpose was to present the show bread. Every Sabbath, the priest was to set out twelve cakes of fine flour, in two piles of six, with incense placed by their side. The bread was to be placed before the Lord (v. 6; cf. Num. 4:7), but He was not the One who was to eat it. His description is in human terms—living in a house, receiving bread—but He is not a human being; He is the holy, omnipresent Lord. He did not need bread to subsist, and therefore, He did not eat it but gave it to the priests as a most holy thing to enjoy (v. 9). The bread represented the people of Israel, who provided the flour and who lived in the presence of a holy God, but it also represented God as Creator and sustainer of life (for more information on the fire/food offering [v. 7], see notes on 1:9). Jesus identifies Himself with the Light (John 8:12) and Bread of God (6:48) as the Source and Preserver of life.

24:10-23. Holiness of God's Name. This narrative describes one of the most serious sins that a human being can commit. In this case, it was committed by the son of an Israelite woman and an Egyptian father (v. 10). In the midst of a fight with an Israelite, he cursed the Name, which refers to Yahweh, the Holy One (v. 11; 23:3; cf. Ex. 20:7) and the very source of holiness and life for Israel. The penalty to be inflicted on the man was stipulated in terms of the lex talionis (Lat. lex ["law"] and talio ["like"]), the law of equivalent retribution, which was used in cases of murder (Lev. 24:17, 20; see Ex. 21:23-24; Deut. 19:21)—the penalty should correspond to the crime. Cursing the Lord was treated as the equivalent of murdering a fellow Israelite and thus required the death penalty. Apparently the man wanted the God of Israel dead. This was a most violent attack (qalal, "to revile, to curse" [vv. 11, 15]; it is used to indicate that someone is destitute of his or her value) against God. Since the crime was committed in public, those who heard the man were considered polluted by it. Through the laying on of hands, they transferred their guilt to him (v. 14); otherwise, it would have permanently attached to them (cf. 5:1).

The text then proceeds to legislate what to do when someone killed a person or an animal. According to the law of exact retribution, the person who killed another should die, but when an animal was killed, the offender was to replace the animal (vv. 17, 21; lit. "life for life"). The value of a human life is higher than that of an animal because humans were created in the image of God (Gen. 1:26-27). Disfigurement is the diminution of life, and the same was to be done to the criminal unless compensation was arranged (Lev. 24:19). These laws were also to be applied to resident aliens (v. 22). The chapter closes stating that the divine decision was implemented and the blasphemer was executed (v. 23). No sacrifice was required to expiate for the sin of cursing the Lord because the individuals were executed; they bore their own sin. Today, blasphemers in the church are not to be executed but are disfellowshipped from the community of believers in the hope that they will repent and return to the Lord (1 Tim. 1:20; cf. 1 Cor. 5:1-5). But in the eschatological judgment of God, those who refuse to repent will be excluded from the city of God (Rev. 13:5-6; 19:20).

Holy Times: Sabbatical Years and Jubilee

After dealing with the Holy Place and the holiness of God's name, there is a return to legislation addressing holy time. The sabbatical years (vv. 1-7) and the Jubilee (vv. 8-22) were not based on the calendar. The unifying topic is the land, and consequently, the legislation addresses property redemption (vv. 23-34), the poor, and slavery (vv. 35-55).

25:1-7. Sabbatical Years and Jubilee. The land was to enjoy its sabbath after six years of planting and harvesting. The seventh year was to be a sabbath of rest (shabbat shabbaton; see 23:3) for the land (v. 4). This meant that during that year, there would be no sowing, no pruning of vineyards, and no harvesting. The people, the laborers, the strangers, and the livestock would eat what grew by itself—the produce from the sabbath year (vv. 6-7; cf. Ex. 23:10-11; Neh. 10:31). Deuteronomy adds that during the seventh year, there was to be a cancellation of debts (15:1; shemittah, "release, remission"). This could refer to the seventh year after the person became a slave and not to the sabbatical year, or it could have also involved a moratorium imposed on collecting debts during the sabbatical year, when there was no sowing or harvesting. In any case, the Levitical law established that the land belonged to the Lord and that in the seventh year, He removed it from the hands of the people to let it rest. This allowed even the poor to benefit from what it produced under His blessing. It also demonstrates that human security does not exclusively depend on the productivity of the land but on the blessing of the Lord.

The Jubilee arrived after forty-nine years, was to be proclaimed on the tenth day of the seventh month (the Day of Atonement), and was to be celebrated in the fiftieth year (Lev. 25:10). Like the sabbatical year, it was to start in the autumn. During that year, slaves were set free to return to their properties and families (Lev. 25:10). When selling land to pay off debts, a person was to take into consideration how many years were left until the Jubilee in order to calculate a fair price (vv. 13–17). The Jubilee was treated as a sabbatical year, during which there was to be no sowing or harvesting (v. 11). The chronological connection between the sabbatical year and the Jubilee is best explained by looking at vv. 20–22: in the sixth year, under God's blessing, the land would yield enough produce for three years (the sixth, seventh, and eighth). Subsequently, in the eighth year, the year of Jubilee (fiftieth year), the people were to start planting and then harvest in the ninth year.

25:23–34. Redemption of Property and the Poor. The practice of freeing the land during the Jubilee was based on the theological conviction that the land belonged to the Lord (v. 23). If, as a result of poverty, it had been sold or leased, the original owner could redeem it in one of two ways. His closest relative (the go'el) could redeem it by buying it back for him. In the absence of a redeemer, he could buy it back after acquiring sufficient financial resources. Several other regulations were given to clarify under what circumstances houses were redeemable (vv. 29–34).

The Jubilee protected not only the land but also the poor, for whom there was specific legislation (vv. 35–38). They were to be treated with respect and not financially exploited (i.e., not charged interest). This too was based on the fact that God had redeemed them from Egypt and that He had given them the land. When Israelites had to sell themselves into debt-slavery, they were to be treated as hired servants, not as slaves (v. 40), until the Jubilee. The theological foundation is that the Israelites were the servants of the Lord and could not be treated as slaves (v. 42). Verses 44–46 establish that Israelites could purchase foreigners as slaves (in most cases, prisoners of war) or could purchase the children of foreigners who lived in Israel. These slaves were not to be released during the Jubilee. They were the permanent property of the owner, who could pass them on to his children as inheritance; the slaves' social status was permanent. However, this was not the way the Israelites were to treat their own brothers; this rigorous law did not apply to them (v. 46b). If Israelites sold themselves as debt-slaves to non-Israelites dwelling in the land with them, one of their relatives should redeem them, or if they had reached financial stability, they should redeem themselves (vv. 48–49). In setting the amount to be paid, the years left until Jubilee were to be taken into consideration. The strangers were expected to treat them as a yearly hired servant in the sight of the people of Israel (v. 53). In any case, they should be released in the year of Jubilee. The Israelites were God's servants whom He brought out of the land of Egypt (v. 55).

The legislation resonates with valuable principles and Christological insights. It teaches respect for the land/creation on the basis of the fact that God owns it. It should not be exploited because human survival is ultimately in the hands of the Lord, who provides for His children even when they cease from their work. What the land produces is for the benefit of all, not just for a few, and consequently, systems should be developed to ensure that others benefit from it. The poor should be treated with respect. Their dignity should not be undermined, and they should not be taken advantage of. Typologically, the law of the sabbatical year and the Jubilee awaken hope in the human heart for a land over which justice and love will rule forever—a new land. This eschatological expectation is a reality because we do have a go'el, a close relative who has acted as our Redeemer—Jesus Christ, who paid the price for our redemption (Mark 10:45). Isaiah announces that the Messiah would fulfill the Jubilee proclamation of freedom (61:1–3), and this was done by Jesus in Nazareth (Luke 4:16–30). Daniel uses the sabbatical year to establish the time for the coming of the Messiah—7 weeks of days  $\times$  7 (49)  $\times$  10 = 490 years (see Dan. 9:24–27). The typology of the Jubilee will find its consummation at the return of Jesus, when His people and the planet will be liberated from the oppressive power and presence of evil (Dan. 7:21–22; Rom. 8:20–23; 1 Cor. 15:55; cf. EW 35).

Blessings and Curses

This chapter brings to an end the speech that began in 25:1, while incorporating all the legislations found in the book of Leviticus into the covenant God made between Himself and Israel on Sinai (for more information on the topic of covenants in the ANE and the Bible, see Deuteronomy: Introduction). The call to a holy life closes with an exhortation to obey the laws of the covenant Lord because doing so would bring rich blessing to the people and to the land, while violating them would result in curses or the presence of disorder and chaos in the life of the covenant community (see Deut. 28). The law established divine order, and its rejection would upset and could even destroy that order by damaging or bringing to an end the relationship between the Lord and His people. This chapter, like Deuteronomy 28, establishes that a life shaped by the blessings/promises of the Lord is possible only within a covenant relationship with Him. A life outside that sphere would be characterized by curses/judgments. The chapter can be divided into four main sections: introduction (vv. 1–2), blessings (vv. 3–13), curses (vv. 14–39), and hope for the future (vv. 40–45).

26:1–13. Introduction and Blessings. The introduction summarizes the core of the relationship between God and His people: He wanted to be their exclusive God, and He wanted them to be His people (cf. v. 12). The emphasis is on the first, second, and fourth commandments of the Decalogue (Ex. 20:3, 4–6, 8–11). God would not tolerate idolatry or the representation of the Deity in physical form. The reference to engraved or carved stone in v. 1 probably refers to stones adorned with pagan symbols used for worship (cf. Num. 8:12; 33:52). Being God's holy people was expressed in keeping the Sabbath (Lev. 26:2) and in showing respect to Him as the Lord. In principle, any violation of the laws of the Lord was a rejection of Him as Creator and Redeemer (Ex. 20:8–11; Deut. 5:12–15) and an insult to the God who dwelt among them (cf. Lev. 26:12).

Six main blessings/promises are listed for those who were willing to submit to the covenant Lord: fertility of the land (vv. 4–5), peace and safety in the land (v. 6), military superiority (vv. 7–8), population growth (v. 9), abundance of food (v. 10), and God's permanent presence among them (vv. 11–12). These promises were the outworking of God's redemptive acts on behalf of Israel when He liberated them from Egypt (v. 13). All these blessings were conditional, depending on the commitment of the people to the covenant Lord.

26:14–39. Curses or Denunciations. The curses were much more abundant and specific than the blessings because they were intended to function as a deterrent. Several things could be said about them. First, they were avoidable contingent upon the faithfulness of the people (v. 14). Most of the prophecies of judgment in the Prophets were based on the covenant curses and are conditional (see "God's Judgment in the Prophets," p. 981). Second, the intensity of the judgment increased from terror (v. 16) to the dissolution of the covenant and the removal of the people from the land (vv. 34–39). This revealed God's patience and love for them (vv. 16, 23–24, 27–28). Third, the purpose of the curses was to prevent the people from rebelling against the Lord (v. 21) and to reform them (Heb. yasar, "to be disciplined," "to become wise"; v. 23). This was redemptive discipline that sought, under God's power, to bring something good out of a state of chaos. There were five main denunciations: panic as a result of the threat or reality of military defeat (vv. 14–17); famine in the land (vv. 18–20); decimation of humans and animals by wild beasts (vv. 21–22); war, with its accompanying epidemics and famines (vv. 23–26); and destruction and loss of the land (exile; vv. 27–39), preceded by cannibalism (see Lam. 2:20), profanation of cultic places (Lev. 26:30–31), desolation of the land (v. 32), and intensified psychological panic (vv. 36–39). Then the land was to enjoy its sabbatical years (vv. 34–35; cf. 2 Chr. 36:21).

26:40–46. Hope for the Future. Although the people might break the covenant, the Lord was unwilling to break it, and this fact introduces into these dark verses a door of hope. In response, the Lord expected the rebellious people to confess their iniquity, humble themselves, and acknowledge their guilt and that God was righteous in His judgments (vv. 40–41). His faithfulness to the covenant assured the people that He would not completely destroy them (v. 44); that is to say, He would be willing to renew the covenant with them (v. 42). He would also remember the land: during the time it enjoyed its sabbath rest, the people were to remain in exile. Hope is always at the disposal of God's people. Such hope anticipated the coming of the Messiah, who would take upon Himself humanity's curse (Gal. 3:10–14) and who, at the end, will remove the curse from the earth (Rev. 22:3). The chapter concludes by stating that the legislations found in Leviticus, as well as the promises and denunciations, were part of the covenant the Lord made with the people on Mount Sinai through the mediation of Moses.

Holy Vows and Tithes

The previous chapters have emphasized the importance of protecting the holy while becoming holy. This chapter closes Leviticus on a positive note and emphasizes the laws which regulated the legal desecration or redemption of persons, animals, and things. Humans, within certain limitations, could practice the redemption of the holy. The chapter examines the redemption of persons and animals (vv. 2–13) and houses and fields (vv. 14–25), along with a discussion of certain restrictions (vv. 26–29) and the practice of tithing (vv. 30–33).

27:1–13. Introduction and Redemption of Humans and Animals. The book begins and ends with a divine speech addressed, through Moses, to the children of Israel (1:2; 27:1–2). A vow is a voluntary promise made to the Lord that must be honored. Hannah's dedication of Samuel is one example of the consecration of a person to the Lord through a vow (1 Sam. 1:11). If the person was to be redeemed, the priest was to determine the amount of the redemption money based on age and gender. This was not about the intrinsic value of a person but about the estimated amount of productive work that a person could perform. The financial assessment took into consideration the economic status of the person who made the vow (v. 8). With respect to animals, if someone promised to bring a sacrifice to the Lord, there was no way of redeeming the animal (v. 9), and neither should the owner substitute it or exchange it for a different animal that was in better or worse condition. In a case where one animal was exchanged for another (presumably when they were essentially equivalent), both animals belonged to the Lord (v. 10). If the promised animal was unclean, then redemption of it would require one-fifth more added to its value (vv. 11–13). The uncleanness could be considered a legitimate desecration. In a sense, this law motivated the Israelites to be like the Lord, who makes and fulfills His promises (cf. Acts 5:1–11).

27:14–29. Houses, Fields, and Some Restrictions. The price for a house that had been dedicated to the Lord, in the sense of giving it to the sanctuary, was established by the priest (v. 14). To redeem the house, those who made the vow would need to add one-fifth to its price (v. 15). Concerning fields dedicated to the Lord, the priest assessed its value on the basis of the amount of seed planted in it (v. 16). Its value was determined by taking into consideration the time left until the year of Jubilee. The redemption of the field required adding one-fifth to its value. The case mentioned in vv. 20–21 is puzzling, but it appears to refer, as suggested by some, to a person who, after selling a field and not redeeming it, decided to dedicate it to the Lord. In this case, the field would not return to the original owner in the year of Jubilee but would become the property of the sanctuary (kherem, “totally devoted to God”). When a person dedicated to the Lord a field that he had bought (leased) and that at Jubilee would return to its original owner (vv. 22–25), the field was not redeemable, and in the year of Jubilee, it would revert to its owner.

All the firstborn of animals belonged to the Lord, and no one was to dedicate them to Him. The firstborn of unclean animals were redeemable. Those things or people totally devoted (kherem) to the Lord were not redeemable, for they were most holy (vv. 26–29). The term kherem designates what was permanently assigned to the tabernacle or to be destroyed. A person had to be legally declared kherem (the sense of the term being, in this case, one set apart for destruction) before he or she was killed (v. 29; cf. Num. 21:2–3; Deut. 13:13–16; 1 Sam. 15:3; see “The Extermination of the Canaanites,” p. 330, and “Holy Warfare,” p. 372).

27:30–33. Tithe. The last section of Leviticus 27 addresses the redemption of tithe and reveals some important details. It is probably discussed last because it was related to humans, the produce of land, and animals. First, the nature of tithe is clearly established: it is holy to the Lord (v. 30). Humans are not to consecrate it to Him because it is already His. Second, since it is holy and belongs to the Lord, humans are to return it to Him as instructed. A tenth of the produce of the land, from the seeds or the fruits, and from the herds or the flocks, of whatever passed under the rod of the shepherd, belonged to Him and was placed out of the reach of humans. Third, the tithe of the animals was not to be manipulated by exchanging the animals—in which case, both animals were to be declared holy. The animals passing under the rod belonged to the Lord, whether they were in good condition or not. If the person wanted to redeem the tithe—perhaps to retain more food or seeds—the person was to add one-fifth to the value of the produce or the animal.

Based on the reading of Leviticus 27, it can be assumed that the people of God had a generous spirit and would voluntarily consecrate some of their blessings to Him out of gratitude. By motivating them to bring donations and the tithe, the Lord was helping them overcome the deep darkness of selfishness that lodges in the human heart. We too should find ways in our own cultural settings to express our love and gratitude to God for His constant care for us, particularly for what He has done for us through Christ. The tithe is not so much an offering but a moral responsibility that involves returning to the Lord what is His (Mal. 3:10). Jesus did not abolish this expression of love but affirmed it (Matt. 23:23).

The book of Leviticus closes with a reminder to the readers that its contents are an expression of the will of the Lord. The story ends with Israel camping by Mount Sinai. The covenant had been established, the tabernacle had been erected and consecrated, the priests had been anointed, and the sacrificial system had been instituted. All that remained was to leave Sinai on a journey of hope.

NUMBERS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. Numbers is the fourth book of the Pentateuch. In the Hebrew Bible, the book is entitled bemidbar, “in the wilderness” or “in the desert.” This title is the translation of the fifth Hebrew word of the opening verse of the book—“And-the-Lord spoke to Moses in-the-wilderness” (1:1). The Greek translation (LXX) named the book Arithmoi, “Numbers,” which the Latin Vulgate rendered as Numeri, “Numbers.” The English title, “Numbers,” is the translation of either the Greek Arithmoi or the Latin Numeri. While the title “Numbers” highlights the two censuses recorded in chapters 1 and 26 of the book, the Hebrew title “in the wilderness” seems more appropriate because it indicates the location of the events reported in the book. It is thus a reminder of the many experiences the Israelites had with God during their journey toward the promised land. During the long journey, they felt disappointment and hope, but God ultimately managed to bring them home.

Traditionally, scholars have credited the composition of the Pentateuch, including the book of Numbers, to Moses. While many modern scholars question the Mosaic authorship of Numbers (see “Introduction to the Pentateuch,” p. 120), the following biblical elements indicate that Moses should be maintained as the author of the book.

(1) Numbers itself states that Moses recorded the stages of their journey (33:2), suggesting that Moses wrote at least portions of the book. While recording the itinerary of the journey, he also narrated events that took place in different sites. (2) The phrase “the Lord spoke to Moses,” which occurs over fifty times in the book and is recurrent in other books of the Pentateuch, indicates that Moses received communication from God that he wrote down. He did not write the book of Numbers in keeping with his own will, but, like other prophets and men of God, he wrote under divine inspiration (2 Pet. 1:21).

(3) The testimony of the NT points to Mosaic authorship by citing a number of events from Numbers associated with him (John 3:14; 6:31, cf. Num. 21:9; 11:7; 1 Cor. 10:5, 8–10, cf. Num. 26:65; 25:1, 9; 21:6; 14:36–37; Heb. 3:2, 11, 17, cf. Num. 12:7; 14:21–23, 36–37; Jude 5, 11, cf. Num. 14:29; 22:7; 16:1–2). These NT references imply that Jesus and the apostles Paul and Jude considered Moses to be the author of Numbers.

Date. The book of Numbers is part of a larger literary whole (the Pentateuch), produced during the fifteenth century B.C. Its contents indicate that it continues the story of the Exodus of the Israelites from Egypt. Its direct connection with the Exodus story implies that it was written during the fifteenth century B.C.

Backgrounds. The book of Numbers continues the story already begun in the book of Exodus. In their journey from Egypt, the Israelites reached Sinai, where they stayed temporarily (Ex. 19:1). The book first describes some features related to their stay in the desert of Sinai (1:1–10:10). It then focuses on the history of their wanderings in the wilderness from Sinai to the plains of Moab (10:11–22:1). It finally describes their sojourn in the plains of Moab, where they prepared to enter the promised land (22:2–36:1–13). The journey from the desert of Sinai to the plains of Moab took about thirty-eight years, during which the first generation of freed Israelites—those who came out of Egypt—died in the wilderness because of their unfaithfulness (26:63–65). When they were ready to enter Canaan, they doubted God’s promises. Their hope vanished, and therefore, they became wanderers in the wilderness. The new generation of Israelites, born in the wilderness, developed a strong bond of love with the Lord and believed that He would bring them into the promised land.

Theology and Purpose. The theme of Israel as the Lord's pilgrim people is a key motif in the book of Numbers. Numbers 33:1 states that the children of Israel went "out of the land of Egypt" in an orderly way. The terms tseba'ot ("armies"), tseba'o ("his army"), and tsaba' ("army" or "war") are altogether used more than fifty times in the book of Numbers in connection with the people of Israel. The image of an army is not used in Numbers to emphasize aggressive military action but to describe Israel as a well-organized group of pilgrims traveling under the leadership of the Lord in full commitment to Him and in opposition to the forces of evil that they will face during their journey. This image also serves to demonstrate that the people left Egypt victorious over the forces of Pharaoh.

1. God as Leader. In the description of Israel as the Lord's army, God is identified as the supreme leader of the people. He organized them after the censuses (1:1–46; 26:1–65) and gave instructions regarding leadership roles, camp layout, and marching formation (chaps. 2–4; 9:15–10:28). During their travels, God provided for their material, social, and spiritual needs and granted them shade, manna, quails, water (10:34; 11:6–7, 31–32; 20:2–13), security, and victory over the enemies they confronted (21:1–3, 21–35; 31:1–12). He blessed them with religious and social regulations and promised them the gift of the land (chaps. 27–30; 32–36). The headquarters of the Lord, His sanctuary, was placed in the center of the camp; He traveled with them. The terms 'ohel ("tent") and mishkan ("tabernacle") occur more than ninety times in Numbers and refer to the dwelling place of God (i.e., the sanctuary from where God guided and communicated with His people; 1:1; 7:89). God even acted as the Judge of His people and settled legal disputes from the sanctuary (5:11–22; 6:9–12; 8:19; 11:16–23; 12:1–15; 14:10–12; 16:16–35; 17:1–9).

2. Dedicated Pilgrims. The metaphor of an army on a pilgrimage implies total separation and dedication to God's purpose under His leadership. The multitude who left Egypt were constituted as a people on a journey to the promised land. The book highlights obedience and faithfulness to God, the supreme leader, as prerequisites for their success. It also warns about the consequences of disobedience—in this case, the exclusion of many Israelites, including key leaders (Moses, Aaron, and Miriam), from entering the promised land (26:63–65). The breaking of God's covenant distances sinners from the Lord and deprives them of God's covenant blessings. Perseverance in hope and faith should have made the journey meaningful and even enjoyable in the presence of the Lord.

3. The Threat of Rebellion. As God's people, the Israelites were to remain loyal and in submission to Him. Whenever the order established by the Lord was upset on account of the rebellion of some, God intervened in order to enable His people to fulfill His plan for them (11:1, 4–6, 32–33; 12:1–15; chaps. 13–14; cf. Gen. 12:1–3). Finally, following the journey from Sinai to Kadesh, up to the plains of Moab, the book of Numbers tells how God faithfully worked out His plan to bring His fainthearted people to the promised land. Like the former Israel, "the church of Christ, enfeebled and defective as it may be, is the only object on earth on which He bestows His supreme regard" (TM 15). Despite the challenges God's people face, there is hope that God will take care of them and bring them safely into the heavenly kingdom.

Literary Features. The book contains diverse literary features, including lists (chaps. 1, 26), poetry (6:24–26; 10:35; 21:14–18, 27–30; 24:17, 20–25), travel logs (chap. 33), historical narratives, and legal material, which are sometimes interwoven. The structure of the book is difficult to delineate. However, most commentators seem to view the book as structured around the three major geographic locations or the two censuses. The first structure divides the book into three parts: (1) stay at Sinai (1:1–10:10), (2) wandering around Kadesh (10:11–20:21), and (3) journey from Kadesh to the plains of Moab (20:22–36:13). The second structure splits the book into two sections: (1) death of the old and rebellious generation in the wilderness (1:1–25:18) and (2) birth of the new generation (26:1–36:13). Although both are potential organizing structures, the first links Numbers to its preceding and following books, aligns well with the journey motif begun already in the call of Abram (Gen. 12:1–3), and fittingly portrays the larger picture of the book.

1:1—10:10

ISRAEL ENCAMPED AT SINAI

The first part of the book of Numbers (1:1–10:10) encompasses the organization of the people of Israel during their temporary stay at Sinai in preparation for the next step of their journey, which culminated in the conquest of the land of Canaan. The organization focused on various aspects, such as numbering of people, structuring the encampment and marching formation, and assigning tasks (1:1—4:49). We also find some legal material (5:1—6:27), matters related to the sanctuary (7:1—8:26), instructions concerning the Passover, a description of the cloud as divine guidance (9:17–23), and directions for the creation and function of the silver trumpets (9:1—10:10). The emphasis on organization was intended to unify God's people, shape their identity, and strengthen their relationship with God. Order and unity of action and purpose should always characterize God's people as they seek to participate in God's mission.

Numbering and Organization of Israel

Numbers 1–4 principally contains instructions concerning the census and the structure of the Israelite community during its sojourn in the wilderness. The section describes two censuses: (1) the general census of the children of Israel (except the tribe of Levi) and its purpose (chap. 1); and (2) the special census of the Levites, followed by an outline of their duties (chaps. 3–4). Between the two censuses, the author narrates how the Israelite community was organized around the sanctuary, which symbolized God's presence among them (chap. 2).

1:1–46. Numbering of Israel. The Lord spoke to Moses from the tabernacle/tent of meeting and ordered him to take a census of Israel (v. 2). The tabernacle/tent of meeting mentioned in the passage was a physical structure reflecting the model of the original sanctuary found in heaven (Ex. 25:8–9; 26:30; 35–40; Heb. 8:2, 5; 9:11; Rev. 4:5; 8:3; 11:19; see Exodus: Introduction). The earthly sanctuary served as God's headquarters from where He directed the affairs of His people (cf. 12:4–5). From there, He communicated with Moses from above the ark of the covenant/testimony (7:89). The census described in this section was commanded by the Lord, the supreme ruler of the people of Israel (1:1–2). In the ANE context, kings generally ordered a census to confirm their authority over the people being numbered. The census data also served to meet military, economic, religious, and political goals.

In the case of Israel, the census was used for conscripting men for military and religious service (1:3; 3:1–39; 1 Chr. 23:1–5), allotting land in Canaan (Num. 26), assigning specific tasks (2 Chr. 2:17–18), and on occasion, strengthening a person's relationship with the Lord (Ex. 30:11–16). In the specific context of Numbers 1, the census was primarily held for a military purpose (1:2–3). The conquest of the Holy Land was a divine project, and the Israelites would accompany God as He fulfilled His purpose. The census revealed that God is indeed a God of order, as is indicated in the Creation account (Gen. 1) and here in the creation of a people through whom He would bless all the nations of the earth.

Moreover, the census could be seen as a confirmation of God's sovereignty over His people. It assumed the willingness of a people who had been redeemed from Egypt to embrace the divine plan and cooperate with God in its realization, with the knowledge that in the process, He would take care of them. They were to rely on Him as their King and Leader. This is also seen in the Eschaton. Revelation 7 provides numbers for the Israel of faith, represented by a unique list of the twelve tribes of Israel. They bear on their foreheads "the seal of the living God" (Rev. 7:3), belonging to Him, and He has made them victorious through the blood of the Lamb (12:11). They too ally themselves with the King of kings, support His plan, and anticipate His victory over rebellious powers.

The census of Numbers 1 is also useful in terms of the leadership principles it contains (e.g., planning, delegation, and the involvement of the youth). The text indicates that Moses counted people according to their families, as well as each individual male (1:2). He also chose assistants to help him conduct the census (1:1–17). These assistants were referred to as called or chosen, which can imply that they were recognized as respected, eminent, and able leaders (v. 16). The age criterion for the census was twenty years old and above (v. 3). The expression "twenty years old and above" is repeated fifteen times to identify who was eligible to go to war. The narrative suggests that accurate recording of statistical reports, delegation of authority, and the inclusion of youth in God's work should be important to the people of God. Numbers 1:46 indicates that the total number of those who were counted was 603,550. This large number is considered problematic by many people, but it is not necessarily so (see Ex. 12:31–42; see "The Number of Israelites Who Left Egypt," p. 210).

1:47–54. Levites Appointed over the Tabernacle. Levites constituted a special group that was not counted in the military census (1:46–49).

Their census is recorded in Numbers 3. Their exclusion from the census in chapter 1 is related to the sacred task assigned to them. The Levites were appointed by the Lord for the care and transportation of the tabernacle (1:50–51, 53); hence, their role was somewhat different from that of other Israelites. They were set apart to protect the sanctuary and, if necessary, to kill unauthorized persons who attempted to enter illegally (1:51). They were in charge of the security of God's holy headquarters. The details of the duties of the Levites are elaborated in chapters 3–4. However, one aspect can be highlighted here: the Levites were set apart to minister in the sanctuary so that God's wrath would not fall on the congregation (1:50, 53). The verb sharat ("to minister"), applied to the Levites (1:50), is the same term used for God's angels or the heavenly host (Ps. 103:21) and designates a special type of service that a subordinate renders to a superior. Intriguingly, the Hebrew term is also used to describe the unique relationship between Joshua and Moses (Ex. 24:13; 33:11; Num. 11:28; Josh. 1:1). This kind of service was not restricted to military or guard duties, however. The word may indicate that because the Levites took care of the sanctuary—the symbol of God's presence—they bore a great responsibility as God's official representatives before the people. Serving as guards, placed around the sanctuary to prevent all unauthorized individuals from accessing it, the Levites were protecting the people from God's wrath (v. 53). Numbers 1 closes by stating that the Israelites followed the Lord's instructions given through Moses (v. 54). The revelation of God's will for His people should always lead them to humble and grateful submission to Him.

2:1–34. Camps and Leaders of the Tribes.

Numbers 2 describes how the tribes of Israel were organized with respect to each other and around the sanctuary. They formed a square or rectangular camp, with three tribes on each side. Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun took positions on the east, where the entrance to the sanctuary was located; Reuben, Simeon, and Gad on the south; Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin on the west; and Dan, Asher, and Naphtali on the north. On the east side, the tribe of Judah took the lead and broke camp first; to the south, it was the tribe of Reuben, and this group set out second; then on the west side, it was the tribe of Ephraim that led, breaking camp third; and finally, to the north, the tribe of Dan took preeminence and set out last. The tribe of Levi was placed around the sanctuary (2:17) as a military guard to protect its holiness. Chapters 3 and 4 provide more details about their position and function.

The structure of the camp probably reflected the status of each tribe. Judah took the first position and thus replaced Reuben, the firstborn. This change was based on what the patriarch Jacob had foretold in Genesis 49:2–4 and 8–11. It is encouraging to know that Reuben was not excluded from God's people. God always seeks to keep His children close to Him. The arrangement of the Israelite camp reflected order and unity. It also indicates the place of God in the life of the Israelite community. Each tribe was related to the nearer tribes, and thus, all the tribes were tied together as one body. Each tribe was part of the larger whole (i.e., God's community). Tribes were interdependent and all depended on God, whose presence was evidenced by the sanctuary stationed in the middle of the camp. Without the Lord dwelling in their midst, they could not be a united community. His presence was at the center of all aspects of their lives. A similar idea is found in Revelation 21 in the description of the new Jerusalem. The city is without a temple because "the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb" dwell among their creation (v. 22). While believers still expect the future fulfillment of this marvelous event, they can now experience it by allowing Immanuel, Jesus Christ, to be at the center of their lives as individuals and as a community of faith.

3:1–39. Duties of the Levites. While Numbers 1–2 centers mainly on the survey and organization of the twelve tribes in the camp, Numbers 3–4 focuses on the same activities specifically in regard to the tribe of Levi. This section (3:1–39) describes the anointing of the sons of Aaron for the priesthood (vv. 2–4), the duties of the Levites (vv. 5–10), and the numbering of the three Levite clans (vv. 14–39).

The priests and Levites were both descendants of Levi, the third son of Jacob (Gen. 29:34). The sons of Levi were Gershom, Kohath, and Merari (Gen. 46:11; Ex. 6:16). Aaron and Moses were descendants of Kohath (Ex. 6:16–20; 1 Chr. 6:2–3), and the priests were descendants of Aaron. They were given the exclusive task of offering sacrifices and presiding over the performance of sacred rituals in the sanctuary (Num. 4:5–15; 18:1–32). The other descendants of Levi formed the group of Levites who assisted the priests. Their major roles consisted of guarding, tending, transporting, and performing other holy activities for the sanctuary (Num. 3:21–37; 4:4–14; 1 Chr. 9:26–32; 15:16; 24:6; 26:29; 2 Chr. 23:7; Ezek. 44:11).

The censuses in Numbers 3:14–39 and 4:34–49 are mainly connected to religious service. Levites were to serve the community at the sanctuary, as well as protect, disassemble, transport, and reassemble the sanctuary during the journey to the promised land (1:50–51, 3:6–10). Each Levitical family had a specific task to perform in regard to the sanctuary (3:21–38) under the leadership of Aaron and his sons (3:9). This implies that the work of the Levites was carefully organized. The sanctuary was not primarily a public gathering place but the holy residence of God. It was a place where God's representatives (i.e., the priests) met with Him in order to mediate between God and His people. Moreover, the order to restrict unauthorized access to the sanctuary suggested that the holy presence of God should be strictly revered. Reverence or respect should always be a significant part of the worship of the Holy God. At the same time, the focus upon God's holiness was not intended to keep other Israelites away from the sanctuary. Instead, God's presence represented a constant invitation to worship and draw close to the Lord who had brought Israel out of Egypt with a "mighty hand and an outstretched arm" (Deut. 4:34). Grace, forgiveness, and hope were important elements of the sacrificial ritual of the sanctuary.

3:40–51. Levites and the Redemption of the Firstborn. As a separated group, the Levites also played the role of representing the rest of the Israelites before God. According to vv. 11–13 and 40–51, they substituted for all the firstborn of the Israelites. This substitution was related to the fact that during the Passover in Egypt, the Lord preserved the lives of the firstborn of the Israelites. From then on, they belonged to God (Ex. 13:2; 22:29; Lev. 27:26), and it seems that His plan was to appoint them to His service in the sanctuary.

At this point, however, the Levites were "wholly given" to God in place of all the firstborn of Israel in order to work on behalf of the Israelites in the sanctuary and to make atonement for them (Num. 3:7–8; 8:16, 19). In addition, the Lord required the Israelites to give Him all the firstborn of their animals and the first of their ripe produce (Ex. 13:2, 12; 22:29–30). The firstborn could be either sacrificed or redeemed. Hence, clean animals were sacrificed while unclean animals and humans were redeemed (Lev. 27:1–29; Num. 18:15). The firstborn could be considered the best or ideal gift that one could offer to God in recognition of His ownership of everything. As firstborn, the Levites were considered a precious gift to God, expected to serve Him wholeheartedly.

The text indicates that the total number of Israelites' firstborn was 22,273 (3:43). Out of this number, the Lord took 22,000 Levites as His own. The Lord commanded that the remaining 273 Levites should be ransomed with a payment of five shekels each. This money was to be given to Aaron and his sons (v. 48). The ransom money is twice referred to as "the sanctuary shekel" (vv. 47, 50). Since coins were not invented until the Persian period, the reference to shekel here is as a unit of weight used in payment or valuation. The weight and value of the shekel varied somewhat, according to time and place. The shekel of the sanctuary seems to have weighed more than the one used in the marketplace. The people could compare the value of the market shekel with that of the sanctuary shekel in order to pay an honest amount to God's treasury. Levites themselves could not debase it and were able to check if the offering had the required value. Five shekels could equate to about half a year's wages. The text does not reveal how the amount was used, but one may infer that it was devoted to God's work.

4:1–49. Tasks Assigned to the Levites. Numbers 4 returns to the census of the Levites and their duties. This census was a record of those who would do the work of the sanctuary (4:3, 23, 30, 35). As indicated, some of their responsibilities involved taking down and setting up the sanctuary, as well as its transportation. Moses numbered the Levites according to their assigned tasks and the items they were assigned to carry (4:49).

When the Israelites moved from one site to another, they bore the sanctuary with them. It was carefully dismantled by Aaron and his sons, not by the Levites (vv. 5, 15, cf., 1:51). The Levites were responsible for the transportation of tabernacle and furniture. Aaron and his sons disassembled the tabernacle, beginning with the veil (v. 5), moving from the Most Holy Place to the other parts of the tabernacle. The veil referred to in v. 5 separated the holy from the Most Holy Place of the tabernacle. The screen that was at the entrance of the tabernacle was carried by the Gershonites instead of the Kohathites, who were appointed specifically to carry items related to the Most Holy Place (3:25; 4:4–5). The holiness of the tabernacle needed to be protected, even during its disassembly.

After dismantling the tabernacle, Aaron and his sons packed the items and covered them (v. 15). The ark of the covenant was the first item to be covered (v. 5). Even Kohathite Levites were not allowed to touch or see the holy items while being packed (vv. 15, 20). Their duty was limited to transportation (v. 15). The Levites served between the ages of thirty and fifty (vv. 3, 23, 30, 35, 39, 43, 47; i.e., about twenty years of service). Numbers 8:23-26 brings the entire period of service to twenty-five years by stating that the Levites were to begin their work at the age of twenty-five. It is unclear whether the Levites began their service at thirty or twenty-five. A possible solution to this question is that they entered the service at twenty-five as apprentices, and at thirty, they were adequately skilled to carry out their official functions.

The text insists that Levites from thirty to fifty could enter into the work (vv. 3, 23, 30, 35, 39, 43, 47). The Hebrew term used here (latsaba ' suggests "warfare" or "army service." The Levitical service was equivalent to military service. Members were to be physically fit in order to fight and protect the tabernacle from trespassers (1:51, 53). The Levites were assigned to their roles based on the families of the three sons of Levi (3:17; 4:2, 22, 29). The Lord appointed the sons of Kohath (one of the three sons of Levi) for special duty (i.e., the transportation of articles related to the Most Holy Place of the tabernacle; 4:4, 15). The Kohathites were to carry their load on their shoulders (7:9) as indicated by the fact that poles were inserted into rings attached to the side of most of the holy furniture (4:6, 8, 11, 14). The sons of Gershom and Merari were given wagons for their duty because their load was heavier than that of the Kohathites (7:7-8).

5:1-6:27

Special Legislation

In the previous chapters, the emphasis is on the structure of the Israelite community. In the current section, the focus is on laws related to health and the social, moral, and religious lives of the Israelites. During their journey in the wilderness and at the time of their settlement in the promised land, God's people were to remember that the Holy God was living in their midst. Therefore, their camp was to be devoid of impurity (5:1-4); restitution was to be made in case of fraud (5:5-10); and cases of marital unfaithfulness were to be settled before God (5:11-31). People—other than Levites—were encouraged to dedicate themselves to God's service (6:1-21), and the priests were to bless God's people (6:22-27). All these instructions were intended to enhance the relationship between God and His people. The principles expressed in these laws are still valid today because they have the power to enhance the lives of God's people.

5:1-4. Unclean Persons Sent outside the Camp. This section is part of a series of three prescriptions recorded in Numbers 5 concerning the preservation of purity in the Israelite community. Numbers 5:1-4 concerns the Israelites who became unclean because they had an infectious skin disease (perhaps leprosy or a similar skin disease), any kind of bodily discharge (particularly emission from sexual organs due to some disease or other reason), or contact with a dead body. These instructions were based on the legislation found in Leviticus 13-15. The two passages are complementary. While Leviticus focuses on the exclusion of unclean persons from the tabernacle to avoid illegal contact with God's dwelling place (Lev. 15:31), Numbers emphasizes their exclusion from the camp (Num. 5:3) to avoid contamination through touch.

The text indicates that people who were affected by one of these three impurities were sent outside the camp so that "they may not defile" it because the Lord was dwelling there among them (v. 3). While it is true that a hygienic aspect is underlined in Numbers 5:1-4, holiness is its major focus (see "Health and Hygiene in Leviticus," p. 272). Preventing the spread of disease among the vast multitude of Israelites living in the camp was imperative (as instances of large and densely populated refugee camps have confirmed). However, God desires purity that goes beyond hygiene (i.e., spiritual purity that enhances the quality of one's relationship with Him and with others). Besides, the impurities described in Numbers 5:1-4, like those in Leviticus, have in common the element of death. Death/the unclean and God/the Holy One are incompatible. Consequently, unclean individuals were removed from the community. By removing the unclean from the camp (v. 4), the Israelites rejected death and clung to life (see Leviticus: Introduction). The Israelites complied with this law throughout their sojourn in the wilderness.

God is interested in both the physical and spiritual well-being of His children. The call is to live a holy life before the Lord (cf. 1 Thess. 5:23). Those who look forward to a condition of absolute freedom from spiritual and moral uncleanness, to be consummated at the return of the Lord, will seek true spiritual health without disregarding physical health (3 John 2).

5:5–10. Restitution for Wrongs. This second regulation is a supplement to Leviticus 6:1–7 and addresses Israelites who wronged others by robbery or fraud and then denied it under oath. Scholars have suggested that the verb ma'al—“to be unfaithful” against God—designates a sacrilege that, in some cases, refers to the violation of an oath taken in the name of the Lord. The parallel with Leviticus indicates that here it means the violation of an oath. This was a case of willful sin, and consequently, the wrongdoer was to confess his or her sin and make restitution to the one to whom the wrong was done in order to restore peace/wholeness in the camp (v. 7). Since this was not only a sin against others but also against the Lord, a guilt/reparation offering was required to atone for the sin committed (v. 8; see Lev. 6:1–7). What was new in this law was that it legislated what should be done when no kinsman was available to receive the restitution; it was to be given to the Lord, who assigned it to the priest (v. 8). This decree was likely meant to encourage honesty in all exchanges. But beyond that, it inspired the offender to repent by pointing to God’s willingness to forgive sins, even intentional ones. Addition or clarification to already established law can be found repeatedly in Numbers (cf. Num. 27:1–11 and the case of Zelophehad’s daughters). In Numbers, God’s law was applied to day-to-day issues faced in the Israelite camp, which, at times, raised new questions.

5:11–31. Ritual of Jealousy. This legislation focused on the procedure to be undertaken when a husband suspected his wife of adultery. If she had been unfaithful, the alleged adulterer would have been defiled (vv. 12–14, 19–20, 27–29). Such uncleanness would have polluted the moral, physical, and social life of the Israelite community. This was a serious threat that needed to be addressed by God Himself (vv. 16, 18, 21, 30). Ancient people used a variety of tests to resolve similar issues. Practices used by other cultures included throwing the accused in the river or making the accused drink a potion, retrieve a given item from boiling liquid, or touch, lick, walk upon, or carry a red-hot object. Today, in some parts of the world, women are still stoned to death if adultery is suspected. Contrary to other ANE people, to solve the issue of alleged marital unfaithfulness, the Israelites used a ritual that involved drinking water. This Israelite ritual was not a life-threatening ordeal like those practiced by the nations surrounding Israel (see “A Woman Suspected of Adultery,” p. 289).

6:1–21. Nazirite Law. The Nazirite law can be divided into four parts: (1) forbidden activities (vv. 1–8), (2) responses to defilement (vv. 9–12), (3) the ritual marking the end of the vow (vv. 13–20), and (4) a concluding statement (v. 21). The term “Nazirite” is related to the Hebrew verb nazar, “to separate,” which implies “to keep oneself away from” or “separated for,” in the sense of consecration. Therefore, a Nazirite (male or female; v. 2) was a person who consecrated a specific length of time for a particular service to the Lord.

Although the priests and Levites were set apart in a very special way for God’s work, all Israelites had the opportunity to voluntarily dedicate themselves to God as a Nazirite. In this case, they separated themselves from common affairs and were consecrated to God’s service for a specific period. Like the priests and Levites, Nazirites were not allowed to drink wine, touch a corpse, or shave their heads (6:1–8; Lev. 10:9; 21:5, 11). Nazirites were common Israelites who were granted a status similar to that of a priest, particularly since they were entirely consecrated to the Lord, in some cases for life (e.g., Samuel; 1 Sam 1:11). The Nazirite was not to break the vow (vv. 9–12). If the vow were involuntarily broken, a purification ritual was performed. The ritual required shaving the individual’s head (v. 9) and offering two turtledoves, one for a burnt offering and the other for a sin offering, to remove ritual contamination (vv. 10–11). Since the Nazirite’s consecration was defiled, a guilt offering was also required (v. 11; see Lev. 5:5–6). At the end of the Nazirite period, the individual’s hair was to be shaved and burned as an offering to God (vv. 18–19). In this particular case, long hair was considered a visible symbol of the consecration of the Nazirite to the Lord (v. 7).

The offerings required at the end of the period of consecration include animals (vv. 14, 19); grain, bread, and oil (v. 15); and the hair of the Nazirite (v. 18). These were to be offered as a burnt offering, sin offering, and peace/fellowship offering (v. 14; cf. Lev. 1–7). The burnt offering involved burning the entire sacrificial animal, and it was employed in a number of different types of ceremonies (Lev. 8:18–21; Ex. 29:15–18). In the context of the Nazirite law, the burnt offering represented the complete dedication of the Nazirite to the Lord. No reason is given here for bringing a sin/purification offering, but it could have been for any sin committed in ignorance during the period of the vow or because anyone who approached God was sinful and in need of atonement (Lev. 4:2–4; Num. 15:22–29). The peace/fellowship offering involved burning part of the sacrificial animal. The rest of the sacrifice was eaten by the priest and the person who brought the offering (Lev. 3:11; 7:14). It served to strengthen the offerer's covenant relationship with the Lord. Through this offering, the Nazirite expressed joy and gratitude to God.

The grain offerings (v. 15) were accessory to animal offerings (lamb, ram), as required in the Israelite sacrificial system (Lev. 2; Num. 15:2–12).

A Woman Suspected of Adultery

The legislation addressing a woman suspected of adultery is unique in biblical jurisprudence and sounds strange to modern readers. It would be useful to explore this passage more carefully in order to understand its intention.

1. Role of the Husband. This was a case of suspected marital infidelity, in which the husband's suspicions were motivated by jealousy (Num. 5:12–14). The legislation removed the case from the jurisdiction of the husband and placed it in the hands of the priest, as a spiritual leader of the people. This decision protected the wife from the physical and/or psychological abuse that a jealous husband could inflict on her. It was, therefore, beneficial to her. The husband was required to bring to the sanctuary a grain offering on behalf of his wife.

2. Role of the Priest and the Community. Since the husband did not have any evidence acceptable in a human court of law, his only recourse was to bring his wife to the priest (vv. 15). The priest was to set the accused woman before the Lord (vv. 16–26) and mix dust from the floor of the tabernacle with sacred water. He stood before the woman, placed the grain offering in her hand, and put her under an oath of innocence or guilt that spelled out the results of the ritual. He would then write the content of the oath on a scroll and symbolically scrape the words of oath into the bitter water. Next, he would take the grain offering from her hands and offer it to the Lord. Lastly, the woman would drink the water. The community did not take any action against her; it simply served as a witness to what the Lord would reveal. On account of their limitations, all human participants (the husband, the priest, and the community) withdrew themselves from the case and left it between the suspected wife and the Lord. She was in good hands.

3. Role of the Lord. The process was a search for truth unavailable to humans. In such situations, only the Lord could reveal whether the woman was innocent or guilty and restore harmony to the home and society (vv. 27–28). The offering was brought by the husband to the Lord on behalf of the wife as a prayer asking the Lord to reveal the truth. It was called an offering of jealousy or iniquity, to indicate the occasion and the mental condition of the husband (v. 15). Offering on her behalf meant that, if innocent, she would benefit from it through the blessings of God. While most ancient ordeals considered the accused guilty until the deity could prove otherwise, in this case, the accused was considered innocent unless God revealed otherwise. Thus, the ritual favored the accused woman. She would not be stigmatized by society after she was vindicated by the Lord.

4. Role of the Woman. The voice of the woman was heard only once—when, after listening to the oath of culpability or exculpation, she was asked by the priest to say “Amen” (v. 22). There were several reasons a woman might be willing to participate in this examination. First, it would bring to an end all accusations by her husband. Second, if innocent, she would be cleared not only before the Lord but also in public; she had witnesses. Third, if she were found guilty, the penalty would be infertility, and her husband would divorce her. This was severe but better than if she had been caught in the act of adultery—that would have resulted in the death penalty. It would appear that, overall, the law was indeed beneficial to the suspected adulterer, and it revealed God's concern for her.

The Nazirite's hair, which was burned along with the peace offering (v. 18), could also be considered an offering. Nazirites expressed their commitment to God by offering a portion of their property (animal and food) but also a portion of themselves. This reinforced the seriousness of the dedication of their lives to God.

It can be observed that through the Nazirite ritual, the Israelite community was encouraged to serve God voluntarily with all their hearts. Just as all Israelites (men and women) could take the Nazirite vow, all believers today are called to offer themselves as living sacrifices to God (Rom. 12:1). Voluntary service implies a high understanding of Christian responsibility.

6:22–27. Priestly Blessing. The legal portion of Numbers (chaps. 5–6) ends with a blessing. This section (6:22–27) is usually referred to as the “priestly blessing.” However, the text clearly indicates that the blessing comes from the Lord. In fact, the passage is introduced by the phrase “The Lord bless you” (v. 24) and ends with “I [the Lord] will bless them” (v. 27). The Lord is the ultimate source of blessing. The priest was merely the instrument mediating God’s blessing to His people. Hence, the act of blessing (6:24–27) was not related to any kind of magical activity.

The reading of vv. 24–27 indicates that the blessing of the Lord is associated with “keeping” those blessed by Him (v. 24). In v. 24, the Hebrew verb shamar, “to keep,” also means “to guard” or “to protect.” It can refer to protection from physical harm and any sort of evil (Ps. 91:11). Thus, the divine act of blessing and keeping implied that the Lord would make His people prosperous (physically and spiritually). This blessing highlights the graciousness of God and the peace that only He can grant to His people. Notice the parallel lines in vv. 25–26. The first and third lines both reference the Lord’s “face” or “countenance.” Then in the second and fourth lines, there is another parallel: “And be gracious to you,” “and give you peace.” When the Lord makes His face shine upon His people, He looks straight at them, regards them favorably, and bestows on them His grace and peace. The grace of the Lord connotes His saving acts that bring genuine peace and goodness to the receiver (Ps. 31:16; 44:3; 67:1–2; 80:3, 7; 89:15). By contrast, at times God hides His face, which refers to the removal of His protection and to desolation (Is. 64:6–7). Since the people had been blessed by the Lord, they bore His name (v. 27); they belonged to Him. The name of God refers to His character, which is here revealed in the blessing that constituted them as His people. God’s blessed people are called to live holy lives that honor the Lord and are characterized by dependence on Him (Deut. 8:17–18).

7:1—8:26

Offerings, Lamps, and the Ordination of Levites

The current section records the tasks required for establishing the sanctuary services. This preparation at Sinai included offerings for the sanctuary (7:1–88), the setting of the lamps (7:89–8:4), and the ordination of the Levites (8:5–26). All these aspects were intended to foster a deep relationship between God and the people of Israel.

7:1–88. Offerings for the Sanctuary. The offerings described in this section are preceded by the anointing of the tabernacle and its furniture, especially the altar (vv. 1, 10, 84). The anointing functioned as an act of dedication. The tabernacle was set apart as a holy place from where the Lord revealed His will to the people. There they were drawn near to God through a variety of rituals. In addition, the text indicates that twelve princes, who were representatives of the Israelite community, brought offerings for twelve days—one prince each day (vv. 2–83).

The offerings for the sanctuary were divided into two categories. The first was comprised of offerings related to transportation—six wagons and twelve oxen in all (vv. 1–9). The Lord accepted these offerings and ordered that they should be given to the Levites who were to use them for the tabernacle service (vv. 5–8). They were to be used for the transportation of the sanctuary furnishings and materials, except for those items that were to be carried on the shoulders of the Kohath Levites (v. 9). The second category of offerings consisted of articles needed for worship—utensils, fine flour mixed with oil, incense, and animals (vv. 10–83). These offerings, which were contributions to support God’s work, were brought by the leaders of the Israelite tribes (v. 2). The donations encouraged generosity and commitment among God’s people. Through these offerings, the Israelites wholeheartedly dedicated themselves and their possessions to the Lord. The contributions were expensive. They included articles made of silver and gold, and there were also important plant products and animals (bulls, rams, lambs, goats) for the sacrifices. Although the individual contributions were similar, each leader brought his donation on a specific day, and record was made of every single offering. Individually and collectively, all children of God are responsible for doing His work.

All of this was done in the context of preparation for the next step of the journey, which would culminate in reaching the land of Canaan. The donations brought by the community demonstrate the depth of their motivation to fulfill God's mission. Taking the dedication of the Israelites as an example, God's people today are encouraged to use their resources for God's work. They are called to give their best in order to advance the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 16:1–4; 2 Cor. 8–9).

7:89—8:4. Arrangement of the Lamps. Before the lighting of the lamps, the Lord spoke to Moses inside the tabernacle from above the ark of the covenant (7:89; Ex. 25:22), commanding him to tell Aaron to set up the lamps so that they might give light (8:1–3). Thus, the sanctuary was inaugurated. The main purpose of the lamps was not only to illuminate the tabernacle but also to symbolize the light of God through Christ that illumines every human being (John 1:9; 8:12), as well as the knowledge or spiritual enlightenment that comes from the Holy Spirit (Zech. 4:1–14; Acts 2:1–4; Rev. 1:4; 4:5). The lighting of the lamps was one of the key daily activities in the tabernacle. The Lord ordered that the lamps should be kept burning continually (Ex. 27:20–21; Lev. 24:2–4). Therefore, they were to be maintained efficiently every day.

8:5–26. Ordination of the Levites. This portion can be divided into two parts: the cleansing of the Levites for service (vv. 5–22) and the age of Levitical service (vv. 23–26). The dedication of the tabernacle was followed by the consecration of those who should work in the sanctuary. The Levites were consecrated to serve in the sanctuary (vv. 6, 11) and were dedicated to the Lord as a wave offering (vv. 11, 13, 15, 21; see Lev. 7:30). They were taken from the community and were wholly dedicated to God as a living sacrifice. In their work in the sanctuary, they represented the people of God (Num. 8:19). Since the Levites were dedicated to God in place of the Israelites' firstborn, they, in a sense, became a permanent reminder of the deliverance God performed on behalf of the firstborn of Israel in Egypt (vv. 17–19).

Further, the Levites also reminded Israel of its identity as God's firstborn (Ex. 4:22–23). As such, the people were expected to obey the Lord and to serve the nations as a kingdom of priests (Ex. 19:5–6). The apostle Peter alluded to this passage when he referred to God's church as a chosen people, a royal priesthood, and a holy nation (1 Pet. 2:9).

The consecration of the Levites included physical and spiritual cleansing (vv. 6–12) and the laying on of hands (v. 10). The laying on of hands in this passage expresses the idea of substitution: they were dedicated to God in place of the firstborn of the people of Israel (8:9–19). The ritual also emphasized the need for the removal of uncleanness from the Levites. They were to avoid any kind of ritual or moral defilement. As to the age of Levitical service, as already indicated, the Levites were to start their service at the age of twenty-five (v. 24) or thirty (see chap. 4) and retire at the age of fifty (v. 25).

9:1—10:10

Passover Regulations, the Cloud, and the Trumpets

As the departure from Sinai drew near, the Israelites celebrated the Passover (9:1–14), and the symbols of divine guidance were set in place (9:14–10:10).

9:1–14. Passover Regulations. The initial Passover served as a prelude to the departure of the Israelites from Egypt (Ex. 12). This second Passover was a prelude to the departure from the wilderness of Sinai, where the Israelites had stayed temporarily. It was celebrated at the appointed time, as required by the Lord (vv. 3–5). On this occasion, the Lord gave Israel additional regulations about its celebration. He specified two reasons for which someone could be exempt from celebrating the Passover at the regular appointed time. People defiled by a human corpse and those who were away on a distant journey were allowed to postpone the celebration (vv. 6–12). The Lord forbade defiled persons from partaking of His sacrifice. Whoever neglected this instruction was to be cut off from the people and thus assumed responsibility for the sin committed (v. 13; 15:30–31; see commentary on Lev. 7:11–21); no atoning sacrifice was available to such persons. Therefore, since anyone who touched a dead body remained unclean for seven days (Num. 19:11), the unclean people mentioned in the passage could not celebrate the Passover at the regular appointed time. They needed to be purified first and then celebrate the Passover later, as required by the Lord.

The Passover celebration was a reminder of Israel's redemption from Egypt and its beginning as a nation (Ex. 12:27). In a particular way, the Passover celebration of Numbers 9 reminded Israel that the Lord was still working out His plan to bring them into the land He had promised to them (Ex. 12:25). Hence, the Israelites started their journey from Sinai with confidence and hope. In addition to those who were Israelites by birth, the “sojourners” or “strangers” (that is, those who were non-Israelites by birth but committed to the Israelite faith and practice) were also allowed to celebrate the Passover (v. 14). God’s blessings are not a matter of birth (Acts 10:34–35).

9:15–23. Cloud of Guidance. As the Lord was preparing His people for the next step of the journey, He provided the cloud as a means of guidance and as a sign of His presence. When the Israelites departed from Egypt, after the first Passover, the Lord went before them by day in a pillar of cloud, to lead the way, and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light (Ex. 13:21). In Numbers 9:15, the appearance of the cloud on the tabernacle was a clear prelude to the coming journey. It reminded the Israelites that the Lord would continue to lead them toward the promised land. Moreover, the cloud indicated that God was dwelling in the tabernacle (Ex. 40:36–38). When the cloud rose from the tabernacle, the people marched, and when it settled, they encamped (Num. 9:17). No human being could predict or manipulate the movement of the cloud. The Lord alone was leading His people. The Lord’s command is mentioned seven times in relation to the cloud (9:18 [x2]; 9:20 [x2]; 9:23 [x3]) to emphasize that not the cloud but the Lord Himself was the Leader of the pilgrimage. At His command, the people were to obey and act accordingly. In the Christian journey, it is important that believers fix their eyes upon Jesus—the author and finisher of their faith—by laying aside every sin that easily ensnares them. The promise of the pillar of cloud for Israel is similar to the NT promise of the Spirit for the church—God is present with His people, even until the end of the world (Matt. 28:20).

10:1–10. Silver Trumpets. The current passage ends the preparatory section. The silver trumpets were a supplementary means of guidance and communication. Although the people could see the cloud (Ex. 40:38), they needed an audible signal to commence or cease the march. These trumpets gave special signals, which the people understood and which directed their movements. The silver trumpets were used for different purposes: to summon the congregation to the door of the tent of meeting (vv. 3, 7), to call the tribal leaders to Moses (v. 4), to signal the breaking of camp and the beginning of the march (vv. 5–6), and to prepare the people for war or for the celebration of festivals (vv. 9–10). Trumpets facilitated clarity in communication as well as order and unity, characteristics God seeks among His people. God was and continues to be a God of order (cf. 1 Cor. 14:8–19, 33).

The text indicates that the silver trumpets were sounded during war so that the Lord would remember His people (i.e., “care for and attend to them”; cf. Gen. 8:1; 30:22; Ex. 2:24) and save them from their enemies (v. 9). The blowing of the trumpets could be considered a prayer offered to God for deliverance or a call to God to bring judgment on the enemies of His people. Similarly, Israel was encouraged to blow the trumpets to express joyful gratitude to God, as well as to mark religious festivals and sacred times (v. 10). The trumpets became a means to express dependency on God when threatened by enemies (vv. 9–10). This reinforced the people’s confidence and hope in God’s plan and in His power to fulfill His promises.

FROM SINAI TO KADESH

After the long preparatory stay at Sinai, the time came for God’s people to continue the journey. They were expected to trust and submit to God as their effective leader. The journey from Sinai began on a note of obedience: when the cloud lifted up from above the tabernacle, the children of Israel departed (10:11–12). The text indicates that they followed the Lord’s command given through Moses (10:13), but as the narrative develops, obedient Israel quickly became rebellious Israel (chaps. 11–20). Israel’s rebellion highlights two important aspects: God’s faithfulness and the tragic consequences of disobedience. Despite their insubordination, the Lord would fulfill His promises. He punished the rebellious generation and raised a new one willing to follow Him into Canaan.

Initiation of the Journey

The current section marks the beginning of the second phase of Israel’s journey toward the promised land. It focuses on the obedience of Israel (vv. 11–28), the request Moses made to Hobab (vv. 29–32), and the attention given to the ark during the journey (vv. 33–36).

10:11–28. Obedient Israel. The children of Israel started their journey at the command of the Lord (v. 13). They marched according to their military subdivisions (vv. 14–28), following the directions given in Numbers 2 and 4. God's people were on the move. Order and discipline are not enemies to spirituality. God values obedience (see 1 Sam. 15:22; Is. 1:11–19) as an expression of a mature relationship with Him, not as mechanical submission to mere regulations.

10:29–32. Moses's Request to Hobab. During the journey, Moses asked Hobab to continue the journey with them and assured him that God would bless him. Thanks to his extensive knowledge of the wilderness, Hobab, Moses's brother-in-law, had been of valuable service to the Israelites. Moses held that Hobab's assistance was still needed. At first, Hobab declined the invitation (v. 30). However, it seems that he eventually agreed because his descendants were later found living in Canaan and sharing the land along with the Israelites (Judg. 1:16).

Moses's request to Hobab begs the question why additional human aid was needed when the Lord was leading the people by means of the cloud and through direct communication. Hobab's assistance indicates that the Lord accomplishes his plans not only in unique and miraculous ways but also with the assistance of human beings. In the Exodus account, God used Moses, Aaron, and other people, as well as the cloud, trumpets, and the ark of the covenant. The role of the cloud did not prevent the Israelites from thinking logically and putting their faith in action in order to work out the details of the journey (e.g., the encampment and its related aspects). Human beings worked in cooperation with God. Like Moses, current leaders of God's people should recognize and collaborate with valuable human resources that can advance the work of God.

10:33–36. The Role of the Ark. When the journey began, the ark of the covenant moved before the people (v. 33). The Levites were appointed to carry it. The ark and the cloud were not magical elements but physical things that the Lord used as symbols of His presence among His people. At a later time, some Israelites thought they could manipulate God's power through the ark, but their effort proved disastrous because God is not compelled by human schemes (1 Sam. 4).

The reference to the ark of the covenant of the Lord preceding the people (v. 33) seems puzzling at first because of previous instructions to transport the sanctuary in the midst of the army (2:9–17; 10:11–21). Numbers 10:14 indicates that at the departure from Sinai, the tribe of Judah advanced first (cf. 2:9). Other tribes followed, along with some of the Levites (the sons of Gershon and Merari) carrying the tabernacle (i.e., its furniture, except the articles from the Most Holy Place; Num. 10:17; cf. 4:4, 15). Then came the Kohathite Levites carrying the holy things (10:21). The Gershon and Merari Levites preceded the Kohathites to facilitate the erection of the tabernacle before the arrival of the holy articles (v. 21). But there is a compelling solution to the puzzle: the Kohathites who followed the Gershon and Merari Levites did not carry the ark (10:21 does not specifically mention it) but rather left it for other Kohathites to carry out in front of the people (as is implied by vv. 35–36; see PP 375). The invocation of vv. 35–36 was an expression of absolute confidence in God's power to overcome the enemies of His people.

11:1—14:45

Rebellion and Its Suppression

This section introduces the struggle between God and Israel in the wilderness. The obedient and confident army of pilgrims (10:11–28) became insubordinate and discouraged. After three days' journey (10:33), the Israelites began to lose confidence in God's leadership, and eventually, the condition of their hearts became fully visible in their rebellion against God. As a result of disaffection, treason, and unfaithfulness to God's covenant, their entrance into Canaan was delayed for forty years (14:34). The rebellion developed slowly, with seven compounding complaints: misfortunes (11:1–3), food (11:4–35), Moses's leadership (12:1–16), the conditions in the promised land (13:1–14:45), Moses and Aaron's leadership (16:1–17:13), water (20:1–13), and further misfortunes (21:4–9). The grumbling escalated gradually from concerns about basic physical needs and expanded to social issues (leadership crises), finally culminating in deep spiritual trepidation (doubt about God's plan to bring Israel into Canaan). The ultimate origin of their complaints was distrust in God and rejection of His leadership (11:20). The Lord handled the multiple rebellions with much care.

11:1–3. Israel's Disaffection. This first complaint stirred up God's wrath, which was manifested in a burning fire (v. 1). Thanks to Moses's prayer of intercession, the fire ceased (v. 2).

The text does not mention the specific complaint. Apparently, this was a general objection to the hardships of life in the wilderness. Maybe the Israelites expected a short trip free of difficulties. The Lord did not ignore this internal unfaithfulness. God takes the attitudes of His people seriously and responds to them. One of the worst enemies of God's people is the discouragement that arises from within. Endurance in tribulation and confidence in God's promises should be a daily aspiration. The Lord is leading and promises to be with His children, even when they walk through the darkest of times (Ps. 23:4; 33:19; 56:3; 147:3; cf. Matt. 28:20). He also declares that the one who endures to the end will be saved (Matt. 24:13).

11:4–35. Rebellion Related to Food. Contrary to the unspecified complaint of vv. 1–3, here the grievance is clear. The concern was about food. As with the former complaint, this one was followed by Moses's prayer and God's response. The people grumbled about their diet, but their words concealed a deeper concern. The text specifies that they desired the fish they ate in Egypt (i.e., their mind went back to the Egyptian diet; v. 5), in rejection of the manna provided by the Lord (v. 6). The Lord understood that their true issue was distrust in Him (v. 20).

Although the complainers mentioned some vegetables and other vegetarian delicacies that they enjoyed in Egypt (vv.4–5), their major concern involved meat, including fish, which is repeated seven times in the narrative (vv. 4, 13 [x2], 18 [x3], 21). Requesting fish in the wilderness was futile because there were no rivers or lakes. Acquiring fish would require a return to Egypt. They preferred bondage over the Lord's freedom if freedom meant living without fish. They had forgotten Egypt's oppression, and they dared to say that they had lived better in Egypt (v. 18). Testing God in this way, similar to the incident at Meribah (Ex. 17:1–7), was a clear sign of unbelief and disobedience that needed to be dealt with (Ps. 95:9–11). This was an act of high treason; a rejection of the authority of the supreme Leader. In a military setting, this represents a criminal act, which called for a severe penalty.

Moses as a man of prayer consulted his superior, the Lord (vv. 10–15). But his prayer was also a complaint in itself, for out of frustration, he went so far as to request that God take his life (v. 15). Moses complained about his many responsibilities, which he could no longer bear alone, and about his inability to provide meat to the grumbling Israelites. But the Lord reminded Moses that He was in charge of the situation (v. 23). He appointed seventy elders to assist Moses (vv. 24–30) and provided quail (vv. 31–32) to feed the people. Like the apostles at the Pentecost, the seventy elders received the Spirit in order to perform their ministry. The Spirit they received belonged to the Lord, not to Moses (vv. 25, 29). The Lord provided quail to meet the demand of the complainers, but He punished their rebellion with a severe plague (vv. 33). The Israelites were overly worried about their material needs and had lost confidence in God's leadership. What was needed was temperance and trust in the Lord, the One who is always able to provide (Deut. 8:3; Matt. 4:4). God's children should not be overcome with the worries of life (Luke 21:34) but should remain confident in God.

12:1–16. Insubordination of Miriam and Aaron.

The two earlier rebellions came from among the people while this one rose from among the leaders of the people. Miriam and Aaron, who were Moses's primary assistants (Mic. 6:4) as well as his own sister and brother, undermined his authority. Their grievance was twofold: (1) they were uncomfortable with Moses's marriage (v. 1), and (2) they objected to the unique relationship between Moses and God (v. 2). As in the preceding insurrection, Moses interceded for the errant leaders, and the Lord's response was swift (vv.13–16).

The text declares that Moses was a humble person (v. 3). The Hebrew word 'anaw ("bowed," "humble") denotes the state of someone who is in deep distress or need and humbly seeks help from God alone (Ps. 40:17; 102:1). It implies a trustful, unpretentious attitude. The account mentions that before Moses could do anything, the Lord "heard" (i.e., He took note of the complaint made against Moses; v. 2). This implies that in the face of unjust attack, Moses was ready to submit his fate. During Miriam and Aaron's revolt, he endured the attacks patiently and did not seek vindication for himself or his family. He left this to God.

Most Bible translations introduce this rebellious account by suggesting that both Miriam and Aaron spoke against Moses (v. 1). However, the Hebrew verb translated "to speak" is in the feminine form third person singular and can be rendered "and she spoke," which suggests that Miriam was the one who initiated the complaint; her name precedes that of Aaron. The grammatical structure suggests that Miriam spoke against Moses (i.e., rebelled against him), and Aaron supported her as an accomplice. This may explain why she was disciplined while Aaron was spared (v. 10). Furthermore, in this case, if Aaron had been punished with leprosy, as Miriam was, Israel would no longer have had a high priestly intercessor since priests could not enter the sanctuary when afflicted with leprosy. In fact, his punishment would not have corresponded to the crime; it arguably would have been too severe.

Miriam and Aaron's objection to Moses's wife seems to have been at least partially due to her ethnicity. Miriam was displeased with Moses because he had not married an Israelite woman but had instead taken a wife from a different ethnic group (v. 1). But it appears that the issue also went beyond ethnicity. Their contention was that the Lord had spoken through them, not only through Moses (v. 2). Miriam and Aaron challenged the uniqueness of Moses's status and apparently wanted to use their own position as leaders to augment their social position or influence among the Israelites. It is possible that they interpreted the influence of Moses's wife as diminishing their own leadership roles. Their discontent was evidently with the subordinate position they held in relationship to Moses. They were envious and arrogant, similar to Lucifer's transgression in heaven (Is. 14:12–14). God's established order was being questioned.

The narrative mentions that the Lord heard the complaint (v. 2) and intervened. The Lord summoned Moses, Aaron, and Miriam to the tent of meeting (v. 4) to settle the matter. In the course of events, the Lord vindicated Moses while the insubordinate leaders were rebuked (vv. 5–11). It is indeed from God's heavenly sanctuary that He judges and defends believers and condemns the wicked. Because of her sin, and as a ring-leader of the rebellion, Miriam was punished. She suffered a severe skin disease, designated by the word tsar'at, a term that encompassed various malignant skin diseases, including leprosy (v. 10; see Lev. 13:1). Instead of being exalted, she was publicly disgraced. God's reaction demonstrated that He does not approve of ethnic hatred, jealousy, or insubordination among His people. Aaron was not physically punished but was humiliated through his association with Miriam. He requested to be spared from punishment (v. 11). As a high priest, instead of praying for Miriam, he asked Moses, whom he called "my lord," to intercede for her healing (vv. 11–12). Aaron confessed his sin and recognized the authority given to Moses by the Lord.

Dispute over position and influence is a permanent issue that generates dysfunctional relationships inside and outside the church. God's people are encouraged to learn from Miriam and Aaron's experience and to focus on humility and loyalty to their appointed leaders (Ps. 75:5–7; Phil. 2:5–8; Titus 3:1–2). At the same time, leaders should trust fully in God and humbly seek guidance from Him and from others who have also been appointed by God to lead His people. Moreover, securing power by using one's status, authority, and social or religious connections can endanger the mission of God's people. Each believer should promote unity and collaboration in the service of God and His people.

13:1—14:45. Report of the Spies and Rebellion. The people reached the edge of the promised land, but unfortunately, they became completely disoriented and lost hope. The spies entered the promised land and made an initial survey. Sadly, ten of them were unfaithful to God. As a result, they brought a dibbah—"bad report" (13:32)—that generated fear, despair, and distrust in the hearts of the Israelites. They questioned God's motives and, therefore, renounced His leadership. To ensure the success of their rebellion, they decided to select another leader who could take them back to Egypt (14:4). They broke the covenant made at Sinai, but God, in His great steadfast love, did not give them up; they were still His people. The section can be divided into five parts: (1) the sending of the spies (13:1–25), (2) the report of the spies (13:26–33), (3) the people's rebellion (14:1–10), (4) God's forgiveness and punishment (14:11–38), and (5) a false repentance and an unsuccessful battle (14:39–45).

The spies were sent, with God's approval (13:1–25), on a military mission. They were to determine whether the inhabitants of the land were weak or strong, few or many, and whether or not the cities were well fortified (vv. 17–19). Before leaving for their mission, Moses commanded them to wehitkhazaqtem (from khazaq)—"strengthen yourselves" or "be courageous"—and to bring back some fruit from the land (v. 20). Therefore, they returned to the camp with an excellent sample of the fruits of the land (v. 23). Unfortunately, the abundant natural fruit did not inspire the people to bear spiritual fruit (cf. John 15:1–8; Gal. 5:22–26).

The report of the spies (13:26–33) contained two elements: a depiction of the fruitfulness of the land (v. 27) and an exaggerated description of the strength of its inhabitants (vv. 28–29). Ten of the spies gave way to pessimism and insisted that it was impossible for the Israelites to conquer the land. They purposely exaggerated the truth by describing the land of Canaan as a land that devoured its inhabitants (i.e., a dangerous place to live; 13:32) though at the beginning of their report they called it a land flowing with milk and honey (i.e., a place where it was good to live; v. 27). Their report generated fear, leading to despair and insurrection. The other two spies, Joshua and Caleb, did not deny or downplay the challenges that the Canaanites presented, but they insisted that Israel would be able to overcome their foes through God's power (13:30; 14:6–9). Because of their unbelief, the people accepted the lie rather than the truth. The majority is not always right.

The apex of the rebellion is described in 14:1–10. The people wept in expression of their hopelessness and accused God of having malevolent plans for them (vv. 1–3). They wanted to return to Egypt, which in comparison, looked like a better option (vv. 3–4). They despaired, despite the presence of the Lord in their midst (v. 9). The Canaanites had already been deprived of divine protection and could have been defeated (v. 9), but the positive contribution of Joshua and Caleb was completely ignored (v. 10).

The Lord threatened to suppress the dangerous rebellion by destroying the entire nation except Moses, from whom He would raise a new community (vv. 11–38). But Moses interceded for his people, and the Lord revealed His grace and forgave them. However, the consequence of their rebellion remained. The unfaithful spies died (vv. 36–37) and the people became wanderers in the wilderness for forty years, unable to enter the land they despised (vv. 30–35). Some of the people attempted to challenge God's judgment (vv. 39–45). Despite expressing repentance, they sinned further by attempting to take the promised land by their own force rather than waiting for God's direction. The military attack they launched on the Canaanites without God's command resulted in utter disaster (14:45). The Lord would grant the old unfaithful generation what they requested—to die in the wilderness (14:2); they would not reach Canaan.

15:1–41

Additional Legislation

The laws described in this section are, in a certain way, connected to the context of the preceding rebellion. Despite the people's rejection of God's promise, the Lord gave them hope and reaffirmed His determination to give them the land (15:1–4). He insisted that the children of Israel would inhabit the promised land and that they would bring offerings to Him in that land (15:2, 18–19). They were to make tassels on the corners of their garments to remember all the commandments of the Lord and the importance of a holy life (15:38–39). God's purpose could not ultimately be defeated, even by His rebellious people.

15:1–31. Laws Concerning Offerings. The laws described in this section concern votive, thanksgiving, and purification offerings. The Lord instructed His people that once they occupied the promised land and were enjoying its produce, they were to offer the firstfruits of their labor to the Lord (vv. 1–21). Grain and libation offerings were to accompany every gift or burnt offering brought to the Lord, and He promised to accept their offerings, as well as those of the faithful strangers dwelling among them (vv. 8–10, 13–15). In Canaan, the people were also to offer to the Lord a heave or set-apart contribution offering of grain in the form of bread (vv. 17–21) as an expression of gratitude to God for providing bread from the land for them.

In addition, knowing that people are sinful by nature, the Lord allowed for the community to bring an offering for its unintentional sin (vv. 22–29; see Lev. 4:13–21); in this case, a burnt offering instead of a sin/purification offering. The function of the burnt offering was now enlarged. But if an individual, not the community, committed an unintentional sin, then the sin/purification offering would be required (Num. 15:27–29; cf. Lev. 4:1–12). The sacrificial ritual aimed at restoring a peaceful relationship with God. However, there was a type of sin for which the sacrificial system did not provide atonement. This was the case of the sin committed defiantly or presumptuously (lit. “with a high hand”; v. 30). This was considered to be premeditated defiance against the Lord, a sin committed with the full knowledge of one's action. No sacrificial victim could bear this sin, and consequently, the sinner would have to bear his or her own sin (v. 31). The perpetrator of such defiant sin was to be cut off from the people (v. 30; see Lev. 7:20); that is to say, he or she would be permanently excluded from being part of God's people. The sin described in the following section belongs to this category of defiant sin, for which sinners show no remorse. They have rejected God's grace.

15:32–36. Stoning of a Sabbath Breaker. The preceding passage (vv. 30–31) dealt with sins committed in open rebellion against the Lord. Now the case of a Sabbath breaker is given as an illustration of this type of sin. The prohibition of work on the Sabbath was extended to outlaw the act of lighting a fire in one's home (Ex. 35:2–3). The Lord ordered that during the sojourn in the wilderness, no fires were to be built on the Sabbath. This was probably based on the fact that the climate was warm. The prohibition appears to have been temporary; it would not be applied in the land of Canaan, where significant climate changes would render fire a necessity (cf. PP 408). The one who gathered wood on the Sabbath while sojourning in the wilderness did so as an open, defiant act against God's law. Since this was a violation of the Decalogue itself rather than the Levitical laws, there was no precedent or guidance regarding how the person should be punished. The Lord provided the needed legislation; the person would be put to death (vv. 35–36). Rejecting the Lord meant rejecting life.

15:37–41. Law of Tassels. A tassel is an ornament for clothing. God required the Israelites to attach fringes or tassels to the corners of their garments (Deut. 22:12). These would remind the Israelites to obey God's commandments instead of following their own desires (v. 39). The verb zakar ("to remember"), which also connotes "to think about or meditate upon," is used twice in the passage to highlight the role of the tassels (vv. 39–40). The tassels were intended to help the Israelites meditate upon God's commandments and to practice them in order to be holy for God (i.e., to be consecrated to Him; vv. 40–41). In other words, the tassels were a symbol of the consecration of the Israelites to the Lord; their adornment was to be a holy life (v. 40). The tassels identified them as worshipers of the Lord.

This instruction reminded the rebellious people that the Lord expected faithfulness and obedience to the covenant law. The blue thread or cord (v. 38) included in the tassels was significant because it was the same color used in the tabernacle and the clothing of the priests (Ex. 25:4; 26:1, 4, 31; 27:16; 39:1; etc.). Wearing tassels thus emphasized that each Israelite was a member of a kingdom of priests (Ex. 19:5–6), with specific privileges and responsibilities. In Revelation 3:18, believers are exhorted to acquire white garments (i.e., the gift of the righteousness of Jesus Christ, which covers their sinfulness and produces righteous deeds in their lives).

Rebellion and Its Suppression

In the previous insurrection (Num. 14), God's people clearly chose desertion. In their spirit of revolt, they declared that the Lord had brought them to Canaan in order for their wives and children to fall by the sword and that it would be better to return to Egypt (14:3). Driven by such interests, the Israelites multiplied reasons to give up the promised land. They lost their hope and commitment to God's plan. In the rebellion described in chapters 16–17, their insolence reached its highest and most dangerous point.

Korah, Dathan, and Abiram's rebellion was the worst in the history of the children of Israel. This rebellion, involving both common people and religious leaders, was an attempt to overthrow the Israelite political and religious system established by God. Similar to the rebellion of chapter 12, this one also rose from within the distinguished leaders of God's people and aimed to challenge the leadership system operated by Moses and Aaron. Korah, a Levite (and a close relative of Moses and Aaron), was displeased with his position and wanted Aaron's (16:10). Dathan and Abiram, descendants of Reuben, the firstborn of Israel, believed it was their natural right to claim the preeminence of the civil power held by Moses (16:1–3). Their dissatisfaction escalated from envy to all-out rebellion. The Lord suppressed the mutiny and reaffirmed the leadership He had appointed.

16:1–50. Rebellion and Suppression. The rebellion of Korah and his followers was a direct affront against God's appointed leaders. They considered the supremacy of Moses and Aaron unjustified in view of the fact that all Israelites were holy (v. 3). They justified the insurrection on the basis of the people's holiness. But Moses clarified that they were actually challenging the holiness of those chosen by the Lord to serve Him in a special way. He unambiguously declared to Korah and his supporters that the Lord would reveal to all Israel who was holy, who belonged to Him, and who was designated to come near to Him in the sanctuary (v. 5). Biblical references to coming near to God point to either the act of bringing an offering to God at His altar or the fact of being chosen by God to minister in His presence (Lev. 1:5, 13–14; Ex. 29:4; Num. 16:9, 40; 18:4). Verse 5 seems to contain both aspects. This verse implies that the person who was holy was someone chosen by the Lord to officiate in His presence.

According to Korah, each Israelite was holy—that is to say, fitted to do the same service performed by Aaron (v. 3). This could also mean that there was no need for a special priestly class among the Israelites because the Lord was in their midst. However, the judgment that fell on Korah and his followers (16:31–35) and the test related to the rod of Aaron (Num. 17) implied that holiness should be also understood in terms of degrees. Though all the Israelites were expected to be holy (Ex. 19:6; Lev. 20:26), Aaron was invested with a special degree of holiness in the sense that he was separated by the Lord for a specific work (16:40; Lev. 8). Moses told Korah and his followers that it was God's prerogative to decide who should come near to Him to minister on behalf of the people (v. 5). The leadership of Moses and Aaron was determined by the fact that the Lord appointed them to their functions. Korah probably understood the priesthood in terms of social power and self-exaltation rather than service for the benefit of others. In line with ANE practices, Moses insisted that all contenders undergo a test to indicate who was holy (v. 7).

In their rebellion, Dathan and Abiram derided God's plan concerning the promised land. They applied the expression "land flowing with milk and honey" to Egypt (v. 13) rather than to the place where the Lord was leading them. They thoroughly misrepresented the ways of God. They ultimately branded Moses as an impostor, deceiving people with false promises (vv. 13–14). Dathan and Abiram also argued that God's promises had not been fulfilled. When the Lord took the Israelites out of Egypt, He had promised to give them a blessed land (Ex. 3:8, 17; 33:3; Lev. 20:24). The insurgent leaders argued that this was simply an illusion (v. 14). They conveniently chose to forget that Moses had already brought them to the border of the promised land. They had failed to enter it on account of their own unfaithfulness and rebellious spirit (see Num. 13–14). In their despair, Dathan and Abiram regarded Moses as a kidnapper who had made a sophisticated plan to take the people hostage in the wilderness in order to rule over them (16:13). They insinuated that he intended to put out the eyes of the people so that they would not discern his scheme (v. 14).

Moses forcefully rejected all the accusations. He argued that he had neither harmed the people nor taken anything from them (v. 15). He committed the matter to the Lord through prayer by asking God not to respect or accept their offering (v. 15). The expression is reminiscent of Cain's experience, when God did not respect his offering (Gen. 4:5). Moses asked God to deny them favor or acceptance when they came into His presence. Filled with defiance, the rebels elected to offer incense to God as evidence of His approval of their ministry (v. 18). But the ringleaders were not accepted into God's presence. They were swallowed up by the earth, and their followers were devoured by fire (vv. 31–35). Instead of mourning for their complicity in Korah's rebellion, the people engaged in a much larger rebellion and might have been completely annihilated (vv. 45–46) if Aaron, at Moses's direction, had not rushed to intercede for them. Even so, 14,700 people died (vv. 47–49).

Aaron stood between the dead and the living to halt the devastating plague (v. 48). He stood in the transition point between death and life. Through his intercession, atonement was made for the people. In vv. 46–47, the verb kāpar ("to make atonement," "to ransom") is used twice to express the work of Aaron on behalf of God's people. In the immediate context of the passage, this term conveys the idea of removing sin to avert punishment. In the Israelite sacrificial system, the more common means of expiation was blood (Lev. 17:11–14). The ritual of expiation of sin by blood was performed during the daily sacrificial service (Lev. 4:20) and especially on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16). The sacrificial blood represented the life that was given on behalf of the penitent. It substituted for the sinner's blood (i.e., life). However, in the narrative of Numbers 16, atonement was made through the burning of incense (vv. 46–48). Incense could also be used by the high priest to make atonement for sin and thus avert God's anger. It is interesting to observe that the incense offered by the rebels brought wrath while that offered by Aaron, the divinely chosen high priest, brought relief (vv. 18, 35, 47–48). The incense itself had no supernatural power to effect atonement, but the Lord used it to reaffirm that He would work only through His appointed instruments.

The atonement performed by Aaron (vv. 46–48) prefigured the ministry of Jesus Christ on behalf of the human race. Jesus Christ, the true high priest, made atonement through offering His own blood (Heb. 2:2–17; 9:11–12). Today, through His ministry in the heavenly sanctuary, He applies the benefits of His expiatory death to all believers (Heb. 7:25; 10:22; Rev. 8:2–4).

The insurrection of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram resulted in a significant loss of human life. The ringleaders, their 250 closest associates, and their 14,700 accomplices perished (vv. 32, 35, 49). Why was the punishment so harsh? The core issue was that the rebels “rejected the Lord” (v. 30). The Hebrew verb na’ats (to “reject,” “spurn,” “disdain,” “abhor”) is used in v. 30 and previously in 14:23 to express the rebellious attitude of the people during the mutiny launched by the unfaithful spies. The use of this verb in v. 30 indicates that the rebels treated God disrespectfully; they rejected His authority and leadership and considered it devoid of any value. Such behavior was nothing less than a fundamental breaking of the covenant, a blasphemy that called for severe discipline and that placed the perpetrators outside the covenant blessings (Deut. 31:20–21). It was for such blasphemy that the Lord decreed that the old generation was banned from entering the promised land (Num. 14:28–33). The entire rebellion demonstrated that the Israelites did not want to remain on God’s side. This was a serious crime, an act of treason. Hence, the Lord destroyed the insurgents and moved forward with the remnant of His people toward the promised land. Korah’s rebellion should alert Christians to the fact that envy, discontent, insubordination, and greed promote the worst in humanity. The account of Korah also places a high value on the importance of the unity of God’s people in their journey to the promised land.

17:1–13. Rod of Aaron. In order to reaffirm the election of Aaron, the Lord made the staff of Aaron to blossom. A staff symbolized the authority of a person. When Aaron’s staff bloomed, his special call, anointing, and authority from God were confirmed, and the arguments ceased (vv. 5, 10). The almond was the earliest blossoming plant in the region; it could, therefore, signify the preeminence of Aaron’s office. As highlighted in an interesting wordplay in Jeremiah, the sprouting of the almond branch (Heb. shaged) also indicates that the Lord watches (Heb. shaqad) over His word and makes certain it is fulfilled (Jer. 1:11, 12). What He decides to do, He does.

Additional Legislation

In the previous chapters, Korah and his supporters challenged the exclusive leadership of Moses and Aaron, but the Lord intervened and revealed that the appointment of Aaron was not arbitrary. In chapter 18, He reaffirmed the privileges and responsibilities of the Levites and priests. In this section, the Lord instructed His people concerning the impurity resulting from contact with a corpse. (Perhaps this instruction is placed here because of the many people who died in Korah’s rebellion; 19:1–22.)

18:1–32. Duties and Provision for the Levites and Priests. The current passage is a general summary of the responsibility of the Levites and their relationship to the priests, the descendants of Aaron (vv. 1–7). It also deals with the dues owed to the priests for their ministry (vv. 8–20) and the tithe that the Lord assigned to the Levites (vv. 21–24). In their turn, Levites were to give tithe to the priests (vv. 25–32).

The duties of Levites and priests were already described in chapters 1 and 3–4. The current section (18:1–7) insists on the importance of order in the service at the sanctuary. The Levites had the responsibility of guarding the sanctuary, preventing the approach of any unauthorized persons (v. 22), and performing the tasks assigned to them by the priests. Priests had the exclusive duty of ministering before the ark of the covenant and offering sacrifices. Thus, the issue over the priestly roles was settled in order to avoid another disastrous situation like that of Korah. The divine instruction that Aaron and his descendants should bear the iniquity related to the sanctuary or their priesthood (v. 1) indicates that the priests were fully responsible for matters related to the sanctuary and priesthood. If the sanctuary or the priesthood became inadvertently defiled, the priests and Levites should be held responsible. Thus the appointment to serve at the sanctuary carried with it a heavy responsibility.

In vv. 8–19, the Lord gave instructions about particular offerings that would go to Aaron and his sons as reward for their service at the sanctuary. The Lord pronounced that this practice would be considered a perpetual covenant of salt before the Lord (v. 19). In many ancient cultures, salt was understood as a symbol of preservation and was employed during alliances to underline the idea that the terms of the agreement would be long preserved. The covenant between God and the priests is said to be “of salt” because it was to be a permanent covenant (v. 19), for as long as the system was operative. The significance of the Levites’ service was honored; the Lord assigned them the tithe (vv. 21, 23–24). The Israelites gave the tithe to the Lord, but the Lord gave it to the Levites for their service in the sanctuary. The Levites also gave a tithe from the tithe they received, and God assigned it to the priests (vv. 25–32). The system was based on the goodness of the Lord and the response of love and gratitude of the people. These same principles should continue to guide contemporary believers on matters related to tithe and offerings (cf. 1 Chr. 29:14).

19:1–22. Red Heifer Ritual. This was a ritual intended to remove impurity caused by contact with a dead body. The ritual aimed at the preservation of purity in the community and implied that God's purpose was to preserve the lives of His people. The description of the ritual and its ramifications can be divided into four sections: (1) the burning of the red heifer to make ashes (vv. 1–10), (2) the purification of someone who touched a corpse (vv. 11–13), (3) the process of cleansing those who became unclean (vv. 14–20), and (4) the uncleanness of the person who manipulated the water mixed with the ashes from the red heifer (vv. 21–22).

The unblemished red heifer was slaughtered and incinerated outside the camp by an Israelite, under the supervision of the priest, to produce the ashes (v. 3; cf. Lev. 4:11–12). During the burning of the animal, some cleansing agents were added to the fire (cedar wood, hyssop, and scarlet; see v. 6). These elements also appeared in other purification ceremonies, such as the cleansing of the leper (Lev. 14:4). Their usage in purification rituals was significant. The scarlet, for example, symbolized life by its red color, which recalled blood—a key element for a ritual that corrected a state of uncleanness and death. There was also hyssop, which the psalmist uses figuratively as a cleansing element from sin (Ps. 51:7) even though he clearly recognizes that the Lord is the one who blots out transgression (51:7), not the hyssop.

In the process of cleansing, the ashes were mixed with “living” or “fresh” water, usually translated as “running water” (v. 17). The flowing water used in the red heifer ritual worked as a symbol of purification and life, as in other biblical rituals (Ex. 29:4; Lev. 8:6; 14:5–7, 50–52; 15:13; 16:4, 24). The water, as well as other elements used in the ritual, pointed to the basic elements of life. The product (ashes plus flowing water) served for the purification of the uncleanness that resulted from touching a dead body or coming into contact with objects or places defiled by a corpse (vv. 9, 13, 17, 20). The Hebrew word khatta'î (“sin”), used in v. 9, could designate either (1) sin (i.e., a moral failure) or (2) the offering brought for sin or impurity (Lev. 4:3). The sin offering was performed in response to immoral actions as well as physical impurities (Lev. 5:2–3, 6; 12:6–8). When the sin offering was brought for physical impurity, its purpose was to decontaminate by removing impurity from the defiled person or object. In either case, the core issue was that of sin and its effects—death, defilement, and a state of sin.

The red heifer ritual dealt mainly with ceremonial uncleanness. It is mentioned that the person on whom the water of purification was applied remained defiled until nightfall or even for days afterward (Num. 19:10–12, 19). The ritual aimed at maintaining purity or life among God's people by cleansing them from physical defilement. It should be remembered that the Lord disapproves of impurity, whether moral or ceremonial. The text declares that an unclean person who voluntarily refused to make use of the water of purification was to be cut off from Israel (19:13, 20).

There is a paradox in the ritual of the red heifer in the fact that what cleansed the defiled person defiled the clean one. In fact, those who performed some roles, such as the burning of the red heifer or the manipulation of its ashes, became ceremonially unclean while those on whom the same ash was applied were purified (vv. 7–8, 10, 18–19, 21–22). The connection between impurity and death was established in order to instill in the Israelites the fundamental truth that life is found only in the Lord (see Leviticus: Introduction). Anything related to death was foreign to the Lord and His sanctuary. The ritual system suggested that the Lord has power over death and that He can remove it from His people. This was to take place through the death of the Son of God, who cleanses sinners from all impurity (Heb. 9:13–14; 1 John 1:7).

Final Events at Kadesh

Following the turbulence of Korah's rebellion, the children of Israel resumed their journey and arrived at Kadesh. Two remarkable events took place there, namely, the death of Miriam and another rebellion against the Lord involving the people as well as their key leaders (Moses and Aaron).

20:1–13. Death of Miriam and a New Rebellion.

Numbers 20 begins with the death of Miriam (v. 1) and ends with the death of Aaron (v. 28). Miriam, one of the most influential leaders of Israel, died at Kadesh. Her death reminded the people of Israel that, as the Lord had declared, the unfaithful generation would not enter Canaan (14:35). Sadly, shortly after her death, the people launched a new rebellion (v. 2). At first, the issue appears to center on the lack of water (v. 2), but a deeper motivation is disclosed in vv. 3–5, where it is indicated that the people questioned God's plan to take them to the promised land.

Because of the lack of water at Kadesh, the children of Israel gathered together to oppose Moses and Aaron (v. 2). This expression denotes the idea of disaffection, a kind of aggressive attitude born out of despair and leading to riot (cf. 16:3, 19, 42). The text mentions that they had a rib with Moses (v. 3). This Hebrew verb generally expresses an idea of contending and quarreling, or in many OT contexts, it is a legal battle. In this context, it implies a struggle with words. Harsh words were addressed to Moses (vv. 3–5). The same verb is used in v. 13 to indicate that the whole rebellion was not directed against Moses but against the Lord Himself. The waters were called Meribah (quarrelling or contention) because the children of Israel contended or quarreled with the Lord (v. 13). The army rebelled against their Chief Commander—God Himself.

The people again gave the impression that Moses had taken them hostage, and they referred to the desert where they were as an “evil/terrible [Heb. ra'] place”—that is to say, a place of misfortune or calamity, a place deprived of food and water (vv. 4–5). They lost hope and confidence in God's guidance and providence and complained; they asked why Moses had brought them out of Egypt (v. 5). They had not learned from previous experience that the Lord was always able to provide for their basic needs. This time, the Lord did not punish them. He had compassion on them (Ps. 78:38).

In face of the new provocation, Moses became exceedingly frustrated and lost his patience. The Lord instructed Moses and Aaron to speak or command the rock to produce water (v. 8). Instead of speaking to the rock, Moses struck it twice (v. 11). The act of Moses and Aaron is referred to by the verb marah, “to rebel against” (i.e., a willful refusal to obey the Lord; Num. 20:24; 27:14). Rebellion had made its way into the hearts of the people and their leaders.

Psalm 106:32–33 indicates that Moses spoke rashly with his lips. This denotes that his statement in Numbers 20:10b was the root of the issue. By these words, Moses and Aaron failed to respect God in the eyes of Israel and thereby deprived Him of His due honor. Moreover, the sin of Moses gave the people occasion to question whether his past course of action was truly under God's control. They may have also thought that like Moses, they could excuse their own sins (cf. PP 417). Even though Moses and Aaron did not revere the Lord in the eyes of the children of Israel (v. 12), the narrative declares that God's holiness was ultimately validated (v. 13). God proved His holiness in His adherence to His promises (see Ezek. 20:41; 28:25; 39:27). Despite their insurrection, the Lord performed a miracle in their favor and manifested His faithfulness and power.

Moses and Aaron exercised significant influence over the people as their primary leaders. Their great responsibility and privilege required impeccable behavior as representatives of the Lord. The Lord could not ignore their sin without showing partiality and, therefore, a lack of integrity as a righteous God. As a result of Moses and Aaron's sin, the people learned that the Lord does not excuse any sin, not even that of leaders. In His dealings with Moses and Aaron, God showed Himself to be reliable and trustworthy.

This account of Moses's failure demonstrates the objectivity of the biblical narratives. Contrary to other ancient writings that highlight only the strong points of their protagonists, the Bible does not overlook the weaknesses of its great heroes. It narrates even the failings of God's honorable people. Christians are encouraged to learn from the mistakes of their predecessors and remain fully dependent on God. God is the only true hero of the Bible. It is on Him that all human beings must rely for their victory. The narrative also speaks to church leaders. To them also the Lord has given great privileges and responsibilities. Pressures and frustrations will not excuse rash actions or a lack of self-control. They must properly represent the Lord at all times before His people.

20:14–21. Edom Refuses Passage to Israel.

The shortest route to the promised land lay through the land of Edom, but when the Israelites arrived there, they confronted opposition. Moses kindly appealed to the Edomites to allow passage through their land, but the Edomites refused the request. The people were obliged to turn around or fight against Edom. At this point, the Lord intervened and directed the Israelites to take a long detour around Edom. This time, the new generation of God's people quietly obeyed Him. Sometimes, in order for the Lord to lead His children to their spiritual, social, or professional destinations, He guides them along a detour. However, a detour with Him is preferable to a direct route without Him.

20:22—36:13*JOURNEY FROM KADESH TO THE PLAINS OF MOAB

The last part of the book describes the journey of the Israelites from Kadesh to the plains of Moab. The Lord's people finally reached the border of the promised land. Over the course of the journey, the Israelites vacillated between hope and despair, trust and distrust, obedience and disobedience. Among them, there remained a significant number of the old generation who had escaped from Egypt. This explains why their victory over Arad was followed by a rebellion against God because of the lack of food and the long journey (21:1–9). Their victory over Sihon and Og was also followed by an act of idolatry and immorality at the border of the promised land (21:21–34; 25:1–18). Despite their deficiency, the Lord continued to lead them. Reaching the plains of Moab, the new generation was ready to inherit the land of Canaan. A new census was carried out (26:1–51), and additional instructions were given that pertained to the inheritance rights of daughters (27:1–11; 36:1–13), the calendar of festivals for regular celebration of God's goodness (28:1—29:40), the division of the land (32:1–42; 34:1–29), and the Levitical cities and cities of refuge (35:1–8; 35:9–34). The instructions renewed the hope of the children of God, for they pointed toward a bright future in the promised land.

20:22–29*Death of Aaron at Hor

The children of Israel went from Kadesh to Hor, where Aaron died. His death confirmed the temporary function of his priesthood, which was a type of the perpetual priesthood of Christ (Heb. 7:23–24). In Hebrews 7:25, the apostle Paul exalts the importance of the permanent and unchangeable priesthood of Christ based on the fact that He is alive; He will never die. Consequently, Christ is able to always intercede on behalf of those who come to God through Him. The apostle insists that since Christ was tempted in all points but did not sin, He is able to assist His children in their weaknesses and give them His grace (Heb. 4:15–16).

The death of Aaron, the high priest, meant that a new high priest had to be appointed (20:28). In obedience to God, Moses took Aaron and his son to Mount Hor, where Aaron would die. But before Aaron died, Moses removed the priestly vestments from him and put them on Eleazar, his son. This was an act of investiture by which Eleazar, the priest, was installed as high priest among the people of Israel. This was not a pompous ceremony or celebration but a simple and silent transfer of responsibilities under the guidance of the Lord. The appointment of Eleazar indicated that the spiritual leadership was now being transferred to a new generation.

21:1–35*From Hor to the Plains of Moab

From Hor, the Israelites moved closer toward the promised land. Before reaching the plains of Moab, they experienced a prelude to God's victory over the unfaithful nations. With God's assistance, they defeated the Canaanites of Arad (21:1–3). But after the victory over Arad, they again became impatient and complained against God's leadership (vv. 4–9). Nevertheless, their complaints did not prevent God from leading them in their journey (vv. 10–20). The Israelites traveled as a victorious people and, as such, defeated King Sihon (vv. 21–32), and King Og (vv. 33–35).

21:1–3. Defeat of Arad. After the discouraging report of the spies thirty-eight years before, the Israelites attempted to conquer the land by their own efforts, but the Amalekites and the Canaanites who dwell in Arad defeated them (14:39–45). Returning to this same location after their wilderness wanderings, the Israelites were once again attacked by Canaanites, and some of their people were captured. Instead of repeating their former mistake, the Israelites committed themselves to the Lord, and He “delivered up” or “gave” (Heb. natan) the Canaanites to them (vv. 2–3). This verb denotes the action of giving a thing or a person to someone. It is also used in the context of war when the Lord, in an act of judgment, gave or handed over unfaithful people to other nations (21:3; Deut. 2:33; Josh. 10:30–32; Judg. 1:4; 3:10; 11:21; 1 Sam. 14:10, 12; Dan. 1:2).

This text indicates that it was the Lord who gave or handed over the Canaanites to the Israelites, which implies that the Lord had authority over the Canaanites. The battle and the victory were the Lord's enterprise. This victory likely boosted morale among the Israelites. But it seems that the victory produced only short-term positive effects among some of the Israelites. The following narrative indicates that during the next phase of the journey, the Israelites were disheartened and renewed their complaints against God and Moses (21:4–5). Unlike the Israelites, believers today should consider each victory that God produces in our lives as a prelude to His ultimate victory over all the forces of evil.

21:4–9. More Complaints: Fiery Serpents.

When the Edomites forbade the Israelites from crossing their territory, the Israelites were forced to take a long detour past part of the Red Sea (identified today as the Gulf of Aqaba (v. 4; Deut. 2:8) and around the land of the Edomites. Over the course of the journey, they became discouraged again and criticized both God and Moses (vv. 4–5). Their complaint, centered on the need for bread and water, was preceded by their recurrent insistence that Moses had brought them out of Egypt only to die in the wilderness (v. 5). This time, the Lord withdrew His protection from them, and fiery serpents (i.e., venomous snakes) attacked them (v. 6). The serpents were described as “fiery” because their poisonous bite caused violent inflammation. Many people died. In the midst of their suffering, those yet remaining recognized their sin and cried to the Lord for help (v. 7).

In response to the prayers of the people, the Lord asked Moses to make a serpent of bronze and lift it up on a pole so that whoever was bitten could look at it and be healed (vv. 8–9). There was no healing power in the bronze serpent. The serpent was neither an idol nor a magic artifact. The Lord Himself was the healer, and the serpent on the pole was a symbol of His healing power. Looking at the serpent was an expression of faith in God, the Healer. It also indicated that sinners cannot save themselves because salvation is from the Lord (Jon. 2:9). The serpent, a symbol of evil, pointed forward to the ministry of our Savior, Jesus Christ. He who knew no sin became sin for us (2 Cor. 5:21) and was lifted up on the cross as God’s means of salvation for those who look to Him (John 3:14). Placing one’s faith in Jesus Christ is indispensable for salvation (John 3:15–18, 36).

21:10–35. Defeat of Sihon and Og. The travel itinerary of the Israelites is carefully preserved in the text to indicate how the Lord cared for and guided them (vv. 10–20). Soon they would confront two more enemies. Under God’s command, Israel would move from victory to victory on their way to the plains of Moab (22:1). Obedience to God’s command and confidence in His leadership were important prerequisites for success (21:34). The territories of King Sihon and King Og were located in the Transjordan region.

This would serve as the Israelites’ entrance point into the land of promise. As in the case with Edom, the Israelites requested passage from King Sihon, but he refused and engaged them in war (vv. 21–23). Sihon’s army attacked, but Israel, empowered by the Lord, defeated them. The land of the Amorites became the first portion of the promised land taken by the Israelites (vv. 24–31; Deut. 2:26–31).

After the Israelites defeated Sihon, they were also attacked by King Og. But as He did with Arad, the Lord gave Og, his people, and his land to the Israelites (vv. 33–35). In preparation for the battle, the Lord told Moses not to be afraid of Og or his people because He had delivered or given them into Moses’s hands (21:34). Later, Moses would remind his successor, Joshua, of the victory over Sihon and Og and reassure him that the Lord would similarly overcome the other inhabitants of the region. Then he exhorted Joshua not to be afraid because the Lord his God would fight for him (Deut. 3:21–22). During the conquest itself, Joshua confirmed that the God of Israel fought for His people (Josh. 10:14, 42). It seems that the victory over Sihon and Og was a significant one for Israel. The names of the two kings are repeated many times in the OT (Sihon [37 times]; Og [22 times]), probably because this was the first conquest in the land of Canaan (cf. Deut. 1:4; 3:1–13; 4:47; 29:7; 31:4; Josh. 2:10; 9:10; 1 Kin. 4:19).

The victory over Sihon and Og validated the word of God and the faithful speech that Caleb had given some thirty-eight years before. Caleb firmly believed that when God is with His people, they can overcome mighty enemies (14:8–9). The narrative of Numbers 21:1–3 and 21–35 demonstrates that the Amorites were powerless when confronted by the army of Israel under the command of the Lord.

Israel on the Plains of Moab

After the victory over Sihon and Og, the Israelites continued their journey and reached the plains of Moab, a steppe region located immediately north of the Dead Sea to the east of the Jordan River. During Israel’s stay in the area, the Moabites attempted to destroy Israel through the influence of Balaam (22:1–25:18). A new census was taken (26:1–65), and God gave an additional law regarding the inheritance of land. It was on the plains of Moab that Joshua was appointed as the new leader of the people (27:1–23). Several laws were instituted concerning sacrificial offerings (28:1–29:40) and vows (30:1–16). The narrative continues with a report of the victory over the Midianites (31:1–54), an account of the tribes that settled down in East Jordan (32:1–42), and a final overview of the trip from Egypt (33:1–49). The book closes with instructions concerning the conquest of the land and laws related to life in Canaan (33:50–36:13).

22:1–24:25. Story of Balaam. After hearing about the defeat of Sihon and Og by the Israelites, Balak, king of the Moabites, became desperate and afraid as the Israelites approached his territory (22:2–3). Instead of launching a military attack against them, Balak decided to take what he thought would be a more effective route. He hired Balaam, an unfaithful prophet, to curse the Israelites (see below, “God’s Use of a Flawed Prophet”). The Bible identifies the homeland of Balaam, son of Beor, as “Pethor” (22:5; Deut. 23:4), a town located in northern Mesopotamia on the west bank of the Euphrates. It is possible that Balaam was Aramaean.

Some have seen a contradiction in 22:20–35 because God allowed Balaam to meet with Balak, but once Balaam was on his way, the Lord opposed him. Actually, God had already prohibited Balaam from going, and Balaam had informed Balak’s messengers of that fact (v. 13). It was because of Balaam’s insistence that the Lord finally gave him permission to go, but only if the messengers of Balak came to him in the morning and asked him to go with them. And if they did, Balaam could only speak what God told him to (v. 35). However, the messengers did not come to him in the morning. They left, and Balaam went after them. Therefore, it is not at all strange that after Balaam departed, God’s anger was directed against him, and the Angel of the Lord stood in his way (v. 22). In any case, by trying to prevent him from going, God wanted Balaam to understand that it was not His intention to allow him to curse the Israelites.

So as to prevent Balaam from interfering with His plan, God enabled the donkey to speak. This certainly should have alarmed Balaam! But it did not. The seer did not see what the donkey saw. The narrative implicitly mocks Balaam. Balaam tried to serve his client well, but he failed, blessing Israel instead (22:41–24:24; for more information on the contribution of these oracles to the theological unity of the Pentateuch, see “Introduction to the Pentateuch,” p. 120). God’s determination to bless His people was unalterable (23:19),

God’s Use of a Flawed Prophet

The figure of Balaam in the OT is unique and perplexing.

1. Archaeology and Balaam. There is some archaeological evidence that Balaam was a historical figure. In 1967, a plaster inscription containing the name Balaam was discovered in the Transjordanian site of Deir ‘Alla in the ruins of a building dated to around the eighth century B.C. The plaster inscription mentions “Balaam son of Beor,” a “seer of the gods” who received messages during the night concerning future things and reported them in the morning. We find in Numbers 22 and 24 some elements similar to those found in the inscription. For example, Numbers describes Balaam as a person who received messages from God through visions or dreams; he was a “seer” (22:8, 19; 24:4). In both documents, he had nocturnal visions (22:20), and in the morning, he shared them, in this case, with Balak’s messengers (22:13). And in both instances, he is called Balaam, son of Beor. These similarities and others suggest that the Balaam mentioned in the inscription is the biblical Balaam.

2. He Was Used by God. In the story in Numbers, the connection between the Lord and Balaam is unusual. Was he a worshiper of Yahweh? One thing is clear—the spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he prophesied about the future of the people of God and the coming of the Messiah (Num. 24:1–9, 17–19). Although Balak, king of Moab, wanted Balaam to curse Israel, Balaam could speak only the words of God. Unquestionably, God used him and revealed to him His plan. It is unclear whether this was an isolated incident or the first time the Lord had used him as a prophet. But one thing is certain: Balaam declared to the messengers of Balak that he could not go beyond the word of the Lord his God in any way (22:18). When he identified the Lord as his God, he was obviously indicating that he knew Yahweh, the God of Israel, and worshiped Him. However, the narrative reveals a number of problems with Balaam's relationship with the Lord and implies an eventual full apostasy. Despite this reality, God still used Balaam as His prophet.

3. Use of Pagan Rituals. There are two details that contribute to Balaam's enigmatic reputation. First, he is in the service of a king who wanted him to curse Israel, the people of Yahweh. Second, in seeking a revelation from God, he used pagan practices. Pagans used various rituals to influence the gods and to predict the future. At some point in his life, Balaam combined the worship of God with pagan ritual practices and worshiped other gods. The inscription found in 1967 supports that conclusion. In the Bible, he is described as a diviner who receives divination fees or instruments used for divination purposes (Heb. qesem in 22:7 could refer to divination instruments or to fees). According to Numbers 24:1, before he pronounced his third oracle, he did not seek to use sorcery or divination as he had previously (Heb. nakhash, meaning "to call for an evil omen"; cf. 23:23), which implies that on the two previous occasions, he had practiced sorcery. The text does not specify the type of ritual he used to seek the omen. In any case, he was unable to coerce the Lord into supporting his efforts to curse Israel. His connection with polytheism suggests that, in principle, Balaam was not a faithful worshiper of the Lord of Israel.

4. Goal of the Narrative. The most important element of this story is not the information it provides about Balaam but what it reveals about the purpose and meaning of the story within the book of Numbers. First, the story reveals that there is no God like the God of Israel. Balaam was completely aware of the fact that Yahweh is unique and that, consequently, he would not be able to coerce Him. Balaam's sorcery was ineffective against Him. Several times, Balaam recognized that he could say only what Yahweh put in his mouth and that he was unable to go beyond it. By the third oracle, Balaam abandoned any attempt to influence God and placed himself at His disposal. It was then that the Spirit came upon him.

Second, the story demonstrates that the people of God are under special protection. The forces of evil cannot bring to fruition their purpose against those blessed by the Lord. In Numbers, God reveals Himself as the leader of His people, depicted as an army of pilgrims advancing victoriously toward the land of Canaan.

Third, through this narrative, God shared with the pagan world His plans for Israel. The vision of Balaam pointed to a time when, through the power of God, Israel would be victorious over all its enemies and would be at peace (24:8–9; see the Introduction to the Pentateuch). He foresaw an era in which the glorious king of Israel and His kingdom would be exalted (24:8, 17–19). The message of the story of Balaam applies with equal force to God's people today and should reaffirm their confidence in their Savior and Lord.

to the point that He was willing to forgive their sins (23:21). No human or demonic sorcery could alter God's will for them (v. 23).

The oracles of Balaam recorded in Numbers 24 are the most impressive of his prophecies and are recorded in poetry. In the third oracle, the Lord describes the camp of Israel as a garden planted by a river; it is a beautiful and fruitful paradise (24:5–7). Then the image transforms to that of a kingdom that is ruled by a king more powerful than Agag (v. 7), described metaphorically as a mighty wild ox (v. 8). While according to 23:22, God brought the Israelites out of Egypt, here God brings this king out of Egypt (a new Exodus), suggesting a powerful messianic figure who permanently overcomes His enemies. This messianic figure then lies down to rest like a powerful lion, whom no one dares to challenge (v. 9). The message is not only about the proclamation of the defeat of the nation of Balak, an enemy of God's people, but about the final defeat of all of God's enemies through God's Messiah, represented as an ox and a lion (see "Introduction to the Pentateuch," p. 120).

The final oracle is the high point (24:15–24). Balaam witnessed what would happen in the distant future, God's eschatological plan. The "He" mentioned in v. 8 is now identified as the future king, prophesied in Genesis 49:10, who was to come from the tribe of Judah. Balaam speaks about a star and scepter coming out of Jacob (v. 17), both symbols pointing to royalty. The NT applies the symbol of the star to Jesus, the messianic King (Rev. 22:16). The star would appear in order to guide the wise men/kings to the child Jesus, who himself was to be the Star that was to come out of Jacob (Matt. 2:1–11).

Finding here a reference to the Davidic Dynasty, from which the Messiah would come, is appropriate. David defeated the enemies of God, including Moab and Edom. But the eschatological emphasis of the text suggests that the ultimate significance of the passage is found in the coming Messiah, who was Himself the culmination of the dynasty (see Ps. 89:19–52; Isa. 11:55:3; Jer. 23:5–6; 30:9; Ezek. 34:23–24; 37:24–25; Hos. 3:5; Amos 9:11; Matt. 1:1; Luke 1:32; 2 Tim. 2:8; Rev. 5:5). The nations mentioned in Numbers 24:17b–24 would symbolically represent all of God's enemies who would be defeated by the Messiah. Moab, Edom (see Is. 63:1–3), and Amalek would not be able to stand before the future King. The proud nations, like the Kenites, would be overpowered (vv. 21–22), even if God had to employ other nations in the process (e.g., Asshur; v. 22). Implicit in the passage is a future for God's people free from the threat of enemies. This last oracle of Balaam was an oracle of hope for Israel.

Israel later attacked the Midianites, and in the ensuing battle, Balaam was killed (31:8). Thus, Balaam died as a result of his sin. He fell from divine grace and tragically became an instrument in the hands of God's enemy. In spite of the imperfections of the Israelites in the wilderness, God was with them, protecting them from physical and spiritual forces. Israel did not discern what Balak and Balaam were attempting to do against them, but God knew and fought for them. He does the same for His people today.

25:1–18. Israel's Immorality and Idolatry.

Despite a clear prelude of ultimate victory against the inhabitants of the land (see the victory over Sihon [21:21–25] and Og [21:33–35]), some Israelites remained spiritually vulnerable. When Balaam failed to curse God's people, he returned home, the place where he should have remained (24:25). But, overcome by greed, he revisited Balak with a strategy to overthrow Israel: to lead some among the people to violate God's covenant by committing harlotry with the women of Moab and worshiping their gods (25:1–2; 31:16; cf. 2 Pet. 2:15; Rev. 2:14). Balaam recognized that the formidable mix of immorality and idolatry would lead many Israelites astray.

As a result of the violation of the covenant, the people were immediately afflicted by a plague from the Lord. God commanded Moses to hang the culprits (v. 4) as a way of bringing the plague to an end. It was particularly because of the intervention of the priest Eleazar, who made atonement on behalf of the people, that God's anger receded (vv. 7–8). The punishment inflicted on Zimri by Phinehas was not arbitrary. He was a leader in Israel and, through his behavior, could have influenced others to sin. Though we no longer live under a theocracy, immoral and sinful behavior in the church always requires a firm response from God's people (1 Cor. 5:1–5).

26:1–65. Second Numbering of Israel. Part of the preparation to conquer Canaan included a census of the new generation. After dealing with the disaster at Baal-Peor, the Lord ordered Moses and Eleazar to number the people (vv. 1–56) and the Levites (vv. 57–62). This was a new census because all those who were originally numbered in the wilderness of Sinai were already dead, except for Caleb, Joshua, and Moses (vv. 63–67), and Moses himself would die soon (27:12–14). The census was conducted according to the number of the Israelite tribes. For all the tribes except that of Levi, the census included male Israelites who were twenty years old and above and able to go to war (v. 2) and female Israelites in case of fathers who had no sons (v. 33). Concerning the Levites, the numbering involved all males older than one month of age (v. 62). In light of vv. 52–56, it appears that the census was to be used in the division of the land. The number of people in the tribe determined how much land a tribe would inherit. The Levites were not counted among their Israelite brethren because they had no land inheritance (v. 62). However, since the land could only be divided after its conquest, the census had a military purpose as well. Thus, the ability to go to war was one of the considerations (v. 2). The division of the land even before its conquest reassured the people that through God's power, they would conquer the land.

In vv. 9–10, the rebellion of Dathan, Abiram, and Korah is recalled as a sign (v. 10; i.e., a warning for others). This reminder to the new generation was important because they faced a genuine challenge in conquering the land, and their success required faithfulness to God. Unlike Dathan, Abiram, and Korah, who mocked God's plan by describing Egypt as the land flowing with milk and honey (16:13–14), the new generation needed to trust in God's leadership and develop strong hope in Him. The apostle Peter warned that in the last days, there would be scoffers who would view the promise of the Second Coming of Jesus with derision. But the children of God are encouraged to wait with hope for the fulfillment of His promise (2 Pet. 3:3–14).

27:1–11. Zelophehad's Daughters. The daughters of Zelophehad raised an issue concerning their father's property. Their situation was serious because the continued existence of someone's name was important to the Israelites, and the most enduring way to preserve a man's name was for his descendants to inherit his land. Because the matter was so complex, Moses referred the case to the Lord (v. 5).

The Lord answered that daughters have the right to inherit their father's property (vv. 6–9). He made it clear that the land of Canaan should be kept in small holdings and passed down along hereditary lines (vv. 9–11). Thus, the case of the daughters of Zelophehad facilitated the creation of a new law entitling women to be considered legal channels through which possession and inheritance of the land could be traced, as it was with sons. This was a revolutionary law that should inform contemporary society, especially cultures in which women still have lower status than men.

27:12–23. Joshua as the Successor of Moses. The current section focuses on the transfer of leadership from Moses to Joshua. The Lord informed Moses that the day of his death was drawing near. He would not enter Canaan because he had been disobedient to God and had not glorified Him at Kadesh (vv. 12–14). Instead of arguing with the Lord, Moses complied with His determination and displayed a deep sense of responsibility (vv. 15–17). Thinking about the welfare of his people, he requested that the Lord appoint a suitable leader, one who would go out and come in before the people (i.e., lead them in battle; v. 17). The Lord directed Moses to Joshua (one of the two faithful spies) and instructed him to lay his hands on Joshua, for the Spirit was in him (v. 18).

The laying on of hands denoted the transfer of power from one leader to another, with one taking the place of the other (Num. 8:10; cf. Lev. 16:21). By laying hands on Joshua, Moses consecrated him as the new leader of God's people (vv. 18–20, 23), the one who would guide them to Canaan. Aaron had given way to Eleazar, and Moses relinquished his position to Joshua. It was clear that the Lord, the ultimate leader of Israel, was in charge of the affairs of His people. He would not allow a leadership vacuum. The future of His work could not be jeopardized by the absence of appointed leaders.

Joshua, a man endowed by the Spirit with wisdom and authority, was installed as Moses's successor in the sight of the congregation while Moses was still alive (vv. 19, 22). This ensured that there would be no misunderstanding or uncertainty concerning leadership

The Status of Women in the Book of Numbers

Despite containing sparse data concerning the lives of women, the book of Numbers seems to indicate that there was a continuous effort to improve their status in Israelite society. Numbers 5–6, 12, 27, 30, and 36 provide some hints about a woman's position in the Israelite community. For example, in 5:1–4, whoever (man or woman) became unclean due to leprosy or corpse defilement was to be sent outside the camp, without discrimination. In 5:6–7, a man or a woman who did wrong to a fellow human being was considered guilty before the Lord and was required to repent. In the same chapter, the Lord indicated that no wife could be held guilty simply on the basis of her husband's suspicion. A wife was considered innocent until the Lord Himself proved her guilty (5:11–31). In relation to the Nazirite law, women as well as men were free to choose to be Nazirites (6:1–2). In addition to the Nazirite vow, women could also take other vows (Numbers 30). Moreover, the incident of Numbers 12 implies that Miriam was recognized as an important female leader in Israel. Furthermore, on the request of Zelophehad's daughters, a law about a daughter's inheritance was established in Israel. Though these illustrations are limited, they marked a step forward in the lives of women. Current society, and especially the church, is called to do better, particularly in the areas of women's education, leadership, and employment.

responsibilities after Moses's death. Joshua would cooperate with Eleazar in leading God's people (vv. 21–22). Eleazar was to consult the Lord with the Urim and Thummim to provide divine instructions to Joshua (v. 21). While Moses anticipated his death, he continued to instruct God's people.

At times, succession can be a source of conflict within religious organizations. But looking back at Moses's and Joshua's experiences, it is clear that the ability to serve and the endowment of wisdom from God should serve as key criteria in the transfer of leadership. The entire matter of succession should be submitted to the Lord, following the example of Moses. Moreover, once the decision is made, it must be reported to the public in an appropriate way. Joshua's collaboration with Eleazar would be important in order to effectively lead God's people into the promised land. God never directs one leader independently of His other chosen instruments.

28:1—29:40. Offerings in the Cultic Calendar.

The offerings described in this section would be required at prescribed intervals in the promised land (see also Lev. 23). There were daily (vv. 3–8; not included in Lev. 23), weekly (vv. 9–10), and monthly sacrifices (vv. 11–15; not mentioned in Lev. 23), as well as offerings for the specific festivals (28:16—29:40). Four kinds of offerings were envisaged for the festivals: whole/burnt offerings, which consisted of burning the flesh of the whole animal; cereal/grain offerings (grain and oil); drink offerings or libations (wine); and sin/purification offerings (29:39). The various offerings presented to God during the festivals were acts of faith through which the Israelites were to express their gratitude to God for His saving actions and for the successful harvests He provided for them. They were also an expression of their commitment to Him.

In other words, the performance of sacrifices at regular intervals, particularly the sin offering, should have reminded the Israelites that God dwelled permanently in their midst and that, consequently, they were in constant need of atonement and cleansing from sin. The sacrifices also developed within the people an attitude of thanksgiving to God, compliance with His covenant, and commitment to Him, as well as the conviction of being accepted by Him. The calendrical sacrifices functioned as constant reminders of God's presence, His holiness, His grace, and, above all, His acts of salvation within the history of His people.

There were several festivals in Israel: the Passover (28:16; cf. Lev. 23:5), the Festival of Unleavened Bread (28:17–25; cf. Lev. 23:6), the Festival of Harvest (28:26–31; cf. Lev. 23:15–21), the Festival of Trumpets (29:1–6; cf. Lev. 23:23–25), the Day of Atonement (29:7–11; cf. Lev. 23:26–32), and the Festival of Tabernacles (29:12–38; cf. Lev. 23:33–43). These different festivals were organized in the context of the agricultural year and the harvests. The Passover and the Festival of Unleavened Bread were scheduled during the barley harvest in spring. The Festival of Weeks or Harvest came during the wheat harvest around the month of June. The Festival of Trumpets and Tabernacles, as well as the Day of Atonement, were celebrated between September and October and corresponded with the ripening of grapes, figs, and olives. By celebrating these festivals at their appointed times, the Israelites expressed their gratitude to God for His provision of food, and they were protected from the influence of idolatrous and immoral pagan harvest festivals.

The festivals also aimed to reinforce relationships among the Israelites in the promised land. The festivals were intended to shape their identity, mission, and destiny, bolstering the idea that they were God's chosen people with one major purpose—namely, to be a blessing to other nations. Moreover, the celebrations would remind them of God's saving acts, His goodness, and His continuous care for them (see Lev. 23 for the typological significance of the festivals). Today, worship should also be centered on the goodness of God and His saving power, and it should be a time of joy and thanksgiving.

30:1–16. Legislation Regarding Vows. This section of Numbers records legislation regarding the seriousness of making a vow or swearing an oath to the Lord. The specific nature of the vow or the oath is not mentioned, except in one instance (v. 13). Five specific cases are discussed. First, if a man made a vow, he was not allowed to violate it (v. 2; see Deut. 23:21–23). Second, if a young woman still living in the house of her father made a vow, and her father knew about it but remained silent (v. 4), the vow was inviolable. But if her father overruled the vow when he learned about it, the Lord would yislah (from salakh) lah—"forgive or release her" (i.e., release her from fulfilling the vow; v. 5). Third, in the case of a young woman who had made a vow before getting married, her husband could annul the vow the moment he became aware of it, and the woman would be forgiven by the Lord. Otherwise the vow would be confirmed through his silence (vv. 6–8). Fourth, the case of a widow or divorced woman was like that of a man; she was bound to fulfill her vow (v. 9). Fifth, when a married woman made a vow, her husband could override it when he first heard of it. Otherwise, the vow would be binding. If, later on, the husband changed his mind and annulled the vow, the woman was forgiven, but her husband would bear her guilt (i.e., be responsible/punishable for the violation of her vow; vv. 10–15).

The annulment of a vow by a father or husband could have been motivated by concerns about the family's limited economic resources or by other marital responsibilities (e.g., when the wife took an oath to humble or deny herself; lit. "humble the soul"; v. 13), which usually meant fasting (Is. 58:3, 5), but which may have included abstaining from sexual relations. What is significant here is that a woman was free to make a vow by herself, without the prior approval of her father or husband, and that it was valid. The potential annulment by the father or husband could be linked to the woman owning insufficient property to fulfill her vow. The object of a vow was often a sacrifice, but it could also have included becoming a Nazirite.

31:1–54. War against the Midianites. At the suggestion of Balaam, the Midianites led Israel into a grievous sin, which resulted in a plague in which twenty-four thousand Israelites died. The Lord spoke again to Moses and instructed him to take vengeance on the Midianites before he died (vv. 1–2; cf. 25:16–18). The time of retribution had arrived, and the Lord ordered the people to go to war. It was not a common thing in the ANE or even in the Bible for a deity to command a war; this was usually done by kings. In response to God's command, Moses organized a military expedition against the Midianites. The new generation of Israelites was ready to cooperate with God and obey His instructions. Hence, they put into practice some of the previous legislations, including the use of trumpets in the context of war (v. 6; cf. 10:9), the purification from corpse defilement (v. 19; cf. 19:1–22), and the support for priests and Levites (v. 47; cf. 18:1–32).

Moses asked Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, to accompany the army to battle and to take with him some holy articles (v. 6), perhaps the Urim and Thummim (27:21). Most armies in the ANE employed priests, diviners, and portable sacred objects when they went to war. The gods were considered responsible for the outcome of the war and would be consulted on the battlefield in an effort to be victorious. In the case of Israel, the company of God's representative, the priest Phinehas, would encourage the army in its mission. His presence, along with sacred articles, could imply that the battle was under God's control, and this would encourage the Israelite soldiers to keep fighting.

At God's command, the Israelites fought against the Midianites and killed the five kings of Midian and many of their people, including Balaam, the unfaithful prophet (vv. 2, 7–8). However, the Israelite army spared the women and children and took them captive (v. 9). This action vexed Moses (v. 14). He then commanded the soldiers to kill all of the women who had ever had sexual contact with men because they were among the key agents who led Israel to apostasy (vv. 16–17). Male children were also destroyed so that they would not become a military threat to Israel in the future (v. 17; see "The Extermination of the Canaanites," p. 330, and "Holy Warfare," p. 372).

Though the war against Midian was carried out at God's command, the text does not indicate that this should serve as basis for individuals to avenge themselves. It is important to note that Moses's army did not exterminate the Midianites. The context of Numbers 31 indicates that the Lord used the Israelites as an instrument to enact His judgment on the Midianites, who were a threat to His plan of bringing His people into Canaan. The command to fight the Midianites was limited to a particular space and time, in relation to the settling of the promised land.

After the battle, the soldiers cleansed themselves, along with the plunder they took (vv. 19–24). The plunder was divided according to certain regulations. One portion went for the maintenance of the sanctuary, another was given to the priests and Levites, still another belonged to the soldiers, and the remainder was taken by the congregation (vv. 25–47). The Lord granted the Midianites and their possessions to the Israelites. In turn, as a sign of gratitude, the Israelites presented an offering to the Lord (vv. 48–54). Thus, they recognized that the victory over the Midianites belonged to God. As with Israel in times long past, the Lord is still ready to give victory to His people today as they continue to trust in His promises, power, and lordship in their lives.

32:1–42. Settlement in the Transjordan. The tribes of Reuben and Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh did not wait on God to designate their allotment. They requested the Transjordan land, which had already been conquered and which was well suited to their pastoral life (vv. 1–5). Their request was accepted, with the condition that they must participate in the conquest of the rest of the land. The agreement was recorded multiple times (vv. 25–27; 31–32; see Josh. 22:1–34).

The commitment of the tribes of Reuben and Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh reinforced the sense of united purpose, mutual responsibility, and interdependence among God's people. At that time, the children of Israel worked together as one people and conquered the promised land. When God's people decide to unite and focus together on a common goal, they can do mighty things for the Lord.

33:1–49. Israel's Journey from Egypt to Canaan.

In this section, Moses summarizes the journey of the people from Egypt to the plains of Moab. Many places mentioned in this passage have not yet been identified and may forever remain unknown. Place names as well as geographical environments are subject to change over time. However, the itinerary as it stands testifies that the Lord led His people progressively and in an organized manner from Egypt to the frontier of the promised land. They were about to leave the wilderness, which had been a place of rebellion and punishment, but it was also a place of divine care, grace, and love, and one where the relationship between God and the new generation of Israelites was finally solidified.

33:50—34:29. Division of the Promised Land.

Before the Israelites conquered the land, the Lord assured them that it was theirs and that they could begin dividing it among themselves. But He reminded them that one of their major tasks would be to destroy the idolatry that prevailed in the land (v. 52). Failing to do this would make the Canaanites a constant threat to their physical and spiritual well-being (v. 55) and would make the Israelites candidates for destruction (v. 56). The size of the tribe was the key criterion in the partitioning of the land (v. 54). The land was to be divided among the nine and a half tribes since the others were allotted shares in the Transjordan territory (34:1–12). Though the land belonged to God, He involved the people in its division and apportionment. They were to allocate the land even before it was conquered, and thus rely completely on the promise that the Lord would indeed give it to them (34:16–29). The Israelites were to be stewards of God's land. As He had directed their liberation from Egypt and their subsequent journey, He also had full control of the division of the land. God wanted to plant His people in a safe place, where faith could grow free from the weeds of sin and rebellion.

35:1–34. Levitical Cities and Cities of Refuge.

The Levites did not inherit any land (26:62). The Lord Himself was their share. He provided for them through the tithes and offerings that the people of Israel contributed. He also required the Israelite tribes to give to the Levites a number of cities and suburbs (35:1–3, 6). It should be noted that, similar to the previous instructions (33:50—34:29), these directives about Levitical cities and cities of refuge were given to the Israelites when they were still on the plains of Moab (i.e., before the conquest of the land; 35:1). The Lord was assuring them again that He would indeed fulfill His plan. There was no reason for them to despair. All they needed was faith and conviction regarding what is not seen (Heb. 11:1).

The Levitical cities would serve as dwelling places for God's servants. These cities were centers for religious instruction and aided the collection of revenue for God's work. Cities of refuge were places where persons who had committed unintentional homicide could seek safety. These cities prevented blood feuds and provided a safe haven to the accused person until the trial (v. 30). Moreover, since it was considered that the blood of the slain could only be expiated by another death, the death of the high priest eliminated the bloodguilt attached to the homicide. In other words, since the high priest was representative of the community at large, his death expiated accidental bloodshed (35:25, 28; Ex. 28:36–38; Lev. 16:16). Furthermore, in Israel, human life was of such high value that a murderer could not pay a ransom for the crime. He or she was to be put to death (35:31). This provision emphasizes the dignity and significance of human life in the sight of God.

This way of thinking short-circuited the common ANE custom of blood vengeance in which a person was obliged to avenge the death of a deceased relative by killing the guilty individual and even his or her family. In vv. 33–34, the Lord insisted that the land should be protected from all possible defilement, especially murder. The holy presence of the Lord in the land required the purity of its inhabitants.

36:1–13. Inheritance of Zelophehad's Daughters. This passage is a supplement to the law in 27:1–11, which allowed the daughters of Zelophehad to inherit the land of their father, who died without a male heir (27:3). The new legislation required women in this situation to marry men within their own tribe so that their inheritance would not be taken from their tribe and granted to another. In this way, the preservation of family property (land), which was one of the highest values in Israelite society, would not be jeopardized. Consequently, the additional law of Numbers 36 contributed to the stability of relationships within the community. The final statement of the book of Numbers (36:13) indicates that the commandments and the instructions that Moses received on the plains of Moab came from the Lord. These regulations were intended to prepare the Israelites for the conquest of the promised land and to clarify how they should live in it. To conquer Canaan, they needed to trust fully in God's leadership. They were to properly organize themselves by taking the census, dealing honestly with leadership succession, and fighting under God's command.

The Lord also instructed them that once they occupied the land, their priority should be true worship and the reinforcement of civil and social rights. On the plains of Moab, at the very border of the promised land, God's instructions strengthened the hope of the Israelites that they would inherit what God had promised them, despite their moments of despair. At this juncture, they stood before the land and anticipated the fulfillment of God's promises to their forefathers and to themselves. Christians too stand waiting, looking for a new heaven and a new earth where righteousness reigns (2 Pet. 3:13).

DEUTERONOMY

INTRODUCTION

Title. Deuteronomy is the final book of the Jewish Torah, also known as the Pentateuch—this name is based on the Greek title of the five books of Moses. In Hebrew the book is known as seper debarim (“Book of Words”), a title taken from its opening line, “These are the words...” (1:1). The Greek translation of the OT (LXX) sets the ground for the name Deuteronomion (“Second Law”)—a designation derived from the instructions given for an eventual king of Israel, which stipulated that he would write for himself a copy of the law on a scroll (17:18). The book reiterates the Decalogue of Exodus 20 almost word for word in Deuteronomy 5, as well as many of the laws found in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers. However, because of this title, the reader of the book may get the wrong impression—unintended by the author—that Deuteronomy is only a series of speeches or sermons that review Israel’s history, including the Exodus narrative and God’s instructions to the people as they journeyed toward the promised land. However, the primary intention of these speeches was to motivate the people to remain faithful to God.

Authorship. Deuteronomy identifies Moses as the author of its content: “These are the words which Moses spoke to all Israel” (1:1). The thirty-eight occurrences of the name Moses, together with the use of the first-person pronoun, support the idea of Mosaic authorship. Also, the NT upholds Moses as the author of Deuteronomy: Jesus referred to Moses as the author of the law of divorce found in Deuteronomy 24:1–4 (cf. Matt. 19:7–8; Mark 10:3–4), and Stephen and Peter cite the prophetic word found in Deuteronomy 18:15–19 about the raising of a prophet like as being spoken by Moses himself (cf. Acts 3:22; 7:37). An exception of Mosaic authorship, however, is chapter 34, which narrates Moses’s death. Joshua, the Israelite leader following Moses, may have recorded this chapter.

Date and Backgrounds. The traditional date for the book of Deuteronomy places the Exodus from Egypt in the fifteenth century (approx. 1447 B.C.). After forty years of desert wanderings, Israel’s new generation arrived in the fields of Moab, where Moses spoke the words of Deuteronomy to them (Deut. 1:3).

With the rise of the Enlightenment, the prevailing consensus among Jewish and Christian scholars about the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy and its date of composition changed. Today, many critical scholars believe that the book of Deuteronomy was the scroll found in the Jerusalem temple during the reform of King Josiah in 622 B.C. (2 Kin. 22:8–23:3; 2 Chr. 34:14–33), and that the scroll had been only recently composed and placed in the temple. Others hold that Deuteronomy is the result of Josianic reform. In any case, critics view Deuteronomy as composed by Jewish scribes and fictionally attributed to Moses.

However, not all scholars are willing to date Deuteronomy late. Many still hold to an early date of composition based on the inner-biblical testimony. The use of archaic language and literary devices such as inclusio, chiasms, key words, and thematic links point to the cohesive literary structure of the book, which bears close resemblance to late, second millennium B.C. Hittite treaties. These features appear across the entire book of Deuteronomy and show evidence for the unity of authorship and an early date of composition.

Theology and Purpose. Deuteronomy is often regarded as “the theology book” of the OT. Similar to Romans in the NT, Deuteronomy reviews God’s gracious acts toward Israel and lays the foundation for the messages of the prophets who followed Moses. The book consists of Moses’s passionate farewell address to Israel, cast into the form of an ancient covenant document. Its content centers around God's faithfulness in fulfilling His promises to the patriarchs, which were manifested in Israel's miraculous Exodus and the instructions God gave them. Deuteronomy systematizes the accounts of Exodus through Numbers into a manifesto calling Israel to respond to God's grace with unreserved love and loyalty.

1. God's Faithfulness. The 120-year-old Moses addressed the new generation of Israelites who camped in the fields of Moab and reminded them of the promises God made to their ancestors (Deut. 2:14-15; Num. 13-14). Moses highlighted God's covenant faithfulness and exhorted the people to be faithful and obedient to Him as their covenant Lord. There would be blessings for such obedience, but curses for disobedience (Deut. 27-30). Deuteronomy's purpose was to prepare the new generation of the Lord's chosen people to be His kingdom representatives in the land He had promised in the Abrahamic covenant. Loyalty to God was to be grounded in the fulfillment of God's redemptive promises to them. The book portrays a reliable God who would deliver to the people the future He offered them through His wonderful promises. Deuteronomy's spiritual emphasis and its call to a total commitment to the Lord in worship and obedience inspired references to its message throughout the rest of Scripture. In particular, the Former Prophets division of the Hebrew Bible (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings; see "Introduction to the Old Testament Historical Books," p. 350) is thoroughly imbued with the style, themes, and motifs of Deuteronomy. Among the Latter Prophets, Jeremiah also reflects a strong influence from this book.

2. God's Love. The reciprocal love of the Lord for His people, and that of the people for the Lord as their sovereign God, pervades the whole book. In fact, God's love seems to be Deuteronomy's main theological theme. The election of Israel was not based on the people's qualities, but solely on God's love toward a small and insignificant people. The deliverance of Israel from bondage in Egypt was a fundamental expression of His love as well as the fulfillment of His promises. Furthermore, because of His loving grace, God assigned them a home in a bounteous and fertile land. In response to all these benefits, it was the individual Israelite's duty to fear and to love the Lord. The love of God is portrayed as His full commitment to them and as an all-absorbing personal devotion of the people to Him. Love is the primary motivator for human duty. The Israelite was to love God with undivided affection ("with all your heart and with all your soul," 6:5), thereby renouncing everything inconsistent with loyalty to Him.

3. Love as the Rejection of Idolatry. God's covenant with Israel (Ex. 19-24) constituted the backbone of the challenge to remain obedient to Him, especially in view of the temptations that they would face among the Canaanites. In order to motivate Israel to start anew in the promised land, Moses cast his speeches into the framework of a new covenant relationship between God and Israel that placed younger generations in their parents' footsteps when they encountered God at Mount Sinai. God called each Israelite to experience by faith the same redemptive events and respond to them with trust and obedience. Loyalty in the expression of love toward God would bring an earnest repudiation of all false gods and idolatrous rites and practices. This loyal love was also to express itself as a cheerful and ready acquiescence to the positive commandments that God had laid down. God repeatedly and emphatically warned Israel against the temptations of idolatry and of the perils of yielding to it. In this context, they would exterminate Canaan's heathen populations. No intermarriage or any other relationship with them was to be permitted, and their places of worship and religious symbols were to be completely destroyed. Israel was always to remember that they were a "holy" people to the Lord (Deut. 7:6; 14:2, 21; 26:19; 28:9). The Canaanite forms of divination and magic were not to be tolerated. While other nations relied upon oracles of fortune-tellers and soothsayers, Israel would rely on the Lord's prophets for divine counsel and guidance (28:9-19). Instruction was given regarding the worship of the true God so that Israel would not follow heathen rites. Part of this worship included the celebration of the three great annual festivals (the Festival of Unleavened Bread, the Festival of Weeks, and the Festival of Tabernacles), the offering of all sacrifices, and the performance of other religious duties at a single central sanctuary where God would put His name (12:5-7, 11, 14, 18, 26). Obedience to these commandments was to be sincere and from the heart, and would bring with it the blessing of the Lord. Disobedience, on the other hand, would end in national disasters and exile (6:14-15; 7:12-16; 8:19, and especially chap. 28).

4. Love and Practicing Justice. The practical expression of loving God was not confined to Israel's religious duties, but also embraced their social and domestic life. The laws included in chapters 12 to 26 contain details for the moral and social well-being of the community that every Israelite was to follow. Love of God translated into love of one's neighbor. Any act detrimental to a neighbor's welfare was to be avoided. The moral principles that the book insists on are justice, integrity, equity, philanthropy, and generosity. Judges were to be appointed in every city to administer justice with strict impartiality so that these principles were followed (26:18–20). Fathers were not to be condemned judicially for the crimes of their children, nor children for the crimes of their fathers (24:16). Just weights and measures were to be used in all commercial transactions (25:13–16). Grave moral offenses were punished severely. Death was the penalty not only for murder but also for the rebellious behavior of a son toward his parents, for unchastity, for adultery, and for kidnapping (21:18–21; 22:20–27; 24:7).

5. Love and Caring for the Needy. The governing motive of the laws of Deuteronomy was philanthropy—compassion and charity shown toward those in need and in difficult life situations. These included those in need of a loan (15:7–11), slaves at the time of manumission (15:13–15), fugitives (13:15–16), hired servants (14:14–15), strangers (i.e., foreign residents), orphans, and widows (cf. 14:29). The Israelites' own past as foreigners and slaves was evoked in order to promote gratitude and a sense of sympathy toward the needy (10:19; cf. 15:15; 16:12; 24:18, 22). Deuteronomy promotes a spirit of tolerance, equity, and regard for the welfare of others like no other book of the OT. Israel was to live within an atmosphere of generous devotion to God and large-hearted benevolence toward human beings. Following the principles found in this book would ennoble, elevate, and refine the entire life of the community.

6. Love and Hope. The strong concern in Deuteronomy for rightful living anticipated rightful living in the land that the Lord had promised to Israel. Previous residents had corrupted the land through their inhumane and idolatrous practices, and their future was removal from it. Israel was now ready to possess it and to make it a center for the worship of the Lord who had brought the people out of Egypt. While on the plains of Moab, Moses informed them about the future and the impact of their hope on the present. In terms of their loving commitment to the Lord and to each other, they were to live the way they would eventually live in the promised land. Their future, the realization of hope, would depend to a large extent on that commitment. It could be characterized by blessings based on God's promises or by curses that would result from the rejection of God's promises. They could choose life or death, but the divine intention for them was life.

Literary Features. From a literary point of view, Deuteronomy's structure reflects the suzerain-vassal treaties of the ancient Near East, specifically Hittite and Assyrian treaties. The elements of such treaties are reflected in the book's division: (1) Preamble (1:1–5); (2) Historical Prologue (1:6–4:49); (3) Stipulations (chaps. 5–26); (4) Curses and Blessings, or Covenant Ratification (chaps. 27–30); and (5) Succession Arrangements or Covenant Continuity, which includes the invocation of witnesses and directions for the disposition and public reading of the treaty (chaps. 31–34).

The book consists of a series of speeches that correspond to treaty documents in which the suzerain orally proclaimed his terms and conditions at the covenant ceremony to the vassals. The treaty style of the book is reflected in the characteristic "I/thou" form that is found in ancient Near Eastern suzerainty treaties. In line with the oral proclamation of the covenant text was the response by the vassal during the covenant ceremony. An example of such a response appears in the text of King Esarhaddon of Assyria (681–669 B.C.), which was found in the royal city of Nimrud. The text contains a self-maledictory oath binding the vassal to the lord's stipulations and repeats a summary of these stipulations in the response. Likewise, Deuteronomy mentions the "Amen" that was to be uttered by the Israelites in the course of their ceremony (27:15–26; cf. 26:17–18; 29:12). Thus, the farewell speeches of Moses were the ceremonial words of a covenant ritual calling the people to accept the treaty offered to them by God. The formal structure of these speeches closely followed fixed ceremonial/legal traditions within the context of a passionate liturgical address.

The example that scholars cite as exhibiting the book's treaty pattern in a miniature format is Deuteronomy 4. This chapter has the following constitutive features: (1) the identification of the speaker (vv. 1–2, 5, 10); (2) the appeal to covenant history (e.g., vv. 10–12, 20–24); (3) the basic stipulation of undivided allegiance (e.g., vv. 15–18); (4) the blessing/curse sanctions (v. 27); (5) the invocation of witnesses (v. 26); and (6) the arrangements for the perpetuation of the covenant (vv. 9–10, 21–22). This brief passage stands as a reflection of the treaty pattern of Moses's speeches and signifies the unity of the book. It is also an interesting indication of how Moses viewed the occasion on the banks of the Jordan River. One might say that in his mind, Moses understood the entire ceremony not just as a passionate farewell speech but as a call for decision making, a solemn dedication service, and a sending ceremony of the younger generation under the protective and guiding governance of their supreme Lord. Moses himself had served the Lord, and he anticipated the same from Israel. The speeches were filled with exhortations recounting important historical events, prophetic utterances, and poetic orations.

COMMENTARY

1:1—4:43

MOSES'S FIRST DISCOURSE: REMEMBERING THE GRACE OF YAHWEH

Chapters 1–4 are often referred to as the “preamble” of Deuteronomy. Moses recalled key events that occurred during the forty years of wanderings in the desert after the Israelites left Sinai. He recapped the history of their journey for a couple of reasons: (1) this younger generation was not the group who experienced these significant events, and (2) he was reminding them of all that God had done to bring them to this historic point. To understand what is to come, we must understand what has gone before; both are indispensable to biblical hope.

This introduction mentions that Moses told the people everything that the Lord had commanded (1:3), and he also expressed his own emotion. He focused specifically on episodes difficult for him: when he needed help in managing such a large group of people, when the spies presented their negative report, and when he was punished. Moses was an old man who had carried a tremendous burden. Some commentators find contradictions with the original narrative in this review of past experiences. For example, Moses centered on his own role in the appointing of the leaders of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, without addressing Jethro's as Exodus does (1:12–17; Ex. 18:17–23). Moses mentioned that the people suggested sending spies into Canaan before they took possession of it, whereas Numbers mentions only God's command (Num. 13:1–2). Yet these narratives are not contradictory, but rather complementary: Moses commanded the people to do what Jethro had suggested, and God commanded Moses to do what the people had suggested. Most surprising of all is Moses's claim that it was due to God's anger over the Israelites' refusal to enter Canaan at Kadesh Barnea that he was refused entry as well (Deut. 1:37; cf. 3:26; 4:21). No mention is made of his own act of disobedience (Num. 20:8–12). These two events are closely associated in the biblical narrative. Here Moses is right in the sense that if they had entered Canaan when they were supposed to, those events would not have happened, and Moses would have entered the promised land. In the present context, Moses chose to highlight the rebellion of the people and its impact on his own life, which complemented what he wrote in Numbers. Thus, he accurately placed responsibility on the Israelites for not entering Canaan and for rebelling at Meribah.

In chapter 2, Moses recounts God's faithfulness and provisions (Deut. 2:7). There is an image of God as a gentle Guide who carefully directed Israel's steps. He told Moses when to pass by a nation peacefully and when to fight, and Israel followed His orders (2:37). Due to their faithfulness, God led them to military victory over the territory east of the Jordan River in preparation for their conquest of Canaan. Conversely, here God appears as a mighty warrior (3:22; cf. Ex. 14:14). Moses's speech of remembrance was meant to encourage the Israelites in what they were about to do. God led them to victory before, and He would do it again.

It is difficult to understand why Moses's account in the first chapters of Deuteronomy is so selective in its detail and condensed in scope. But we should understand that his address was meant to summarize forty years of history and personal experiences into a short period of time. Also, Moses was speaking to a crowd of millions of people and was possibly relying on others who shouted to those who were further back in the crowd. He had to be concise in order to avoid misunderstanding. This reminds us of Jesus's words in the Sermon on the Mount in Matthew 5. Jesus condensed God's laws, which were written in large parts of the OT, into eight statements, which we call the Beatitudes. Surely, He did that not for the sake of the disciples or for the learned among the people sitting in front of him, but for the crowds who had gathered around them. A speaker is always aware of his audience and chooses the right discourse for the occasion. Moses chose to focus on the events that he saw as significant and that pointed to one indisputable fact: the Israelites had made it to the promised land not because of their efforts, but because of God's faithfulness.

The first three chapters of Deuteronomy relate bittersweet memories for Moses. He stood before the people he loved, and this was his last chance to address them before he died. He was disappointed at not being able to enter the promised land, but he had spent his life following God's orders under all circumstances. He had been a loyal servant and shepherd. Through most of the journey, we see him as a strong leader who persevered through conditions that most of us would find intolerable. But that is why God had chosen him for this mission. He had the right attitude and was totally committed to do what God had set before him. Now, at the end, we get a much more human picture of Moses. He was a man with the same weaknesses all humans share. The difference is that his faith was unshakable. No matter how bad things became, Moses never questioned God's faithfulness or love. We can learn from his example. While our lives may not turn out exactly as we had hoped, we can trust that God makes all things work together for the good of those who love Him (Rom. 8:28). In Him, we are more than conquerors (Rom. 8:37).

Preamble to Moses's First Discourse

The first five verses give the time and place of the addresses that make up the book. What follows consists of the laws and teachings Moses addressed to the people in the land of Moab, shortly before they entered the land of Canaan. Critical scholars argue for a multiple authorship of the book on the basis of the three introductions to Moses's speech in vv. 1, 3, and 5. However, traditional commentators have made suggestions about their coherence, based on their chiastic design:

- A The site of Moses's speeches—east of (lit. "across" or "beyond"—Heb. 'eber) the Jordan (v. 1)
- B The foreshadowing of the first message of the first speech (v. 2)
- C The date when Moses began the speeches (v. 3)
- B' The foreshadowing of the second message of the first speech (v. 4)
- A' The site where he delivered his speeches (v. 5)

The speaker of Deuteronomy was Moses himself, apart from a few connecting passages and the narrative about his last days. Moses reviewed the past forty years and prepared Israel for the future. He brought the laws together with the lessons learned and urged the people to keep both in mind.

Though the voice of God is heard only five times in the book of Deuteronomy (31:14b, 16b–21, 23b; 32:49–52; 34:4b), and the introduction alerts the reader to the voice of Moses, the authority behind the book was God (1:3). Moses served as the mediator of Yahweh's covenant with Israel and as a human conduit of divine revelation at Sinai. He was God's authoritative spokesperson.

Those addressed were "all Israel" and "the children of Israel" or "the Israelites" (1:1, 3). These two expressions are scattered throughout the book. The former suggests that Moses spoke to the community of faith; the latter highlights the nation's ethnic cohesion—they were the descendants of the patriarch Jacob, who was renamed Israel. The introduction gives the location of the speeches of Moses as be'eber hayyarden—a phrase variously translated as "beyond the Jordan," "east of the Jordan," or "on this side of the Jordan." More specifically, the text locates the speeches as being given in the land of Moab. The exact location seems to be at the northern edge of Moab (32:49; 34:1).

The time of Moses's address was in the fortieth year, on the first day of the eleventh month. The peoples' departure from Egypt appears to mark the beginning of Israel's history. On Mount Sinai, God constituted them into a holy nation (Ex. 19:6). This reference designates how much time had passed since the Exodus (Ex. 12:2). This chronological marker is synchronized with the rest of the Pentateuch (cf. Ex. 16:1; 19:1; 40:17; Num. 1:1; 9:1; 12:11; 33:38). A second chronological marker is that Moses delivered the speeches after the defeat of the two Amorite kings, Sihon and Og, who ruled east of the Jordan (Deut. 1:4). These victories provided concrete proof that when Israel was faithful to Yahweh, He would fight for them.

Moses proclaimed to the Israelites all that Yahweh had commanded him (v. 3). He functioned as an interpreter of the law (1:5), prophet (18:15; 34:10), and pastor (cf. Num. 27:17; Is. 63:11), delivering his final sermon before he passed from the scene. The use of the verb ba'ar ("make plain," "explain," or "expound") to designate Moses's activity refers to more than mere verbal exposition. The Hebrew word has links to the Akkadian notion of covenant making in the sense of confirming or putting a legal document into force. Through the exposition and the proclamation of the performance of the covenant renewal rituals implied in the book, the Israelite covenant ratified at Horeb was put into force for the new generation. In this sense, Moses was not just making plain the word of God, but confirming and legalizing it. The expression hat-torah hazzo't ("this law") characterizes what follows as legal instruction. Moses taught the people (Deut. 4:5, 14; 5:31; 6:1; 31:19), and they learned the Torah (4:10; 5:1; 17:19; 31:12–13). The bulk of the book consists of instruction and exhortation, and when laws are cited, they are surrounded by exhortations.

Deuteronomy involves two kinds of Torah: oral and written. Deuteronomy 1:5 and 4:8 classify Moses's first address as oral. However, within the reports of Moses's second (6:6–9; 11:18–21; 17:18–20; 27:1–8; 28:58–61) and third (29:14–29; 30:8–11) addresses, we find numerous references to a written Torah, which is the transcribed version of his speeches. As if to dispel any doubt about the genre of the book, the introduction concludes with a verb of speech: "saying" (v. 5). Moses stood before the people as pastor, delivering his final sermon at the command of Yahweh and pleading with the Israelites to remain faithful to their God once they crossed the Jordan and settled down in the land promised to their ancestors.

1:6—4:40

Essence of Moses's First Discourse: The Grace of Calling

Moses's first discourse serves as a prologue to the book. Its description of historical events precedes the proclamation of the law in 4:44—28:68. Structurally, this speech is divided into two parts: a retrospective view (1:6—3:29), and an exhortation to obey God's laws (4:1–40). Complemented with a marked shift in style and tone, the transition to the second part is formally signaled by an exhortation to "hear/listen" (4:1). While 1:6—3:29 consists largely of historical collections, 4:1–40 bears a distinct sermonic style, as it is Moses's call for his people not to forsake the Lord and to go after other gods. They both emphasize the importance of obedience to God.

The two parts are linked by at least four theological themes: (1) Yahweh's presence (1:30–33, 42; 2:7; 4:9–14, 36–39) and (2) Yahweh's election of Israel. Although chapter 2 casts a broad vision in which Yahweh allotted lands to the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites (2:5, 9, 19), Israel's title to the land was based on the election of the ancestors and the divine promise of land to them (1:8, 21, 35). The rescue of Israel from Egypt was the decisive proof of Israel's elect status (1:27, 30; 3:24; 4:32–33). (3) Obedience was the appropriate response to divine grace. In 1:19, 26–46, obedience means heading for and entering the land of Canaan; in chapter 4, obedience involves adherence to Yahweh's will as revealed at Horeb, especially to the prohibition of idolatry (vv. 1–8, 15–24, 40). (4) The land of Canaan was Yahweh's gracious grant to His chosen people (cf. 1:7–8, 20, 36; 2:29; 3:20, 24–28; and 4:1–5, 21–26, 38–40). To these features we should add Moses's personal references to his experience with the people (1:37; 3:26; 4:21). In developing these themes, Moses told Israel's story backwards in four stages: Yahweh's care and guidance of Israel from Horeb to the plains of Moab (1:6—3:29); Yahweh's revelation of His will (4:1–8); Yahweh's covenant relationship with Israel (4:9–31); and Yahweh's salvation of Israel from the slavery of Egypt (4:32–38). In 4:37, there is a fifth stage: Yahweh's love and election of their ancestors.

By recounting Israel's recent past and concluding with an impassioned appeal, Moses summoned Israel to not rebel like their ancestors (1:6—3:29). Instead, they should respond to Yahweh's amazing grace with wholehearted devotion. Only then would their future be secure (4:39–40).

1:6—2:1. Yahweh's Grace to the Exodus Generation. This passage can be divided into three sections (1:6–33; 1:34–41; and 1:42—2:1) that summarize the relationship between God and Israel from Mount Sinai to the border of the land of Canaan. The passage begins with God's command to Israel to proceed and possess the land of Canaan, His gracious gift to them. When they reached the border of the land, Moses also exhorted them to take possession, but the people disregarded the exhortations of God and Moses, refusing to possess the land because of fear at the report of the spies (1:6–33). This was one of the most grievous sins: the rebellion of the people against the loving grace of the covenant Lord. Consequently, God withdrew His promise to give the land to this rebellious generation of Israelites. He vowed that none of them, except Joshua and Caleb, would enter Canaan, and commanded the people to turn back to the wilderness. When they decided to enter the land of Canaan and fight for it (1:34–41), God warned them against this plan and left them to their own designs. Without the presence of their covenant Lord, they were defeated by the Canaanites. Disgruntled, they decided to obey God's command and turned back to the wilderness. Their disobedience and lack of faith in God resulted in the refusal to accept and possess the divine gift of the land of Canaan (1:42—2:1). In a sense it could be said that God extended His grace to the Exodus generation by not destroying them immediately. By allowing them to live, God gave them the opportunity to repent before they died as a consequence of their sin.

2:2—3:29. Yahweh's Grace to the New Generation. In order to enter the land, the Israelites were to approach it from the east, which required passing through the territories of five tribal groups: Edom, Moab, Amon, and the Amorite kingdoms of Sihon and Og. Israel was commanded to not harass Moab (2:9). The Moabites and Ammonites were descendants of Lot, the nephew of Abraham (Gen. 19:36–38). Since they and the Edomites were relatives of Israel, and the Lord had given them their land, He did not permit the Israelites to attack them (cf. Deut. 2:4—7:19). Feeling threatened by the presence of the Israelites, the Moabites and the Midianites (also related to Israel, Gen. 25:2) came together and tried to destroy Israel (Num. 22–25). This time God fought for His people, made them victorious, and gave them the land of King Og, which was east of the Jordan, from Aroer to Gilead. Israel was already beginning to possess the promised land; prophecy was being fulfilled.

4:1–40. Yahweh's Grace with the Future in Mind. Moses described how Israel reached the border of Canaan and stressed that the future welfare of the new generation would depend on their obedience to God's Torah. In vv. 2–8, he explained why obedience to the Torah was crucial: (1) The Torah in itself is normative (v. 2), and nothing should be added or deleted from God's word; (2) Obedience to the Lord's word is a matter of life and death (vv. 3–4), as was demonstrated in the experience at Baal Peor when Israel worshiped Baal (Num 25:1–9). All who followed Baal were destroyed, but those who were alive and standing before Moses were those who held fast by making a decisive and irreversible commitment to the Lord. They were a living testimony to the importance of obedience to God's will. (3) Obedience to the Torah was a high privilege (vv. 6–8). It was not a burden imposed on the people; it was a special privilege that would make the surrounding nations envious. They would recognize Israel's status as a great nation. Interestingly, the nations would understand the greatness of Israel as coming from Yahweh, and not from its own qualities.

There was no other nation like Israel (vv. 6–8). Israel was unique because God was near His people, dwelling among them and answering their prayers. When the people who worshiped other gods prayed, their gods remained silent because they could not hear. While Israel's God was not represented by images set up in the temple or in homes, He was near and He heard the cries of His people whenever they cried to Him. Hearing was more important than seeing. Furthermore, the Israelites were privileged because they knew what their God expected of them—righteous living in obedience to laws that were just and righteous. Righteousness was not an abstract norm, but was related to concrete ethical acts that were directed toward the interests of others and that led to a harmony between the people and God. Though the Lord gave them an elevated status, they were not to boast of this, but were to become a blessing and a light to the nations.

In the major section of chapter 4 (vv. 9–31), Moses recollected three main aspects of God's dealing with His covenant people. He mentioned the word "covenant" three times (vv. 13, 23, 31), and this term provides the key to the main idea of this section and to the literary structure of the verses. Each occurrence of the word "covenant" alludes to a particular moment in the covenantal history of Israel with God: the origins of the covenant (vv. 9–14); the essence of the covenant (vv. 15–24); and the permanence of the covenant (vv. 25–31).

With regard to the origins of the covenant, the people heard the address of the Lord when they stood at the foot of Mount Sinai. He introduced them to His covenant, which means that He initiated the relationship with Israel. He also identified the covenant partners, defined the terms of the covenant, and determined the consequences for compliance and noncompliance. The difference between this covenant and the Hittite or Assyrian treaties was that the Sinai covenant was not imposed on Israel by an overlord upon a defeated vassal. Out of His great compassion, God had rescued Israel from an oppressive overlord to establish a loving relationship with the people for the sake of their well-being. He then asked the people to fear, or revere and respect, Him and to be in awe of His amazing and mighty saving power. This kind of fear or reverence is grounded in love, which encourages God's people to obey Him and discourages disobedience. John writes about this type of fear when he calls believers to love God as our Father and Friend, and not to fear His judgment (1 John 4:18).

The essence of the covenant with Israel is captured in Deuteronomy 4:15–24. Israel knew that God has no form (v. 15). There was no way that one could know how to make an idol that would be an accurate material representation of Him. Another religious perversion that Moses warned against was the worship of the sun, moon, and stars. Ancient Near Eastern people perceived these as representations of divine beings who governed the earth. Moses described five concepts of such worship: raising eyes heavenward, gazing at the heavenly array with devotion, being seduced into thinking that there is more to them than mere celestial bodies, prostrating before them, and submitting as vassals to the gods. The last clause of v. 19 is one of the most difficult in Deuteronomy. Some take it to mean that the Lord assigned heavenly bodies as objects of worship to the nations, while reserving Himself for Israel. First, this interpretation not only goes against the Lord's emphasis on worshiping Him only, but also assumes that the verb "to worship" is implied after the verb "to give/apportion." Second, the fact that the Lord gave them to all the nations means that their role was defined by the Lord. Third, this role is defined in the Creation account of Genesis 1:14–19. These heavenly bodies were not created to be worshiped, but to function as sources of light over the whole earth and to establish times and seasons. These divinely assigned functions are for the benefit of all the nations of the earth.

Verse 20 is the center point of the passage. It highlights Israel's special relationship with the Lord: (1) Israel was the product of the Lord's saving actions; (2) Israel was rescued from the iron furnace (used to smelt iron) of Egypt to be God's covenant partner; and (3) Yahweh claimed Israel as His own special possession. The text highlights the Lord's loving relationship with Israel. Verse 24 identifies the Lord's relationship using marital language. God is a "jealous God"—not envious, but jealous to protect His exclusively intimate, marriage-like covenant relationship with His people.

The covenant between God and Israel was to last into the future; it was to be permanent. Moses spoke (vv. 25–31) of the future, and his tone became pessimistic. The covenant relationship would disintegrate, and Israel would descend into idolatry. This recognition was so important that Moses called heaven and earth to witness against Israel (v. 26), using the language of a formal treaty/covenant between God and the Israelite nation. Other ancient Near Eastern treaty documents, such as those of Hittite kings, called upon various gods to serve as witnesses to hold treaty partners accountable. Since the Israelites believed in only one God (6:4), Moses instead personified and invoked heaven and earth (from which people could not escape) as witnesses.

Moses's speech was filled with irony and sarcasm as he spoke of the folly of idolatry: instead of the creature worshiping the Creator, the humans worshiped their own creations, idols formed by human hands. If they worshiped idols, the Israelites would face a total disintegration of the relationship between God, the nation, and the land. But suddenly the tone of the speech changed again. According to v. 29, Moses saw a change in the people's disposition. In Exile, when Israel would suffer and worship idols, the people would start to seek God, and He, amazingly, would let Himself be found. Unlike other deities, He is a God without a particular territory; He is the God of personal relationships. A reversal would take place out of distress. In the land of exile, the people would seek their God, He would listen, and they would find Him (vv. 29–30). They would turn back toward their God. Moses assured them that the Lord would not abandon Israel, would not destroy Israel, and would not forget His covenant with their ancestors (v. 31). These are powerful promises that gave shape to a hopeful future.

In vv. 32–40, Moses's first speech reaches its climax. God is incomparable and gracious beyond understanding in the revelation of His will (vv. 1–8) and in His invitation to the covenant relationship (vv. 9–31). Moses called the audience to engage in exhaustive historical research: Has anything like this great event (Israel's salvation) ever happened? Has anybody ever heard about such a thing? Has another nation ever heard the voice of God? If it had, did somebody live to tell about it? Has any other god done what Israel's God has done in taking a people for Himself from the midst of another nation?

Moses declared that Israel's rescue from Egypt was unique and unparalleled in history. Israel's God is unique. He revealed His acts and demonstrated that He alone is God. He chose Israel because He loved their ancestors (v. 37). Love is the basis of the covenant relationship. This was a revolutionary statement in the context of the divine/human covenant relationships of the ANE. Love was the foundation of the Sinai covenant, including the Ten Commandments. Moses appealed to the people to obey the will of God for their own good (v. 40).

Epilogue to Moses's First Discourse

These verses are not part of Moses's address, but are a narrative appendix about the assignment of three cities to provide asylum for those who committed accidental manslaughter. The specific law about the cities of refuge appears in 19:1–13 and Numbers 35:9–34. In Numbers 35:14, the six cities to be chosen included three in the Transjordan. Deuteronomy 4:42, therefore, seems to be an abridgement of 19:3–5.

MOSES'S SECOND DISCOURSE: EXPLAINING THE GRACE OF YAHWEH

Before Israel entered the promised land, Moses communicated the laws to the people (Deut. 4:44—28:69). This speech is preceded by a description of the contents of the discourse and its setting (4:44–49). Moses described the historical circumstances under which God gave him the laws to be communicated to Israel (chap. 5). In the preamble, Moses presented the ideological basis of the laws and appealed for their observance (6:1—11:19). He then presented the laws (chaps. 12–26), described the mutual commitments made by God and Israel (26:16–19), and prescribed ceremonies to reaffirm the covenant after they entered the promised land (chap. 27). He finally announced promises and warnings as the consequences for fulfilling or violating the covenant (28:1–68). A subscription concludes the discourse (29:1).

Moses referenced the covenant made at Mount Sinai at the beginning and at the end of the speech (5:2; 28:68). The text sandwiches the core of the discourse within framing passages. Moses preceded and followed the laws with instructions about the ceremonies, reaffirming the covenant (11:29–30; 27). He also repeated the heading to the laws at their conclusion (11:32—12:1; 26:16). Below is the chiasmic structure of the second discourse (author's translations):

- A "The LORD our God made a covenant with us at Horeb" (5:2)
- B Ceremony at Mount Ebal and Gerizim (11:29–30)
- C "Take care to observe all the laws and rules that I have set before you today. These are the laws and rules that you must carefully observe..." (11:32—12:1)
- D The laws (12:2—26:15)
- C' "The LORD your God commands you this day to observe these laws and rules; take care to observe them..." (26:16)
- B' Ceremonies at Mount Ebal and Gerizim (27)
- A' "The covenant which He had made with them at Horeb" (29:1)

4:44–49

Preamble to Moses's Second Discourse

In the speech's preamble, the reference to the Torah—including the testimonies, statutes, and ordinances—points to the covenant stipulations given at Sinai and other regulations delivered during the time in the wilderness. Verse 46 links the speech specifically to the defeat of the Amorite kings.

5:1—26:19

Essence of Moses's Second Discourse: The Grace of the Covenant

Moses's second discourse involved specific legal stipulations. It dealt first with the Ten Commandments (chaps. 5–11), followed by legislation concerning ordinances involved in worship and social interaction (chaps. 12–26). Its text in Deuteronomy is in two parts. The first is largely sermonistic (5:1b—11:32), while parts of the second (12:1—29:1) are more formal, making more direct use of previously revealed prescriptions and concluding with covenant blessings and curses. However, Moses's pastoral voice runs throughout the speech. The exhortations were not inserted, as some critical scholars argue. These are vital in determining the genre of the book and are much more extensive in chapters 12–28 than is generally recognized. In the first address, there was a pastoral exhortation to covenant faith, and in the second, there were more detailed pastoral applications of covenant faith and life.

Chapters 5–11 subdivide into three parts, each of which begins with an exhortation to Israel to hear or listen (5:1b; 6:4; 9:1). By word count, these sections increase progressively in length: Deuteronomy 5:1b–6:3 consists of approximately 570 words; 6:4–8:20 has about 830 words; and 9:1–11:32 has approximately 1,150 words. Homiletically, these three parts represent three constituents of authoritative preaching: the Scripture lesson (5:1b–6:3), highlighting the foundations of covenant relationship; the theology arising from the Scripture (6:4–8:20), focusing on the essence of covenant relationship; and the appropriate response arising from that theology (9:1–11:32), demonstrating love for Yahweh as evidence of the covenant relationship. It is fitting that Moses begins this discourse on Yahweh's relationship with Israel by reciting the foundational covenant document, the Decalogue (cf. 4:13). This was the official statement of the covenant, and it fit that time's practice of covenant making. Since most of the younger generation of Israelites had grown up after the original revelation at Sinai, it was especially important for them to hear these words from Moses himself.

5:1–33. Principles of the Covenant Relationship. Moses's purpose in the first five verses was twofold: to challenge the generation he was addressing to take hold of what their parents failed to take hold of at Sinai and to highlight the importance of his teaching. His message was the same as what was revealed at Sinai, and he delivered it as the very message of God. With the opening summons calling Israel to hear/listen, Moses both challenged his hearers to listen and called for obedience to the will of the Suzerain. This summons also introduces the content of Moses's message: the revelation given by Yahweh through Moses at Sinai. As in 4:1, with this summons Moses also declared the goal of his address: the laws were to be learned and rigorously applied. The construction shamar-tem la'asotam ("keep by doing them") in 5:1 contrasts with 4:6, which used finite verbs for both "keep and do." This form in 5:1 occurs often in the book (e.g., 6:3, 25; 8:1) and is reminiscent of Genesis 18:19, where Yahweh calls on Abraham's descendants to keep (shamar) the way of Yahweh by doing ('asah) justice and righteousness.

Before Moses described the stipulations, he made an exceptional declaration: Yahweh did not make a covenant with their ancestors at Horeb, but with the people standing before Him (vv. 2–3). Verses 4 and 5 plainly state that it was to those present at his address, who were standing at the foot of the mountain, that the Lord spoke face to face. The modern reader may ask the question, "How could Yahweh make a covenant with this generation when some or most of them had not yet been born at the time of the Horeb/Sinai covenant?" Another question may arise concerning the reference in v. 3 to the ancestors. If Moses had in mind the former generation, his statement would seem to some to contradict Exodus 19–24, which clearly shows that God had made a covenant with the Israelites.

The ancestors could refer to the patriarchs, and in this case the contrast would be between the Horeb covenant and the covenant that God renewed with Abram in Genesis 15 (cf. Gen. 17). But Deuteronomy interprets the covenant rituals at Horeb and in Moab as the means by which the patriarchs' descendants were incorporated into the covenant that was originally made with them (cf. Gen. 17:7). It is natural to treat the reference to the ancestors ("fathers") as designating the Exodus generation. The association of the stipulations, decrees, and laws with the descendants of Israel who came out of Egypt (Deut. 4:45) suggests that this was how Moses understood the matter. The reason why this way of describing the covenant in 5:3 is not contradictory is because Moses was calling the new generation to identify itself with the events at Sinai. They were exhorted not to see what happened there as something that happened to their forefathers, the previous generation, but to view it as a covenant the Lord was making with them. They were invited to incorporate themselves into the redemptive history of Israel. Every new generation was to do this through covenant renewals because the covenant was made with Israel. By faith in God's redemptive power, they had been redeemed from Egypt. The new generation stood on the shoulders of the earlier generation, and God's previous speaking was relevant and applicable to them also.

Deuteronomy 5:6–21 recounts the Decalogue of Exodus 20:1–17, but it contains a number of differences and additions. These changes in the Deuteronomy version of the Decalogue were determined by the sermonic nature of the book and the contextualization of the Exodus text for the younger generation of Israelites standing at the border of the promised land (see "The Decalogue in Deuteronomy and Exodus," p. 322).

The Decalogue is foundational for later revelations in the OT. The prophets referred to the Ten Commandments and expounded their relevance when they admonished the people concerning their behavior toward God and each other. The Decalogue itself is cast as a complete entity in Exodus as well as in Deuteronomy. Its structure resembles ancient Near Eastern treaties, which were composed of distinct sections. The Deuteronomy document (as well as the Exodus one) includes its own formal introduction (v. 6), its own discrete number of stipulations (vv. 7–21), and an epilogue (v. 22).

5:6. Historical Prologue of the Decalogue.

The prologue is a fundamental part of the covenant document, similar to ancient Near Eastern treaties in which the prologue introduces the suzerain and summarizes the history of the relationship between the two parties of the covenant. Unlike many ancient Near Eastern vassal treaties, however, the Decalogue document does not speak of the suzerain God as conquering and defeating Israel; it does not reflect a superior's military conquest of Israel. Rather, the foundation of this document lies in the gracious actions of a God who rescued His people from those who held them in bondage. In his discourse, Moses addressed the people of Israel as being God's own people by divine grace (v. 6). God's grace created an environment of

The Decalogue in Deuteronomy and Exodus

As already indicated, when Exodus 20:1–17 and Deuteronomy 5:6–21 are compared, a number of differences and additions to the Ten Commandments are evident.

1. Minor Differences. Leaving the Sabbath commandment aside for now, we find in the text minor differences. Among them are those that have to do with Hebrew vowels and the conjunction “and” (Heb. waw) that links the two clauses. These differences are not abundant and do not in any way affect the meaning of the text.

2. Significant Variations. There are a number of places where there are more significant variations between the two accounts, which to a certain extent alter or enrich the sense of the passage. First, Exodus 20:8 has the verb “remember” as the key verb, whereas Deuteronomy 5:12 has the verb “keep.” The verb “remember” in Hebrew (zakar) has the sense of imprinting or impressing on something, while “keep, observe” (shamar) highlights care and stewardship. Second, Exodus 20:16 forbids giving “deceitful” testimony, while Deuteronomy 5:20 broadens this prohibition to “worthless” testimony. Third, there are several differences between Exodus 20:17 and Deuteronomy 5:21 in the prohibition about coveting what belongs to the neighbor. Exodus uses the same verb in both clauses: “desire, covet” (khamad). This verb indicates an emotional aspect—a desire or taking pleasure in something. It is sometimes used in a positive sense, but more commonly it suggests an inappropriate or uncontrolled, selfish passion. Deuteronomy uses this verb for the first clause, but uses a different verb (Heb. 'awah) for “desire” in the second clause. This verb can have a more calculating connotation to it. The other difference between Exodus 20:17 and Deuteronomy 5:21 is the order of items mentioned. Exodus places house first, followed by wife, manservant, maidservant, cattle, donkeys, and anything else. Conversely, Deuteronomy places wife first, followed by house, field, manservant, maidservant, cattle, donkeys, and anything else.

3. Additions to the Text. Additions to the Exodus version have resulted in a longer version of the Decalogue in Deuteronomy. Verse 12 (author's translation) contains the extra phrase “as Yahweh your God has commanded you.” Verse 14 adds “your cattle or your donkeys” and “so that your male servant and your female servant may rest just like you.” Verse 16 includes “as Yahweh your God has commanded you...in order that it may be well for you.” And v. 21 contains the extra word “field.”

Moses applied the Decalogue to the present and future life of the new generation. His additions were determined by the fact that they are part of a sermon in which he makes the Decalogue particularly relevant to the new generation. In the process, the content of the Decalogue was enriched and nothing was lost. Additionally, in some instances what is implicit in the Exodus text is made explicit in the Deuteronomy text.

benevolence toward Israel, expressing His desire for the people's well-being. The law was preceded by grace in the context of the gospel. Obedience to God's terms of well-being as outlined in the following commands represented a supreme response to grace, an act of worship in all aspects of life, involving reverential acts of submission and homage before the divine Sovereign.

5:7–21. Covenant Stipulations in the Decalogue. Moses's speech cast the terms of the covenant as second person singular commands without preconditions or consequences. Except for the Sabbath commandment and the command to honor parents, the stipulations were negative in form, and motive clauses were the exception rather than the rule. To interpret them as the law code for Israel alone would mean to fail in understanding their intention and meaning. They were cast in absolute, universal, and permanent terms. God's covenant document with Israel served to create a worldview intended to govern the relationship between the redeemed and their Redeemer, and between the members of the community. It has been correctly indicated that the Decalogue functioned as a type of constitution that provided the basis for later specifications of the laws as recorded in other parts of the Scriptures.

Furthermore, in Moses's discourse the Decalogue emphasized the responsibility of individuals before God and to each other. God claims exclusive allegiance and worship (vv. 7–10) and requires proper respect (v. 11). Respect is also expected toward one's household members (vv. 12–15), to one's parents (v. 16), and to one's neighbor and their property (vv.

17, 21b). Purity and fidelity in marriage are required (vv. 18, 21a), as well as respect for the property of others (v. 19), and the proper use of our words (v. 20). The first two commands (vv. 7–11) govern the vertical relationship of the Israelite with the Lord, and the last seven govern the horizontal relationship between the members of the community (vv. 16–21). Similar to the Exodus version of the Decalogue, here in Deuteronomy the Sabbath commandment receives prominent status by its central position and great quantity of words. Its theological content emphasizes a Sabbath rest designed for the entire household and is based on the Exodus experience of deliverance from bondage.

As argued previously, the modified formulations of the Deuteronomy version of the Decalogue should be understood on the basis of the sermonic aspect of the book and as a form of contextualization of the Exodus text for the young generation of Israelites standing at the border of the promised land. One of the most significant changes becomes apparent when one studies the Sabbath commandment (see below, "The Sabbath Commandment in Deuteronomy"). The expansion in Deuteronomy involves additions in vv. 12 and 14, concerning the list of all those who were to keep the Sabbath and be affected by Sabbath rest. At the end of v. 12, Moses added the very well-known fulfillment formula, "as the LORD your God commanded you." This formula occurs frequently in the Pentateuch and indicates the execution of a command given directly or indirectly by God. In Deuteronomy 5, the phrase appears three times (vv. 12, 15 [with slight variation], and 16). The three occurrences highlight the proclamation of the ten words.

The Sabbath Commandment in Deuteronomy

The greatest difference—one which has puzzled biblical scholars—between Exodus 20:8–11 and Deuteronomy 5:12–15 concerns the motivation clause for Sabbath observance. The Sabbath commandment in Deuteronomy 5:12–15 replaces the focus on Creation and God's rest on the seventh day (Ex. 20:11) with a focus on Israel's deliverance from Egypt (Deut. 5:15). Here, too, some speak about the changed historical situation of Israel, which was about to enter the promised land and needed to hear the law in applicable words.

1. The Deliverance Motivation. In the introduction to the Decalogue in Deuteronomy, Moses already focused on the applicability of the covenant and the covenant law to the new generation (Deut. 5:3). In addition, the deliverance motivation suggests that the Israelites were urged to observe the Sabbath because they were liberated from Egypt, which implies that they should give others the freedom to rest on this day. However, the deliverance motivation for the Sabbath also features prominently in the Sabbath commandment of the Covenant Code in Exodus 23:12. This text seems to be rooted in the Creation and contains the motif of God's compassionate interest in the liberation of the oppressed. Therefore, the deliverance motivation clause in Deuteronomy 5:14 does not contradict the Creation motive clause in Exodus 20:11. It appears to apply Creation themes such as rest, freedom, and equality to the actual life situation of the new generation of Israel.

2. Length of the Sabbath Commandment. The Sabbath commandment in Deuteronomy contains intricate parallelisms that show the correspondence between the Sabbath and the Exodus. Similar to the Sabbath commandment in Exodus 20, the commandment in Deuteronomy 5 is the longest, being about ten Hebrew words longer. Similar to the original version in Exodus 20, the first part of the Sabbath commandment in Deuteronomy 5 focuses on humanity (5:12–14), and the second part focuses on God, who liberated Israel from slavery (5:15).

The difference in length between the Exodus and Deuteronomy versions of the Sabbath commandment does not change its basic structure. Both versions are consistently marked by the twofold occurrence of the phrase “the Sabbath day” at the beginning and the end.

3. The Sabbath and the Individual. The text states that the Sabbath is given as an explicit command to the individual person. The personal meaning of the Sabbath is expressed four times by the second-person-singular suffix in the phrase “the LORD your God.” The following parallel structure shows the importance of the Sabbath as a commandment of the personal God of each individual Israelite:

- A “Observe the Sabbath day to keep it holy as the LORD your God [has] commanded you”
- B “The seventh day is a Sabbath to/ of the LORD your God”
- B' “The LORD your God brought you out of/from there”—i.e., Egypt
- A' “The LORD your God commanded you to make/celebrate the Sabbath day”

The fact that the phrase “the LORD your God” is used 308 times in the book of Deuteronomy testifies to its importance (the phrase occurs in Genesis only once, in Exodus twenty-seven times, in Leviticus twenty-six times, and in Numbers six times). Moreover, it is interesting to note that in the account of the Decalogue in Deuteronomy 5:6–21, the personal note is brought into view by the use of the phrase “the LORD your [singular] God,” which occurs in this passage nine times: three times in the commandments that precede the Sabbath commandment (vv. 6, 9, 11) and two times in the commandment that follows the Sabbath commandment (v. 16). The cluster of four occurrences of the phrase “the LORD your God” in the Sabbath commandment demonstrates the importance that Moses placed upon the personal relationship between God and every Israelite, and shows the central position of this view, not only in the Sabbath command, but also in the Decalogue itself.

The two lines at the center of the parallel structure, B and B', draw attention to the heart of the Sabbath commandment: the Sabbath was given by “the LORD your God” who delivered each Israelite individually out of slavery, emphasized again by the second-person-singular suffix of the word He “brought you out” (v. 15). In this way, the commandment expressed the idea that the Sabbath functioned as a personal sign of personal deliverance from Egypt.

Included in the dynamic character of the Sabbath commandment may also be an allusion to the people's oppression as slaves in Egypt, recorded in Exodus 5:1–9. The presence of this allusion might be supported by the chiastic correspondence of the Sabbath and the Exodus event in the commandment, which is mentioned above. In Exodus 5:1–9, the narrative mentions that the people were not allowed to “cease” (shabat; Ex. 5:5) from their hard labor, but were afflicted with even more hard work (5:1–9) before God liberated them with “a mighty hand” and “outstretched arm” (Deut. 5:15; cf. Ex. 6:6; 13:9).

4. Sabbath and the Household. Further insight into the text of Deuteronomy 5:12–15 may be gained from its chiastic arrangement. The following chiastic structure displays the same characteristics as the Sabbath commandment in Exodus 20:8–11 with regard to its center focusing on the members of the Israelite household:

- A God's command to keep the Sabbath holy
- B Work six days and rest on the seventh day
- C Do no work: you, your children, your male and female servants (mentioned twice), your ox, your donkey, your cattle, or your sojourner
- B' Remember you were slaves in Egypt, and the Lord brought you out of there
- A' The Lord your God commanded you to keep the Sabbath day

A comparison of Deuteronomy 5:12–15 and Exodus 20:8–11 shows that the center of the chiasm is even more specific in Deuteronomy 5:14 (where the ox and donkey are mentioned) than in Exodus 20:10. This reference alludes to or may even be a verbatim quotation of Exodus 23:12, where the ox and the donkey were to rest because of the householder's Sabbath observance. Also, Sabbath "rest" (Heb. nuakh) is made more specific in Deuteronomy 5:14 by two references to the male servant and the female servant as equal beneficiaries of Sabbath rest together with the householder himself. Here, the significance of the matter of equality and justice within the Israelite household comes into view and shows the concern of this Sabbath commandment for the equality of each human being, regardless of his or her status in society (see below).

5. Sabbath and Service. The literary structure of the Sabbath commandment in Deuteronomy 5:12–15 emphasizes social and spiritual service. The root 'abad, "to work, serve," is used four times and is the key word in its chiastic structure:

- A You shall serve (v. 13)
- B Your male/female servant shall not do any work (v. 14)
- B' Your male/female servant shall rest (v. 14)
- A' You were a servant (v. 15)

This arrangement shows the emphasis in the Sabbath commandment upon the act of serving. This emphasis occurs once in verbal form as part of the clause, "six days you shall labor," which corresponds to the reference about the Israelites serving as slaves in Egypt (A / A'). The center of the structure contains two references to the male/female servant and calls for them to not do any work on the Sabbath, which corresponds with resting on the Sabbath (B / B'). This parallel arrangement, built upon the word "serve," shows that the state of slavery in Egypt paralleled the six days of weekly labor. This suggests the interpretation of the Sabbath as a sign of deliverance from slavery. In other words, the Sabbath corresponded to the Exodus as an act of redemption. Because of this, every Israelite was called to service.

6. "Remember" and "Keep/Observe" the Sabbath. The verb that introduces the Sabbath commandment in Deuteronomy 5:12–15 has a variety of nuances in the Hebrew language: "watch, guard, observe, fulfill, keep, keep watch, spy out." Its grammatical form in Hebrew is an infinitive absolute (shamor), which is similar to the infinitive absolute of "remember" (zakor) in Exodus 20:8. Whereas "remember" connotes the commemoration of the Sabbath as a day of celebration and historical remembrance, "observe" is used for the fulfilling of obligations regarding the Sabbath in the context of obeying the law of the covenant. Moses changed the verbs because he was introducing a complementary motivation. The Exodus event is to be remembered as an act of divine deliverance. In Jewish understanding, the different verbs ("remember" in Exodus and "observe" in Deuteronomy) are linked to the different motivation clauses, but are not mutually exclusive. They serve different functions: the Exodus commandment explains the origin of the Sabbath so that the motivation is to remember our Creator, while the Deuteronomy commandment explains its aim to identify God as Redeemer and offers another motive for observing it.

One more insight in regard to the infinitive absolute form of the verb "to observe/keep" is that Deuteronomy contains only five infinitive absolute forms of the verb "observe." The first occurs in the Sabbath commandment in Deuteronomy 5:12, followed by two such forms complemented or intensified by the repetition of the same verb (a common way in Hebrew to emphasize an action). Thus in Deuteronomy 6:17 and 11:22, the Hebrew word can be translated as “observe diligently” (lit. “observe observing”); in these two cases the reference is to all of God’s commandments. The fourth infinitive absolute of “observe” occurs in the Passover commandment in 16:1, and the fifth is about observing all of God’s commandments (27:1). The significance of the usages of this particular verbal form is that out of the call to the Israelites to observe all the commandments, only two specific laws are singled out, namely, the Sabbath and the Passover, the latter directly related to the Exodus from Egypt. The great significance of Israel’s redemption from Egypt would lend itself, on the lips of Moses, to be another reason for Sabbath observance.

The use of the infinitive absolute of the verb “to observe” in the book of Deuteronomy corresponds to the use of the same verbal form of the verb “to remember” in the book of Exodus. “To remember” is used in only two passages in Exodus, namely, for the Passover festival (Ex. 13:3) and for the Sabbath (20:8). Both events have to do with origins: the creation of everything and the liberation/creation of God’s people. Both events are to be remembered through obedience to the Lord’s law. While “remember” characterizes the Sabbath and the Passover festival of the Exodus from Egypt in terms of the covenant and its promises made to Israel’s forefathers, the infinitive absolute of “observe” in Deuteronomy identifies and regulates the Sabbath and the Passover festival in terms of the law of the covenant. The new generation of Israelites is especially urged to observe the law of God out of love and total devotion to Him (Deut. 6:5-6; 11:13).

7. Keep It Holy and Celebrate. The Sabbath commandment in Deuteronomy 5:12-15 displays a parallelism between the specific verbs (also infinitives), “to keep it holy,” “to make,” or “to celebrate.”

Deut. 5:12      “Observe the Sabbath day to keep it holy as the LORD your God [has] commanded you.”

Deut. 5:15      “You shall remember... Therefore the LORD your God commanded you to celebrate/observe the Sabbath day.”

The parallelism between these two lines is substantiated by two identical clauses, “the Sabbath day” and “the LORD your God commanded you.” The analogy between these two forms concerns a Sabbath observance that aims toward Sabbath holiness by remembering the Creator God who acted with “a mighty hand and an outstretched arm” (v. 15) when He brought Israel out of Egypt. “Therefore,” the commandment continues, “you are la’asot (from ’asah, —“to do/make”) the Sabbath.” Contextually, ’asah expresses the idea of “observing” and “celebrating.” The parallelism between the verbs “to sanctify” and “to observe/celebrate” alludes to their close relationship in the Sabbath text in Exodus 31:12-17. Here, the text also uses the verb ’asah in the same form and states that the sons of Israel are to make the Sabbath a day that is “holy to the Lord” in order to know that the Lord makes them holy. This text makes an even stronger point by suggesting that “observe/celebrate” the Sabbath has an existential meaning for human beings in a covenant relationship with God: whoever would profane the Sabbath would be put to death and be cut off from his people.

The analogy that exists between the verbs “sanctify” and “observe/celebrate” has further implications for differentiating the nature of the Sabbath and the Passover in the book of Deuteronomy. The Sabbath was to be observed by humans in order to keep it holy, and the Passover was to be observed and celebrated as well:

Sabbath	Observe to keep it holy by observing/celebrating (Deut. 5:12)
Passover	Observe and celebrate (Deut. 16:1)

While both festival days were to be observed and celebrated as a remembrance of God’s deliverance, the intent of the Sabbath is emphasized by its holiness; for it was to be the day of a holy God, “the LORD your God.”

8. Sabbath and the New Creation. The Sabbath commandment in Deuteronomy 5:12–15 addresses the individual Israelite as a human being delivered from slavery in Egypt and personally calls each one to remember his or her deliverance and therefore observe the Sabbath to keep it holy. The individual Israelite delivered from slavery experienced a new beginning marked by the gift of freedom and Sabbath rest. He or she was in a way a new creation, similar to the first created human being described in Genesis 1:26–29. The liberation of Israel from Egypt was the starting point of a new creation that parallels the creation of the human race in Genesis 1–2. Israel, as a liberated people, was God's new creation. This concept occurs frequently in the prophets and is often associated with the new creation after the Exile (cf. Is. 40:26; 42:5; 43:1, 7, 15; Mal. 2:10). This new creation is rooted in God's election of Abraham and his family (Gen. 12:1–3). In this sense, the Sabbath links the cosmic creation of the world to the establishment of a people who were to reflect the image and holiness of God (Ex. 19:6).

The Sabbath commandment addressed the individual Israelite (whether male or female) with the appeal of the law, which has its place in the heart and calls one to love the Lord with heart, soul, and strength (Deut. 6:5). This same law of the heart is a reminder and asks for obedience to all of God's commands, including a Sabbath observance aiming for Sabbath holiness. In following the law out of love for the Creator, the newly created human being will receive the gift of Sabbath rest and Sabbath holiness, and imitate the Creator's Sabbath observance, which testifies to the holiness of this day and to the sanctifying power of the God of the Sabbath.

9. Sabbath, Gender, and Class Distinction. The Sabbath carries high significance in regard to the question of gender and class distinction in Israelite society. In differentiating the household members by gender and social class, God placed each member at the same level in regard to the Sabbath, perhaps pointing to His ideal for the human race. His ways of dealing with distinctions in society have always been such as to mitigate their potential abuses, even while apparently tolerating some of those distinctions. This gender and class leveling during the Sabbath was highly significant, because it was given to a people who existed in a millennia-old world of hierarchical male dominance. In Exodus 20:10, seven household members are mentioned to make the house complete, with five categorized by their gender. With regard to the first "you"—a second person masculine singular—some have wondered why the wife is not part of the list.

A contextual reading of the Ten Commandments shows that they address each individual in Israel, including women and children, with a masculine singular "you." Otherwise it would mean that only males have to obey the Ten Commandments. One of the most important reasons for understanding the inclusion of the wife in the masculine "you" of the Sabbath keeper is the principle of embeddedness in Israelite society, which is based on the creation order of husband and wife to become "one flesh" (Gen. 2:24). This principle becomes visible in the Hebrew Bible by the free use of the masculine grammatical form without specification of gender unless it is used to refer to a definite, particular person.

The second and third gender-defined household members in the Sabbath commandment are the son and daughter. It is truly revolutionary that God, giving the commandment, identified the children by gender, "your son...your daughter." Even more surprising is the fact that the slaves were also differentiated by gender: "your male servant...your female servant." God spoke of each as an individual in His Sabbath address. In speaking to a community that was shaped by the paradigm of hierarchical, patriarchal power, the Sabbath opened the mind of the Israelite man and woman, son and daughter, male and female servant to a diametrically opposed model—the Creator's prototype. For the Sabbath is the Lord's, and when male and female keep this day, they equally personify the "image and likeness" model established during the Creation week.

The Sabbath's significance for equality is even more emphatic in the Deuteronomy Sabbath commandment. It was reiterated by Moses after the establishment of the Levitical priesthood. The Sabbath commandment in Deuteronomy 5:12–15 contains a more detailed list than the one in Exodus 20:8–11 in that it distinguishes nine entities (you, your son, your daughter, your male servant, your female servant, your ox, your donkey, all your cattle, and your stranger) and places emphasis on the rest of the male and female servants through repetition (Deut. 5:14). The commandment shows that God's concern and kindness toward animals is to be imitated by the Israelites. Furthermore, the importance of this list lies in remembering that Israel was a nation saved from slavery. The worldly bonds of dominance and hierarchical power were broken, and Israel was called to witness to this event in its weekly Sabbath celebrations, with a message of equality and inclusion to all the surrounding living beings. The Sabbath told every Israelite man and woman that they were set free from the bonds of any kind of slavery. They existed as human beings in direct relation to God, and each individual was placed into relational bonds with others who had the same privileges, rights, status, and opportunities.

5:22–33. Epilogue. Based on a comparison with ancient treaties, many consider v. 22 to be the introduction to the next literary section that extends from 5:22 to 6:3. However, this verse is best understood as the conclusion to Moses's recitation of the Decalogue (cf. Ex. 24:12–18; 31:18). Moses mentioned the affirmative response of the people to God's grand revelation at Sinai, including their fear and the request for Moses to be their mediator (vv. 22–27). The Lord's voice was heard (vv. 28–31) accepting the people's commitment of obedience. Moses, the mediator, exhorted the covenant community to a life of obedience toward the Lord, the source of the commandments (vv. 32–33).

6:1—11:32

Proclaiming the Covenant Relationship

Chapter 6 continues Moses's second charge to the Israelites, in which he called them to acknowledge God as the teacher of the commands (6:1–2). He then discussed the third charge for the people to become doers of the commands. After reciting the Scripture in the form of the Decalogue, Moses launched into a theological exposition of that text. His primary goal in the first major part of the second address (6:4—11:32) was to impress on the people the privilege and the sheer grace of the special relationship

Over the course of millennia of slavery, hierarchical authority, and discrimination, the Sabbath has always carried its message forward and has remained God's standard for all cultures in all circumstances.

10. The Sabbath Is the Lord's Day. Finally, the Sabbath commandment reminds us that the day, in the sense of created time, belongs to the Creator God. Exodus 20:10a and Deuteronomy 5:14a are reminders of divine lordship and ownership, and point back to Creation. This insight has much to say to today's contemporary culture in which time is too often identified with accomplishments, and the individual is measured by his or her achievements. God has a different way of computing, measuring, and categorizing time. His Creation laws are recognized in rhythm of time that is distinct from our own perception and from life in a postmodern world. For Him the seventh day Sabbath is unique and imbued with rich blessings for those who keep it holy.

they enjoyed with Yahweh. This grace was not to be received casually, however; it was to be embraced with grateful and unreserved devotion to their Redeemer and covenant Lord.

6:1–25. The Centrality of Torah Study. Deuteronomy 6:4–25 is formed by four units: (a) 6:4–9, (b) 6:10–15, (c) 6:16–19, and (d) 6:20–25. Thematically, these paragraphs fall into a parallel pattern: paragraphs (a) and (d) reference teaching God's words and instructions to one's children; paragraphs (b) and (c) warn against forgetting God and His providence, and against testing His ability to provide. Paragraphs (c) and (d) emphasize the reward for obedience and the role of the laws in expressing and instilling reverence for God; they point to the introductory section in 6:1–3 and create a frame for the entire chapter.

6:4–9. The Shema. Verses 4 and 5 are identified to the core of the Shema, a name that is derived from the Hebrew word for "hear." The Shema is the sum total of all the statutes, which the Israelites were to abide by and teach to subsequent generations. This section displays a meaningful structure. First, there is a proclamation containing three words that apply to God's covenant stipulations: mitswah—"command," khog—"decree" or "statute," and mishpat—"judgments," "rules," or “laws” (v. 1). These stipulations were given as a guarantee for a prolonged life. Then, Moses emphatically appealed to his people to listen and be careful (v. 3). The metaphorical words used to describe the land—as one that was flowing with milk and honey—capture the notion of a strong desire for a bountiful, lavish place, a place so different from the wilderness where the people had lived and wandered for forty years. The land that lay in front of them would overflow with blessings.

Scholars debate the grammar, syntax, and etymology of the words used in this passage. Unquestionably, these words aimed, according to the context, at the innermost being of the listeners—at their heart (vv. 4–6). From there the words would impact the world of the family, reaching far to the outmost limits (the gates; v. 9).

The term “gates” certainly does not set limits on the impact of these powerful words concerning the only God of Israel. For “your gates” were not the borderline for God; they were meeting places to enter into dialogue with other individuals. The gates were exits into the world for lovers of God and humans; they were entry points for outsiders to be drawn in and experience God’s love. “Your gates” surely hold opportunities for God as well as challenges for the lovers of God.

The problem with v. 4 is that it contains two clauses without a verb, and translators are expected to supply one. Linguistic studies indicate that in such cases the verb “to be” is usually inserted. What follows represents the main translations proposed by scholars:

“Hear, O Israel, Yahweh our God; Yahweh is one.”

“Hear, O Israel, Yahweh our God is one Yahweh.”

“Hear, O Israel, Yahweh is our God; Yahweh is one.”

“Hear, O Israel, Yahweh is our God; Yahweh is one/unique.”

“Hear, O Israel, Yahweh is our God, Yahweh alone.”

The Hebrew word for “one” used in the Shema is also used for man and woman in Genesis 2:24—they become “one flesh.” This majestic proclamation emphasizes the essential oneness of God. He had already been known to be the only God (cf. 4:35, 39). There are passages where the plurality of God is implied in the OT (e.g., the plural pronouns in Gen. 1:26–27). Also, there are passages where the Angel of the Lord is clearly a reference to a divine being who is also Yahweh (see Gen. 6:7–14; 22:11–18; 31:11–13; Ex. 3:2–6; 14:19; 23:20–23; Judg. 2:1–5; 13:2–23; Hos. 12:3–5; Mal. 3:1). Furthermore, the messianic prophecies imply the divinity of the Anointed One (e.g., Is. 9:6; Mic. 5:2). In the NT, the plurality of God is also clearly indicated or implied (Matt. 28:19–20; John 1:1–3; 14:16–18; Acts 5:3–4; Col. 1:15–20; Heb. 9:14). As a result, the unity and oneness of God mentioned here would not exclude the plurality of the holy Trinity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (see Matt. 28:19). This is the mystery of three persons who are yet one deity (cf. Col. 1:19; 2:9). The oneness of God would also include the idea that He is the only one for His people (cf. Zech. 14:9, for all peoples). This is the concept behind the First Commandment (Deut. 5:7; Ex. 20:3). Israel’s worship of idols—as attested during the monarchy, and lamented and condemned by the prophets—is astonishing in light of their testimony to the monotheistic concept of God over the course of millennia.

The recitation of the Shema had legal implications. It enjoined the people to remain true to their calling. It was a committal to follow a declaration that was true and firmly established. It had the force of an oath solemnly affirming that the obligation just recited was valid and binding in every way. Furthermore, the Shema emphasized the response that God expects from his people. The first verb, the imperative “hear,” occurred in a series of subsequent imperatives: love, impress or teach, talk, bind, and write. Its binding importance is reflected in the Gospels.

A scribe approached Jesus and asked which commandment was the greatest or most significant, and He responded quoting the Shema as well as Leviticus 19:34 (Mark 12:29–31). Jesus stated further that all the Law and the Prophets were based on these two commands. To love God with all the soul (v. 5) is the driving force behind obedience to all the statutes and ordinances given by Him for the welfare of His people. Jesus regarded the principles of love for God and for other human beings as the basis of Scripture. The Ten Commandments provide principles based on two kinds of love. The fact that love is foundational should not surprise us because the Bible expresses the character of God in terms of love (1 John 4:8).

The Shema is one of the most important identifications in Judaism. Its liturgical significance is reflected in the fact that it appears immediately after the Decalogue in the Nash Papyrus, a second-century B.C. liturgical text, and in a first-century phylactery text from Cave 8 at Qumran, where the Shema is written in a rectangle and surrounded by other texts. To this day, Orthodox Jews recite the Shema as part of their prayers when they wake up and before they fall asleep (cf. according to the instruction in v. 7). In so doing, they take “the yoke of the kingdom,” which means that they place themselves under the sovereignty and kingship of Yahweh. Some Jewish groups take the command of v. 8 to mean that God’s written laws should be literally bound to the body. Others have understood these instructions as a symbolic emphasis of the need to remember well the commands of God (as in Ex. 13:9, 16, on remembering the events of the Exodus). In any case, placing God’s laws on the hand and head highlights the importance of doing and thinking about them (cf. Ezek. 9:4; Rev. 7:3; 13:16).

6:10—8:20. Challenges of Faith. In Deuteronomy 6:10 and 8:20, Moses forecast the challenges that his people would endure as a result of their loyal confession to God. Some scholars suggest that the structure of this section is developed on the basis of internal and external tests arranged according to an ABA order. The internal tests are in 6:10–25 and 8:1–20, and the external are in 7:1–26. Whereas 6:4–5 embodies the central idea of love for God, the rest of the section (chaps. 6–8) responds to the question, “What does it mean to be totally committed to God?” Moses presented his audience with the challenges that come as a result of unreserved loyalty to God.

Deuteronomy 6:10–25 contains an internal test and the answer to it. Israel was warned not to forget their loyalty to the Lord once they entered into the prosperous land of Canaan. They were not to follow the gods of the people surrounding them. The solution to this potential test or temptation is given in vv. 20–25. In this passage, Moses tried in different ways to impress upon the people the importance of loyalty to God. Obedience to the different laws was to be firmly grounded in the Lord’s saving acts. In other words, it was all predicated on His grace.

Deuteronomy 7:1–26 presents the external test that the people of Israel would face when they reached Canaan. The chapter describes the Gentile nations as the greatest danger to Israel’s loyalty to God. The Israelites were forbidden to enter into covenantal relationships with the nations or to intermarry with them. They were commanded to eliminate the Canaanite population. This latter policy is known as the kherem ordinance and is based on the Hebrew word for “destroy, ban, devote for destruction” (see below, “The Extermination of the Canaanites”; see also “Holy Warfare,” p. 372). Some find in it a reference to ritual sacredness and argue that kharam means “to reserve for divine service.” This last meaning is far from certain. The regulation was intended to preserve both the Israelites’ holiness and God’s plan for them in a world of threatening idolatry and corruption.

Deuteronomy 8:1–20 contains the third challenge of faith that the Israelites would encounter in the promised land. The chiasmic structure of this chapter highlights the importance of not forgetting to keep the commandments of the Lord when life is good and full of satisfaction. At that time, God would test His people to know what

The Extermination of the Canaanites

In their response to one of the most problematic texts in all of Scripture, the early church fathers tended to interpret Deuteronomy 7 allegorically. Modern scholars ascribe the chapter’s harsh policies (cf. also chap. 20) to a primitive mindset that lacked the ethical and religious ideals preached by later prophets and that was inferior to those of Jesus in the NT (Matt. 5:44; Luke 6:27, 35). Other scholars hold to the concept of progressive revelation in the sense that God adapted the prevailing practices of the time to His own agenda, which consisted of establishing a future society free from violence. This raises questions about divine consistency and seems to either support Marcion’s heretical assertion that the God of Israel and the God of the NT were two different Gods, or that God is the same in both, flexible in desiring an idealistic universe, but working for the time being in the realistic universe of sin.

1. God as the Agent. It has been suggested, based on Exodus 23:20–33, that the destruction of the Canaanites was not a prescription for the Israelites, but was given as God's pledge that He Himself would exterminate the Canaanites. He would do this by sending His terror ahead of the people when they entered the promised land. He would confuse the Canaanites, make them run, send hornets ahead of Israel's army, drive out the Canaanite nations, and deliver them into the hands of Israel. All of these actions would not happen immediately, but would be implemented by God "little by little" (vv. 29–30; Deut. 7:22).

2. God as Indirect Agent. Furthermore, it is important to note that Exodus 23 does not use the word kherem to speak of the total destruction of the Canaanite nations, but employs another Hebrew word (kakhad) with the connotations of hiding, keeping something back, effacement, and nonexistence. This word occurs in Exodus 23:23 and is usually translated as "I will completely destroy them" or "I will cut them off." However, its grammatical form in Hebrew is causative (hiphil) and could denote God acting indirectly through afflictions that would cause the Canaanites to destroy themselves. The divine activities listed above support this latter reading. The reason for the legislation was given: the Canaanites would cause Israel to sin against God (23:33).

3. Israel as Agent. Deuteronomy 7, on the other hand, focuses on Israel's active partnership with God after they entered Canaan. In this instance, Moses placed much emphasis upon the reason for the Canaanites' destruction, namely to safeguard Israel's holiness and fidelity in regard to God. Ethnic purity was not at all in the purview of the legislation. However, the war policy of Deuteronomy 7 raises serious ethical questions, especially for a postmodern reader: How could a God who claims to be gracious and merciful command the extermination of whole populations?

Consideration of the biblical kherem policy needs to take into account that if Deuteronomy 7 is to be interpreted in terms of total annihilation, the Israelites should have been completely destroyed because their failure to enforce kherem meant its application to them (see vv. 4 and 26). But even in Deuteronomy, Moses foresees the failure of Israel and indicates that they would not be completely destroyed, but that a remnant would survive God's judgment of the Exile (4:29–31; cf. 30:1–10). Total extermination does not necessarily mean the literal extermination of all.

4. Its Implementation in Joshua. The conquest narratives in the book of Joshua cause some to cast doubt on a literal interpretation of the kherem ordinance that would have required the total, not partial, extermination of the Canaanite population. The case of the Gibeonites is certainly unique, but remains a good example. Although they feared that the Israelites would execute the policies of Deuteronomy 20:15–18 (see Josh. 9), they were not exterminated because they abandoned their idolatry and converted to the Lord. Although they were Canaanites, the divine command to destroy the idolatrous Canaanites did not apply to them. The accounts in Joshua and Judges suggest that the kherem ordinance was carried out in only four places: Jericho (Josh. 6:24), Ai (8:28), Hazor (11:13–14), and Laish (Judg. 18:27; cf. Josh. 19:47). This accords with the archaeological record, which does not present evidence for a widespread destruction of Canaanite cities, and it accords with texts in Deuteronomy, which mention that the Israelites would inherit cities that they did not build—cities that were intact, great, and splendid (Deut. 6:10–11). The text also makes it clear that the Hebrews made a mistake by not driving out or exterminating all the idolatrous inhabitants of Canaan (Judg. 1:27–2:4).

5. Fundamental Principles. When dealing with this subject, we should first remember that the kherem policy was driven neither by hate for other nations nor by ethnic concerns. The reason for the policy was the elimination of all rivals to God, who holds supreme power over Israel. Under His authority there was no room for compromise with the gods of other nations. In addition, these nations were being destroyed because of their recalcitrance and wickedness. God had allowed hundreds of years of probationary time for the Canaanites to accept His love and forgiveness, but they would not (see Gen. 15:16; Deut. 9:4–5). The uncompromising nature of God had been declared in the command of the Shema (6:4–5) and in the first two of the Ten Commandments (5:6–9).

Second, the inheritance records and the farewell speech in the book of Joshua (Josh. 13–21, 23) testify to the concept put forth in Exodus 23:20–33 concerning the initiative and activity of God in freeing the land from the Canaanite nations (Josh. 23:3; and vv. 4–13). In addition, Joshua directly referred to Deuteronomy 7 (the religious concept of war, the prohibition of covenant making with the Canaanites, and intermarriage). In a theocracy, war and destruction took place in order to eliminate idols and their worship. Biblical theocracy strove toward a society that lived uncompromisingly under the government of the supreme God.

was in their hearts (v. 2). Notice the structure of the passage:

- A Observe the commandments and prosper (v. 1)
- B The wilderness and the manna (vv. 2–4)
- C Observe the commandments in prosperity (vv. 6–10)
- C' Do not forget the Lord in prosperity (vv. 11–14)
- B' The wilderness and the manna (vv. 15–16)
- A' Remember and do not forget the Lord or you will perish (vv. 18–20)

The threat was to forget that goodness and well-being come from the Lord and not by chance. The gift of food and the sustenance of life are from the Creator God. Moses appealed five times to the people to keep alive the memory of Yahweh's miraculous actions in the wilderness (vv. 2, 11, 14, 18, 19). The remembrance of God's goodness in the past strengthens our hope and faith in the present. The notion of remembering played a key theological role in Moses's speech. The main charge was to keep the commands of Yahweh by walking in His ways and fearing Him (vv. 6, 11). Moses's dramatic descriptions of the Israelite experience in the wilderness heightened the nature of the test and called for a personal commitment to the Lord.

9:1—11:32. Disputations. The opening words, "Hear, O Israel!" (9:1), signal the beginning of the third major section (9:1–11:32) of Moses's second address to Israel (4:45–26:19). This large section can be divided according to its temporal vision, which shifts inconsecutively from Israel's future (9:1–6), to the past (9:7–10:11), to the present (10:12–11:1), back to the past (11:2–7), forward to the future (11:8–25), and ends at the present (11:26–32).

Deuteronomy 9:1–10:11 is a self-contained literary subunit featuring Moses looking forward to the crossing of the Jordan (9:1). He demonstrated that the future of Israel was grounded in the events of the past when Yahweh commanded him to lead the people away from Sinai/Horeb and toward the possession of the land He had promised to their ancestors (10:11). The appeal between these two events is composed of stories about Israel's time in the wilderness, their rebellions, the way the Lord handled their wayward actions, and their relationship with each other. All these parts of the text are held together by the temporal phrase "forty days and forty nights." This phrase occurs nine times in the OT and five times here: it took forty days and forty nights (1) for the Lord to deliver the Ten Commandments to Moses (9:9–10), (2) for the Israelites to prove the shallowness of their covenant commitment when they worshiped the golden calf (9:11–17), (3) for Moses to deal with the sin of the people and his own (9:18–21), (4) for Moses's plea before the Lord not to annihilate His people (9:25–10:5), and (5) to receive the assurance that the Lord would not destroy His people and to hear the order to march toward the promised land (10:10–11). It was a period of time that led to new beginnings—good or bad.

The elevated style of 10:12–11:1 suggests that Moses's second speech was nearing a climax. The use of we 'attah'—"and now" (10:12) signals a climactic moment, similar to 4:1, when Moses introduced the section of commandments and statutes. With the words recorded in 10:12, Moses stressed the moral and spiritual implications of a covenant relationship with the Lord. He used the rhetorical marker "and now" before his opening question, "What does the LORD your God ask [or "require"] of you?" (10:12a). Moses answered (11:1), but also gave a preliminary answer (10:12b). It contained two main ideas: they were to fear the Lord, their God, and to serve Him with full heart and soul. In general, Moses provided three answers to the opening question:

(1) allegiance to the Lord expressed by a fundamental disposition to fear and love, followed by obedience to the God of the covenant; (2) circumcision of the heart as a true sign of the Israelites belonging to the Lord (not merely the outer sign of circumcision instituted in Genesis 17); and (3) unqualified devotion to the Lord. Moses then tied the three responses together in the final climactic response that linked it back to the Shema (11:1; cf. 6:5).

Deuteronomy 11:2–28 is a complex passage of historical recollections and theological expositions and exhortations. The text is characterized by frequent repetitions, interruptive appositions, and parenthetical comments. From Moses's preacher's perspective, this style was most suited to impress the audience with his message. From a structural point of view, the passage has a break between vv. 7 and 8 as Moses moved from recollections of history to exhortation.

Moses presented lessons from history (vv. 2–7) as he reviewed God's mighty acts against Pharaoh and what He did to Dathan and Abiram when the earth opened and swallowed them. Moses included in his speech references to the land (vv. 8–12) for which God constantly cared, as His eyes were continually on it (v. 12). The land was God's climactic gift to Israel; it was the fulfillment of His promise to their ancestors (Gen. 17:8; Ex. 3:6–8; 6:8). This gift challenged the people to remain faithful to God (Deut. 11:13–21), who provided for the fruitfulness of the land. If they were faithful to the Lord, they would possess the land from the wilderness to Lebanon, from the River Euphrates to the Mediterranean Sea (v. 24). But they would have to decide whether to receive the blessings or the curses that were embedded in the covenant relationship with the Lord (vv. 26–28).

Deuteronomy 11:29–32 closes this portion of Moses's second speech (8:1–11:32) with a reference to the covenant blessings and curses. This passage looks forward and anticipates the covenant ceremony that would take place with the reading of the blessings on Mount Gerizim, and with the reading of the curses on Mount Ebal. In his brief speech, Moses described the ceremony with only nine words in the Hebrew text (v. 29b). It would occur soon because, as Moses emphatically indicated, they would cross over the Jordan to enter and possess the land (v. 31). Moses concluded this section of his second speech with a most contemporary appeal: the laws and decrees were set before the Israelites "today": these decrees were to be obeyed.

12:1—26:19

Proclaiming the Dimensions of the Covenant Relationship

In this new section of the second speech, Moses dealt with the vertical and horizontal dimensions of the covenant obligations. The dominant theme recorded in Deuteronomy 12:2–14:21 is the vertical relationship with the Lord; the theme appearing in 15:19–16:21 is primarily about human concerns. These vertical/horizontal dimensions were to teach the people that the worship of God and everyday life are intertwined. To come before the Lord with offerings and sacrifices means nothing if familial or neighborly relationships are not cleared of all burdens and strains. Acceptable worship to the Lord asks for fidelity in horizontal relationships.

Deuteronomy 12:1 introduces a new section (12:1–26:19), which is composed of a formal series of laws, and 26:16–19 is its formal conclusion. The covenant obligations found here are very similar to those found in the Book of the Covenant (Ex. 20:22–23:19). They are similar in structure, and their opening and closing sections resemble each other. An outline of the material, based on the content of these two passages, helps the reader to grasp the flow of thought. A chiastic structure occurs in both law sections, with the principles of worship framing the different laws:

- A Principles of worship highlighting Israel's cultic expression of devotion to Yahweh (Ex. 20:23–26; Deut. 12:2–16:17)
- B Casuistic and apodictic laws highlighting Israel's ethical expression of devotion to Yahweh (Ex. 21:1–23:9; Deut. 16:18–25:19)
- A' Principles of worship highlighting Israel's cultic expression of devotion to Yahweh (Ex. 23:10–19; Deut. 26:1–15)

But these parallels, useful as they are, do not do complete justice to the extent and scope of the passage in Deuteronomy. The sermonic tone and style portray Moses as a preacher, as is also the case in chapters 6–11. While he drew on the specific laws and regulations that Israel received at Sinai, his aim was more pastoral than legislative.

In terms of the flow of this speech (Deut. 12–16), Moses began with the nation's direct obligations to the Lord (12:2–16:17). After presenting the vertical dimension—their relationship with the Lord—Moses moved to the horizontal dimension and gave instructions about the offices through which the Lord would exercise His kingship once the people settled in the promised land (16:18–21:9). Then, he included a section on the family (21:10–22:30), reminded the people of the boundaries of the covenant community (23:1–8), gave regulations regarding different aspects of Israelite life (23:9–25:19), and ended with instructions for worship, returning to the vertical dimension (26:1–15). By adopting the vertical/horizontal dimension and structuring his speeches accordingly, Moses, the pastor, taught his congregation that worship and daily life are intricately intertwined. Acceptable vertical expressions of covenant faithfulness are preconditioned by fidelity in horizontal relationships, which offer opportunities for the corporate celebration of the vertical.

12:2–14. Worship at the Sanctuary. The limitation of sacrificial worship to a single place is the most unique and far-reaching law in Deuteronomy. It affected the religious life of individuals, the sacrificial system, the way festivals were celebrated, the economic status of the Levites, and the judicial system of Israel. Aside from the triannual celebrations at the central sanctuary, religious activities such as prayer and study were to take place in people's lives throughout the year.

In his expositions about the obligations of the people to the Lord (12:2–16:17), Moses employed a positive and appealing strategy: he introduced the obligations by inviting the people to celebrate the presence of the Lord in the promised land (12:2–14). There were negative charges, like the command to purge the land from Canaanite idol worship (vv. 2–4, 8–9), interpolated with positive invitations and instructions to worship the Lord, (vv. 5–7, 10–12). The invitation that families were to gather and eat together in the place that the Lord would choose for worship is especially beautiful and brings out the meaning of ancient fellowship practices as the culmination of covenant making rituals (Gen. 31:54; Ex. 24:5–11). At Mount Horeb, only a small privileged leadership circle had the opportunity to eat in the presence of the Lord (Ex. 24:9, 11). Here, Moses opened the invitation to everyone. Worship is a joyful practice; it calls for celebration and communion among all participants.

Interestingly, Moses used language reminiscent of the Sabbath commandment to call the congregation to worship and joyful fellowship at the sanctuary (Deut. 12:12; cf. v. 18). The equality and inclusivity of the Sabbath in regard to social status and gender were placed at the forefront by Moses's use of this language. Male and female slaves were invited to worship together with sons and daughters and were to receive the same treatment. The Levites were not given higher authority or even a place of honor at the table, but they were to gather like the others to enjoy a meal before the Lord (Deut. 12:18).

For the contemporary readers of this text, Deuteronomy 12:1–14 offers some elements of a theology of worship: (1) The Lord, the Creator of heaven and earth, is the Redeemer of humankind and the only one who can legitimately receive our praises. All other objects are illegitimate, even abominable. (2) The purpose of worship is to please the Lord, and this is to happen with humility and awe before God in the course of the lives of the worshipers (Ps. 15; 24; Is. 1:2–17; Mic. 6:6–8). (3) The location of worship, important as it is, is less important than the presence of the divine host (cf. John 4:21–34). Fortunately, in Deuteronomy God selected the place where He would be present for worship. (4) True worship occurs in the presence of an awe-inspiring God and in communion with fellow believers. Deuteronomy emphasizes the inclusion of all; gifts of food would be shared not just with family members, but also with the marginalized (12:12). It would be correct to say, in agreement with others, that the hour of church worship is often the most segregated hour of the week. Deuteronomy stands against this and suggests that when churches split their services or differentiate on the basis of hierarchical status, social status, race, gender, age, musical tastes, or for any other reason, the house of God is divided. Consequently, God's goal for unity and fellowship in equality, inclusion, and the joy of worship is diminished.

12:15–28. Sacrifices. Moses proceeded to provide instructions about the sacrifices to be offered in the place of worship chosen by the Lord. This section has two parts, like a coin with two sides. On one side are the regulations for the regular slaughter of animals and meat eating (vv. 15–16, 20–25); on the other side are the instructions about sacred offerings at the sanctuary (vv. 17–19, 26–27). When Moses spoke about meat eating, his way of expression was remarkably positive and generous (vv. 15, 20–22). He highlighted the craving of the people to eat meat thrice daily (vv. 15, 20b, 21b) and then anticipated their expression of this craving (v. 20a). The response to the stress on craving meat is fourfold: (1) The people were permitted to slaughter animals and eat meat because of the Lord's blessing on the promised land (v. 15; cf. 16:17). (2) The people were allowed to slaughter animals and eat meat in their towns and in proportion to the Lord's blessing (vv. 15, 20–21). The regulation given in Leviticus 17:1–16, according to which the slaughtering of animals and eating their meat was only allowed in front of the tabernacle, would no longer be necessary in the land of Canaan. (3) Anyone, clean or unclean, was permitted to eat meat (vv. 15b, 22b). This included every person, even those who had touched a corpse or carcass, or were unclean because of a disease or a bodily discharge (Lev. 11–15; Num. 5; 19). (4) The people were allowed to eat the meat of clean domestic animals and of wild game (vv. 15b, 22).

The concession to eat meat does not exclude the concept of the value of animal life before God and neither does it eliminate the plant-based diet assigned to humans in the beginning (Gen. 1:29). During the journey of the people through the wilderness, the Lord initially provided vegetarian food for them (Ex. 16:1–4). The plant-based diet remained an ideal in the setting of an agrarian society. The concession to eat meat was regulated by the Lord. Slaughtering an animal to eat meat was commonly associated with the cult in the sanctuary, but it was not detached from God's perspective and the regulations about the proper treatment of animals. There was the demand to drain the blood (vv. 16, 23). The common slaughter of animals was to follow the same method used in sacrificial slaughter.

12:29–13:18. Warnings about Apostasy.

Moses continued to warn his audience against idolatry as he discussed the temptations that Israel would encounter in the promised land. He placed four hypothetical circumstances before the people under which seduction toward the Canaanite gods might occur. The first might result from the work of a false prophet (13:1–5). This is the first time that Moses uses the word “prophet” (nabi) in Deuteronomy. In the Old Testament, a prophet is one who is summoned or called by God to proclaim His messages (Ex. 7:1–2; Jer. 23:16–22). Moses's audience was not oblivious to the meaning and work of prophets. Abraham was regarded as a prophet of God (Gen. 20:7). The Israelites even knew of the prophetic ministry of a female prophet, Miriam. Moses, the leader himself, was regarded as a prophet in Israel, as was Aaron. There was also the incident with Balaam, the deceiving prophet (Num. 22–24; 31:8, 16; Deut. 23:4–5). Therefore, to discern between true and false prophets was of highest importance.

The second hypothetical cause of an apostasy was a dreamer (Deut. 13:1–5). Studies on ancient Near Eastern history reveal that divination through dreams (oneiromancy) was widespread. There are numerous texts from Egypt and Mesopotamia about such phenomena. Moses warned that such persons might provide a sign or wonder and then invite the people to follow other gods (13:2b [3b]). These “other gods” were ones they had not known, the gods of the Canaanites (12:29–30). The treatment of false prophets and dreamers who would try to entice Israel to follow other gods is unambiguous and absolute: they were to be put to death (13:5a). In the political arena, a person who tries to subvert allegiance to the king is sentenced to death; how much more would the death penalty apply to one who called God's people to abandon Him and worship idols?

The third hypothetical scenario of apostasy was related to a member of an Israelite family (13:6–11). Moses spoke about family members and close friends—a brother, a son, a daughter, a wife, and a friend—people who were loved and respected. The list heightens the threat of potential familial treachery. In cultures where family networks are close, this scenario involves the highest potential danger. The fourth scenario of apostasy involved anyone in Israel who was rumored to be enticing fellow citizens to desert the Lord in favor of other gods (13:12–18). Again, the seriousness of idolatry called for capital punishment.

14:1–21. Eating. Eating is connected to a holy life. Moses constructed this section as another chiasm:

- A A holy people to the Lord their God (vv. 1–3)
- B Edible versus inedible animals (vv. 4–20)
- A' A holy people to the Lord their God (v. 21)

There is a clear link to Leviticus 11 (see “Clean and Unclean Animals,” p. 257). Moses emphasized the definition of kosher food instead of the abominable animals. In addition, vv. 1–3 build the foundation for the list of permitted and prohibited animals. Moses spoke of Israel as a holy people, possessing a unique covenant status with God. Without this foundation right at the beginning, the words spoken here would have sounded like those of a suzerain imposing his law on a vassal. The status and quality that God had placed upon His people marked them in all aspects of life, including eating and the treatment of the body. The latter was probably related to pagan rites of mourning for the dead.

14:22–29. The Economically Vulnerable. Although tithing was a well-known practice in the ancient world and is found elsewhere in the Torah, Deuteronomy provides legislation concerning a second tithe. Leviticus 27:30–33 proclaims the tithes on both produce and cattle as “holy to the LORD.” This phrase normally indicated that tithes belonged to the priests and the Levites (cf. Lev. 22:10; 27:21). A farmer could redeem produce by paying its value plus an extra fifth. Numbers 18:21–32 indicates that all tithes were required to be given to the Lord, who then assigned it to the Levites, who were also to give a tithe of tithes to the priests. The Levites could then live off the rest of the tithes given to them. This was the first tithe, not to be confused with the second tithe mentioned in Deuteronomy. This second tithe was to be used for a family fellowship meal eaten in the sanctuary.

Deuteronomy 14:22–29 begins with an emphatic call to annually set aside an extra tenth of all that the fields produce. What follows is an invitation for celebration. The goal of the speech was reached when Moses expressed concern for the well-being of the economically vulnerable. From this perspective, a true covenant relationship with the Lord was to be demonstrated by active care for the poor. This commitment would reach its high point when the poor were invited to join in the celebration in the Lord’s presence at the sanctuary.

Similar to the previous instruction about tithe, another highly significant insight Moses provided was about inclusion and equality (14:28–29; cf. 26:12–15). Every three years, the second tithe was to be used for the benefit of the poor and powerless in Israel (vv. 28–29). It seems that the beneficiaries of this tithe were those who had no inheritance in the land, that is to say, the widows, orphans, foreigners, and the Levites. The OT often lists the triad of widow, orphan, and foreigner as representing the poor, oppressed, and disempowered within a patriarchal society governed by a hierarchical order. They were the most easily marginalized and had no safety net; but God cared for their needs. This extra tithe that provided for the Levites and for the “disempowered triad” reveals God’s concern for equality and justice.

15:1–23. Remission of Debts. The appeal to be generous toward the poor and disadvantaged found a climatic expression in the seventh year. Debts were to be canceled, and lost property was to be returned to the original owner. Creditors were not to pressure debt-slaves to pay off their loan before the arrival of the year of remission. When Moses began to speak about the different groups of disadvantaged people, he looked with a visionary eye into the future and stated that there would be no poor in Israel because of God’s blessing, (v. 4). However, in order for them to arrive at this hope, an almost utopian future, Israel was called to have the greatest concern for the poor, the widows, the fatherless, and strangers. These were economically deprived and dependent on others for relief and survival. When he gave instructions on how to treat the poor, Moses used the term “brother” (or “fellow Israelite”; vv. 7, 9, 11); if the Israelites treated the poor badly and they cried out to the Lord, this treatment would be recognized as sin. There are definite warnings about hardheartedness and tightfistedness (v. 9), and there is a call to generosity toward the poor in the context of lending money to them, especially when there is little to no hope of repayment.

It was also important to establish humane laws concerning those who were bound to work for six years toward paying off a debt. Just because the debt was paid (by six years of labor) did not mean that the newly released man or woman was to leave without payment of their own (v. 13). Coinage was not invented until the Persian period (by Lydians or Greeks in the sixth or fifth centuries B.C.), so lending and payment at this time were done through foodstuff or flocks. Concerning the law of the firstborn (vv. 19–23), see Leviticus 27:26–27.

16:1–17. The Three Annual Festivals. For the celebration of three festivals, the Israelites were to travel to the place of worship that the Lord would choose for Himself in the promised land.

These three festivals were the Festival of Passover (vv. 1–8), the Festival of Weeks (vv. 9–12), and the Festival of Tabernacles (vv. 13–15). The Festival of Passover and the immediately following Festival of Unleavened Bread had their origin in the Exodus event and are described in detail in Exodus 12. In Exodus, the focus is on the festival's observance in the homes of the Israelites in Egypt; there was no centralized place of worship. In this speech in Deuteronomy, Moses envisioned and prophesied that God would choose for Himself a place of worship in the promised land; thus the locus of the celebration of the festival shifted, and it became more of a national celebration. Moses strongly charged the people to keep the Passover by using Sabbath language. The link with the Sabbath is made direct and clear by the use of the same word of command: "observe" is found in both passages (Deut. 5:12 and 16:1); likewise in Exodus, the word "remember" occurs in two passages, the Passover text in Exodus 13:3 and the Sabbath commandment in Exodus 20:8. Furthermore, a Sabbath link is also found in the reference to the six days during which the Israelites were to eat unleavened bread as a remembrance of the time of slavery in Egypt. On the seventh day, there was to be a solemn assembly before the Lord (Deut. 16:8).

The Festival of Weeks (vv. 9–12) brought the Sabbath even more to the forefront. While the Passover already showed its closeness to the Sabbath, it was the Festival of Weeks that had an even stronger connection through its counting of seven times seven days after Passover and the Festival of Unleavened Bread. Moreover, Sabbath inclusion was highly emphasized when Moses's words recalled the different members of the household (also mentioned in the Sabbath command) who were to celebrate and rejoice before the Lord. Then Moses continued with the list and added orphans, the fatherless, and widows (v. 11). The Festival of Tabernacles (vv. 13–15) was the final festival of the year, and the Levites were to sit together with everybody else to celebrate with people from all classes and both genders (v. 14). It seems that the festivals incorporated the Sabbath concern for equality and inclusion among the Israelites. A biblical Sabbath theology affects all parts of society, including the festivals, and emphasizes the importance of equality.

16:18—21:9. Offices of Justice. After the appeals for concern toward those in need among the worshipping congregation of Israel, Moses appropriately turned to the theme of justice

(16:20). In this section, Moses described conditions that would apply directly to specific offices among the Israelites in Canaan. First, judges were to administer righteous justice (16:18—17:13), and then the future king of Israel was called to the highest moral order (17:14–20). The Israelites were to provide for priests and Levites (18:1–8), and the Levites were to care for each other. With the gift of prophecy (18:9–22), the future of the Israelites was ensured, so that standards of righteousness would be applied in all circumstances: in matters of life and death (19:1–21), when Israel's troops went to war (20:1–20), and even in cases of extreme incidents such as manslaughter and blood guilt (21:1–9).

16:18—17:13. Israel's Judge. God's pervasive concern for justice and righteousness is the focus of the section that discusses the judges in Israel. The central idea is not so much concerned with the administration of social justice by a judicial institution, but with the engagement of the entire community in living a life of righteousness as defined by the Torah. The emphatic call to righteousness in 16:20 demonstrates the passion of Moses. His words were not those of a legislator administering decrees, but were those of a passionate preacher who pleaded and strove for the real and deep need of his people.

Moses listed three examples of how righteousness could be violated. The first was spiritual syncretism. This involved a compromise between a legitimate and an illegitimate act (e.g., setting up an Asherah pole beside the altar of the Lord; v. 21). The second prohibition was against the setting up of pillars for Asherim (v. 22). This example may be understood as the Israelites erecting a symbol for Yahweh as the Canaanites did to celebrate the fertility rituals of Baal and Asherah. The third prohibition dealt with sacrifices that were defective. All three prohibitions spoke of the violation of righteousness having its roots in the breaking of the covenantal relationship with Israel's Suzerain.

The violation of the principle of doing what is right (16:20), which represented the vertical relationship, would lead to violations on the horizontal level. Deuteronomy 17:2–13 deals first with violations that could be resolved. These were to be investigated and judged by the courts of the judges in Israel, with the judicial process sometimes ending in execution. In the second part of this section, extreme cases that go beyond the power of the secular offices of the judges are discussed. Such cases were to be submitted to the sanctuary and its priests. The sanctuary was a place of judgment. Priestly judgment was to be “theocratic” in these cases. The oracles Urim and Thummim might have been involved, or there may have been a process such as the one involved with a jealous husband who was to bring his wife before the priest into the courtyard of the sanctuary because there were no witnesses to attest to her wrongdoing, and only God was in the position to judge her (see Num. 5:11–31).

17:14–20. Israel’s King. In light of Moses’s address, Israelite kingship was revolutionary in the ancient world. First, the desire for a king was societal. The lengthy temporal clause of direct speech that introduces the desire of the people (v. 14) shows that kingship was not necessary for Israel’s society and economy to grow and flourish. The Lord was the reason for Israel’s success in the land. Kingship was the result of the people’s desire, which was based on what they saw among the nations. However, God legislated how kingship would function in Israel, and He would choose the king. Moses mentioned the first rule for the king: he was to be a native Israelite (v. 15). Moses then listed prohibitions unheard of in the annals of other nations: (1) the king was not to acquire many horses from Egypt (v. 16); (2) he was not to take many wives (v. 17); and (3) he was not to accumulate large amounts of wealth (v. 17). Following these prohibitions were positively formulated instructions: (1) Seated on the throne, the king was to copy the Torah for himself in the presence of the Levitical priests (v. 18). This was a sacred act showing the king’s spiritual subordination to the holy book and the priests. In addition, the king did not issue the law; he received it from a higher authority. (2) The king was to keep the Torah close to himself; it would accompany him wherever he was. (3) He was to read the Torah for himself all the days of his life (v. 19). Moses used four purpose clauses to show what reading the Torah would mean for the king: (1) he was to learn to fear the Lord (v. 19); (2) he was to show a proper disposition toward his people and not consider himself superior (v. 20); (3) he was to remain faithful to the Lord and not turn in any other direction (v. 20); and (4) the reading of the Torah was the key to securing the future of Israel (v. 20).

One is amazed at such simple instructions for what was considered the highest office on earth. Each one contains lessons that run against human perceptions and operations, both at the time they were issued and in the contemporary world. Such lessons include the following: (1) Whereas leaders of the world gain power or usurp it at the expense of rivals and subjects, God’s leaders are appointed by a divine call and without any need for human power. (2) Whereas leaders of the world are viewed as administrators of justice, God’s leaders embody justice within a covenantal relationship with the Lord. (3) Whereas the leaders of the world codify laws to regulate standards under their government or to protect their own interests, God’s leaders have no authority to issue laws. They themselves are subject to the laws of God. (4) Whereas the leaders of the world are elevated above their people, God’s leaders are equals among their fellows.

18:1–22. Israel’s Priest and Prophets. Israel’s treatment of the Levites and priests was a barometer of their fidelity to the Lord and His standards of righteousness given in the Torah. Levites and priests were entitled to compensation, tithe, and food gifts because they would not be allotted land inheritance. The Lord was their inheritance (v. 2b).

Before speaking of Israel’s prophetic ministry, Moses addressed the dangers of the occult practices that other nations used to communicate with their gods. The Israelites were forbidden to imitate the occult methods that the Canaanites used to seek guidance from their gods. Moses gave a long list of such methods and strictly forbade the Israelites to imitate them when they lived in the land together with the local inhabitants (vv. 10–11; cf. v. 14). The God of Israel detested idolatry and spiritual prostitution. Moreover, it was because of the very practice of these abominable things that God would drive out the Canaanite nations from the land.

Moses countered the occultism of Canaan with the ministry of a prophet chosen by the God of Israel to speak to His people (v. 15; see v. 18). Interestingly, the raising of a prophet was caused by the people’s reaction to God’s direct and awesome revelation at Mount Sinai (vv. 16–17). Moses had already referred to Exodus 20:18–21 in his first speech (Deut. 4:10–13). Here, in the context of contrasting the revelations of idolatrous gods with God’s revelation to Israel, Moses reminded the people that they made the request for a mediator between them and God. Their fear of not being able to endure God’s continual, direct, and overwhelming revelations became paradigmatic for a future succession of prophets in Israel.

According to Moses's speech, the contrast between a Canaanite diviner and a prophet of God was clear. However, prophets would come up among their own people and would show ambiguous signs. Moses drew lines and provided five signs in order for his people to be able to differentiate between a prophet speaking with presumptuous words and a true prophet of God. The true prophet would (1) be an Israelite (vv. 15, 18); (2) speak in the name of the Lord (vv. 16, 19–20) (death was to be the result for false claims; v. 20); (3) speak words that proved true (vv. 21–22); (4) perform miracles (13:1); and (5) give words and revelations that did not contradict previous certified revelations of God (13:1–18).

Still, for today's reader, the rejection of witchcraft, magic, or occultism is sometimes not clear. Why does God detest sorcery or necromancy? When looking at the Canaanite methods of occultism, one realizes that each practice was controlled by the power and authority of the one who performed it for another person. In order to establish, keep, or increase their power, the sorcerer or diviner would perform things meant to impress and frighten. Today, the spell of witchcraft not only spreads a fascination with a world that is thought to be governed by the spirits of the dead, but is actually led by demonic powers and therefore allows evil forces to have access to our lives. Occult practices have terrorizing effects; some put human life in danger or require the destruction of life.

God's ways of communicating with His people were completely different from those of the occultists. The prophet of God was His spokesperson and was called to speak words that show a deep concern for life. When Moses told the Israelites that there would be more prophets like himself (in their function and in terms of the content of their message), he placed himself as the paramount example for all future prophets. For the past forty years, his life and his words had been a testimony of one who deeply cared for his people. He did not exercise power to keep the people under his control. His care and love for his people especially stood out during Israel's greatest revolt, which was when they built the golden calf. Moses stood up for his people in a sacrificial way. Such a person would be the prophet whom the Lord would choose for His people. He would intercede before God for the sake of His people. At the same time, the prophet would speak only God's words. Again, Moses was the example. For a long time, the audience had listened to him speaking words of life and wisdom, words of warning and concern, words of compassion and enthusiasm.

The prophet Moses was willing to give his own life for the lives of his beloved people. The subsequent prophets in Israel all stood as witnesses of their sacrificial love for God and the people they served. For NT writers, the full actualization of God's promise to Moses came in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ (v. 18). When Philip encountered Nathanael, he alluded to Moses's prophecies in the law (John 1:45). After Jesus fed the five thousand, the people affirmed that He was "the Prophet" (John 6:14). Peter identified Jesus as the Prophet of whom Moses had prophesied (Acts 3:22–23), and in his apologetic before the Sanhedrin, Stephen declared that Jesus was the promised messianic Prophet to whom Moses had pointed (Acts 7:37–38). After Christ's death and resurrection, some may ask whether there is still a need for prophets in the church. An understanding of the NT indicates that God continues to raise up prophets to guide His people and assure the church of His presence (Acts 11:27; 13:1; 15:32; 1 Cor. 14:29; Eph. 2:20). God calls and appoints prophets according to the gifts imparted by the Spirit. Paul indicates that prophets are specifically appointed for the benefit of the church (1 Cor. 12:28–29; 14:4; Eph. 4:11–14). On the other hand, Paul, in line with Moses who once wished that every Israelite would be a prophet of God (Num. 11:29), wished that all church members would prophesy (1 Cor. 14:24–25).

19:1—21:9. Righteousness in Matters of Life and Death. This part of Moses's speech has links to Exodus 20:22—23:33. Moses spoke about everyday life as well as about extreme situations. He spoke of a provision for asylum for those who committed accidental manslaughter (19:1–14). In cases of false accusation, Moses assured the Israelites that God was in charge (19:15–21). The lex talionis ("law of retaliation") hindered disproportionate vengeance or malicious payback; its demand was that punishment be proportional to the crimes committed.

Righteousness was the standard in times of war (20:1–20). Since Moses knew that his people would soon be involved in war, he addressed the specific situation of corporate violence. He provides instructions for distant war campaigns (vv. 10–15). He also had instructions for how to deal with Canaanite towns and people on smaller local campaigns (vv. 16–18). The issue of the complete destruction of towns and people in vv. 16–18 brings the kherem policy back into discussion, which in scholarly and non-scholarly studies is often associated with the notion of “holy war.” This is differentiated from ordinary warfare in the rest of Deuteronomy 20 (see “The Extermination of the Canaanites,” p. 330, and “Holy Warfare,” p. 372). It is important to notice that after dealing with the mustering of the troops, Moses gave a lengthy speech of encouragement. Obviously, Israel did not have trained military forces, so Moses spoke to the common people about the emotional crisis that they would experience at the sight of armed Canaanites in their fortified cities. “Do not be afraid” is the motto of the speech (vv. 1–9), an emphasis underlined by the use of three different expressions of the word “afraid” (yare’—“to be afraid,” v. 1; khapaz—“to be alarmed,” v. 3; ’arats—“to be fearful,” v. 3). The reason they were not to be afraid was that the Lord their God was with them to fight against their enemies and save them. The priests and other officials received direct instructions and words for the recruits. They were to provide assurance that Yahweh would be with the troops in battle.

There are several remarkable insights into military actions that prove a high ethical standard: (1) The fearful and the recently married were exempted from military activities (vv. 7–8). (2) Targeted cities were to be given the opportunity to surrender before an attack (vv. 10–11). (3) Israelites were prohibited from using the wood of fruit trees to make military machinery (v. 19). On the other hand, there were instructions to the troops about the complete destruction of towns and people. These instructions were built on the law of kherem as prescribed in chapter 7:

- The policy demanded the slaughter of the entire human population of Canaanite towns;
- The ordinance originated with Yahweh and not with military leaders or strategic planning;
- The people groups to be targeted were specifically identified;
- The policy was not driven by acts of hate and genocide, but by religious reasons—to punish the nations for their wickedness (9:4–5) and to keep Yahweh’s people free from syncretism and idolatry (v. 18).

21:10—26:19. Righteousness in Everything.

This section brings all of life under the principle of justice (16:20). The cases of women taken captive are discussed (20:10–14). They were to be treated well when taken as wives, as well as in cases where they were not. Their dignity and rights were to be protected. There are two prohibitions issued for the Israelite husband in case he decided not to marry (or according to some, to divorce after marriage) his war bride: he was not allowed to sell her nor treat her as chattel. Moses promoted a compassionate treatment of war brides even in cases when they were not married or were sent away. As a captive, she was degraded; now, she was not to be humiliated again by being treated as property. These texts speak to today’s crimes of the abuse of women and show that God did not allow this to happen even in the most extreme situations. God was concerned with the dignity of and respect for women, native or alien. He did not permit denying women their rights or treating them as property.

Deuteronomy 22 addresses care for domestic animals, wild animals, and the land. Deuteronomy 22:13–30 concerns righteousness in marital relations by addressing matters of sexual infidelity and misconduct. Contemporary readers of this passage have two alternatives: to interpret the text as a document of a time and culture that has no relevance today or to try to understand the values reflected and apply them to contemporary issues in marriage. With regard to the first choice, we may recognize that this passage reflects a high view of community, family, and human sexuality. This may run against our modern perspectives where individualism reigns, and human beings strive for independence and self-sufficiency. Sexual matters today are regarded as purely private. However, Moses taught that human sexuality is sacred, and that the purity of marriage is precious and needs to be defended. In a society where families disintegrate, and the rate of divorces among Christians is as high as among nonbelievers, Moses’s call for the defense of the institution of marriage is highly needed.

The law concerning the exclusion of eunuchs from the assembly did not preclude them from worshiping God (Isa. 56:3–7). Therefore, it is likely that the term “assembly of the LORD” (Deut. 23:1–8) designated an administrative body within Israel. Because they represented the people of God, the wholeness of the physical body of its members was required—representing the absence of moral or spiritual defects. In the case of foreigners, they could participate after living in Israel for a number of generations; at which time they would have assimilated into the religious culture of the Hebrews and could make decisions more in line with God's will. This notion is reinforced in the laws concerning the holiness and cleanliness of the army that represented God (23:9–14). These laws of cleanliness not only had a theological aspect, but also contained valuable health principles (see "Health and Hygiene in Leviticus," p. 272).

The law concerning runaway slaves (Deut. 23:15–16) is thought to apply to the slaves of foreigners since Hebrew bondservants could expect their freedom after six years of work (15:12). Other cultures were not as generous in this regard. In Egypt, treaties were signed with other nations requiring the return of slaves that might have escaped to or from Egypt. In Mesopotamia, Hammurabi's Code had the penalty of death for anyone who harbored a runaway slave, and the Code rewarded the bounty hunter for finding and returning them.

Prostitution (23:17–18) was often associated with a temple or a cult as part of the way a god or goddess was worshiped. A price was paid (Gen. 38:15–23) for this service. In no instance was a Hebrew to participate in this practice, and no foreigner was allowed to bring the wages received from such service as a gift to God.

The remaining three laws in Deuteronomy 23 all address different aspects of honesty, especially when relating to another person in the community. This included interest, keeping vows, and taking advantage of neighborly generosity.

Deuteronomy 24:1–4 is often understood as the passage that regulates divorce. However, it is important to note what the passage says and what it does not say: (1) Only the husband could initiate the divorce, likely because in that culture (unlike in Egypt where the wife could initiate a divorce) only the man was able to act legally. (2) The husband found 'erwah, "nakedness of a word/thing" (Heb. dabar), in the wife and divorced her. The meaning of this Hebrew word is difficult to understand in this context. It is possible that the term can be understood as pointing to a physical rather than a moral problem. The physical problem may have been related to menstrual irregularity, which would make the woman unclean and incapable of regular marital activities, including potential childbirth (cf. Lev. 15:19–30). A number of other interpretive options have been advanced, but none of them have clarified the question of the cause for divorce mentioned here. Ultimately, there is no explicit indication of what the "nakedness/thing" is (see Mark 10:1–12). (3) Moses did not speak primarily regarding the grounds for divorce, but focused on instruction for the conduct of the husband after the divorce. The husband was not allowed to reclaim her after she had married a second time, after her second husband died, or after her second husband also divorced her. (4) The husband who divorced his wife had to provide her with legal proof of the dissolution of the marriage. This document protected the woman from being forced to go back to the husband or from being accused of adultery when she married another man. Jesus clarified that the divorce document was only allowed for sexual immorality (Matt. 19:7–9), which by the time of Jeremiah included adultery (Jer. 3:8).

In the next part of his speech (Deut. 24:5–25:16), Moses addressed different aspects of life and demanded the implementation of righteousness. Each of these short laws contains some aspect of decentness toward one's neighbor.

Childbirth provided security in latter years, value in the esteem of their culture, and most importantly, a child to love, tend, and care for. Children brought happiness to a woman. Therefore, it was improper to give a woman to a man through marriage and not to provide her with the opportunity to become a mother (24:5), something that required the man to be around before risking his life as a soldier. To be a childless widow was pitiable in that culture.

Food processing was a daily task. The reason given for not taking a millstone implies that the same principle would apply to other forms of security that directly affected a person's ability to live (24:6).

A person could become a slave in different ways. Poor or indebted families sometimes sold family members into slavery to pay debts. Prisoners of war often became slaves. This law, however, particularly prohibited the evil of kidnapping Israelites for the purpose of selling them as slaves (24:7).

A community could easily be wiped out through poor hygiene, so if a person was suspected of having a communicable skin condition, he or she needed to be sent away from the community even if they were of high standing (24:8–9; cf. Lev. 13, 14).

It was the practice to pledge objects as collateral for a debt. The dignity of a person was not to be disregarded, regardless of the financial obligation (24:10–13). It was common to pay a worker each day. However, it is reasonable that an employer might want to pay wages on an accumulated basis. Thus, it needed to be stated that if the worker was not able to survive without the daily wages, the employer was required to pay them regardless of the business inconvenience (24:14–15).

The prohibition against punishing children for their parents' sins was directed at the magistrates—apparently only God was to decide when corporate punishments were to be applied (24:16). This law was cited as the reason why Amaziah did not kill the families of the men who assassinated his father (2 Kin. 14:6).

Historical memory was to motivate kindness and compassion for those less fortunate within the community. The protected class was to include widows, orphans, and the poor (Deut. 24:17–22). This principle was still emphasized in the early church (James 1:27). The minimal personal requirement was not to hoard every last portion of a harvest so that the protected class could glean and eat.

Even in receiving punishment, dignity was to be extended to the justly condemned person (Deut. 25:1–3). This was preceded by an impartial evaluation of the evidence by the judges. The physical punishment was to be inflicted in the presence of the judge to assure that the law was properly enforced, but in the process the judge was probably emotionally impacted by the execution of the sentence.

Those who worked were to receive wages for their work. This requirement was extended to the work of service animals (25:4). Oxen were used to pull threshing sledges across stocks of grain. These sledges were flat boards that often had small stones embedded on the underside. Those stones, combined with the hooves of an ox, were what helped to release the grain from the stocks.

Aged women were cared for by their children, particularly by their sons. For a wife to be widowed before she had a son was considered a tragedy. The levirate marriage law was designed to provide her with one and was not to be taken advantage of for the pleasure of the levirate brother (see Gen. 38:8–10). The best example of how this was to work comes from the story of Ruth where the closest kin refused to do his duty (Ruth 4), allowing the next nearest kin to do so. However, in that story, it is interesting that the son of Boaz and Ruth was never considered in the genealogies to be the son of her former husband (Ruth 4:21; Matt. 1:4).

Although the punishment of the woman who attempted to help her husband in a fight (Deut. 25:11–12) sounds harsh to our ears, it was designed to prevent sexual immodesty. There were ways to help her husband that did not require her coming in contact with the genitals of another man. Thus, this was a made choice. That part of the man's anatomy was to be regarded as untouchable, probably since it was his way to produce heirs. However, this is the only law that allowed for physical mutilation as the form of punishment, and it was better than death (the punishment for adultery, Deut. 22:22). It certainly was a powerful deterrent.

Because coins were not used until the Persian period, bartering was the only way to pay for goods or services. Often this required a way to measure what was exchanged, and scales were used. However, this required the weights to be accurate. A dishonest merchant could easily doctor his weights more or less than was proper. This was not to be allowed (Deut. 25:13–16).

The Amalekites, descendants of Esau (Gen. 36:12), have not been associated with any known archaeological material culture from Sinai (Exod. 17:8–13), the Negev (Num. 13:29; 14:25, 45; Judg. 6:3; 1 Sam. 30:1–20), or lands to the east (Judg. 3:13; 7:12). There is archaeological evidence of nomads in these regions at that time, but at this point it is impossible to associate any of that material with the Amalekites, perhaps in fulfillment of God's command to "blot out" any remembrance of Amalek (Deut. 25:19). That command (Deut. 25:17–19) restates a similar one from Exodus 17:14–16 that immediately followed an incident in Israel's victory over the Amalekites. This speech by Moses was given at the end of the forty years of wandering; whoever heard this speech when the Amalekites attacked would have been eighteen years old then. In the process of reminding this new generation, it is implied that the Amalekites knew better than to attack because they were aware that God would disapprove of their actions, and yet they did so anyway (Deut. 25:18), which was, in itself, a subtle warning to the Israelites to live as God would want. True to this command (v. 19), the Amalekites were later subdued by both Saul (1 Sam. 14:47–48) and David (2 Sam. 8:11–12), and in the time of Hezekiah they were completely destroyed (1 Chron. 4:41–43).

The Israelites were to remember that God gave them the land they were living in through two unique ways that dealt with their agricultural produce. First, they were to provide an offering for the Lord in the first year (Deut. 26:1–2, 10b–11), accompanied by a declaration that recognized God's providential hand in their own history (26:3–10a). Second, they were to give the third year's tithe to the protected class (Levites, foreigners, orphans, and widows; 26:12), accompanied by a declaration of covenant faithfulness and a plea for the blessing of the nation (26:13–15).

Moses concluded this section by picking up the theme of cultic worship and calling for a celebration of the Lord's faithfulness at the central sanctuary. Deuteronomy 26:16–19 summarizes the key theological issues in Moses's second speech. With the expression "this day" (v. 16), Moses refocused the attention of the audience and asked for their positive decision and a total commitment to the Lord. Furthermore, Moses reminded his congregation that while he was speaking, they actually heard the voice of the Lord their God.

27:1–26

Call for Covenantal Renewal in the Promised Land

Deuteronomy 27 seems to interrupt the flow between chapters 26 and 28, which are linked by common vocabulary and themes (an appeal to obedience and an announcement of blessings and curses). However, in the covenant call (Deut. 27), Moses specifically identified Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim as the places where the covenant renewal was to take place after the Israelites had crossed over into Canaan. Furthermore, the Israelites were to erect inscribed stones (vv. 2–4), build an altar (vv. 5–7), and have witnesses present (vv. 12–13). Also, a speech was to be given (v. 14) with a series of curses (vv. 15–26). Moses formally charged the people and the elders to adhere to the obligations of the covenant with the Lord. In view of the fact that the congregation was gathered at the border of the promised land and was ready to enter it, this covenant underlined the triangle between God, the people, and the land. At their entrance into the land, the people were to erect stone monuments and write on them the law that Moses had spoken. If the stone monuments were inscribed in Hebrew with Moses's three Deuteronomy speeches, there would have been about twelve thousand words written on each stone. Evidence for such customs in the ancient world comes from the Code of Hammurabi, which was written on a seven-foot stela in syllabic cuneiform script.

The main part of the covenant renewal is composed of the imprecations listed in vv. 15–26. The use of the word "cursed" (Heb. 'arur) implies that covenantal righteousness would not be enforced merely by the Israelite courts. The response of the entire congregation with a solemn "Amen" at the end of each of the twelve curses bound the people to God as the ultimate supervisor of moral order and placed the violators under divine sanction.

28:1—29:1

Blessings and Curses

Deuteronomy 28 is unevenly divided into two panels: blessings for those faithful to their covenant Lord (vv. 1–14) and curses for those persistently rebellious against Him (vv. 15–68).

28:1–14. Blessings. Before the expression of the blessings in seven principal clauses (vv. 7–14), Moses introduced them in the form of rhetorical declarations: town/country; fruit of the body (children)/fruit of the ground (crops)/fruit of the animals (the young from the livestock); basket/kneading bowl (trough); coming in/going out (vv. 3–6). Each of the following seven statements of blessing highlighted the Lord as the originator of blessings, so that Israel could not claim credit for anything that they would enjoy in the future. In the center of the material benefactions was Israel's special relationship with Yahweh (vv. 9–10). The ideal for Israel was to be a holy people, set apart and high above all nations; here, Moses envisioned the climax and fulfillment of all blessings. All the nations of the earth would recognize the name of Yahweh in Israel and that the well-being of the people was a gift of their divine Suzerain. Consequently, they would bring praise and honor to God. In these words, Israel represented all humanity in a microcosm; they were a people pointing back to the original creation order of the first human beings.

28:15—29:1. Curses and Epilogue. Moses began the curses with a series of blessing reversals (vv. 16–19), creating similarity by using the same words and concepts as in vv. 3–6, followed by a long list of curses (vv. 20–68). (1) As with the blessings, the Lord is the subject of all the actions stated in the text. (2) The preposition "until" ('ad) emphasizes the intent of the curses: the people would be destroyed (vv. 20, 24, 45, 51, 61). The covenantal triangle between God, Israel, and the land would be dissolved, and the entire nation would be wiped out. (3) Disasters would follow without relief. (4) Disasters and destruction would be caused by Israel's unfaithfulness to God. Deuteronomy 29:1 is the subscription that concludes the covenant made in the land of Moab. The reference to the words or terms of the covenant involve specific legal obligations and their stated consequences, and it applies to the laws, blessings, and curses of the preceding chapters (see “The Wrath of God,” p. 918, and “God’s Judgment in the Prophets,” p. 981).

29:2—30:20

MOSES’S THIRD DISCOURSE: TRUSTING IN THE GRACE OF YAHWEH

Moses summoned the people to reaffirm the covenant they had with the Lord (4:44—26:19; and chap. 28). He emphasized that the covenant bound both the people who were present and about to enter the promised land, and those of future generations (29:9–14). He warned of exile as the consequence of disobeying the covenant (vv. 15–28); but sincere repentance would result in the restoration of God’s favor (30:1–10). Consequently, Moses assured Israel that the terms of the covenant were not too difficult to fulfill (30:11–14). He concluded by making them an offer: choose between life and death (30:15–30).

In his third speech, Moses looked into Israel’s past history (29:2–9), using the word hayyom (“today” or “this day” or “now”) thirteen times to address the present generation, and provided visions of the future. The different temporal sections of the speech are arranged in an ABABA pattern, with the A sections addressing the immediate audience and the B sections looking into the future:

- A Present generation (29:10–13)
- B Future generations (29:14–28)
- A Present generation (29:29)
- B Future generations (30:1–10)
- A Present generation (30:11–20)

The climax of the speech is in the call to choose life rather than death (30:19) by completely submitting to the will of God.

29:2—30:20

Essence of Moses’s Third Discourse: The Grace of Covenant Renewal

The importance of the Exodus can never be overestimated. Moses looked back at this event and used similar words to those of God when He spoke to the Israelites at the foot of Mount Sinai (Ex. 19:4).

29:2–13. God’s Guidance in the Past. Moses recapitulated the themes of his speech in Deuteronomy 1–4 and 8 and showed again how God supernaturally sustained Israel to teach them His full power. The eyes that saw the great events in Egypt were very young eyes (eighteen years old or younger). Close to a year and a half after the Exodus, the spies gave their report, and the people refused to enter the promised land (Num. 13–14). All those who were twenty years or older at that time died over the course of the next forty years (Num. 14:29–35). However, all of those living at the time of this speech had seen the more recent victories over Sihon king of Heshbon (Num. 21:21–32) and Og king of Bashan (Num. 21:33–35). In spite of this, Moses wanted them to know that they still had the same problem of the heart that their parents had when they rebelled (Deut. 29:4). They had witnessed great victories but had not been convicted. So Moses reminded them of a more recent personal experience: their clothes and sandals had not worn out (v. 5) over the course of forty years. These experiences could have enabled Israel to realize the wisdom of obeying God and the folly of disobeying Him. Deuteronomy 29:10–15 addresses both the present and future generations of Israel, and the covenant formula at the center is the same for all generations (v. 13).

29:14–28. Consequences. Moses then spoke about the consequences that would befall the individual, family, or tribe that was disloyal to the Lord because of idolatry. Such persons needed to know that the blessings of the covenant were not unconditionally guaranteed. Because of their defiant response to God, they would seal their fate and suffer the anger of Yahweh (vv. 18–21). In the second part of this section, Moses shifted the focus to the collective consequences of idolatry for all Israel (vv. 22–28). The curses of Yahweh would come over the people and the land with full fury, and all would be uprooted and destroyed. Most of this section is direct speech involving three different voices: (1) the descendants of the present generation of Israel (vv. 22–23); (2) the nations surrounding Israel (v. 24); and (3) unknown respondents to the previous voices (vv. 25–28). Verses 22–24 contain questions that fit the context of the ancient world in which devastated land was interpreted as evidence of divine fury: Why had the Lord done this to the land? Why did He have this great anger? (v. 24). The respondents would speak of Israel’s treachery as the cause of their fate and of Yahweh’s response to idolatry. The speech was filled with a series of unparalleled expressions of the fury of Yahweh: He (lit. in the Hebrew) “burned at the nose” (v. 23), an expression derived from the natural phenomenon of hot breath coming from the nose of an infuriated person or creature; Yahweh acted in rage (khemah, v. 22) and great wrath (v. 23). He had imposed all the curses written in this book (v. 27), uprooted all the population, and tossed them away from the land (v. 28; see “God’s Judgment in the Prophets,” p. 981).

30:1–20. Restoration. In his speech, Moses transitioned from the horrific image of a devastated land to the promise of restored grace. But before this, he placed before his audience a most enigmatic passage (29:29): the secret things belong to the Lord God, but the revealed things belong to His people and their children forever, so that they may follow everything in the law. That generation had received a clear understanding of the will of the Lord and the nature of His covenant. Because of His gracious presence among disloyal people, there was hope for renewal and restoration.

Moses brought his audience (Deut. 30) to the climax of the gospel that he had proclaimed in all his speeches. The tone of his words completely changed. He offered the assurance that if Israel would be exiled, God would reinstate the people based on their genuine repentance and their return to Him and His will. The chiasm below shows that the keyword in this section is the Hebrew word shub, “turn” or “return,” which expresses both Israel’s return to God and God’s act of returning Israel to its prior state of well-being. In the Hebrew text, this word occurs in seven clauses in which the activity of a “return” by God and Israel appears in a chiasmic pattern, as noted in this literal translation of the Hebrew text:

- A When...you return them [these words] to your heart...and you return to the LORD your God...and obey Him with all your heart and soul (vv. 1–2)
- B Then the LORD will return you from captivity...He will return you from all the people where he has scattered you (v. 3)
- C The LORD your God will circumcise your heart and the heart of your descendants; love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul, so that you may live (v. 6)
- B' You will return and obey the LORD...the LORD will return to rejoice over you (vv. 8–9)
- A' If you return to the LORD your God with all your heart and soul (v. 10)

Moses made the core, the most important part, consist of Israel’s and Yahweh’s turning to each other and the returning of blessings: circumcision of the heart and love for God that comes from the heart (v. 6). He reintroduced a theme that he had already presented (10:16) when he called the Israelites to circumcise their hearts. Circumcision of the flesh became a metaphor for the removal of all the barriers that hinder a person from being totally committed to the Lord. As a result, devotion to the Lord would be evident in undivided love and obedience. Those whom the Lord would bring back from the Exile would have undergone a surgery of the heart, exposing radical actions of affection toward their divine covenant partner. Concomitant with the restoration of the former exiles would be the Lord’s restoration of their place among the nations. The nations would suffer the punishments that they had inflicted upon Israel. They acted as God’s agents against Israel, but they were also His enemies and He would address their evilness. Moses concluded his third discourse with a most urgent appeal to choose wisely between the two options that he had presented, namely, life and death (vv. 15–20).

THE DEATH OF MOSES

This portion of the book, the epilogue to both Deuteronomy and the entire Torah, is about the last days of Moses. It describes the final steps Moses took to prepare Israel for their future in the promised land. The reader will experience soaring moments in meditating on the song of Moses and contemplating the description of his final moments: his climb of Mount Nebo and his death. The actions described in this section are interwoven with lengthy poems, which show their importance to both the new beginnings of Israel as a covenant nation and the conclusion of Moses’s life: (1) Moses announced his imminent departure and appointed Joshua as his successor (31:1–8, 14–15, 23). (2) He wrote a copy of the teaching in his three speeches, placed the copy in the care of the priests and elders, gave instructions for its regular public reading, and urged the people to observe it (31:9–13, 24–26; 32:45–47). (3) Moses orally taught the people a prophetic poem and deposited a copy of it with the priests (31:16–22, 27–30; 32:1–44). (4) He delivered a final blessing on the tribes (chap. 33). (5) Finally, he ascended Mount Nebo and died (32:48–52; 34).

31:1—32:52*Preparing for the Death of Moses

Deuteronomy 31 and 32 stand as a memorial to the covenant between God and Israel that was renewed on the plains of Moab. Deuteronomy 31–32 consists of eight sections. Scholars recognize in this section an alternating order of long speeches about the transcription of the Torah and shorter speeches dealing with the appointment of Joshua; in between these are two poetic sections.

31:1–29. New Leader. In these narrative sections, Yahweh committed to the people of Israel, and they responded to their supreme Lord. The repeated mention of witnesses and testimony (31:19, 21, 26, 28; 32) reinforces the ritual aspect of the covenant renewal. Moses's legacy lives on due to his inspired writings, which chronicle a life of dedication to the call that came to him in the wilderness when he stood barefoot before the burning bush in the awesome presence of the Lord. His never-ending, passionate concern for a people who so often disrespected him, speaks more of the man Moses and his love for the Lord than any pillar of stone that has been erected for the great leaders of the world. Another remarkable act of Moses was his appointment of his successor, Joshua. One might expect that Moses would perhaps hand over his mantle of leadership in the form of his staff, which had carried a symbolic meaning for the past forty years; yet all the text records is that Moses delivered a song. (For the eschatological content of v. 29, see "Introduction to the Pentateuch," p. 120.)

31:30—32:43. Song of Moses. The Song of Moses is a magnificent artwork and didactic poem. The style is typical of biblical Hebrew poetry. Each line consists of at least two phrases or clauses that are parallel, synonymous, antithetical, or complementary to each other. Scholars refer to the phrases or clauses as "colons," and to pairs and trios of colons as "bicolons" and "tricolons" (see "Introduction to Hebrew Poetry and Wisdom Books," p. 614).

The core of the poem shows God's faithfulness and Israel's betrayal of Him. Moses began the song by praising the name of God and ascribing all greatness to Him. He spoke (vv. 4–6) of the faithfulness of the Lord as being manifested in His numerous dealings with a corrupt and ungrateful nation. Looking back upon the past, the poet described God's providence, which had brought Israel safely through the wilderness.

With the word "remember" (v. 7), all attention turns even further into the days of old when God separated the peoples of the earth and set boundaries to them. There is an allusion to the story of Babel in which the nations were divided and separated all over the earth. Moses seems to have used the context of this story when singing about Israel's ancestor Jacob receiving the inheritance and portion of the Lord.

Verses 10–14 are an extravagant poem about God's care for Jacob (v. 9). The reader is reminded that just after the scattering of the nations who attempted to make themselves a name by building the tower of Babel, Abraham received God's divine call and promise to make a name for Abraham and bless him abundantly. In his song to the Israelites on the Plains of Moab, Moses cast these ancestral stories into words filled with passion and loving enthusiasm. The Lord's actions toward Jacob, the founding in the wasteland, were twofold. First, Yahweh acted like an army encircling a village of defenseless, hungry people. He surrounded and protected them from the enemy, guarding them like a precious treasure, like the apple of His eye (v. 10). The following image in v. 11 is that of a mother eagle who encircles the nest of her young and hovers over the little eaglets to protect them from enemies and feed them out of her beak. When the birds are old enough to learn to fly, the mother spreads her wings and catches the young and carries them back into the safety of the nest for as long as they need this training.

Second, the song alludes to the beginnings of time and the primordial world as described in Genesis 1:1–2. There, the Spirit of God was "hovering over the waters" like the eagle mother over the nest with the young birds. The same verb used in Genesis 1:2 is used in Deuteronomy 32:11 to speak of the interest of the Spirit of God in a world that was to be filled with God's works of creation. Moses's song stresses the uniqueness of the relationship between God and a young Israel who knew of no other god (v. 12). He provided nourishment so that Israel would prosper. The metaphors of honey and oil that flowed from the land and rocks show the abundance that God gave.

The next stanza of the song portrays the very opposite image. Israel violated the supreme command by abandoning the Lord and pursuing other gods (vv. 15–18). Neglect of God, ingratitude, and perverse actions of idolatry committed by "Jeshurun"—a metaphor likely used in an ironic way because the name designates the “straight one”—resulted in the Lord threatening Israel with national disaster and bringing it almost to the verge of ruin (vv. 19–30). The imagery of v. 18 is especially interesting because Moses used a portrait of God that is often neglected: he spoke of God as a mother who gave birth to Israel and agonized in labor pains. Israel, the child, had forgotten God, her mother.

After a lengthy description of the evils that would come over Israel, vv. 31–43 describe the Lord’s determination not to allow an unworthy foe to triumph over His people. In the ultimate sense of the poem, the underlying theme is the rescue of the people by an act of grace. Just as God found and rescued the baby dying in the wilderness, so would he save again in the very moment of imminent annihilation (cf. Ezek. 1–14). Moses returned to the theme of divine rescue in the face of despair with impassioned earnestness and great literary and artistic skill.

32:44–52. God’s Address to Moses. In between the magnificent song chanted by the congregation and the grand blessing spoken over the tribes of Israel (chap. 33) is a unique paragraph: God spoke to Moses, the old leader, after Moses’s three long speeches for the people of Israel. At first glance, the obvious difference in the style of the passage, with its narrations and direct speeches in between two highly artistic pieces, makes God’s address to Moses seem awkwardly placed. The content of God’s address to Moses is completely different from the content of the two poetic sections. While the two poetic panels tell of God’s faithfulness, care, and blessing toward Israel, even in the times of Israel’s apostasy, the insertion of God’s address to Moses reminds readers of the most disappointing event in his life, which was when he disobeyed by striking, instead of speaking to, the rock. His disobedience was the reason why he was not allowed to enter the promised land. God used strong imperatives in all four verbs in vv. 49–50. Then He expressed the reason why Moses would not be allowed to enter into the promised land though he would be in sight of it (vv. 51–52).

The incident mentioned here is found in Numbers 20:2–13 and 27:12–14, conveying the reason why Moses could not go into the promised land. Moses mentioned this fateful event earlier in the book and told of how he pleaded with the Lord about going into the land, but the Lord remained firm on His prohibition (Deut. 3:23–27).

A look into the unusual form of God’s speech reveals that the first pair of imperative verbs (“go up” and “look/view”) harks back to Moses’s own words in the beginning of his speeches to the Israelites (Deut. 1:21). The parallelism between God’s speech to Moses and Moses’s speech to the people should not be overlooked. Moses received the same command that he had given to his people: “Go up!” The sharp contrast is followed by a second pair of imperatives, which are not about taking possession of the land as Moses had told the people (see 1:21), but instead are about his dying. The combination of the verbs “die” and “be gathered” place Moses in a direct line with the patriarchs of old, all of whom died and were gathered to their dead: Abraham (Gen. 25:8), Ishmael (25:17), Isaac (35:29), and Aaron, Moses’s brother (Deut. 32:50).

The Blessings

Deuteronomy 33 contains the blessings of Moses upon the Israelite tribes. The chapter is cast into elegant poetic Hebrew consisting of a series of benedictions, almost identical in size, for each tribe.

The poetic blessing in Genesis 49 that was spoken by Jacob to his sons before he died resembles Deuteronomy 33 most closely. However, the order of the tribes in Deuteronomy differs from Genesis 49, which lists the sons of Jacob in order of birth. Deuteronomy seems to list them in the geographical order of their territory in Canaan. The list begins with Reuben in the Transjordan and then moves west to Judah and ends with the northern tribes of the Galilee area. The list also seems to be organized according to their mothers. The first three that are listed are Leah’s sons, then come Rachel’s two sons, followed by Leah’s last two sons. The last four are the sons of Jacob’s concubines. Moses omits one son, Simeon, possibly because Simeon’s territory was within that of Judah.

The three sections of the poem, the introduction, core, and conclusion, work together in a unifying way. The core of the poem is composed of the blessings on the individual tribes (vv. 6–25), with the sections on Levi and Joseph at the center. The introduction and the coda emphasize the ideal unity of the tribes as a single people and heighten their security and prosperity in the land by the chiasmic repetition of key words that form an inclusio around the poem: the names “LORD” (YHWH), “Jacob,” and “Jeshurun” appear in the introduction (vv. 2, 4, 5), and then in reverse order in the conclusion (vv. 26, 28, 29). Also, “people” and “Israel” appear in chiasmic order in the introduction and conclusion (vv. 5, 28, 29).

The blessings of Moses begin with a majestic vision of the Lord coming from Sinai, rising up from Seir, and shining forth from Mount Paran (v. 2). The reference to His coming from Sinai seems to connect with God's revelation and the giving of the law, which is accompanied by the fiery phenomena and loud sounds that attended a solemn occasion. As the priestly tribe, the Levites were entrusted with the Urim and Thummim to find out God's will in specific situations (v. 8; Num. 27:21). These objects were kept in the breastplate (ephod) of the high priest (Ex. 28:30). The responsibilities of the Levites were twofold: to teach the law to Israel and to assist with the offerings (v. 10). The mediatory and instructive role of the Torah were foundational for the future of Israel as God's covenant people.

Moses had the longest blessing for Joseph, which was similar to Jacob's blessing in Genesis 49:22–26. In this blessing, Moses spoke about fertility and strength. Joseph received a double portion of territory, but was represented by his two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh (v. 17b; Josh. 14:2–4). Together, the two tribes received the largest portion of land. Their areas were some of the most fertile in the Transjordan territory and in all the promised land. In his wish for fruitfulness (vv. 13, 14, 15, 16), Moses mentioned all of God's creation as a source of blessing for Joseph: heaven, sun, moon, mountains, and earth. Moses expressed Joseph's power over the nations through the horns of a wild ox, a metaphor for strength (see various uses of a wild ox as a metaphor in v. 17; Num. 23:22; Job 39:9–12; Ps. 22:21).

The messianic language in the blessings for Levi and Joseph appears in the context of a visionary speech pointing to the end of days (Deut. 31:29; see "Introduction to the Pentateuch," p. 120, for a discussion of the messianic content of Deut. 32–33). The phrase

"latter days/end of the days" may refer to the coming messianic age. In the blessing for Levi, Moses spoke of the khasid, "holy, faithful" One (33:8), which seems to allude to the Messiah as the antitypical Priest, who is a cultic Mediator and Offerer of sacrifices as well as the Teacher of Israel (v. 10). In the blessing on Joseph, the term nazir (33:16) contains the meaning "consecrated" or "separated," including a notion pointing to the royal and priestly line of the Messiah (some translations have "prince"). This suggests that Deuteronomy closes with a view of the near future, the conquest of the land, and a messianic perspective of hope.

Death of Moses

The record of Moses's death has a mysterious element in its description of the magnificent view of the promised land and in the suggestion that God Himself officiated at the burial of His precious servant (v. 6). During Jesus's transfiguration, He was accompanied by Elijah and Moses, which indicates that Moses had been resurrected by the Lord. Moses died in good health at the age of 120 years. The Israelites lost their greatest leader; a man used by God like no one else in the OT. His successor was Joshua the son of Nun, chosen by God because he was full of the spirit of wisdom (v. 9). Moses had placed his hands on him, thereby appointing Joshua as the leader of Israel. The book closes with the absence of Moses, but the people were ready to conquer the land in fulfillment of the divine promises and under the leadership of God's instrument. In reality, there was no change in leadership. The Lord was still leading His people through human instruments. Joshua and the people shared the same hope of victory.

HISTORICAL BOOKS

INTRODUCTION TO THE OLD TESTAMENT HISTORICAL BOOKS

A large part of both testaments of Scripture include significant historical writing. Apart from the many historical sections contained in the Pentateuch, the OT books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, 1 and 2 Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther are all almost exclusively presented as history. Their NT equivalents include the four Gospels, which tell the story of Jesus, and the Acts of the Apostles, which details the story of the early Christian community.

The organization of the Hebrew Bible, which is different in book order than our modern Christian Bible, included Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings in the section titled Prophets (nebi'im), more precisely the Former Prophets, while Ruth, Ezra, Nehemiah, 1 and 2 Chronicles, and Esther were included in the Writings (ketubim), the last of three groups of books in the Hebrew canon—the Law, Prophets, and Writings (see “Formation of the Biblical Canon,” p. 21).

HISTORY WRITING, HISTORIOGRAPHY, AND THEOLOGY

In order to appropriately understand this particular genre of the OT canon, it is helpful to consider the relationship between biblical history writing, historiography, and theology. While the first two elements are obviously related, the visible presence of theology and theological thinking in these texts has led critical scholars to discount the historical veracity of biblical texts detailing history. After all, how does God fit into a literary category that requires objective, nonpartisan, and dispassionate reporting?

If we want to understand this legitimate question, we need to remember that any writing, including biblical historical accounts, reflects the convictions and presuppositions of the author. We always bring our own experiences, beliefs, and perspectives to the text, and these are also reflected in the way information is communicated to us. Texts and images always reflect an angle and perspective and cannot be truly “objective” since they always involve human communicators.

Right from the outset, biblical history writing identifies its most foundational assumption. Based on its claims of divine revelation (2 Tim. 3:16–17; 2 Pet. 1:19–21), Scripture makes it very clear that God is always at the center of what we read. As Creator, Sustainer, and Redeemer, He is actively involved in human affairs. War is reported in terms of God’s engagement; kings are evaluated based on their spiritual commitment to the covenant God made with David and his successors. Nations and individuals are participants and witnesses of God’s interaction in history. While this may be a challenging concept for many Western twenty-first-century readers, the notion of divinely inspired texts, presenting history from God's perspective, was not unique to Israel in biblical times. Mesopotamian and Egyptian texts contained similar claims.

Historiography is the science of writing history. Biblical historiography includes several important characteristics that need to be acknowledged before one attempts to understand the text. First, OT authors writing historical reports were very selective in the choice of details they reported. The narratives in the book of Judges reflect this characteristic, as they do not provide a comprehensive and systematic list of leaders (or judges) governing Israel. Some judges included in the book seem to have led regional confederations, as Israel lacked a central government during that period. Furthermore, the tenure of a number of the judges may have overlapped with other judges governing in a different region. This is not always clearly indicated in the text of Judges, since the biblical text focuses on the response of Israel's tribes to God's call to covenant faithfulness.

Second, OT historiography is theological and God-centered. Events and people are evaluated in the light of their commitment to the revealed word and their relationship to the Creator God. The well-known formula "X did evil in the sight [or eyes] of the Lord" (e.g., 1 Kin. 11:6; 14:22; 2 Kin. 8:18, 27; 13:2; 2 Chr. 22:4) appears dozens of times and reminds the reader that Israel's God is not far removed but rather is intimately engaged in human history. This concept can also be found in contemporary ANE texts and would have been readily understood by ancient readers.

Third, OT historiography is unabashedly interpretive. The biblical text describes people and events not from a neutral, objective manner but from the vantage point of Yahweh, the covenant God. The authors emphasize what is important for salvation history, moving from Creation, the Fall, and the Flood to the ups and downs of a people called by God for a specific mission. The life of King Omri of Israel, the founder of an important dynasty in the Northern Kingdom of Israel, is summarized in only eight verses (1 Kin. 16:21–28), while the reign of his son Ahab is covered in seven long chapters (1 Kin. 16:29–22:40). This ancient characteristic of recording what is important to the purpose of the text is understood more clearly when we note that Ahab does make an appearance in Assyrian texts (e.g., in a stela erected by Assyrian King Shalmaneser III celebrating his supposed victory at Qarqar in 853 B.C. over a coalition of kings including Ahab). However, most references to Israel in these texts over the following century and a half include the Akkadian bit humria ("the house of Omri") found in texts of Shalmaneser III, Adad-Nirari III, Tiglath-Pileser III, and Sargon II. Thus, for the Assyrian superpower, Omri himself, as the icon of his dynasty, must have played a much more significant role than suggested by his limited appearance in the biblical text.

Fourth, OT historical writing is realistic. While we would wish for stories that tell of perfection and excellence in the lives of God's people (including their kings), the stories told in the historical books of the OT offer us the real version without an idealized tint. In fact, compared to some other ancient texts that tell truly unbelievable stories, this trait of biblical history writing should give us more confidence in the authenticity of the material. King David, who looms large in biblical texts and whose name is the most referenced in the Bible, is not portrayed only as a fearless warrior and wise negotiator. The reader can also see his fierce and arrogant anger in his threat to avenge the disrespect from Nabal (1 Sam. 25) and his adulterous affair with Bathsheba and the eventual murder of her husband, which led to more death and pain in his family and Israel as a whole (2 Sam. 11; cf. 1 Kin. 15:5). The biblical author describes not only the extraordinary wisdom and riches of King Solomon but also his ungodly importation of Egyptian horses and chariots (1 Kin. 10:28–29; in violation of the divine command found in Deut. 17:16) and his waning commitment to the Lord due to his love for many foreign women (1 Kin. 11:1–8). A propagandist purpose would not have allowed the inclusion of these damaging facts. But the Bible includes them as lessons and examples of God's grace, forgiveness, transformation, and, at times, judgment.

People living in the world of the OT related well to stories, and history often has its best effect when it is presented in that way. This was as true then as it is today. Beyond the selective, theological, interpretive, and realistic nature of OT history writing, all these texts were given to tell the story of redemption again and again. Sometimes this happens through the vehicle of personal biographies or brief glimpses of key moments; at other times, the focus is more on the national storyline within the bigger context of a cosmic controversy. All of these stories, however, include a teaching component. In the NT, John 20:30–31 summarizes this focus by stating that John's book was written so that readers would believe that Jesus is the Christ/Messiah, the Son of God, and thus have life in His name. Ultimately, reading and hearing these stories help us to focus on the most foundational response of believing that the God who worked in the life of individuals and people is still at work today in the life of His church.

DEUTERONOMY AND THE HISTORICAL BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

Scholars have noted a number of similarities between Deuteronomy and the first six historical books (Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings), involving terminology and the overall theological lens, characterized by a focus on the covenant. Consequently, these books have been labeled as belonging to a Deuteronomistic History (DH). Clearly, many of the specific commands and values found in these books reflect those included in Deuteronomy. However, since the concept of a DH is closely linked to the source-critical paradigm pioneered by German scholars K. H. Graf and Julius Wellhausen (see "Introduction to the Pentateuch," p. 120), it suffices to recognize the logical sequence of these books following the covenant renewal described in Deuteronomy at the border of the promised land. In this sequence of biblical history, Joshua describes the time immediately prior to the conquest of Canaan and continues until the death of that first generation of conquerors. Judges continues the narrative, relating the frequent ups and downs of Israel's tribes, who often forget their commitment to the covenant made with the God who saved them out of slavery. The books of Samuel and Kings tell the story of Israel's transition from a tribal, judge-led confederation of clans and people to a united monarchy under Saul, David, and Solomon.

While the historical books do not reflect the sermonic frame of Deuteronomy, the treaty elements using distinctive vocabulary and phraseology connected to the promised land appear repeatedly in these books and highlight the close connection. One of the crucial themes of Deuteronomy, the need and requirement for a specific, single place of worship (Deut. 12:5), appears again and again in the historical books. Prior to the construction of the temple in Jerusalem, this is focused on the location of the tabernacle and the constant battle to maintain the singularity of the worship of the Lord amid the turn to high places and rival sanctuaries. After the construction of the temple under Solomon's leadership, the struggle continued as high places and household cultic places threatened to distract people from worshipping God as the unique Creator of heaven and earth. They were tempted to forget the object-lesson quality of the sacrificial and temple service, which pointed forward to the true Lamb of God.

The emphasis on heart religion and commitment in Deuteronomy is echoed by the early prophetic voices heard in the historical books. Moses's call for Israel to love God with all their heart, soul, and strength (Deut. 6:5; cf. 10:12) is repeated again and again in the later books (e.g., Josh. 22:5; 24:23; 1 Sam. 12:20, 24; 1 Kin. 8:61).

EARLY PROPHECY AND THE HISTORICAL BOOKS

Throughout history, God has very often communicated with humanity through the ministry of prophets. According to the definition found in Scripture, a prophet is an individual who has been called by God to speak on God's behalf to God's people and the larger world (as exemplified in Moses; cf. Deut. 18:15–22). Beginning in the Pentateuch, prophets are God's instruments to invite individuals or peoples to turn around and commit themselves again to God.

There are several Hebrew terms describing prophets, and all of them are used in the historical books (e.g., "man of God" [1 Sam. 9:6]; "seer" [1 Sam. 9:9]; and "prophet" [1 Sam. 3:20], to mention a few). Prophets and prophetic ministry per se were also known in the cultures surrounding Israel, including Egypt, Mesopotamia, and Syria. Texts from Emar and Mari and other regions of the ANE illustrate this phenomenon. In most instances (and rather distinct from biblical prophecy), extrabiblical prophets spoke to kings and were mostly in the employ of royalty. Their ministry happened typically within the context of cultic, ritual, and priestly activities, while biblical prophets came mostly from families that were not of the priestly line (with some exceptions, such as Samuel or Jeremiah). Unlike the monarchic and priestly functions, there was no hereditary prophetic role in Israel. God called whom and when He liked.

Early biblical prophets include Enoch (based on Jude 14; cf. CTr 51), Noah (Gen. 9:24–27; PP 117), Abraham (Gen. 20:7), Miriam (Ex. 15:20–21), Balaam (Num. 22), Deborah (Judg. 4:4), and a number of anonymous prophets (Judg. 6:8; 1 Kin. 13:1–10).

Samuel played an important role in the late premonarchic and early monarchic periods in relation to the monarchy, similar to the ministries of Nathan and Gad, who faithfully and fearlessly communicated God's messages to King David, even if that potentially meant a death sentence (2 Sam. 12:1–15; 24:11–25; 1 Chr. 21:9–19). Elijah's and Elisha's ministries affected a significant number of Israelite and Judean kings, as well as their Syrian neighbors. Like later writing prophets, such as Micah, Isaiah, and Jeremiah, their messages often annoyed and ultimately challenged their people and leaders to take a stand for the Lord and remember the covenant that God had made with them. The description of Ahab's and Jehoshaphat's encounter with Micaiah, the son of Imlah, in 1 Kings 22 provides a telling illustration of the different ways that various kings related to prophets of Yahweh.

Ahab of Israel and Jehoshaphat of Judah, linked through the marriage of their children (2 Kin. 8:18), agreed to fight the Syrian regional power to regain control over Ramoth Gilead, which had originally belonged to Israel. Like other ANE kings, they required divine orientation. It appears that Ahab followed the normal custom of maintaining a large number of court-supported prophets and diviners. The biblical text reports that about 400 prophets were gathered by the king, and they noisily proclaimed a resounding victory (1 Kin. 22:6). Jehoshaphat's skeptical reaction (v. 7) highlights one of the characteristics of true prophecy: a prophet of the Lord speaks the word from the Lord—not a conveniently packaged message requested by a king willing to pay for the right words. Micaiah's first message was full of irony and echoed what Ahab wanted to hear. Ahab's reaction suggested that he caught the irony (v. 16), and when he demanded the truth in the name of the Lord, the prophet revealed the king's imminent death. Micaiah's incarceration is a good illustration of the fact that the message of biblical prophets was not always welcomed by national leaders and the people.

In the ninth century B.C., during the time of Elijah and Elisha, the biblical text also depicts the existence of schools of the prophets. Generally, their members were called "sons/company of the prophets" (e.g., 1 Kin. 20:35; 2 Kin. 2:3, 5, 7, 15). Some scholars consider them as groups of individuals who practiced asceticism and preferred communal living. The biblical data, however, suggests a more school-like institution whose members were often married (2 Kin. 4:1–7) and may have functioned as itinerant religious teachers following their studies (PP 592–94).

The OT includes a number of books written by prophets (beginning with Jonah in the eighth century B.C.) whose ministries affected both Israel and Judah and whose writings became part of the biblical canon. Biblical prophets continued to admonish, encourage, challenge, and call back God's people until the Exile and the destruction of Jerusalem. The prophetic gift continued to bless God's people even after the Exile, as can be noted in the Ezra-Nehemiah narrative where Haggai and Zechariah play key roles in encouraging the returnees to continue the reconstruction of the temple (Ezra 5:1; 6:14; cf. the reference in Ezra's prayer in Ezra 9:11 and the many references to past prophetic ministry in Neh. 9:26, 30, 32). Intriguingly, the text also describes false prophets who had been hired to discourage Jerusalem's leadership and people through their misguided ministry (Neh. 6:10–14). This brief review clearly highlights the enduring presence of God's prophets ministering to the needs of the covenant people as well as the larger world surrounding them. During the intertestamental period this prophetic voice essentially disappeared, but it rang out loud preceding the time of Jesus's ministry and in the foundational decades of the early Christian community.

MAIN HISTORICAL PERIODS COVERED IN THE HISTORICAL BOOKS

The historical books cover the period beginning with the conquest of Canaan (ca. 1400 B.C.) until the time of the return of the Jews to Jerusalem under the leadership of Ezra in the fifth century B.C. (ca. 450 B.C.), slightly less than a thousand years. This period comprises a significant part of Israel's history, beginning with the time of the judges, that was characterized by tribal division and near-constant conflict with local powers, until the return of the Jews to Jerusalem during the time of Artaxerxes II when the province of Yehud was under the control of the Persian Empire. Following is a brief review of the major divisions of Israelite history.

Period of the Judges (ca. 1407–1053 B.C.)

The total number of years reported in the book of Judges for individual judges, if added sequentially, significantly exceeds 450 years (in addition to the three fairly extensive periods for which the biblical text does not include explicit durations: the time that Joshua and the elders governed Israel [Judg. 2:7]; the period that Samgar led Israel [Judg. 3:31]; as well as the long period that Samuel served as a judge [1 Sam. 7:15]). This significantly surpasses the roughly 350 known years between the conquest (ca. 1407 B.C.) and the anointing of Saul (1053 B.C.). This discrepancy suggests that judges may have governed at the same time in different parts of the country. This suggestion is supported by the geography of Canaan, which may have led to the isolation of some of the tribes (e.g., the tribes living on the eastern side of the Jordan). The biblical text itself highlights the fact that not all tribes were always afflicted by the same enemy or participated in every fight for liberation (e.g., Judg. 6:35; 8:1; 12:1).

United Monarchy (1053–931 B.C.)

Three kings reigned during this period, separated by some years of strife and civil war. Luke suggests in Acts 13:21 that Saul's reign lasted for forty years, which may indicate a rounded number, in line with David's (1 Chron. 29:27) and Solomon's reigns (1 Kin. 11:42). The meaning of the text of 1 Samuel 13:1 is unclear, as can be seen in the many diverging modern versions ("Saul reigned one year; and when he had reigned two years over Israel" [NKJV]; "Saul was thirty years old when he became king, and he reigned over Israel forty-two years" [NIV]; "Saul was...years old when he began to reign; and he reigned...and two years over Israel" [NRSV]). The ancient versions reflect the difficult nature of the text: the translators of the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible, simply omitted the verse. In the Targums, the Aramaic translations of the Hebrew Bible, the text is paraphrased as "Saul was as innocent as a child of one year when he began to reign."

David's forty-year reign (1011–971 B.C.) is divided into two periods. David reigned for seven years in Hebron over Judah and Benjamin. He conquered Jerusalem and made it his capital (2 Sam. 5:6–10), and he reigned thirty-three years in Jerusalem as king of a united kingdom (1 Chr. 29:27). His military victories over the Philistines and other neighboring nations laid the foundation for a short period characterized by military strength, advances in the organization of the kingdom, and economic blessings. The biblical text draws a clear connection between David's faithfulness and God's divine blessings for the nation. Critical scholars have long doubted the very existence of King David. However, recent discoveries, including the ninth-century-B.C. Tel Dan inscription mentioning "the house of David," found in 1993, and the important contribution of the excavations of Khirbet Qeiyafa (possibly to be identified as the biblical Shaaraim, mentioned in 1 Sam. 17:52 as a border town separating Israel and Philistia), strongly suggest the existence of a central administrative power in the tenth century B.C. in Israel. These discoveries have put these doubts from critical scholarship to rest (for more, see "Archaeology and the Bible," p. 77).

Solomon's reign (971–931 B.C.) also covered forty years (1 Kin. 11:42) and represents the pinnacle of power, economic prowess, art, and architecture of Israel's united monarchy. At this time, Israel's territory extended from the Gulf of Aqaba in the south to the Euphrates in the north. Solomon's plea for divine wisdom (1 Kin. 3:1–15) was granted and his fame spread throughout the ANE. His marriage to Pharaoh's daughter (1 Kin. 3:1) underlines Solomon's elevated status within the context of ANE powers of the tenth century B.C. Solomon is well known for his construction of the first temple, but from a strategic position, his construction of a series of fortified cities for his standing army and his extensive chariot force (1 Kin. 4:26; 9:15–19; 10:26) hints at his political, economic, and military significance. Israel's crucial geographical location, connecting Africa (and Egypt) to Syria, Asia Minor, and Mesopotamia, gave Solomon serious control of key routes. Unfortunately, his huge harem and his agreement to the construction around Jerusalem of places of worship honoring scores of ANE deities for his wives set the stage for Israel's continuous struggle with idolatry over the following centuries (1 Kin. 11:1–8). Furthermore, his ambitious building projects and the complete administrative reorganization of the kingdom required that every Israelite had to contribute labor, leading to disquiet and challenging the agricultural production of the kingdom.

Divided Monarchy

Due to Rehoboam's unwise decision soon after his coronation to increase the forced labor requirements for his citizens, the ten northern tribes broke away from Judah and Benjamin. This resulted in the division of God's people into the kingdoms of Israel and Judah (1 Kin. 12:1–20). The following contains a brief summary of key kings and events during the following centuries.

Kingdom of Israel (931–722 B.C.)

Jeroboam I (931–910 B.C.) became Israel's first king (1 Kin. 12:19–20). During the reign of Solomon he had been part of the royal administration (1 Kin. 11:26–28), but following a prophetic oracle anticipating the division of the ten northern tribes from Judah and Benjamin, Jeroboam had to flee from Solomon to Egypt (1 Kin. 11:29–40). He later returned to Israel after the death of Solomon, and became king over the ten northern tribes when they rebelled against Rehoboam. Even though he had been called to reign over Israel by a prophet from God, Jeroboam built two temples and installed two golden calves in two crucial geographical locations of his kingdom: Bethel (marking the southern border) and Dan (marking the northern border). This was most likely for political reasons, as he sought to keep his people from traveling to the temple in Jerusalem to fulfill a requirement of the law (1 Kin. 12:27–30). He also appointed non-Levitical priests and established high places around his kingdom (v. 31). These became known as Jeroboam's sins that caused Israel to sin (e.g., 1 Kin. 14:16; 15:30; 2 Kin. 3:3; 10:29).

Jeroboam's form of worship was a beguiling mixture of true and false religion. Jeroboam was the first king of a line of twenty kings representing many dynasties. His son Nadab (910–909 B.C.) reigned for only two years (1 Kin. 15:25) and was assassinated by Baasha from the tribe of Issachar (1 Kin. 15:27). Baasha reigned for twenty-two years (909–886 B.C.) and fought a number of battles with Judah and also Syria to the north. His son Elah (886–885 B.C.) reigned for less than two years and was assassinated in his capital, Tirzah, by one of his generals, Zimri (885 B.C.), who made himself king but reigned for only seven days (1 Kin. 16:8–10, 15). In fulfillment of the message that the prophet Jehu had delivered to Baasha (1 Kin. 16:1–4), Zimri spent his very short-lived reign killing all the family members of the house of Baasha (1 Kin. 16:11–13). After Zimri's violent coup another of Elah's generals, Omri, was proclaimed king by the army of Israel and took the capital from Zimri, who committed suicide, after a short siege (vv. 16–18).

The biblical text reports that, for a while, Israel was ravaged by civil war between the followers of Tibni (885–880 B.C.) and Omri. The reign of Omri, who finally prevailed (1 Kin. 16:21–22), lasted twelve years (885–874 B.C.) and represents the beginning of the longest-reigning dynasty of Israel (four generations). According to the Moabite Mesha Stele, Omri subjugated Moab, and during the time of King Ahab, Omri's son, Moab paid him a yearly tribute of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams (2 Kin. 3:4). Omri also established Samaria as Israel's capital (1 Kin. 16:24). His son Ahab (874–853 B.C.) reigned for twenty-two years and, based on the evaluation of the biblical text, was one of the worst kings of the Northern Kingdom. His reign overlaps with the ministry of Elijah. His marriage to the Phoenician Queen Jezebel caused a major religious crisis in Israel (1 Kin. 18:4, 19). She introduced court-sponsored prophets and priests of Baal. First Kings 22:39 states that Ahab built an ivory house in Samaria. Excavations of the palace at Samaria found hundreds of artistic ivory fragments. His son Ahaziah (853–852 B.C.) reigned for only two years (1 Kin. 22:51–53) and followed in the footsteps of his father. He was followed by his son Joram (Jehoram; 852–841 B.C.), completing the fourth generation of the dynasty of Omri. Moab rebelled against Israel during his reign (2 Kin. 3:4–27).

Jehoram (sometimes also called Joram, cf. 2 Kin. 9:14–26) was assassinated by his general Jehu (841–814 B.C.), who had been anointed at Elisha's direction by one of the sons of the prophets (2 Kin. 9:1–10) and had been charged to completely destroy Ahab's descendants. Jehu's zealous fulfillment of this command resulted in the divine promise of the establishment of Jehu's dynasty until the fourth generation (2 Kin. 10:30), even though he ultimately did not help Israel to return to the Lord and continued in the worship at Dan and Bethel established by Jeroboam I (2 Kin. 10:31). His son Jehoahaz (814–798 B.C.) reigned for seventeen years (2 Kin. 13:1–2) but did not change the general downward course of Israel. During his reign Israel lost significant territory to the Syrians, led by Hazael and Ben-Hadad. Second Kings 13:7 states that Israel was left with only 50 horsemen, 10 chariots, and 10,000 foot soldiers. His son Jehoash (Joash; 798–782 B.C.) reigned for sixteen years and recovered some of the territory lost to the Syrians (or Arameans; 2 Kin. 13:25). He also won a battle against Judah at Beth-Shemesh and took hostages and booty from Jerusalem to Samaria (2 Kin. 14:8–14). It is likely that he coreigned with his son Jeroboam II (793–753 B.C.) for twelve years.

Jeroboam II's reign represents the golden age of the Northern Kingdom of Israel. Due to the weakness of the Assyrians and the Syrians, he was able to extend his reign and recover much of the territory that had been lost since the days of Solomon. While the seven verses describing his reign suggest political and economic stability and link his reign to the prophetic ministry of Jonah, he did not initiate true reformation (2 Kin. 14:23–29). Judging from the writing of Amos, a contemporary of Jeroboam II, it appears as if social injustice became an ever more pressing problem in Israelite society. His son Zechariah (753–752 B.C.) reigned for only six months and was assassinated by Shallum (752 B.C.), who in turn was killed a month later by Menahem (752–742 B.C.), who had to pay a high tribute to the Assyrian King Tiglath-Pileser III.

That turbulent period of Israelite history underlines the decay and diminishing importance of Israel (2 Kin. 15:8–22). The reign of Menahem's son Pekahiah (742–740 B.C.) was cut short when he was assassinated by Pekah (752–732 B.C.). Intriguingly, according to 2 Kings 15:27 Pekah reigned for twenty years, suggesting that he may have governed a small part of the kingdom during Menahem's reign. He rebelled against the Assyrian power and formed an alliance with Syrian city-states (cf. Is. 7:1–4 for more information). The last king of Israel, Hoshea (732–722 B.C.), killed his predecessor, Pekah, and had to pay heavy tribute to the Assyrians. He joined an anti-Assyrian alliance under the leadership of Pharaoh So of Egypt (2 Kin. 17:4), possibly Osorkon IV, who reigned in Tanis. Ten years into Hoshea's reign, Samaria and Israel ceased to exist and the people were deported by the Assyrian kings Shalmaneser V and Sargon II (2 Kin. 18:10).

Kingdom of Judah (931–586 B.C.)

Different from Israel, Judah's kings all belonged to the Davidic dynasty. Rehoboam (931–913 B.C.) suffered an attack and defeat by Pharaoh Sheshonq I of Egypt in his fifth year (1 Kin.

14:25–28). The temple was raided and its treasures taken. Unfortunately, like his father, Solomon, he had many wives and many concubines (2 Chr. 11:21). Judah fell more and more into idolatry (1 Kin. 14:22–24) during his reign. His son Abijam (913–911 B.C.) reigned for only three years and followed the general downward trend of his father. His son Asa (911–870 B.C.), however, is considered a good king by the biblical author because of his religious reforms (1 Kin. 15:9–15). He was one of the longest-reigning kings of Judah. Because of his lack of faith in God's power to save when Israel's Baasha attacked Judah, he was severely reprimanded by the prophet Hanani (2 Chr. 16:1–10). Asa's son Jehoshaphat (872–848 B.C.) reigned as coregent due to his father's ill health (2 Chr. 16:12–13). He continued his father's reforms but made an alliance by marriage with the dynasty of Omri when his son married Ahab's daughter (2 Kin. 8:18, 26). Unfortunately, this marriage opened Judah to Baal worship. He also fought alongside Ahab against the Arameans at Ramoth Gilead (2 Chr. 18–19:3).

Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram (853–841 B.C.) reigned with his father from 853 B.C. onward. He should not be confused with Joram (Jehoram) of Israel, who reigned in the same period. Scripture's evaluation of his reign is entirely negative due to the influence of his wife, the daughter of Ahab (2 Kin. 8:16–18). Judah lost control over Edom and Libnah during his reign (2 Kin. 8:20–22). The reign of his son Ahaziah (841 B.C.) was cut short dramatically when he died from the injuries sustained during Jehu's rebellion in neighboring Israel (2 Kin. 9:14–28). His mother, Athaliah, reigned from 841 to 835 B.C. and secured her reign by killing all the royal heirs (2 Kin. 11:1) except for her grandson Joash, who was hidden by his aunt Jehosheba, who was married to the high priest Jehoiada (2 Kin. 11:2–3). Athaliah's reign of terror ended six years later when, under the leadership of Jehoiada, the army and the people of the land made Joash king of Judah and killed Athaliah.

The long reign of Joash (Jehoash; 835–796 B.C.), not to be confused with the king of Israel with a similar name, reflects both good and evil. Guided by his priestly uncle, Joash attempted a major religious reform, seeking to destroy the worship of Baal in the land (2 Kin. 12:1–16; 2 Chr. 24:1–14). Later on, however, he killed Jehoiada's son Zechariah, who had challenged Judah publicly (2 Chr. 24:15–22). Joash was killed by his servants, and his son Amaziah (796–767 B.C.) became king in Jerusalem (2 Chr. 25). God gave him a resounding victory over Edom (2 Chr. 25:5–12), but Amaziah became arrogant and challenged Jehoash of Israel, who won a great victory and marched into Jerusalem (2 Kin. 14:8–14) and took many spoils and hostages back to Samaria. Amaziah was also killed by his own servants, and his son Azariah was made king in his stead (2 Kin. 14:17–21). Azariah (Uzziah; 792–740 B.C.) is considered a good king, and he reigned for fifty-two years, coreigning with his father, Amaziah, at the end of his life. Judah avoided many of the dynastic struggles that Israel experienced by appointing future kings as coregents. Azariah is called Uzziah in Chronicles, perhaps reflecting a throne name. Parallel to the reign of Jeroboam II in Israel, Azariah's reign is characterized by peace and strong economic development (2 Chr. 26:10). He maintained a strong army (2 Chr. 26:11–15) and regained control over Elath at the Gulf of Aqaba (2 Kin. 14:22), thus giving him sea access and control over an important trade route. During his reign Judah experienced a major earthquake that is referenced in Scripture (Amos 1:1; Zech. 14:5). When the king attempted to enter the Holy Place and burn incense on its altar, he was struck with leprosy and had to live a secluded life in the palace (2 Chr. 26:16–21). His son Jotham (750–732 B.C.) reigned in his place and was a contemporary of the prophets Isaiah, Hosea, and Micah, who, most likely, were a good influence on him (2 Chr. 27:1–9). His son Ahaz (735–716 B.C.), however, represents one of the worst kings in Judah's history; he practiced idolatrous abominations, including sacrificing one of his sons (2 Kin. 16:3–4). Instead of trusting in the Lord, Ahaz sent a heavy tribute to the Assyrian king Tiglath-Pileser III, requesting his help against the alliance of Israel and Syria (2 Kin. 16:5–9; Is. 7:3–13). He also introduced an Assyrian altar into the temple in Jerusalem (2 Kin. 16:10–16).

Ahaz was succeeded by his son Hezekiah (716–687 B.C.), who initiated major religious reforms and also strengthened the national defenses (at Lachish and Jerusalem) in light of the Assyrian threat following the destruction of Samaria (2 Kin. 18:1–8; 2 Chr. 32:28–29). His name is associated with the 1,900-foot (ca. 582 m) tunnel connecting the Gihon Spring to a pool in the lower part of Jerusalem inside the city walls (2 Kin. 20:20; 2 Chr. 32:30; see “Archaeology and the Bible,” p. 77). Lachish, the second-largest fortified city of Judah located south of Jerusalem, was destroyed by Sennacherib during his reign. God delivered Jerusalem from the Assyrian attack and killed a huge number of Assyrian soldiers (2 Kin. 18–19).

Manasseh (697–643 B.C.), Hezekiah's son, became one of the worst kings of the kingdom of Judah, reconstructing altars for Baal, practicing magic, sacrificing children, and worshiping the stars (2 Chr. 33:1–10). Consequently, he was taken to Mesopotamia as a prisoner of the Assyrian kings (2 Chr. 33:11). Chronicles reports that Manasseh repented and God forgave and restored him to his throne (2 Chr. 33:12–13). The damage done by his example, however, accelerated Judah's fall and soon-coming destruction. God's prophetic word announced that it was for the sins of Manasseh that Judah would go into captivity (2 Kin. 24:3). Amon (643–641 B.C.), Manasseh's son, reigned for only two years and was killed by his servants (2 Kin. 21:19–26; 2 Chr. 33:21–25). He was succeeded by Judah's last good king, Josiah (641–609 B.C.), who undertook a major reform at the age of fifteen or sixteen years (2 Chr. 34:3). In the eighteenth year of his reign (622 B.C.), the “book of the law” was found in the temple, which gave impetus for more reforms, including reinstating the celebration of the Passover (2 Kin. 22–23; 2 Chr. 34:6–7). Josiah died in the battle of Megiddo against Pharaoh Necho in 609 B.C. (2 Chr. 35:20–24) as he sought to delay the arrival of the Egyptian army on their way to support the remainder of the severely diminished army of the last Assyrian king. His son Jehoahaz (609 B.C.) reigned for three months and was deported by the Egyptian pharaoh, who put another son of Josiah, Jehoiakim (609–598 B.C.), on the throne.

When the Babylonian crown prince Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem for the first time in 605 B.C., Judah became a vassal of the new Babylonian superpower. Among the hostages taken by Nebuchadnezzar were Daniel and his three friends (Dan. 1:1–6). When another battle between Egypt and Babylon in 601 B.C. ended in heavy losses to the Babylonians, Jehoiakim thought that his time had come, and he rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar. He died in 598 B.C. before the Babylonian troops were able to take Jerusalem for a second time. His son Jehoiachin (598–597 B.C.) was made king of Judah following the sudden death of his father, but he reigned for only three months (2 Kin. 24:8–12) before Jerusalem fell for a second time to the Babylonians. He was taken as prisoner to Babylon but was released in the thirty-seventh year of his captivity by Babylonian King Evil-Merodach, a son of Nebuchadnezzar, who ruled Babylon from 562 to 560 B.C. (2 Kin. 25:27–30). Judah's final king's birth name was Mattaniah ("gift of Yahweh"), but he received the throne name Zedekiah ("justice of Yahweh"; 597–586 B.C.) from Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kin. 24:17). He was another son of Josiah but did not live as his father had lived. He traveled to Babylon in his fourth year (ca. 594/593 B.C.; Jer. 51:59) to swear allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar. That trip to Babylon may be connected to the story found in Daniel 3 when all the princes of the Babylonian Empire were required to worship the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar had built on the plain of Dura. Like some of the other kings before him, Zedekiah was persuaded by Egypt into another anti-Babylon alliance (Jer. 37:6–10) and rebelled in 590 B.C. Babylon's quick response led to the destruction of all fortified cities in Judah and, finally, in July of 586 B.C., to the fall of Jerusalem (2 Kin. 25:2; Jer. 39:2), resulting in the complete destruction of Jerusalem and its temple. Zedekiah was caught when he tried to leave the city prior to the fall, was blinded, and was taken to Babylon as a prisoner (2 Kin. 25:1–7). Nebuchadnezzar appointed Gedaliah as administrative overseer of the newly established Babylonian province, and Gedaliah resided in Mizpah (2 Kin. 25:22–24). Unfortunately, he was killed by Jewish rebels, who took many of the remaining Jews, including Jeremiah, to Egypt (2 Kin. 25:25–26; see Jer. 41–43).

Exile and Return (605–444 B.C.)

Judah's Exile lasted about seventy years, beginning with the first deportation in 605 B.C. and concluding after the fall of Babylon in 539 B.C. and the subsequent decree issued by the Medo-Persian King Cyrus (2 Chr. 36:22–23; Ezra 1:1–4). The first group of Jews returned to Jerusalem around 537 B.C. under the leadership of Sheshbazzar (most likely the Babylonian version of the Hebrew name Zerubbabel; cf. Ezra 1:5–11; 2:2; 3:2–8; Hag. 1:14–15). While the altar was immediately reestablished and the sacrificial worship began right after the arrival of the returnees, it took more than twenty years to complete the rebuilding of the temple itself (Ezra 6:15 gives the sixth year of King Darius I [515 B.C.] as the time when the newly rebuilt temple was dedicated). Ezra and Nehemiah describe three returns: the first under Zerubbabel/Sheshbazzar in 537 B.C.; the second under Ezra in 457 B.C. (the seventh year of Artaxerxes I; Ezra 7:8); and the third under Nehemiah, who had been appointed as the new governor of the province of Yehud that was part of the Medo-Persian Empire (in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes I, 444 B.C.; Neh. 2:1, 11).

Judah's provincial status within the satrapy Beyond the River suggests limited control over its destiny, which is also reflected in Ezra and Nehemiah (cf. Ezra 4). Restoration of the temple and return to the land did not automatically mean political restoration equivalent to the freedom Israel and Judah had enjoyed during the centuries of the united and divided monarchies. For the next centuries until the beginning of the NT period, Jerusalem and its surrounding territory were part of a sequence of empires that controlled its destiny. God's covenant people were called to affect the world and cultures surrounding them by their example and message. In many ways, this was a time of growing expectations, as the time of the Messiah, anticipated by Israel's prophets for centuries, was drawing closer and closer.

MAJOR THEOLOGICAL THEMES OF THE HISTORICAL BOOKS

God's engagement in human history is one of the key theological motifs shared by all of the historical books of the OT. In spite of unfaithfulness by His people and leaders, God is at work. He heard Joshua's plea for wisdom and strength before he had even expressed it verbally (Josh. 1:1–9). He heard Israel's repeated cries during the period of the judges as they experienced repeated oppression due to their poor choices (e.g., Judg. 3:9, 15; 4:3; 5:28). God hears when we lack hope or when we are burdened by our sins and bad choices. As we cry we also turn toward the only One who can offer us hope and liberation. This is the covenantal framework that runs like a golden thread through the historical books. God woos us into recognizing our distress, which causes us to turn to Him and repent. In turn, God provides a way out. Sometimes He uses other people (as illustrated by the stories told in Judges and Ruth); sometimes He intervenes directly, moving the hearts of princes and kings or sending His prophets to offer a way through a parched desert, which led to an unexpected victory (2 Kin. 3:9–24); sometimes He uses kings and courtiers to make a way (see Ezra 1), as when He stirred up the spirit of Cyrus and the hearts of His own people. He moves history forward and fills it with hope.

God's engagement in human history is central to the larger cosmic battle between good and evil. There is a purpose to God hearing the cries of His people and those who are afflicted and oppressed. Ultimately, it drives us to make a decision about whom we will trust. God's covenant blessings were a way of helping the larger world surrounding Israel and Judah to pay attention to the Lord, the God of Israel, who is not a local or regional deity made of stone, wood, or metal. This principle of establishing His people as witnesses (already anticipated in Gen. 12:1–3) is appropriately expressed in 1 Kings 10:1 when the queen of Sheba came to visit King Solomon and asked him questions because of his fame and the name of the Lord. Solomon's fame was related to "the name of the LORD"—shorthand for His character and qualities. Israel was to demonstrate to the world that God is the Creator and Sustainer of all the world. Intriguingly, most canonical prophets writing during this period included a significant number of messages and oracles directed to the nations surrounding Israel, illustrating perfectly the universal nature of God. In the NT the same principle is summarized so powerfully in John 3:16—God loved the whole world and gave His only Son to save us from eternal death and give eternal life to those who trust in Him. There is no partiality or partisanship in God's saving grace.

Another recurring motif found in the historical books involves the power of leadership. Faithful leaders inspire faithful followers; idolatrous leaders seduce people to more idolatry. This clear message can be easily documented in the annals of Israelite history. Great moments of national reformation are led by God-fearing kings, prophets, or priests who don't consider the cost of unpopular decisions (e.g., Joash's repair of the temple was inspired by the godly influence of the high priest Jehoiada [2 Kin. 12:1–16; 2 Chr. 24:1–14]; following the death of his mentor, Joash served wooden images and idols [2 Chr. 24:15–22]). Other examples include Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah from the kingdom of Judah. Their examples and leadership functioned as powerful initiators of national transformation, even though we can clearly see in the biblical text some of their weaknesses and bad choices.

When we consider the importance of leadership, we should not overlook the significance of the prophetic ministry. The role of the prophets in the historical books cannot be underestimated. Their divinely inspired messages often call God's people to return to Him or, in other moments, are a reminder of the fact that God is still in control and able and willing to save His people, thus offering them hope.

God's sovereignty and grace shines through the story again and again. He gave the land to Israel. He chose Jerusalem to be the location for His temple and His presence. He listened to the cries of His people and their leaders. He appointed and empowered kings—even though a human monarchy was not part of His ideal plan (1 Sam. 8). He gathered a remnant to return to Jerusalem. His ability to hear the prayers and cries of His people is not limited by time and space. He is the all-powerful, almighty, all-knowing, and all-caring God, even though Israel often forgot these foundational truths.

As we reach the end of OT history in the Chronicles and in Ezra and Nehemiah, we wonder about the Messiah, the One foretold by prophets and prefigured by some of Israel's leaders. When will He come? How will He come, and for whom will He come? As easily recognizable from the lack of recognition in the NT Gospel narratives, Israel was waiting for the Messiah but looked for the wrong kind. The Messiah's arrival would change the world forever and validate the hope of thousands who yearned to see Immanuel, God with us.

JOSHUA

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. In the Jewish canon, the book of Joshua is the first of the section called “the Prophets.” The title of the book is a personal name, yehoshua’, meaning “Yahweh saves.” Joshua’s name was originally hoshea’, “salvation,” but Moses changed it by prefixing the abbreviated form of the divine name Yahweh (yahweh + hoshua; Num. 13:16). The English form “Joshua” abbreviates the Hebrew “Yehoshua,” while the name Jesus derives from the Greek version. This means that the names Yehoshua, Joshua, and Jesus are one and the same. Both in name and work, Joshua was a type of Jesus Christ, the “Commander of the army of the Lord” (Josh. 5:13–15).

Internal evidence shows that the book was composed shortly after the conquest. Several examples can be cited. First, it is stated that Rahab was still living in Israel in the writer’s lifetime (“to this day”; 6:25), which suggests that the writing of the book occurred during the lifetime of the generation that entered the Holy Land (cf. Judg. 2:10). Second, the author seems to have been an eyewitness to the conquest, not only because he uses a first-person pronoun (Josh. 5:6) but also because of the copious geographical and topographical details found throughout the book. Third, the references to Jerusalem (15:63) and Gezer (16:10) as being inhabited by the Jebusites and Canaanites, respectively, as well as the preeminence given to Sidon as opposed to Tyre (11:8; 13:4; 19:28), imply that the book was composed long before the reigns of David and Solomon (cf. 2 Sam. 5:6–11; 1 Kin. 7:13; 9:16). According to the text, Joshua was literate (Josh. 8:32; 24:26). He is also the dominant human character of the book, as is Moses in the Pentateuch. It is probable, therefore, that Joshua is the author of the book that bears his name, though his death account, as well as that of Eleazar (24:29–33), must have been added by another inspired person(s). The internal evidence agrees with Jewish traditions that Joshua wrote chapters 1:1–24:28 while Eleazar and Phinehas added 24:29–32 and 24:33, respectively. Nonetheless, there are some later scribal modernizations intended to clarify the text for later generations (see 11:21; 15:13–15; 19:47). The reference to the book of Jasher (10:13; 2 Sam. 1:18) may be one of these later scribal additions. Such additions, however, do not affect the inspiration and authenticity of the book.

Date. The dating of the book of Joshua depends largely on the dating of the Exodus, since this book is a direct continuation of Genesis–Deuteronomy. Scripture supports the fifteenth-century-B.C. dating of the Exodus (see Judg. 2:10; 11:26; 1 Kin. 6:1; cf. Exodus: Introduction). Therefore, the conquest of the Holy Land must have begun about 1407 B.C. Caleb was forty years old when, along with Joshua, he was numbered among the spies (Josh. 14:7; Num. 13:6, 8). Caleb was eighty-five at the end of the conquest (Josh. 14:10), with at least thirty-eight of these years elapsing between Kadesh Barnea and the crossing of the Zered river in Transjordan (Deut. 2:14; cf. Num. 10:11–12; 33:38). The conquest then must have lasted for about seven years (i.e., between ca. 1407 and 1400 B.C.), with Joshua dying a few decades later (Josh. 23:1, 14; 24:29). As demonstrated above, the bulk of the book of Joshua was probably written by Joshua before his death. Consequently, this composition (including more than 24:29–33) was in the late fifteenth/early fourteenth century B.C.

Backgrounds. Genesis–Deuteronomy provides the background to the book of Joshua (1:1–9; 21:43–45). The call of Abram recorded in Genesis 12:1–3 highlights the universal hope of restoration and blessing. These verses sum up God’s covenant with Abram (Gen. 15:7–21; 17:1–22). Abraham was promised that through him and his offspring God would bring salvation to all the people of the earth. He was also promised a land to be inherited by his descendants after a few centuries, which included the promise of an Exodus from Egypt to the Holy Land. The reason God saved Israel from Egypt was to relocate His people in the Holy Land as promised to Abraham (Ex. 6:2–6). The promise of land, therefore, was the immediate hope of Israel at the Exodus (1:11; 13:5–11; Lev. 25:38; Num. 14:8; Deut. 1:8, 21). The realization of this promise is the focus of the book of Joshua. If the Lord led Israel out of Egypt through Moses, He settled Israel in the Holy Land through Joshua.

Although scholarly debate surrounds the dating of the Exodus and the conquest, evidence from Scripture, as noted above, suggests that the time period covered by the book is between the last decade of the fifteenth century and the first quarter of the fourteenth century B.C. (ca. 1407–1357 B.C.). During this time, the Holy Land was probably nominally under Egyptian control, with the country divided into numerous independent city-states (e.g., Jericho, Ai, Bethel). The archaeological documents known as the Amarna Letters, written about 1400 B.C., reveal that during this time a people called habiru were invading the Holy Land, forcing Canaanite kings to send distress calls to Egypt for military assistance. In these letters, habiru may refer to the Israelites.

By failing to respond to the requests for reinforcements, the Egyptians seemed to have had little interest in the affairs of Syro-Palestine at that time. Also, due probably to either internal or external reasons, none of the other contemporary powers in the ANE (Hittites, Hurrians, Kassites, and Assyrians) was in a position to interfere with developments in the Holy Land. Similarly, the major wave of Philistine immigrants was not yet ready to form a barrier against the Israelite conquest. Finally, further evaluation of archaeological discoveries places the destruction of Canaanite cities such as Jericho and Hazor around 1400 B.C., thereby confirming the scriptural account. Archaeological research, though, has equally yielded conflicting results and questions relating to the conquest. While we may hope for more reliable findings, the internal claims of Scripture should always be the final arbiter.

The biblical text is clear that Israel actually conquered and settled in the land of promise (13:1–21:45), and other scriptural passages refer to this fact (see 2 Sam. 21:1–6; 1 Kin. 16:34; 2 Chr. 20:7). But what was the extent of this conquest? On the one hand, some texts use the language of totality in regard to the campaigns (Josh. 10:40–42; 11:16–23; 21:43–45). On the other hand, there are texts indicating that Joshua did not conquer the whole land (13:1–6; 17:12–13; 18:2–3; 23:4–5, 13). There is, however, no contradiction between these two sets of texts. The former texts, examined contextually, do not denote the whole land of promise but rather portions within the land. These texts emphasize that God was faithful in fulfilling the promise of land to Abraham (cf. 21:43–45). The second set of texts shows that parts of the Holy Land were yet to be possessed, though these too were divided among the tribes (23:4). In these texts, God promises to drive out the inhabitants of the land from before Israel (13:6; 23:5). This reiterates the earlier promise that God would drive out the inhabitants of the Holy Land “little by little,” otherwise the land would be desolate and wild animals would be too numerous for Israel (Ex. 23:29–33; Deut. 7:22).

Theology and Purpose. The primary purpose of the book of Joshua is to describe Israel’s entry into the land of promise, the conquest of the land, and its division among the tribes. This purpose underlines the message of the book, namely, the faithfulness of God in fulfilling the promise of land made to Abraham. The book emphasizes God’s faithfulness to His covenant promises (Josh. 21:43–45).

1. Covenant Faithfulness. Obviously, the major theological theme of the book of Joshua is the covenant. The central element of the covenant is the promise of the Holy Land. As such, the book repeatedly emphasizes the Lord’s faithfulness in fulfilling this promise (2:24; 3:10; 11:23; 21:43–45; 23:14). Israel was a covenant nation and thus was required to keep the covenant (Ex. 19–24). As enshrined in the covenant provisions, any deviation on the part of Israel was punishable

Habiru

Habiru, a people group, are mentioned in texts from various places in the ANE between 1750 and 1150 B.C. These were generally nomadic tribesmen or fugitives who had penetrated urbanized centers and were proving troublesome to native populations. While habiru could refer to any group of people “outside of the law,” the habiru in the Amarna letters may refer to people groups including the Israelites. Moreover, habiru would be a fitting designation of the Hebrews (Israel) who were then invading the Holy Land.

(see Josh. 23:16), yet this was a means to protect the divine promise. This is the backdrop against which the destruction of Achan and his family is to be understood. Achan's sin constituted covenantal unfaithfulness on the part of Israel as a whole (7:1, 11). As a covenant community, Israel shared a corporate identity, so the sin of one member affected the whole community until it was purged (7:11–13). Similarly, by violating the covenant and thus bringing himself under the “curse,” Achan damaged all who shared in his identity (7:12, 24–26). The importance of the covenant theme in Joshua is further highlighted by the several references to its renewal (5:2–9; 8:30–35; 24:1–28). Joshua's exhortation against disobedience, idolatry, and intermarriage with the Canaanites summarizes the covenantal demand on Israel (23:6–16; 24:14–27). The implication is that the continual possession of the land was contingent on Israel's obedience of the covenant law (23:16; Deut. 28:58–68).

2. God's Sovereignty. The book also places quite an emphasis on the sovereignty of God. The Lord is the “living God” whose promises do not fail (Josh. 3:10). The God of Israel is “the LORD [Yahweh],” “the Lord [Adonai] of all the earth,” who is able to “cut off” the waters of the Jordan to make way for His people (3:13–17) and to command the sun and the moon to stand still till He claims victory for His people (10:12–14). It was this Sovereign Lord, El-Shaddai, who transferred the land of the Canaanites to Israel (cf. 3:10). He gave rest (23:1) to Israel by extirpating the Canaanites through the holy warfare strategy known as kherem, meaning to “ban” (see “Holy Warfare,” p. 372). The Exodus and the conquest, therefore, demonstrate that the Sovereign Lord intervenes in history to accomplish His purposes for humanity.

3. Judgment and Salvation. The book also discusses judgment and salvation within the confines of the covenant. On the one hand, the circumcision ceremony in 5:2–8 reiterated that those who came out of Egypt died in the wilderness because of their unfaithfulness to the covenant. Achan and his family also were destroyed due to his violation of the covenant (7:24–25). On the other hand, those who sought refuge in the Lord by joining the covenant community found salvation. Rahab declared faith in the Lord, and this led to the salvation of her entire family (2:11; 6:25). The Gibeonites also joined the covenant community, though deceptively, and shared in the blessings thereof (9:3–27). As hinted in Genesis 12:1–3, the possession of the Holy Land was not an end in itself. Rather, Israel's settlement in the Holy Land was a means to the ultimate realization of the divine promise, namely, the blessings of salvation to the world. Settled strategically at the crossroads of the ancient world, Israel was God's missionary, serving as a channel of the “blessed hope” to the world.

4. True Leadership. We also find in the book a theology of leadership. It is God who establishes leaders (Josh. 1:1–9). The leaders God appoints are prepared both physically (Ex. 17:8–16; 24:12–13; Num. 13:16) and spiritually (Num. 27:15–23; Deut. 34:9) for the task at hand. Courage, dynamism, promptness, dedication, a serving attitude, firmness, and reliance on the word of God are some of the qualities of good leaders. The transition from Moses to Joshua reveals that there was a succession plan—God's people always had a leader. Yet, the success of leaders depends on their total submission to the will of the Lord (Josh. 1:8; 11:15). By submitting himself to the leadership of the Lord, Joshua succeeded in leading Israel into the promised land. Joshua's leading of Israel into the promised inheritance anticipated the work of the Messiah, Jesus Christ (Is. 49:8; Eph. 1:11–14; Heb. 4:8–11; 9:15; cf. Matt. 5:5). Through the saving work of the Messiah, the promise of the land becomes the promise of a land that is free from evil and sin. It is a land recreated by the power of Christ for His people (Rev. 21:10).

Literary Features. The book is formed by a narrative telling the experience of the twelve tribes from the death of Moses to the death of Joshua. The covenant renewal ceremonies (Josh. 8:30–35; 24:1–27) and the ritual ceremonies (circumcision and Passover; 5:1–12) are embedded in the narrative. The book can be divided in two parts: the first dealing with the conquest (chaps. 1–12) and the second with the division of the land (chaps. 13–24).

COMMENTARY

1:1—12:24

A HOPE REALIZED: CONQUEST OF THE HOLY LAND

The inheritance of the land of promise was a central element in God's covenant with Abram (Gen. 12:1–7; 15:7–21). In order to fulfill this covenant promise, God saved Israel from Egyptian slavery and led them into the promised land by His servants Moses and Joshua. Joshua 1:1—12:24 describes Israel's conquest of the Holy Land.

1:1–18*Joshua Succeeds Moses

Joshua 1:1–18 reports the commissioning of Joshua and his initial orders to the leaders of the congregation. While Moses was alive, Joshua served as his attendant (Ex. 24:13; 33:11; Num. 11:28), and this experience prepared him to succeed Moses.

1:1–9. Joshua's Commission. The phrase “after the death of Moses” connects the book of Joshua to the five books of Moses, especially Deuteronomy. Verses 1–2 recall the death of Moses recorded in Deuteronomy 34. The book of Joshua, therefore, continues from where Moses left off. Before Moses's death, the Lord had appointed Joshua and commissioned him as Moses's successor. Following the Lord's command, Moses laid his hands on Joshua and commissioned him, signaling to the entire nation the transfer of the mantle of leadership (Num. 27:18–23; Deut. 3:28; 31:1–23; 34:7–9). Not only was he a man of experience and strength, but he was also a man full of the “spirit of wisdom.” Such are the qualities the leaders of God's people must demonstrate.

Joshua 1:2–9 constitutes a divine charge to Joshua, the thrust of which is to build confidence in the promises, to urge courage and obedience, and to assure victory. The opening of the book contains the excitement of knowing that the promises of God to the patriarchs were about to be fulfilled. The people would witness and be part of the fulfillment of prophecy—the promised land was becoming theirs. Although the land west of the Jordan was the allotted land for Israel, the influence of Israel would extend far beyond the Jordan (1:4; 22:19; Deut. 11:24; 12:10; 32:48–52; 34:4). God made two important promises to Joshua. The first was a promise of victory (Josh. 1:3, 5). The outcome of the battle was assured and therefore he, and consequently the people, would be invincible. Second, God promised to be with Joshua (v. 5). His invincibility was grounded in God's presence with him: God would be with Joshua; He would not leave or abandon him (v. 5). Yet, divine promises require human involvement. Two things were required of Joshua: strength and courage (vv. 6–7, 9). These two characteristics were important for Joshua to be an able military leader (v. 6), but they were also indispensable for him to remain loyal to the divine law (v. 7). Courageous and strong people remain faithful to God in the context of spiritual conflict. Such individuals are not afraid or dismayed when facing the enemy (v. 9). Joshua was expected to continually study the word of God to avoid any deviation from the covenant and to keep himself focused on the divine will (vv. 7–8). The instruction to meditate upon the law provides the platform for courage and obedience (v. 8). Through meditation and prayer, leaders draw on the divine resources. In sum, vv. 1–9 teach both that faith and obedience are inseparable ingredients for leadership and that success in leadership depends on the presence of God among His people and on the leader's relationship with Him and His word.

1:10–11. Getting Ready. God's charge to Joshua would certainly have encouraged and strengthened him (vv. 2–9). Following the charge, the officers conveyed to the people Joshua's instructions for preparing for crossing the Jordan. His communication to the people was both clear (i.e., indicating a definite plan of action) and appropriate (i.e., following a quick and effective chain of command). The people's response to this command revealed that he was both convinced of the divine promise and convincing in his rallying call to the people.

If the spying of Jericho is to be included, “three days” in v. 11 may denote “few days” rather than three literal days (cf. 2:16, 22; 3:2; 9:16). However, if the instruction in v. 11 was given after the return of the spies (2:1, 23), then the three days should be understood in a literal sense. The people were to take possession of the land that God was giving them (v. 11). The land was a gift, but it was also a task—it was to be possessed. God's gifts require a human response.

1:12–18. Rekindling the Commitment. The conquest of the Holy Land was a task to be undertaken by all Israel, including the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh, who had already received their inheritance in the Transjordan (Num. 32:20–22). Joshua urged these tribes to join the others in battle until the Lord gave rest to all Israel (Josh. 1:12–15; cf. Deut. 3:18–20). Their response evinces total obedience to the Lord and to His chosen leader. They not only pledged to cross the Jordan to assist the other tribes in the battles but also confirmed Joshua as the chosen replacement of Moses by promising to punish anyone who rebelled against him (vv. 16–18). It is only when leaders and followers unite and cooperate in the Lord that they can accomplish the divine mission entrusted to them.

Rest

The concept of rest is important in Joshua (1:13–15; 21:44; 22:4; 23:1) and finds its spiritual type in Hebrews 4:1–11. The rest intended for Israel was both political and economic (Deut. 3:20; 28:12–13). It would serve as the substratum for the fulfillment of their spiritual mission—becoming a channel of blessings to the world.

2:1–24

Hope beyond the River

The sending of spies was a crucial part of warfare, as military morale and preparations for an impending battle largely depended on their reports (cf. Num. 13:31–14:5). The report of the two spies sent to Jericho inspired hope in the hearts of the Israelites.

2:1–7. Surveying Jericho. Israel encamped east of the Jordan, while Jericho was on the west. The city was a formidable fortress guarding the access routes leading to the central highland of the southern Levant; therefore, it was particularly important as the scene of Israel's first attack in the Holy Land. Joshua's sending of spies was not an act of unbelief but good military strategy. The promise of divine intervention does not rule out human responsibility. Knowledge of the enemy's strategy and conditions would strengthen the faith of Israel (Josh. 2:24).

Why seek shelter in a harlot's house? The spies did not engage Rahab's professional services (cf. v. 8). Subsequent events in the narrative will indicate that the Lord had already been working in the heart of this woman, and that He had providentially led His servants to her house. Besides, in Rahab's house the spies would not only be less detectable but would also find an easy escape since the house was part of the city's outer wall complex (v. 15). Moreover, she had the information the spies needed (vv. 9–11). The king of Jericho expected Rahab to cooperate in an intelligence activity, but she deceived the king in order to save the spies. She would rather side with God's chosen people (6:17). By sending the king's guard on a vain pursuit, Rahab successfully deflated any suspicion against her as well as any possible search of her house. It is clear that Rahab knew that her only salvation lay with the Hebrews and their God. The text does not condone lying but reveals the well-intentioned actions of someone who was only beginning to learn about God. Meanwhile, she had hidden the spies on the roof. In this period, houses had flat roofs that were used for drying grain or stalks, as well as for eating and sometimes sleeping. The bold decision of Rahab to hide the spies can be attributed only to her fear and faith in the God of Israel. Those who truly fear the Lord do not fear humans.

2:8–21. Refuge in the Lord. Rahab's recital of Israel's crossing of the Red Sea (Ex. 14) and their subjugation of Sihon and Og (Num. 21:21–35) testify that the Canaanites had fair knowledge about Israel's history and God's plans for them. What God had done for Israel at the Red Sea and in the land of the Amorites convinced Rahab that the Lord had given Israel the land of promise (Josh. 2:9). Her report of the great fear and panic that had befallen Jericho on account of Israel recalls Exodus 15:15–16. Perhaps, the high point of Joshua 2 is Rahab's confession of faith in v. 11: she recognized that the God of Israel (to whom she refers by using the covenant name of YHWH) was the God of both heaven and earth (v. 11). Following the confession, she sought refuge in the Lord by requiring an oath from the spies to save her extended family. An oath taken in the name of the Lord could not be broken with impunity. The reciprocal relationship of mutual trust that Rahab expected is expressed by the word khesed ("loving-kindness," "loyalty"). In delivering the spies from the king's officers, she showed that she had shifted loyalties. The spies granted her request on the conditions that she would keep the matter secret, tie a line of scarlet cord on the window, and bring her extended family into her house. These conditions would provide a way for Rahab's family to exercise faith in the God of Israel. Salvation comes by faith, but faith is expressed through obedience—a lesson Israel had already experienced during the tenth plague when the blood of the Passover lamb had to be painted upon the doorpost of every Israelite house. It seems that Rahab immediately tied the scarlet cord on the window as a symbol of her hope for salvation. The Hebrew tiqwah, usually translated as "line," means "hope." The references to the scarlet cord and the gathering of the family in the house have undertones of the Passover in Egypt (Ex. 12:21–23). By acknowledging the God of Israel and pleading for salvation from the impending doom, Rahab sought entry into the covenant community. The experience of this Canaanite prostitute testifies to the gracious saving purpose of the Lord, a grace that pardons and cleanses. The NT honors Rahab for her faith (Heb. 11:31) and good works (James 2:25).

2:22–24. Report of Hope. Rahab's loving-kindness (khesed) to the spies was proof of her faith in the Lord. Thanks to her testimony (Josh. 2:9–11) and direction (vv. 15–16, 22–23), the spies returned to Joshua with a message of hope. The spies went to see what the enemy was planning to do, but instead they witnessed what God was already doing in the camp and in the hearts of the enemy. He had planted fear in their hearts, and in this case fear preceded defeat. God had already given the land into Israel's hands (v. 24). Unlike the majority of the spies sent to the Holy Land by Moses (Num. 13:31–14:5), the spies sent to Jericho brought encouraging words to Joshua (Josh. 2:24). Israel was now poised to take over the land.

Crossing the River

Israel crossed two water bodies, and in both instances the Lord parted the waters before His people. The crossing of the Red Sea under Moses marked Israel's departure from Egypt, while the crossing of the Jordan under Joshua marked their entrance into the land of Canaan, which was the climax of the redemptive act that began in Egypt (cf. Ps. 114). By entering Canaan, the promise of land made to Abraham was being realized. Prophecy was being fulfilled.

3:1–13. Instructions for Crossing. From Shittim (or the Acacia Grove) Israel journeyed to the Jordan—a distance of about ten miles (16 km)—and encamped on the bank of the river. The instructions for the crossing of the Jordan were clear. The people were to wait for the ark, carried by the Levite priests, to lead the way and then follow after it. They were also to consecrate or sanctify themselves in anticipation of the wondrous works of the Lord on the following day (Josh 3:5). The Lord's holiness requires and makes possible the holiness of His people. In the context of the covenant, Israel's consecration in preparation to meet the Lord included bathing, washing of clothing, and abstaining from sexual activity (Ex. 19:14–15; cf. Gen. 35:1–2).

The miracle of the crossing of the Jordan both confirmed Joshua as the leader and demonstrated that the Lord was with him as He had been with Moses. One of Joshua's primary responsibilities was to exhort the people to trust in the Lord (Josh. 3:9–11). He assured the congregation of the certainty of the Lord's promise to deliver the inhabitants of Canaan to Israel. Joshua promised that the living God among them would, without a doubt, drive out the inhabitants of the land before them (v. 10). God also promised to march in front of the Israelite army to defeat the enemy for them. He is the Lord of all the earth (v. 13). God's parting of the waters validated His sovereignty over the earth.

3:14–17. Crossing on a Dry Riverbed. The waters of the Jordan were cut off as soon as the feet of the priests carrying the ark touched the water, allowing the people to cross over on dry ground (vv. 13–17; 4:18–23). Like the crossing of the Red Sea, the crossing of the Jordan was a solemn religious event. It gave to the new generation of Israelites the opportunity to deeply ponder the wondrous things that God had done and was doing for them. The Lord, symbolized by the ark, was marching with His people to claim the land of Canaan. Although those who carried the ark in Joshua 3 are called priests, it was the Levites—the Kohathites—who were assigned that responsibility (Num. 4). The term “priest” is used here to include the Levites (cf. Josh. 3:3). Although the priests were commanded to carry the ark and cross over (3:6), the water did not stop flowing until they stepped into the river and touched the water (v. 13). Oftentimes, God waits for His people to go forward in faith before He opens a way for them. The crossing occurred when the Jordan was overflowing its banks due to the spring rains and the melting of snow on Mt. Hermon. By indicating that the Jordan was at flood stage (v. 15), the text clearly suggests it was impossible for Israel to cross over without the Lord's work (v. 5). He who commanded Israel to cross the river made the crossing possible.

4:1–24. Remembrance of the Crossing. During the crossing of the Jordan, the Israelites were ordered by the Lord to pick twelve stones from the dry riverbed as a memorial of this solemn act. That twelve men representing the twelve tribes picked the stones (3:12; 4:3–4) signifies that all Israel crossed the river into Canaan and that it was the responsibility of all tribal leaders to ensure that succeeding generations would not forget what the Lord had accomplished for them. The monument, set up at the camp in Gilgal, would provide concrete evidence to later generations and thus encourage faith in them that the waters of the Jordan had actually been “cut off” to make a passage for their ancestors. Scripture attests to the raising of stones as a memorial (see 7:26; 24:26–27; Gen. 28:18–22; 31:45–47; 1 Sam. 7:12). Remembering or celebrating the past deeds of the Lord is tantamount to participating in the blessings of those events. The Lord does not want us to forget His goodness. Joshua 4:9 possibly refers to another set of twelve stones placed where the priests bearing the ark had stood.

In Joshua 3:7, the Lord promised to exalt Joshua, and 4:14 reports a fulfillment of this promise—Israel stood in awe of Joshua as they had stood in awe of Moses. The basis of his exaltation was his humility and his obedience to the Lord. Joshua 4:19–24 reaffirms the miraculous crossing of the Jordan and the memorial function of the twelve stones. In the future, the monument would awaken the curiosity of children and would provide for their parents the opportunity to instruct them about the goodness of the Lord (vv. 21–24). Israel crossed the Jordan on the tenth day of the first month and encamped at Gilgal. Gilgal would become Israel's base of operations for the period of the conquest (10:15, 43; 14:6). God's salvific power was illustrated both in the crossing of the Red Sea by the previous generation and in the crossing of the Jordan by the present generation. Both of these supernatural events would lead the nations to acknowledge the power of Israel's God. Miracles serve to encourage faith. Historically, the crossings of the Red Sea and the Jordan marked Israel's washing away of the filth of bondage and their glorious entry into the Holy Land.

Preparing for the Conquest

In Joshua 5, we see the Israelites committing themselves to obedience to the covenant Lord (vv. 1–12) and to His word (vv. 13–15). The two covenantal ceremonies performed at Gilgal (namely, circumcision and Passover) prepared Israel for the conquest. Circumcision marked every male as a son of Abraham and a member of God's people (Gen. 17:10–11)—hence they were heirs of the covenant—and was a prerequisite for the Passover, which celebrated the redemption of Israel from Egypt (Ex. 12:48). Like baptism, circumcision marked one's entrance into the covenant community, and like the Lord's Supper, the Passover celebrated the salvific deeds of the Lord.

5:1. Demoralization of the Canaanites. The miraculous crossing of the Jordan was meant partly to move the nations to recognize the Lord as the only living God (Josh. 4:24). This purpose was achieved, and consequently the kings of the Amorites (west of the Jordan) and the kings of the Canaanites (east of the Jordan) got demoralized upon receiving the news of the crossing of the Jordan (v. 1). Rahab must have shared the conviction of many fellow Canaanites that the Lord had handed the land over to Israel (2:9). The demoralization of the Canaanites (5:1) was part of the covenantal blessings (Ex. 23:28). The fear expressed by the Canaanites must certainly have bolstered Israel up for the conquest.

5:2–9. Covenant Renewal. In the meantime, Israel had to renew the covenant to fully claim its blessings. Canaan was a covenantal land, and Israel could possess it only while maintaining their covenantal relationship with the Lord. The performance of the rite of circumcision before staging the conquest evoked and brought to fulfillment the covenantal promises made to Abraham (Gen. 17:10–11). The outward rite of circumcision represented the true circumcision of heart, demonstrating a life of faith and obedience (Deut. 10:16; Jer. 4:4; Rom. 2:29). A reconsecration to the Lord's service was necessary before Israel could undertake the Lord's warfare and take possession of the land.

The people were to be circumcised a second time with flint knives (v. 2). This may denote a renewal of the observance of the rite that had been discontinued for about forty years. But if mass circumcision took place in Egypt prior to the Passover celebration (cf. Ex. 12:43–49), then the second mass circumcision took place in Joshua 5. In any case, the command does not mean that there was a second circumcision of the same generation. All the males who came out of Egypt had been circumcised, but these died in the wilderness due to disobedience (vv. 4–7). Those who received circumcision at Gilgal were the second-generation males—sons born after the Exodus, all of whom had not been circumcised. Although metal knives were available, flint knives were probably more surgically efficient. The place-name gib'at-ha'aralot ("Hill of the Foreskins") shows that this was a mass circumcision. As a monument, this hill would remind Israel of the first renewal of the covenant upon entry into Canaan. The period after the circumcision was certainly a time when Israel would be militarily most vulnerable (cf. Gen. 34), but this act also demonstrated their faith in the Lord. Even though Israel was vulnerable, the presence of the Lord was all the people needed.

The place-name “Gilgal” derives from galal, “to roll away” (v. 9). The reference in this verse to “the reproach [or disgrace] of Egypt” lends itself to different interpretations. It could refer to the disgrace of the enslavement in Egypt, but it may also relate to the neglect of the rite of circumcision by the previous generation while in Egypt. It most probably refers to the people’s forty years of wandering in the wilderness as a result of their rebellion, which led the Egyptians to say that God brought this people to the wilderness to kill them (see Ex. 32:12; Num. 14:13–16; Deut. 9:28). Now, finally, the people were ready to enter the promised land. The reproach of Egypt was proven to be unfounded. Within the context of the covenant, the foreskin signified opposition to God, and its removal meant dedication to Him (cf. Ex. 4:24–26). Gilgal, therefore, became a place where the nation was constituted anew as the people of God. Israel’s constitution through the rite of circumcision meant that Egypt would have no basis to scorn her.

5:10–12. The Passover Event. These verses record the third celebration of the Passover (Ex. 12; Num. 9). The Passover marked Israel’s redemption from Egyptian bondage. The previous generation had probably not celebrated the Passover in the wilderness, just as they had neglected circumcision. Since no uncircumcised male could celebrate the Passover (Ex. 12:43–49), the circumcision of the people before the celebration of Passover in Joshua 5 is significant. The Passover could be celebrated only by the covenant community, native or adopted, but a male person could not be a member of the covenant community without having undergone circumcision. By observing the Passover, Israel remembered the deliverance from bondage, even as the Lord’s Supper is a remembrance of the death of Jesus Christ, which wrought salvation for the human race.

On the fifteenth day of the month—when the Festival of Unleavened Bread began (Ex. 12:14–20)—the Israelites ate of the produce of the land (Josh. 5:11). Consequently the “raining down” of manna ceased that same day (v. 12; cf. Deut. 8:2–4). The barley harvest took place during the first month. God provided manna to Israel during their journey in the wilderness, but now that they were in Canaan, they could eat of the fruit of the land. All instances of miraculous feeding in Scripture were only temporary; they were not intended to be regular sustenance. The unleavened bread was eaten for seven days following the Passover.

5:13–15. The Two Commanders Meet. The earthly and the heavenly commanders of the armies of the Lord met each other near Jericho in the darkness of the night. Realizing that He was his holy Lord, Joshua worshiped Him and in obedience to His command took the sandals off his feet (Josh. 5:15). Joshua was now ready to receive orders from the Commander of the heavenly army. This theophany convinced Joshua that the Lord Himself was at the head of the Israelite army, ready to conquer Canaan. With this Commander, defeat was an utter impossibility. But Joshua would soon learn from the incident involving Achan that the question was whether Israel was on God’s side.

The Conquest of Jericho

Joshua 6 reports the destruction of Jericho and the salvation of Rahab. The destruction of all the inhabitants of Jericho indicates that the Lord judges sin, while the salvation of Rahab teaches that His grace extends to everyone willing to accept Him as Lord.

6:1–7. Instructions for the Conquest. Frozen in fear of Israel, the city was shut up inside out. This was a sure sign that the Lord had already defeated Jericho before Joshua’s assault. The battle was already won; Israel only had to claim the victory (v. 16). While the victory had already been won for Israel, the army still had to follow certain instructions in order to claim that victory. It is probable that the heavenly Commander, after their brief conversation, proceeded to give Joshua instructions concerning the attack against Jericho (vv. 2–5). They were to work together. The army of the heavenly Commander would be in charge of the demolition of the wall, the most difficult part. The role of the people was to march around the city, to shout at the proper moment, and to charge against the city once the walls collapsed. The injunction to march around the city with the ark and with trumpets would teach the people that the ensuing battles were holy wars in which the Lord led the procession. Faith in the Lord, demonstrated by obedience to His word, was all that was required in order for Israel to claim the victory.

6:8–16. Blowing the Trumpets. The Lord is a God of order. In the wilderness, the Israelites marched in order (Num. 2). When crossing the Jordan, they marched in order (Josh. 3–4). Now, the army was instructed to march around Jericho in order. The six-day voiceless march, however senseless it might appear, was a requirement of faith. The wall would collapse at the shout of the marching army, yet the army was not to shout until the seventh day. At times faith may not appear to be scientifically or logically sound, but we act on it. Those who think that an earthquake was needed in order for the wall to tumble down forget that rocks obey the voice of the Lord (Ex. 17:5–7).

In the Bible, the number “seven” denotes perfection and completeness. During the march, the army was instructed to shout only during the seventh round on the seventh day. That the army had to march seven times on the seventh day meant that the land was theirs and that victory was complete. The blending of trumpet with voice would mark the fall of the city. The wall would obey the voice of the Lord. The strong shout was a war cry, which usually served to encourage the army and frighten the enemy. Given the size of Jericho (i.e., five or six acres [2–2.5 hectares] of land), Israel must have encircled the city with a number of columns of armed men. These columns could, therefore, charge simultaneously from all sides. Miraculously, Rahab’s house was still standing after the collapse of the wall.

6:17–27. The Ban, Rahab, and Joshua. The injunction to destroy the city and its inhabitants, human and animal, is what is normally referred to as the “ban,” translated from the Hebrew kherem, which denotes total annihilation (see below, “Holy Warfare”). Whatever was devoted to the Lord under this curse had to be destroyed (Josh. 6:17). In the case of Jericho, only Rahab and those of her family who sought refuge in her house were to be spared. Note that kherem did not include silver, gold, and bronze; these were consecrated to the Lord and were to be brought to the treasury of the house of the Lord—the sanctuary (vv. 19, 24). Through a four-fold repetition of the term kherem, Joshua 6:18 provided a stern warning against violating the ban regulation. Israel shared a corporate identity and responsibility, so that even if only one person violated the ban regulation, the whole congregation was answerable.

Like the blood on the Israelite doorposts at the Passover, the scarlet cord on Rahab’s window signaled her faith in the Lord and occasioned her deliverance. The decision of the spies to save Rahab was taken seriously not only by Joshua but also by the Lord. An oath, once taken in the name of the Lord, is irrevocable, and God honors such. Rahab and her family were placed outside the Israelite military camp, until the moment when she and her family were fully incorporated into the community.

The conquest of Jericho was among the firstfruits of the Lord’s victory in the promised land. Joshua’s curse (v. 26) was meant to deter future generations from rebuilding the city. The remains of Jericho would forever remind the Israelites of the Lord’s miraculous destruction of the enemy. Being prophetic in nature, this curse was fulfilled in Hiel, whose two sons died because he rebuilt the city (1 Kin. 16:34). Although the city of Jericho was not rebuilt before the time of Hiel, there were still people living in the lands around it who were still called by its name (Josh. 18:21; Judg. 3:13–14; 2 Sam. 10:5).

The concluding verse records the fame of Joshua (Josh. 6:27). He was famous only because he allowed himself to be used by the Lord. In Scripture, success in leadership depends completely on the leader’s reliance on the Lord. This verse testifies to the Lord’s faithfulness in delivering on His promise to exalt Joshua before the nation (1:5; 3:7).

Holy Warfare

The extermination of the Canaanites has raised many questions among believers and nonbelievers. In what follows, we will discuss this matter from within the biblical text itself, hoping to shed some light on the practice of the “ban.”

1. God as a Warrior. The book of Joshua portrays God as a Warrior (5:13–15; 6:2–5;

8:1–2; 10:14). He waged war against the Canaanites and gave rest to Israel in accordance with His promise (1:13; 14:15; 21:44; 23:1–3). During the conquest, He planned the attacks, developed the tactics, and handed over the enemy to Israel (see 6:3–5; 8:1–8). Because God is the Sovereign Warrior, nature stands at His command in battle—the walls of Jericho obeyed His voice (6:20), hailstones descended upon the enemy (10:11), and the sun and moon obeyed His word (10:12–14). These miracles, as well as the presence of the ark on the battlefield, confirmed the presence of God in the conquest. But more than these, the real Joshua, the Commander of the army, was at the head of the Israelite army, conquering Canaan with a drawn sword (5:13–15).

2. Meaning of the Term “Ban.” The “ban” was central to holy warfare; it demanded the total extermination of the inhabitants of the promised land. This concept is based on the Hebrew term kherem, related to kharam (“give over,” “devote for destruction,” or “exterminate”), which in the context of warfare denotes what is irrevocably “devoted” or “dedicated” on oath for destruction (see Num. 21:2–3), be it animate or inanimate. Even outside of warfare, anything that was pronounced kherem could not be redeemed (cf. Lev. 27:28–29). By placing the inhabitants of Canaan under kherem, God required their complete annihilation (cf. Josh. 6:17–21; Deut. 7:1–11; 20:16–17). The policy of kherem as found in the book of Joshua has raised both hermeneutical and ethical questions. Why would God command the slaughter of all the Canaanites?

3. Seeking an Answer. A few points may be considered in an attempt to answer this question. First, in military contexts, kherem was applicable only to the conquest of Canaan; it did not apply to people outside of that land (Josh. 9:6–7; Deut. 7:26; 20:10–16). God does not desire the destruction of life (Ezek. 18:32; Jon. 4:11). Second, the destruction of the Canaanites was a fulfillment of earlier prophecy. The prophetic curse of Noah upon Canaan (Gen. 9:25–27), as well as God’s covenant with Abraham (Gen. 15:7–21), foreshadowed the future displacement of the Canaanites from their territory by the Hebrews (Gen. 10:15–20; 15:18–21), who were the descendants of Shem through Eber and Abraham (Gen. 10:21; 11:14–26). Third, the Canaanites deserved destruction. While God promised to give Canaan to Abraham, He waited five to seven centuries, depending on the length of the sojourn of Israel in Egypt, until the sin of the Amorites was complete (Gen.

15:16; see “The Four-Hundred-Thirty-Year Sojourn,” p. 211). In the meantime, He warned the Canaanites with the fire of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19:24), but they soon outlived the memories of such destruction from the “Judge of all the earth” (Gen. 18:25). At the time of the conquest, Canaan was at the peak of religious and moral degradation, hence ripe for judgment (Deut. 9:5; 12:29–31; 18:9–12). Fourth, God probably had to settle Israel strategically at the crossroads of the ancient world so that Israel would serve as the light and salt of the world (Matt. 5:13–16), proclaiming the salvation found in the Lord. The earth belongs to the Sovereign Lord (Josh. 2:11; 3:10; Ex. 9:29; Lev. 25:23), hence He could give it to anyone in accordance with His salvific purposes. Israel, too, would be removed from the land if they failed to live up to their calling and mission (Josh. 23:16; Deut. 28:58–68). Fifth, God’s promise to drive out the inhabitants of Canaan using hornets (Josh. 24:12; Ex. 23:27–30; Deut. 7:20; cf. Josh. 13:6; 23:5) would seem to imply that the Canaanites did not have to come under the ban had they—upon receiving the miraculous news of the Exodus and the impending conquest—vacated the land so solemnly promised Israel (Josh. 2:9–11; 9:24). Finally, just as the family of Achan was destroyed in the ban because they shared in his identity, so were the Canaanites destroyed because they too shared in the identity of the Canaanite family. The conquest of Canaan was undertaken not only to secure the promised land but also to protect Israel from foreign practices and hegemony (Josh. 23:7–12; Deut. 7:3–6; 20:18). This required that all the inhabitants of the land be purged, together with their evil practices. The foregoing observations would require that the policy of the annihilation of the Canaanites be understood within the contexts of God’s sovereignty, the plan of salvation, prophecies relating to the Canaanites, and corporate solidarity. To seek to unravel the problem posed by kherem merely on the basis of human ethics is to lose sight of the power, love, and grace of the supreme Source of morality in the cosmos, namely, the Lord. (For more on this topic, see “The Extermination of the Canaanites,” p. 330).

The Conquest of Ai and Covenant Renewal

Joshua 7–8 reports the conquest of Ai (7:1—8:29) and the renewal of the covenant (8:30–35). The initial defeat of Israel by Ai indicated that Israel could not win its battles without the Lord. The renewal of the covenant was done in fulfillment of Moses's instruction (Deut. 11:26–30; 27:1–26).

7:1–5. Failure of First Attack. Joshua had warned the army against taking any of the things under the ban or curse of Jericho for themselves, lest they bring trouble upon the whole congregation (Josh. 6:17–19). Joshua 7:1–5 shows that despite this warning, Israel, in the person of Achan, violated the ban regulation. This act constituted a violation of the Lord's covenant, and hence incurred His anger (v. 1). Although only Achan did the stealing, the congregation of Israel was guilty of an egregiously rebellious sin, which deserved capital punishment (cf. Num. 15:30–36). Though Achan stole the items during the destruction of Jericho, the consequences for doing so came during the battle against Ai. God, in His mercy, had granted him enough probationary time to reflect and return the stolen objects.

Spies were sent out, and after returning they advised an attack on Ai with only a segment of the army because the inhabitants of Ai were small in number. Israel would soon realize that they were not on the side of the divine Commander in this battle against Ai. Here the Israelites experienced their first military defeat in the land of Canaan (v. 4). Their defeat was so severe that, like the inhabitants of Jericho, the hearts of the people “melted” and became like water (v. 5; see 2:9–11; 5:1). Whether then or now, the Lord is the only hope of victory. Had Joshua and the leaders consulted the Lord before engaging Ai, the congregation as a whole would not have reaped the consequences of Achan's sin. It is important to consult the Lord. Leaders are bound to fail if they lean on their own understanding (cf. 9:14; Prov. 3:5–6).

7:6–9. Joshua's Question. The killing of thirty-six Israelites was a great tragedy; it threw the congregation into a panic (Josh. 7:5). The tearing of clothes, falling down on the face, and putting dust on the head were vivid expressions in ancient times of sorrow and mourning. Even if Joshua did not consult the Lord before the battle, he now turned to Him in prayer. The words of v. 7 are not words of resignation, as if Joshua regretted crossing the Jordan.

Rather, he was simply unable to imagine Israel turning its back to the enemy. His prostration before the ark was a prayer of intercession. He shared with the Lord his own feelings and showed great concern for God's reputation (v. 9). He was certainly concerned about Israel's name being cut off from the earth, but more than that, he was concerned about the Lord's “great name” (v. 9). In Scripture, a name stands for the reputation of the one who bears it, so that if the name of Israel was cut off, the Lord, whose name Israel bore, would be equally disgraced (cf. Ex. 32:12–13; Num. 14:13–19).

7:10–15. The Lord's Answer. For the Lord this was not the time to feel frustrated but to stand and find out what happened. Israel, He said, was defeated because they had sinned. Stealing the things under the ban constituted a violation of the covenant, an outrageous sin that needed to be purged. Since Israel's inheritance of the land of Canaan was a covenantal promise, the conquest could not continue if they violated the covenant. The penalty for a deliberate and rebellious violation of the covenant was death. As noted in the comment on Joshua 6:19–21, Israel shared a strong sense of solidarity. Accordingly, the Lord pressed charges against Israel as if the whole congregation was involved (7:11).

While Achan became cursed for stealing the things under the ban, which were devoted to the Lord, the whole congregation was bound to suffer for his disobedience. It would be in the interest of the congregation to purge the one devoted to the curse of destruction (here kherem refers to Achan and the things he stole). The command to sanctify and bring the people, tribe by tribe, was meant to involve the whole congregation in the searching process. Whenever the congregation had to meet the Lord, they needed to sanctify themselves (cf. Josh. 3:5). The people were also to undergo a searching process in order to identify and punish the offender. What we do impacts others for good or evil. Although individual responsibility is not overlooked, believers share a corporate responsibility, so the sin of one member could affect others.

7:16–21. Finding the Culprit. God's omniscience is forcefully underscored in chapters 6–7. Achan successfully hid the cursed things from the congregation, but he could not hide them from the Omniscient One. The presentation of the people by tribes, clans, families, and individuals was not intended to inform God about the identity of the perpetrator. The search signaled to the people that nothing could be hidden from Him, and that the resolution of this act of rebellion involved the entire congregation. Whatever humans think they are hiding is actually already laid out in the open before the Lord (7:23). The searching process was probably carried out through the use of the Urim and Thummim (Ex. 28:29–30). “Give glory to the LORD” (Josh. 7:19) was the oath formula by which a person swore to honestly testify or confess in a law court that he or she was guilty as charged and that God was righteous in His decision (v. 20; cf. John 9:24). Achan had disobeyed the word of the Lord by coveting, stealing, and hiding the items (Josh. 7:21). Coveting involves direct opposition to the Lord (Gen. 3:6; Ex. 20:17). He should have taken the articles to the priests, as commanded by the Lord, but he chose to keep them for himself (Josh. 6:19). Unwilling confession, like Achan’s, is devoid of repentance and feelings of remorse. Such confessions often come too late.

7:22–26. The Punishment. Achan deserved death because he defiantly violated the covenant (vv. 11–15) and brought trouble upon Israel (v. 25). God would have permanently withdrawn His presence from Israel if the sin of Achan were left unpunished (vv. 12, 26). By taking the cursed things devoted to the Lord, Achan brought himself and his family under the ban (cf. 6:18). It could be that his family knew what he had done and kept quiet; we do not know. But one thing is clear, human solidarity, particularly familial solidarity, causes others to suffer as a result of the evil actions of one person. One stroke of sin flares like brushfire, licking up everything that is around it. The destruction of Achan together with his family recalls that of Dathan and his company (Num. 16). Stoning was a form of capital punishment that quickly rendered the person unconscious (see Ex. 21:28–32; Lev. 20:2–5). Achan and his family were not only stoned; their corpses were burned. Burning his property was necessary because it had also been contaminated. The pile of stones over the remains of Achan would serve as a warning against similar rebellions. The stoning was done by all Israel—probably tribal representatives—signifying their corporate responsibility as a covenant community in dealing with rebellion (see Josh. 1:18). The Hebrew ‘emeq ‘akor means “valley of trouble” (vv. 24–26). With the troubler of Israel (1 Chr. 2:7) destroyed in the valley of trouble, God relented of His wrath and granted Israel His favor. The Lord is able to transform the valley of trouble into a door of hope (Hos. 2:15).

8:1–9. Instructions for a Second Attack. Having purged the accursed from Israel, the Lord assured Joshua victory over Ai in the second attack. As always, Israel only claimed the victory that the Lord had already won. Ai was also brought under the ban. But while in the case of Jericho only silver, gold, and bronze were taken as booty (Josh. 6:19–21), in Ai both the spoils and the livestock were taken (vv. 2, 27). The requirement was that the spoils should be brought to the leaders to be shared proportionally (Num. 31:27). In the second attack, Israel was instructed to lay an ambush behind Ai. Ambush suggests a surprise attack from a concealed position; when a defending army withdrew from their post, the ambushing army would move behind them. The troops in ambush would set the city on fire to signal to Joshua and his troops that the city had been taken. This would also demoralize the defending army. There is an intertwining of the miraculous and human effort in the conquest narratives. While victory was assured, Israel needed to take active steps to realize that victory. The Lord taught Israel military tactics and decoy. Yet it was not Israel alone who fought these wars; the unseen army did it together with them (2 Kin. 6:17).

8:10–29. Victory with the Lord. To be a leader means to go before the people. Joshua and the elders led the army against Ai. Joshua spent the night in the valley, probably meditating and surveying the land in preparation for the battle. While in Joshua 8:3 the warriors who were set to ambush numbered thirty thousand, Joshua set only a five-thousand-man ambush (v. 12). It is possible that the figure in v. 3 refers to the size of the entire army that attacked Ai, while the figure in v. 12 is the ambush party. There was only one ambush party (vv. 14, 19, 21), and the ambush mentioned in v. 13 would refer to it. The nearby city of Bethel joined Ai in its attack against Israel. But in the haste of the pursuit, they left the city open behind them, offering an easy entrance for the Israelite ambush (v. 17). In the battle against Amalek, Moses held up the staff of God until victory was won (Ex. 17:8–12). Joshua’s stretching forth of the spear was a sign that the Lord had given them victory; it also served as a signal to the ambush party to break out into the city (Josh. 8:18–19). Just as Moses did not let down his hand until Amalek was defeated, so Joshua did not draw back his spear until he destroyed Ai (v. 26). Once the enemy was engaged, there was no room for retreat. Victory comes from the Lord, but believers must engage the enemy as if they were fighting the battle (2 Chr. 20).

Through tactical deception and decoy, the Israelite army completely broke the power of the enemy (Josh. 8:20). Israel annihilated the inhabitants and burned the city (vv. 22–28). The hanging of Ai's king on a tree follows the instructions of Deuteronomy 21:22–23. A dead body was not supposed to be hung on a tree or pole throughout the night. The fight against Ai resulted in two heaps of stones, one for Achan and his possessions (Josh. 7:26), a symbol of rebellion and defeat, and the other for the king of Ai (8:28), a symbol of Israel's faithfulness and victory.

8:30–35. Covenant Renewed. Moses had commanded the people to build an altar on Mt. Ebal. Six tribes were to stand on Mt. Ebal and another six on Mt. Gerizim for the reading of the law and the recitation of the covenant blessings and curses (Deut. 11:26–30; 27:1–26). This ceremony was a covenant renewal during which the Lord, represented by the ark, was in the midst of Israel, witnessing the pledges of the congregation. As in Exodus 19, all Israel—men, women, and little ones, citizen or alien—was present. The covenant was meant for everyone in Israel, not just for the men. The building of an altar, the offering of sacrifices, congregational standing, the proclamation of blessings, and the reading of the law, were all central elements of worship. Burnt offerings and peace offerings represented devotion and fellowship, respectively. This was an appropriate time to celebrate the Lord's victory over their enemies. The renewal of the covenant was also timely, given Achan's rebellion and its consequences for Israel. The writing of the law on stones and its reading in the hearing of the people would create an indelible impression on Israel, both in sight and in heart. As Joshua read the law and they enjoyed the blessings of fellowship, they would also ponder the blessings or the curses that would follow obedience or disobedience to the law. Israel's possession and occupancy of the land of Canaan was contingent upon obedience to the covenant law. The law, as the transcript of God's character, was the basis of life in the land.

Joshua 8:31–34 affirms Moses as the author of the book of the law. Here, the “law of Moses” is the same as the “words of the law” that Joshua read to the people, namely, the blessings and curses “written in the Book of the Law.” Since these instructions of Moses are found in Deuteronomy, we may conclude that the “Book of the Law” refers, at least, to Deuteronomy. Joshua 8:31–35 testify that Joshua carefully followed the instructions of Moses. The success of Joshua and Israel was dependent upon their adherence to the law of God given through Moses. This lay at the heart of the covenant renewal ceremony.

9:1—10:43

The Conquest of the Southern Coalition

Chapters 9–10 demonstrate the centrality of the covenant in the book of Joshua. Israel's inheritance of the land of Canaan was a fulfillment of a covenant promise. In chapter 9, Gibeon established a covenant relationship with Israel through deception in order to remain in the land. Since Israel entered into this covenant by swearing on the name of the Lord, they were bound as a covenant suzerain (overlord) to protect the vassal (subordinate), Gibeon, from enemies such as the coalition of armies in 10:1–5. The covenant with Gibeon (chap. 9) was the immediate basis for Israel's battle and conquest of the southern coalition (chap. 10).

9:1–13. Reaction of the Canaanites and the Gibeonites. The city-states in the land of Canaan formed a coalition army to fight Israel following its conquests of Jericho and Ai. They ignored that Joshua, through the presence and power of the Lord, was invincible. Despite their knowledge of the miraculous deeds of the Lord among Israel, these Canaanites decided to oppose Him. Consequently, they would soon be swallowed up in their obstinate rebellion.

The Gibeonites sought a covenant with Israel for the preservation of their lives. This was based on their conviction that the Lord had given all the land to Israel (v. 24). The poor appearance of the Gibeonite delegation sent to Israel at Gilgal was intended to make Israel believe that they were coming from a far country. The dry and crumbly bread would also communicate the same message. Like the serpent in Genesis 3:1, the Gibeonites were truly crafty in deception. In Genesis 3:1, the serpent was 'arum, and in Joshua 9:4 the Gibeonites were 'armmah. Both of these words are related to the same root. Being cunning, they succeeded in trapping Israel into a covenant of peace. The word translated as “covenant” is berit, the same word which is used for the covenant between the Lord and Israel. The Gibeonites seemed to have known the rules of warfare, or they may have had some knowledge of the warfare regulations in Deuteronomy 20. Israel could proclaim an offer of peace to a far away country but not to the inhabitants of the promised land (Deut. 20:10–18). This explains why both the Gibeonites and the Israelites were concerned with distance (Josh. 9:6–7, 12–13). The Gibeonites also knew about the miraculous deeds of the Lord in Egypt and the subjugation of the two kings east of the Jordan. However, they seem intentionally to have left out mention of the destruction of Jericho and Ai (cf. v. 3). The delegation was probably sent soon after the destruction of these cities, but because they pretended to have come from a far away country, they craftily avoided mention of the destruction since the Israelites might question how this news could have reached them so soon. This too was part of the plot to convince Israel that Gibeon was a far away country. By appearing in worn-out clothes with worn-out provisions, the Gibeonites convinced the elders of Israel that Gibeon was a faraway country that merited the proclamation of peace. Moreover, by evoking the name of Israel's God and accepting His rulership over the land (v. 9), the Gibeonites theologically convinced Israel that they, like Rahab, sought real refuge in the Lord.

9:14–15. A Hasty Covenant. The Gibeonites were Hivites. Hivites were among the nations God had promised to drive out of the land (3:10). Their insistence that Israel make a covenant with them should have made the elders of the congregation more suspicious, for a truly distant country would naturally not be in desperate need of a covenant relation with Israel. Israelite leaders partook of the provisions of the Gibeonites as a covenant meal and entered into a covenant of peace by swearing in the name of the Lord to preserve their lives (cf. v. 18). By making peace with Gibeon on oath to the Lord, Israel was bound not only to desist from fighting them but also to protect them from their enemies. When they said, “We are your servants” (v. 8), they meant that they were ready to be a vassal nation to Israel, the suzerain. As in every suzerainty covenant (see commentary on 9:1–10:43), the suzerain promised on oath to protect the vassal. While Joshua and the elders of Israel made attempts to follow the divine instruction in Deuteronomy 20 and subsequently entered into a genuine covenant with Gibeon, they did not seek the guidance of the Lord (Josh. 9:14) in whose name they sealed that covenant. In other words, evidence and logical arguments were not enough to legitimize such an important decision. Any major Israelite decision with covenantal implication was supposed to be guided by the Lord. Both success and failure in leadership depend on the leaders' constant reliance on the Lord.

9:16–27. The Response to Deception. Once Israel had made the covenant with Gibeon in the name of the Lord, it could no longer be revoked. About three days later, the Israelites realized that the Gibeonites were their neighbors in the promised land, but by then they could not attack Gibeon. When leaders fail, the congregation complains. In this case the complaints of the congregation may have been justifiable, but they did not have the right to attack the Gibeonites. They apparently thought about it (v. 26). Israel's covenant with Gibeon would remain binding forever, for the Lord's name cannot be vainly misused (Ex. 20:7). And any attempt to revoke it would incur divine wrath (Josh. 9:20; 22:20). God's wrath fell on King Saul when he violated Israel's covenant with Gibeon (2 Sam. 21:1–9).

Deception and lies have adverse consequences, though. The Gibeonites successfully tricked Israel into a covenant of peace, but they had to bear the consequences. By telling Joshua to do to them what “seems good and right” (Josh. 9:25), the Gibeonites both reminded him of their covenant relationship and accepted the consequences of their deception. The penalty for their deception was the curse of slavery. As slaves, they would hew wood and draw water on behalf of the congregation for the Lord's altar (vv. 21, 23, 27; cf. Deut. 20:10–15). Interestingly, Gibeon was notable for its water supply (2 Sam. 2:13; Jer. 41:12). When Solomon became king, the sanctuary was at Gibeon (1 Kin. 3:4–5; 2 Chr. 1:3, 13). The proclamation of Joshua against the Gibeonites recalls partly the curse of Noah over Canaan (Gen. 9:25–27). The references to a curse, the service of slavery, and “the house of my God” (i.e., the God of Shem dwelling in the tent of Shem) strengthens this connection. Despite the consequences of their deception, however, the Gibeonites became members of the covenant community—hence they were partakers of the covenantal blessings (v. 27; cf. Ps. 84:10)—and shared in the service of the sanctuary, even though as menial servants. Thus, like Rahab, the Gibeonites sought and found refuge in Israel's God, the God whose salvific grace extends beyond Israel.

10:1–11. Fulfilling the Demands of the Covenant. According to Joshua 9:1–2, many Canaanite city-states formed a coalition to fight Israel, but Gibeon refused to join them and sought peace with Israel. It is the coalition of chapter 9 that Israel defeated in chapter 10. Gibeon was close to Jerusalem. The fear of Jerusalem's king was fueled both by Israel's conquests of Jericho and Ai and by its covenant with Gibeon. The defection of Gibeon gave Israel a military advantage and weakened any resistance of the city-states in the region. Gibeon is described as an important, large city—"like one of the royal cities" (v. 2).

The coalition of the five kings was formed with the intention to attack Gibeon and break its alliance with Israel. In view of the covenant relationship between Israel and Gibeon, any attack on Gibeon was an attack on Israel. All three parties of the covenant—Gibeon, Israel, and the Lord—fulfilled their covenantal obligations. On its part, Gibeon sent messengers to tell Israel not to abandon its new servants (v. 6), reminding Israel of its obligation to protect Gibeon. Joshua gathered an army of valiant warriors to rescue Gibeon. The Lord encouraged Joshua and promised victory (v. 8). While the immediate cause of Israel's attack on the Amorite kings was to protect Gibeon, the destruction of the city-states constituted a major part of the conquest of Canaan. The description of the battles mentioned in vv. 9–39 clearly shows that it was the Lord who fought for Israel. The Lord defeated the enemy both with hailstones and with Joshua's sword (vv. 10–11). Nature stands at the sovereign Warrior's command in battle. At Jericho, the wall obeyed His voice and tumbled down (6:20). At Gibeon, hailstones descended upon the enemy (10:11), and the sun and moon obeyed His word to prolong this day of great victory (vv. 12–14). As in all the battles of the conquest, victory was the Lord's.

10:12–15. The Long Day. On the chronology of chapter 10, see "Chronology in Joshua 10," p. 379. Based on the use of the verb damam ("be silent"), some think that Joshua asked only that the sun reduce its heat that day. However, v. 13 uses both damam ("be silent") and 'amad ("stand" or "stop") for both the sun and the moon. The sun "stopped" ('amad) and did not go down for a whole day (v. 13). The stopping of the sun and the moon must not be considered "too hard" for the Lord (Gen. 18:14; Jer. 32:17). He who created daytime, the sun, and the moon, still had these objects under command. There have been various attempts to explain this miracle, but the truth is that it is beyond our understanding. Some have claimed that scientists have been able to establish a missing day in cosmic history. These claims have not been verified and remain in the realm of speculation. The context proves without a doubt that it was a divine miracle, unprecedented and unsurpassed. Verse 14 shows that the Lord heeds the voice of His servants and fights their battles for them. These miracles were all meant to communicate this important truth. During the conquest, Gilgal was the main base of Israel's operations. The return of the army to Gilgal occurred after the slaughter of the enemy on that prolonged daytime (Josh. 10:15). The Book of Jasher referred to in v. 13 may have been a collection of battle narratives or heroic songs (cf. 2 Sam. 1:18).

10:16–27. Execution of the Coalition Kings.

Joshua was in the camp at Gilgal when the report reached him that the five kings were hiding in a cave at Makkedah. Caves provided places of hiding and refuge in the Holy Land (see 1 Sam. 22:1). Joshua barricaded the cave to allow the army to pursue the enemy. These were probably the remaining armies of the five kings and the inhabitants of Makkedah (Josh. 10:19–20, 28). Since the Lord fought the battle, Israel suffered no casualties (v. 21). Like the king of Ai, the five kings were killed and then were hung until evening (see commentary on 8:10–29). By asking the captains of the warriors to place their feet on the necks of the five kings, Joshua reiterated and fulfilled the Lord's promise to put the enemy under the feet of Israel (cf. 1:3). This would then be a concrete expression of the enemy-under-foot motif (1 Kin. 5:3; Pss. 8:6; 110:1). This gesture served to encourage the Israelite warriors to fight on with the assurance that the Lord had already defeated their enemies. For the five kings, however, it meant total humiliation and subjection. The pile of stones over the cave was another monument to remind later generations of how the Lord had conquered the Amorites.

10:28–39. Capturing the Southern Cities.

The events of vv. 29–39 occurred over a period of time. The reference to the king of Jericho in association with the capture of Libnah suggests that v. 29 begins a conquest narrative that starts at a different date, after the capture of Makkedah. Throughout these verses, kherem ("the ban"; see commentary on 6:17–27) is completely carried out; according to the divine command, Joshua annihilated all the inhabitants of the captured cities (cf. 11:15; Deut. 20). The "second day" in v. 32 refers to the second day of the siege of Lachish (Josh. 10:31), rather than the day following the prolonged day. In several places in the narrative, the word translated as "people" is the Hebrew nepesh, which is often rendered “soul” (see vv. 28–39; 11:11). In the OT, this word often represents the person as a whole; it never refers to an immaterial essence that is capable of conscious existence apart from the body. The same word is used for a dead body (Lev. 21:11).

10:40–43. Extent of the Southern Conquest.

Verses 40–43 are mainly a summary of the conquest of the kings and cities narrated in 10:1–39. The kol (“all” or “whole”) land that was conquered was not the whole of Canaan but all of the territories of the peoples defeated in vv. 1–39. This was a large area that included the central mountains of the Holy Land, the desert in the south, and the Shephelah or the western foothills. Goshen in Israel (v. 41) is not to be confused with the land of Goshen in Egypt (Ex. 8:22). For a further discussion of the extent of the conquest described in Joshua, see the section on Backgrounds in Joshua: Introduction. The Israelite army encamped temporarily at Makkedah for the subsequent battles (Josh. 10:21) and v. 43 records their return to the main camp at Gilgal. As in several other places, “all Israel” (v. 43) designates the warriors and not every Israelite. Although Israel took these portions of land during a single military campaign (v. 42), the length of time is not indicated. The conquest of these lands might have taken a couple of years (cf. yamim rabbim, “many days”; 11:18). Verses 40–43 stress the Lord’s faithfulness in fighting for Israel and handing over the land as a covenantal gift. Now that Israel had gained a substantial foothold in Canaan, the hope of the Exodus, which was the inheritance of Canaan, was finally being realized.

11:1–15

The Conquest of the Northern Coalition

In 10:1–39, Joshua defeated the southern coalition. After this, Israel’s attention turned to the northern coalition in 11:1–15. The conquest story in this chapter emphasizes the Lord’s faithfulness in fulfilling His covenant promises. Joshua’s obedience to the Lord and His word also stand out.

11:1–5. The Coalition. As usual, coalitions were formed because of the threat posed by Israel’s victories. The northern coalition, led by the king of Hazor, was larger and perhaps stronger than the southern coalition. The armies of this coalition are compared to the sand. Its military strength is highlighted by its numerous horses and chariots (v. 4). A vast army with a large number of sophisticated weaponry thus gathered to battle Israel. Horses and chariots posed serious challenges to the Israelite army, which consisted of only foot soldiers with limited weaponry. Israel would soon be reminded, however, that the battle is not to the one who possesses chariots and horses but to the one who is on the Lord’s side.

11:6. Encouragement and Instruction. The size and weapons of the coalition army might have caused alarm among Israelite soldiers, but the Lord’s words in v. 6 encouraged Israel and assured them of victory. Even though Israel had to face this great and strong enemy, it was the Lord, the God of war, who would fight the battle and hand over the enemy to Israel. This divine assurance of victory breathed hope

Chronology in Joshua 10

The chronology of Joshua 10 is difficult to unravel. It appears that only vv. 10–15 constitute events of the prolonged day, while the events of vv. 16–43 occurred at other times. After the prolonged day, Joshua and the army returned to Gilgal (v. 15); but when the report came that the five kings were hiding in the cave of Makkedah, the army set out from Gilgal and encamped at Makkedah (v. 21). If Makkedah was farther than Azekah (vv. 10–11), it means that Israel did not reach Makkedah during the pursuit on the prolonged day—Israel stopped at Azekah while the five kings sought refuge in the cave of Makkedah (v. 16). The slaughter of Makkedah “that day” (v. 28) must relate to vv. 16–28 rather than vv. 10–15. That the events of vv. 16–43 did not occur on the prolonged day is supported by references to “that day” (vv. 28, 35; cf. vv. 26–27), “second day” (v. 32), and a siege (vv. 31, 34). Within vv. 16–43, the events of vv. 16–28 might have taken one day, while those of vv. 29–43 occurred on different days. According to 11:18, the battles recorded in 10:40–42 (cf. 11:16–23) took a long time, probably a couple of years.

and comfort into the hearts of the Israelites. The word of the Lord was always the strength of Joshua. The horses and chariots, which might have scared Israel, would be good only for destruction. Horses were hamstrung by cutting a tendon on the hind legs, rendering them militarily ineffective. The Lord does not need horses and chariots to fight (cf. Deut. 17:16; 2 Sam. 8:4; Is. 31:1), and so He would not let Israel take these as booty.

11:7–15. The Victory. Joshua deployed surprise attacks during the conquest (cf. Josh. 10:9). Through surprise attacks, Israel caught the enemy unprepared and drove them into the mountains toward the north, where chariots could not be used. The Lord fulfilled His promise by delivering the enemy into the hand of the Israelite army, whose task was only to pursue a terrorized army to the slaughter. There is always a blend of divine and human effort in the conquest stories (see commentary on 8:1–9). Whether literally as in Joshua's day or spiritually as in the Christian's life, victory over the enemy results from this blend of divine and human effort. Victory is always a gift from God, but believers must claim it in faith and action.

Joshua annihilated all the inhabitants of the cities of the coalition army in accordance with the kherem policy (the “ban”; see commentary on 6:17–27). The destruction of Hazor marked a significant victory in the region, since it was the most impressive city in the land. Unlike other elevated cities, only Hazor was burnt during the northern campaign. This was probably done because of the atrocities associated with it. Since Hazor was completely burned, it is possible that Israel did not take booty from it. As the chief city-state, it might have been the epitome of Canaanite corruption, luxury, and paganism.

This section concludes by stressing Joshua's faithfulness to the kherem policy (extermination) as commanded through Moses (v. 15). Since kherem was the central warfare policy of the conquest, Joshua's obedience to this regulation is remarkable. In chapter 11, the word kherem and related words occur four times, showing that the ban is a major concern. The repeated references to the annihilation of the Canaanites emphasizes this point (vv. 16, 20–21). By stressing Joshua's obedience to Moses's command, the text suggests that Joshua was completing the work that Moses had begun.

Record of the Conquest

Joshua 11:16—12:24 is an inventory of Israelite conquests. In 11:16–23, the author summarizes the conquests of Joshua. Chapter 12 summarizes the conquests of Moses east of the Jordan (vv. 1–6) and those of Joshua west of the Jordan (vv. 7–24). This inventory prepares for the division of the land that begins in chapter 13.

11:16–23. Summary of Joshua's Conquest with Special Highlights. The use of the Hebrew word kol (“all,” “whole,” “entire”) in vv. 16 and 23 does not refer to the whole land of Canaan but rather to the portions of land defined in vv. 16–17 (cf. 12:7–8). For more on the extent of the conquest, see the section on Backgrounds in Joshua: Introduction. The summary description of conquered land (11:16–18, 23) seems to cover all the portions of land taken by Joshua, including the territories of the southern campaign (10:43–45). We do not know how long Israel made war with these kings, but the entire conquest under Joshua may have taken about seven years (see the section on Date in Joshua: Introduction). In their battles against the Canaanites, the Israelites remained faithful to the divine rules of engagement, their only mistake being the covenant with Gibeon (10:19; Deut. 20:16–18).

While the Israelites were eager to conquer the land, they seem to have been slow in initiating the attack. Therefore, the Lord brought the battle to Israel by hardening the already stubborn hearts of the enemy to attack Israel. Thus were the enemies quickly destroyed (Josh. 11:20). When the Lord incites or allows the enemy to come against His people, He certainly intends the destruction of the enemy.

In Numbers 13–14, ten of the twelve spies discouraged Israel from entering Canaan because of the ‘anakim’ (“giants”). Caleb and Joshua, the two other spies, encouraged Israel to march into Canaan and to trust in the Lord's promise to drive out these giants. Joshua 11:21–22 and 15:13–14 record the victories of Joshua and Caleb over the ‘anakim’ in accordance with the Lord's promise. Joshua defeated all the ‘anakim’ except those in Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod (11:22). These were Philistine cities, and as we read in 13:2, the Philistines were not conquered during Joshua's time. The ‘anakim’ who remained in these cities were the ancestors of Goliath of Gath, whom David would kill (cf. 1 Sam. 17:4–7). The references to Israel and Judah, at a time when the nation was not yet divided, constitute an example of the scribal modernization of place-names rather than evidence of late authorship (Josh. 11:16, 21).

Joshua 11:23 concludes by highlighting key theological elements of the book. Joshua took the “land” and gave it to the tribes of Israel as “inheritance.” The Lord had promised to give rest (nuakh) to Israel in 1:13, and 11:23 testifies that the land had rest (shaqat) from war. The rest denoted by shaqat is quietness from war (11:23; 14:15) and thus prepares the way for nuakh, which denotes settling down or repose (23:1; see commentary on 1:12–18). In 11:23, the conquest of Canaan is at least substantially complete.

12:1–24. Kings Defeated by Moses and Joshua.

Verses 1–6 describe the territory east of the Jordan that Moses took from the two Amorite kings Sihon and Og (Num. 21:21–35; Deut. 2:26–3:11). The territory included the fertile lands of Gilead (i.e., the mountainous region east of the Jordan) and Bashan (i.e., the rich pastureland east of the Sea of Galilee). The two-and-a-half tribes (Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh) who inherited the lands of these Amorite kings owned large numbers of livestock, and Gilead and Bashan provided excellent pasturelands (Num. 32:1, 26–40).

Throughout the book, Joshua’s work is portrayed as complementing that of Moses. Moses had conquered the land east of the Jordan, and Joshua continued the conquest west of the Jordan. As noted earlier, the summary of land conquered by Joshua in Josh. 11:16–18, 23 includes all the territories taken during the entire conquest west of the Jordan. This is supported by the summary description of Joshua’s conquests in 12:7–8. Verse 8 lists the nations the Lord had promised to drive out of the land (3:10; Deut. 7:1), implying that Israel had carefully followed the divine command. Although as in 9:1 and 11:3 the Gergashites are omitted from the list of nations in 12:8, 24:11 records the fulfillment of the Lord’s promise to drive out the seven nations. The list of kings, thirty-one in all, that follows (12:9–24) illustrates that Israel massively broke the power of the Canaanites and took the land. The list includes only defeated kings with their capital cities; it is not an inventory of all the towns taken in the conquest. Among other things, the vivid descriptions of the conquest of Canaan presented throughout the book leave no room for doubt regarding the historicity of the Exodus from Egypt and the conquest of Canaan.

A HOPE REALIZED: DIVISION OF THE LAND

While the first half of the book (1–12) describes Israel’s conquest of the land of Canaan, the second half (13–24) describes the division of the land among the tribes of Israel. The narrative of chapters 13–24 is fraught with geographical and topographical details that forcefully underline the historicity of the conquest and division of the land. The careful demarcation of territories enabled later generations to identify their tribal boundaries. The actual division of the land ends in chapter 21, and the remaining chapters relate to issues of unity, loyalty, and covenantal faithfulness. With the division of the land, Israel’s hope of inheriting Canaan was realized (chaps. 13–21). But whether Israel would continue to receive God’s blessings and thus become channels of the “blessed hope” depended on their faithfulness to the covenant (chaps. 22–24).

The Command to Divide the Land

Although significant conquests had been made, Joshua seemed to have delayed dividing the land. The conquest took about seven years (cf. 14:7–10; Num. 13). The Lord’s promise was to conquer the land and divide it through Joshua (Josh. 1:6; Deut. 31:7), hence it was appropriate for the Lord to remind him to divide the land before he died. Verses 2–6 explain the last part of v. 1, which states that there was still much land to be possessed by Israel. Read superficially, vv. 1–6 seem to contradict earlier statements that Joshua took the whole land (Josh. 10:40–42; 11:16–23; see the section on Backgrounds in Joshua: Introduction). The portions of land yet to be taken were basically the lands of the Philistines and Sidonians (Phoenicians), who lived along the coast of the Great Sea and in Lebanon, respectively. The Philistines were not conquered during Joshua’s time (13:2). This explains why the ‘anakim were still in Philistia (11:22).

While much of the land was yet to be possessed, the Lord bade Joshua to focus on his assigned task of apportioning the land, promising that He Himself would gradually drive out the Canaanites (cf. Ex. 23:28–29). In v. 6, the Hebrew raq happileha (lit. “only/surely cause it to fall”) refers to the allocation of Israelite land into tribal divisions—this adds some urgency to the Lord’s command. In later passages, it is revealed that the land of Canaan was to be divided by lots among nine and a half tribes (Josh. 18:6; 19:51). The casting of lots was probably done using the priestly Urim and Thummim and so placed the decision completely in God's hands (Ex. 28:30; Num. 27:21). Lot casting was a means of divine revelation.

13:8–33

Territory East of the Jordan

Joshua 13:8–33 describes the territories of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh. These two and a half tribes received their inheritance east of the Jordan.

13:8–14. Extent of the Territory and the Levites. The land west of the Jordan was to be divided among nine and a half tribes because Moses had already given tribal allotments to two and a half tribes east of the Jordan. These were, namely, the lands over which Sihon and Og had ruled (see commentary on 12:1–24). The two and a half tribes failed to drive out some of the inhabitants of the land (13:13). This failure of Israel is a recurring theme in chapters 13–24 and anticipates the idolatrous practices that ensnare Israel in the book of Judges. The Levites were not given a tribal allotment since the Lord was their portion (v. 33). They received only forty-eight cities and their pastureland scattered throughout the land east and west of the Jordan. Being fully employed in the work of the Lord in His sanctuary, the priests and Levites were not to engage in farming or business activities. Since they did not possess land, it was the responsibility of the other tribes to provide for their needs through tithes, offerings, and other sacred donations.

13:15–28. Reuben and Gad. The Reubenites settled in the territory that had belonged to the kingdom of Sihon, south of Gilead and north of the Arnon River. The text mentions the slaughter of the Midianites (vv. 21–22) in the land of Moses's in-laws (Num. 31:8) and of Balaam the prophet, who unwillingly blessed Israel and subsequently entrapped them into sexual immorality and idolatry (Num. 25:1–3; 31:16). By rehearsing these incidents that took place in the Transjordan, the text indirectly warns God's people against sexual immorality and idolatry.

The Gadites shared the land of Gilead and part of the land of Ammon with the Reubenites. The Lord had commanded Israel not to conquer or claim the territory of Ammon (Deut. 2:19, 37). The reference to Ammon in Joshua 13:25 may refer to a portion of the Ammonite territory that had been conquered by Sihon before being taken over by Israel. This may provide a background to Judges 11:13–27.

13:29–33. Half-tribe of Manasseh. Half of the tribe of Manasseh settled in the land of Bashan, which Og had ruled, and Manasseh also shared the land of Gilead with Reuben and Gad. Machir (or, alternately, Makir) was the son of Manasseh and father of Gilead (Gen. 50:23; Num. 26:29). In v. 31, Machir is used to designate the tribe of Manasseh (cf. Judg. 5:14). Verse 32 summarily reasserts that Moses gave the conquered territory east of the Jordan as an inheritance to Israel. For v. 33, see commentary on 13:8–14.

14:1–19:51

Territory West of the Jordan

Joshua 14:1–19:51 describes the territories of the nine and a half tribes who settled west of the Jordan in the land of Canaan. In the division of the land, priority was given to the tribes of Judah and Joseph, probably because of their size and importance (see commentary on 15:20–16:4); these tribes were influential and would become the two major forces in Israel. The priority given to them was in agreement with the principle that the land was to be allocated based on the sizes of the tribes (Num. 26:52–56). As the Lord had commanded, Joshua divided the whole land of Canaan, including portions of the land that were yet to be conquered (Josh. 13:6).

14:1–5. Principles for the Division. The divine instruction was carefully followed in the allocation of the land. The principles outlined in vv. 1–5 suggest that the tribal territories were allocated under divine sanction and supervision. Eleazar the priest, Joshua, and the tribal heads administered the distribution. They divided the land through lot casting as commanded by Moses (on the use of lots, see comment on 13:1–7). Since two and a half tribes had already received their inheritance east of the Jordan, the land west of the Jordan was to be divided among nine and a half tribes. The Levites had no share since the Lord was their portion (18:7). By stating that the descendants of Joseph constituted two tribes (i.e., Ephraim and Manasseh), v. 4 explains why there were still nine and a half tribes even after excluding the tribe of Levi and the two and a half tribes who settled in the east.

14:6–15. Caleb. Some think that Caleb was not an Israelite because his father was a Kenizzite (cf. Num. 32:12), but in Joshua 14:6–7, Caleb seems to be included among the people of Judah. It seems that only the Judahite delegation accompanied Caleb as fellow tribesmen to claim his promised inheritance. Caleb had represented this tribe among the twelve spies (Num. 13:6). He probably would not have represented the tribe in such a capacity had he not been a direct descendant of Judah. He was probably considered a Kenizzite because his ancestor was named Kenaz (Josh. 14:14; 15:13, 17; cf. 1 Chr. 4:13–15).

Caleb reminded Joshua about the Lord's promise through Moses to give Caleb the land upon which his feet had walked as a reward for exercising bold faith and confidence in the Lord in his spy report. In his recounting of the incident of the twelve spies, Caleb noted that forty-five years had elapsed between the sending of the spies and the end of the conquest. This means that the conquest took about seven years, since thirty-eight years had passed between the time that Caleb returned from spying the land and their entrance into it (Deut. 2:14). The strength of Caleb was remarkable; even at the age of eighty-five he still could go to war (Josh. 14:10–11). But he seemed to praise his own strength in order to convince Joshua that he was strong enough to conquer Hebron if it were given to him. Caleb's request for Hebron was thus a fulfillment of the Lord's promise through Moses, who is here for the first time called "man of God" (v. 6). Hebron was noted for its warriors, greatness, and fortifications. The 'anakim lived in Hebron. Yet Caleb was convinced that since the Lord had promised him the land, He would be able to drive out these giants. Throughout the conquest, the Lord had been faithful in delivering the enemy into the hand of Israel as promised, and so Caleb had no doubt He would do the same with the 'anakim in Hebron (cf. Deut. 9:1–3).

In Joshua 11:21, Joshua is said to have driven the 'anakim out of Hebron, but in 15:13–14 it is Caleb who did this. It is possible that 11:21 is a summary of all the conquests, including Caleb's conquest of Hebron. In other words, Caleb's conquest of Hebron might have taken place as part of the southern campaign. The statement that "the land had rest from war" in 14:15, which also occurs in 11:23, strengthens this observation. Notice that there is no record of a battle in chapter 14, so v. 15 may be referring back to 11:23.

15:1–12. Judah. Judah was the first to receive its inheritance in the land of Canaan. Judah's territory was the southern part of the land, covering part of the central hill country. They shared borders with the Brook of Egypt (which flows from the Sinai Peninsula into the Great Sea), the Great Sea (i.e., Mediterranean Sea), Edom, and the Salt Sea (i.e., Dead Sea). While Jebus or Jerusalem proper was in Benjamin's territory (18:16, 28), its southern slope belonged to Judah (15:8, 63).

15:13–19. Caleb Claims Inheritance. As seen in 14:6–15, Joshua gave Hebron to Caleb in accordance with the Lord's promise. The three 'anakim named here appear in the report of the spies in Numbers 13:22. In bold confidence, Caleb had encouraged Israel to march into Canaan and possess the land because the Lord was with His people (Num. 14:9). With that same faith in the Lord, he won victory over the 'anakim. Thus Caleb, whose name may mean "dog," proved to be that "dog" who would not rest until he had chased out the enemy. That Caleb offered Debir (i.e., Kirjath [or Kiriath] Sepher) as the bride price for his daughter may be a hint that he was already fostering the next generation of leaders, since Othniel, Caleb's nephew and later his son-in-law, is the same Othniel who became a judge in Israel (Judg. 3:9).

15:20–16:4. Towns of Judah and Joseph's Territory. Judah's territory was the largest in the land of Canaan. Judah failed to drive out the Jebusites from Jerusalem, at least at the time the book was composed (cf. 2 Sam. 5:6–10). This failure of the Israelites is a significant refrain in the second half of the book. The recurrence of this refrain implies that at the division of the land the national wars of conquest were over; wars of occupation were now the responsibility of individual tribes.

Jacob had adopted Joseph's two sons (i.e., Manasseh and Ephraim), thereby giving Joseph the right to a double inheritance (Gen. 48:5–6, 22). Ephraim was the second born, but he received the blessings of a firstborn (Gen. 48:13–20). Unlike the other tribes west of the Jordan, the description of the territory of the tribes of Joseph does not contain a list of towns. The territory may have been thinly populated (cf. Josh. 17:14–18).

16:5–10. Ephraim. Ephraim's territory stretched from the Jordan to the Great Sea. It covered the central hill country of Israel. The Ephraimites had some cities within the territory of Manasseh (16:9; cf. 17:9). Like Judah, Ephraim failed to drive out some of the inhabitants of the Canaanite cities (e.g., Gezer), though they subjected them to forced labor. The result of this failure on Israel's part was interfaith marriages and religious syncretism (Judg. 2:1–3; 3:1–6; 10:6).

17:1–13. Half-Tribe of Manasseh. Even though Manasseh was the firstborn of Joseph, Jacob transferred the right of succession, which at that time usually belonged to the eldest son, to Ephraim (Gen. 48:13–20). On Machir, see commentary on Joshua 13:29–33. Some Manassites had received their inheritance east of the Jordan in Gilead and Bashan, though it is not possible to determine the specific clan(s). The reference to the “rest” of the people of Manasseh designates the other half of the tribe who settled west of the Jordan. On the inheritance of Zelophehad's daughters, see Numbers 27:1–11 and 36:1–12. Apparently, Zelophehad had only daughters. Traditionally, women would not have had a share in the division of the land, but the Lord granted the request of these women to inherit portions of the land alongside their father's brothers. The reason for the daughters' request was to preserve the name of their deceased father and thus ensure the future of the family among the tribes. Accordingly, they had to marry within their father's clan to keep the property within the clan and tribe (Num. 36:6–9). The territory of Manasseh in the land of Canaan shared borders with Asher, Zebulun, and Issachar (north), the Sea (west), the Jordan (east), and Ephraim (south). Ephraim had several towns within Manasseh (Josh. 16:9), and Manasseh had a few towns within Issachar and Asher (17:11). Manasseh also failed to completely drive out the Canaanites, even though Manasseh eventually subjected them to forced labor (see commentary on 15:20–16:4; 16:5–10).

17:14–18. Complaint of the House of Joseph. A quick look at a map of the tribal allotments reveals that Ephraim and Manasseh inherited a large territory. Moreover, their territory was the most fertile in all Israel. Thus, while it is true that the Lord had blessed the two tribes and made them a great and numerous people, it is not true that they had only one lot and one share (v. 14; cf. v. 5). Perhaps the people viewed their inheritance in terms of the number of cities and already-cleared farmlands ready for use and not in terms of the actual size of the allotments. By stating that they received only one lot and one share, the tribes of Joseph probably sought to remind Joshua of the prophetic blessing in Genesis 48, where Joseph was given the right of double inheritance. The tribes of Joseph may also have compared their allotment to that of Judah and may have reasoned that since Joshua was a fellow tribesman, he would reconfigure the division to their advantage. Ephraim and Manasseh requested more territory because they were a great and numerous people (v. 14). Joshua turned the argument around to challenge them to subdue the land already allotted to them. If these tribes were a great people as they claimed, they should have used their numerical strength to clear out more forest country and expand their territory (v. 15). The forest refers to the central mountainous region. The Perizzites were among the nations that the Lord promised to drive out before Israel (Deut. 7:1). Repa'im (sometimes translated as “giants”), like 'anakim, were a people of unusually large stature (Deut. 2:11; 3:11).

Joshua's response in Joshua 17:15 reveals that what the tribes of Joseph needed was not more territory but rather a proper mind-set and faith in the Lord. Their response reveals that the real reason for their confrontation was an unwillingness to clear a place in the forest country as well as a fear of the Canaanite iron chariots (v. 16). Thus, they refused to see the hill country as theirs because it would be difficult to clear and settle in. They also felt unable to drive out the Canaanites in the lowlands because they possessed chariots of iron. Humanly speaking, the foot soldiers of Israel were no match for the Canaanite army with iron chariots, which were formidable implements of war. But the tribes of Joseph forgot that the conquest of the land of Canaan was the Lord's business. They seem to have forgotten that the divine Warrior has no regard for horses and chariots (11:6). If the Lord drove out the 'anakim from Hebron before Caleb (15:13–14), Ephraim and Manasseh should well have known and believed that He would similarly drive out the repa'im and the Canaanites with their iron chariots (cf. 13:1–7).

In vv. 17–18, Joshua forcefully repeated his challenge to the two tribes. He was truly a transformational leader who sought to effect change in the mind-set of the people. As a good leader, he would not yield to a narrow or selfish request, nor would he succumb to a tribal wooing. Rather, he would challenge their faith in the Lord. Lack of faith and courage easily turns into rebellion. The tribes of Joseph should have realized that the division of the land was done under the direct supervision of the Lord, and if by any chance they charged Joshua with unfairness in the apportioning of the land, they were in fact murmuring against the Lord.

18:1-10. Allotting the Rest of the Land.

Gilgal had been the base of Israel's operations during the conquest. The tabernacle was pitched there. After Gilgal, Shiloh became the next base and religious center (18:1; see "Shiloh," p. 920). While at Gilgal, Judah, Ephraim, and Manasseh (west) received their inheritance, but the remaining seven tribes had not yet received theirs (v. 2). Joshua reproved the seven tribes for their apparent reluctance in dividing and thus occupying the land. The clause literally reads "they did not divide/share." Throughout the book, the Israelites carefully obeyed Joshua. At his command, tribal representatives went and surveyed the land, and returned with a map describing the land in seven parts defined by their cities. On v. 7, see commentary on 13:8-14. As usual, the tribal territories were divided through lot casting. It was actually Eleazar who would cast the lots in the Lord's presence at the entrance of the tabernacle in Shiloh (19:51). For lots, see commentary on 13:1-7.

Benjamin was strategically located towards the Jordan between northeastern Judah and southeastern Ephraim (18:11-28). Benjamin bordered Dan to the west. In this list we note, among other things, that Jerusalem/Jebus was shared between Benjamin (vv. 16, 28) and Judah (cf. commentary on 15:1-12, 20-63). Simeon (19:1-9) was located within the southern territory of Judah. In his parting blessings, Jacob prophesied that Simeon and Levi would be scattered in Israel (Gen. 49:5-7). According to Joshua 19:9, Judah's territory was too large for them, and so a part of it was given to Simeon. Soon, Simeon would be assimilated by Judah. Zebulun (vv. 10-16) shared borders with Asher (west), Naphtali (northeast), Manasseh (south), and Issachar (southeast). Their territory mainly covered the forested mountain rim north of Jezreel. Prophetic blessings suggest Zebulun might have had access to the seas (Gen. 49:13; Deut. 33:18-19).

Issachar's territory covered the land between Jezreel and the Jordan. Issachar shared borders with Naphtali (north), Zebulun (northwest), Manasseh (south), and the Jordan (east) (vv. 17-23). Asher bordered Naphtali (east), Zebulun (southeast), and the Great Sea (west), thus adjoining the Phoenician coast. It covered the western Galilee highland (vv. 24-31). Naphtali's territory covered the western shore of the Sea of Galilee and extended to the north. It bordered Asher (west), Zebulun (southwest), Issachar (south), and extended over the Jordan, thereby sharing a boundary with one half of Manasseh in the Transjordan (vv. 32-39). Dan's territory (vv. 40-48) was bordered by the Great Sea (west) and Manasseh (northwest); the rest of Dan's territory was sandwiched together with Benjamin (east), between Judah (south) and Ephraim (northeast). Some of the towns of Judah were reassigned to Dan (15:33; 19:41-43). The Danites failed to subdue the inhabitants of the land (Judg. 1:34-35; 18:1). Some of the Danites migrated to the extreme north and took Leshem, which they renamed Dan (Josh. 19:47). As if the rejection of their original territory was not enough, the Danite migrants also clung to idolatry (Judg. 18). Perhaps because they established idolatry in this region, it later became a major center of formalized idolatrous worship during the time of Jeroboam (1 Kin. 12:28-29).

19:49-51. Joshua. The Israelites gave an inheritance to Joshua. He had been a faithful spy (Num. 13-14) and a great leader before the Lord. Verse 50 implies that the Lord had promised to give him as inheritance whichever city he would ask for. As an Ephraimite, he requested Timnath Serah in the mountains of Ephraim. Notice that he was the last to receive his inheritance. He did not select a place for himself before dividing the land. As a good leader, he served others first. There are several indications that the division of the land was a religious activity. First, as elsewhere (Josh. 14:1; 17:4; 21:1), Eleazar the priest is named before Joshua and the tribal leaders. Second, these verses reiterate that the division was done through casting lots in the Lord's presence at the entrance of the tabernacle at Shiloh. The division of the land was not only carried out unanimously by the leadership of Israel but was done under divine sanction and supervision. Now that the division of the land was complete, it was time to designate the cities of refuge (chap. 20) and the cities of the Levites (chap. 21).

20:1-9*Cities of Refuge

In Numbers 35:9-34, the Lord commanded through Moses the establishment of six cities of refuge from among the Levitical cities—three on each side of the Jordan—where anyone who unintentionally killed a person might seek asylum (cf. Ex. 21:12-13; Deut. 4:41-43; 19:1-13). Joshua 20 contains the fulfillment of the promise in Numbers 35 and related passages. Joshua 20:1–6 states the reasons for the appointment of the cities, and vv. 7–9 enumerate them. The establishment of the cities of refuge obviously served to limit and control the practice of blood vengeance and to avoid polluting the land with innocent blood. Such a provision was unparalleled in the ANE. It was a way of teaching respect for life and justice to the Israelites.

20:1–6. The Rationale. The person who killed another person unintentionally would flee to a city of refuge from the “avenger of blood.” This refers to a close male relative of the deceased whose responsibility was to avenge the dead by killing the murderer. A city of refuge provided both protection and a trial for those who killed someone accidentally. Such people would explain their situation before the council of elders at the entrance to the city gate, who upon hearing would take the person in and provide asylum, including a place to live (v. 4). The city gate was usually a complex structure that both controlled traffic and facilitated the defense of a city. The council of elders normally judged cases at the gate. It was the responsibility of the elders of the city of refuge not to deliver the manslayer into the hands of an avenger of blood who pursued the slayer into the city. After the initial hearing by the elders, person who killed someone accidentally would be tried before the assembly (vv. 6, 9). A guilty slayer was handed over to the avenger of blood (v. 9; Deut. 19:12). For having caused the accidental loss of a human life, an innocent slayer would have to remain in the city of refuge until the ruling high priest died, at which time the people who killed someone accidentally could return to their original city (Josh. 20:6). The death of the high priest—who bore the people’s guilt (Ex. 28:38; Lev. 10:17)—may have provided some sort of amnesty or atonement. This aspect of the high priest’s death would point obliquely to the death of Christ, the High Priest, whose death provided atonement for sin (1 Pet. 2:24; Heb. 9:11–15).

20:7–9. The Cities. Cities east of the Jordan included Bezer (Reuben), Ramoth in Gilead (Gad), and Golan in Bashan (Manasseh; cf. Deut. 4:43), while those west of the Jordan comprised Kedesh in Galilee (Naphtali), Shechem (Ephraim), and Hebron (Judah). The cities of refuge provided asylum for both the native and the stranger in Israel who unintentionally slew a person. The Lord was the God of Israel and of foreigners living in Israel. The cities of refuge were also Levitical cities (Josh. 21:13–38).

21:1–42 Levitical Cities

The tribe of Levi did not receive a tribal allotment because the priesthood was their inheritance (see commentary on 13:8–14). Joshua 21:1–42 records the allocation of cities throughout the nation as dwellings for the Levites. The Levitical cities would serve as centers for religious instruction.

21:1–3. The Directive. The Lord had commanded that forty-eight cities and their common lands be given to the Levites to settle in (Num. 35:1–8). In Joshua 21:1–2 the Levites reminded Eleazar, Joshua, and the tribal leaders to fulfill the Lord’s directive regarding the Levitical cities. Since the Levites represented the nation in their sanctuary service, it was the responsibility of all the other tribes to donate the cities.

21:4–42. The Distribution. The cities were determined through the casting of lots. Verses 4–8 summarize the tribal distribution of the cities, while vv. 9–40 list the cities. Levi had three sons, Kohath, Gershon, and Merari. The priestly sons of Aaron (also the Kohathites) received thirteen cities from the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin (vv. 9–19). The priests were thus providentially settled in the vicinity of the future temple of Solomon in Jerusalem. The rest of the Kohathites received ten cities from Ephraim, Dan, and one half of Manasseh (west; vv. 20–26). The Gershonites received thirteen cities from Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, and one half of Manasseh (east; vv. 27–33). Finally, the Merarites received twelve cities from Reuben, Gad, and Zebulun (vv. 34–40). Verses 41–42 conclude the distribution of the Levitical cities. The cities were forty-eight in number, each with its common lands for the livestock of the Levites.

21:43–45 Faithfulness of the Lord

Joshua 21:43–45 accentuates the Lord’s faithfulness in delivering His covenantal promises. These verses elegantly summarize the purpose of the book and the Exodus from Egypt. The Lord had taken Israel out of Egypt and led them through the wilderness in order to give them “rest” in the land of Canaan (see on 1:12–18). The text asserts that God’s oath to the fathers had now been fulfilled (see Gen. 22:16–18). God’s promises are reliable and fill the heart with hope. Israel obeyed the Lord and engaged the enemy in battle, but the land remained a covenant gift from the sovereign God. The use of natan (“give”), yarash (“possess”), and nakhal (“inherit”) indicates throughout the book that Israel’s occupation of Canaan occurred through a legal transaction in which the Lord, being God of all the earth, transferred the land as a covenantal gift to Israel. While Israel thus owned the legal title to the land, it would experience true “rest” only by keeping the covenant.

22:1–34

Unity and Loyalty

Joshua 22 records how the warriors of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and one half of Manasseh, who had crossed over the Jordan to help the other tribes take possession of Canaan, returned to their land.

22:1–6. Loyalty of the Two and a Half Tribes.

Now that the Lord had given rest to the nine and a half tribes in the land of Canaan, it was time for the warriors of the two and a half tribes (Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh) to return to their inheritance in the Transjordan. In his farewell address, Joshua commended their loyalty and obedience to the Lord’s command to join the other tribes in the conquest of Canaan (1:12–15; Num. 32:20–22). He then charged them to remain true and loyal to the Lord; that is, to love the Lord, walk in all His ways, keep His commandments, hold fast to Him, and serve Him wholeheartedly (Josh. 22:5). Obedience to the Lord was the key to blessings and perpetual occupancy of the land. True success has always depended on wholehearted devotion and obedience to the Lord. Joshua’s address contained a charge and a blessing, in the manner of patriarchal parting words (see Gen. 49:28–29).

22:7–9. Returning Home. The warriors of the two and a half tribes returned with both material and spiritual blessings. Joshua pronounced spiritual blessings upon the people, but he also gave them material blessings. The returning warriors divided the spoils that had been accumulated during the conquest with the other tribes, but they would have to share the booty with their brothers who had stayed behind in the Transjordan (cf. Num. 31:27). Technically, the land of Canaan was the land west of the Jordan. The lands east of the Jordan were known as Gilead and Bashan, though sometimes the area was simply called Gilead (see Josh. 22:9). By emphasizing that the land of Gilead was given by divine command to the two and a half tribes, v. 9 suggests that crossing the Jordan back to Gilead did not mean these people no longer had a share in the Lord.

22:10–12. The Altar and Its Crisis. The returning warriors built a large, imposing altar by the Jordan in the land of Canaan before crossing to their territory. Moses had instructed Israel to build an altar only at the place that the Lord would choose (Deut. 12:11), which was temporarily at Shiloh (Josh. 18:1). The construction of any alternative altar for sacrifices—even if offered in the Lord’s name—constituted egregious rebellion. It was the responsibility of the congregation to punish such rebellion (Lev. 17:8–9; Deut. 13:12–15). This explains why the whole community gathered at Shiloh to prepare for war (Josh. 22:12). There is a contrast in Joshua 22 between the people of Israel and the people of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh. Often, the expression bene yisra’el (“sons,” “children,” or “people” of Israel, or simply “Israelites”) designates a majority of the Israelites against a minority (see 18:10; 19:49; 21:3, 41). Notwithstanding this, there is a clear distinction between the land of Canaan (i.e., the side of the people of “Israel”) and the land of Gilead (i.e., where the two and a half tribes settled).

22:13–20. The Accusation. Moses had commanded Israel to carefully investigate acts of apostasy before punishing them (Deut. 13:14–15). Therefore before the intended war, the tribes west of the Jordan sent a delegation of tribal heads together with Phinehas (son of Eleazar the priest) to the Transjordan. This was a religious matter, so a priest had to lead the delegation. The delegation assumed—without asking for the rationale—that the altar was built for sacrifices and as such would signify a turning away from and rebelling against the Lord. On this basis, they reminded the two and a half tribes of Israel’s iniquity at Peor and the sin of Achan, both of which brought the Lord’s wrath against the whole congregation (Josh. 7; Num. 25). Included is a suggestion given to the two and a half tribes. If they thought that their own land was unclean, they could cross over to the place where the Lord and His sanctuary stood and take possession of some of that land (22:19; cf. vv. 9–12). There was no need to rebel in order to make a point.

In their accusation, the delegation signaled their fear of the Lord’s anger befalling the whole congregation on account of the rebellion of the Transjordan tribes, since the covenant community shared a corporate responsibility. This is why they rehearsed the incidents of Peor and Achan. The comment that Israel was not yet cleansed of the iniquity of Peor is intriguing. Although the Lord had destroyed the offenders with a plague, Israel felt that the Lord still held this iniquity against His people. While this might not be a wholesome theology, it certainly served to warn Israel of any further rebellion against the Lord. The building of an alternative altar constituted covenantal unfaithfulness, and Israel could no longer afford the price that came with such rebellion.

22:21–29. Response to the Accusation. The delegation of the nine and a half tribes wrongly interpreted the rationale for the altar and had thereby unjustifiably accused the builders of rebellion. By the twofold invocation of the solemn title of the Lord (‘el ‘elohim yahweh—“The Mighty One, God, the LORD” or “The LORD God of gods”; v. 22), the two and a half tribes sought to prove their innocence of the accusation. The Lord, being omniscient, already knew the rationale for the altar. But in case they were found guilty, they were prepared to accept full responsibility for the altar, as punishment either from their fellow Israelites or from the Lord Himself. Rather than an act of rebellion, the altar by the Jordan was built out of fear that the future descendants of the two and a half tribes would be denied the right to worship at God’s tabernacle. This replica of the Lord’s altar (v. 28) at Shiloh was built not for sacrifices but as a witness, especially as future generations of the two and a half tribes could cite it as evidence that they were part of the Lord’s people since their ancestors built it. The impressiveness of the altar would thus agree with its function as a witness. Verse 29 carefully debunks all the charges pressed forward by the delegation from the west. As it turned out, the altar signified commitment to the Lord and unity with the other tribes in His service. The returning warriors had been loyal to the Lord’s command throughout the conquest; there was no reason they should rebel against the Lord or His chosen leader now that the conquest was over.

22:30–34. Conflict Resolved. A good response will always turn away anger and prevent tragedy (cf. Prov. 15:1). Because of the heartwarming response of the two and a half tribes, Phinehas ended up commending their loyalty to the Lord. The nine and a half tribes were obviously waiting for the results of the delegation’s investigation before engaging the two and a half tribes in war. Upon receiving the pleasing report, however, they praised God (lit. “blessed” Him) and refrained from the attack. Through confrontation and dialogue, conflicts are resolved and tragedies are averted. Among other things, Joshua 22 touches on the role of communication in conflict resolution. Unity among believers is evidence of the Lord’s presence. The two and a half tribes probably named the altar “witness”—a witness to their loyalty to the Lord and their right, even if they lived outside of the land of Canaan, to share with the other tribes in the Lord’s worship at His tabernacle.

Farewell Exhortation

Chapter 23 contains Joshua’s parting message to all Israel, represented by elders, heads of tribes, judges, and military officers. This was a time when he was old and nearing death, well after the end of the conquest. By outlining both the benefits of obedience (vv. 1–11) and the consequences of disobedience (vv. 12–16), Joshua’s exhortation emphasized faithfulness to the Lord and obedience of His Word.

23:1–11. Benefits of Obedience. It was the Lord who fought for Israel and gave them the land of Canaan as an inheritance. It was also He who would continue to drive out the remaining inhabitants of the land. Joshua then exhorted the people to be courageous and to resolve to do everything recorded in the book of the law of Moses, being careful not to deviate either to the right or to the left (v. 6). Keeping this law would mean that Israel would not swear by the Canaanite gods, serve them, or worship them, for such would constitute rebellion against the Lord and a rejection of His covenant. The reason Israel was required to continue to “hold fast to the LORD” (v. 8) was two-fold. On the one hand, Israel had to keep the law of the Lord because He had been faithful in fulfilling His covenant promises. No nation in Canaan, though greater and stronger, was able to stand against Israel because the Lord fought for His people. But Israel would be blessed even more through obedience to the divine law. For example, the Lord would terrify the rest of the Canaanites, so that one Israelite would chase a thousand of them and thus expel them from the land. As a response, the Israelites would love the Lord and keep His commandments.

23:12–16. Consequences of Disobedience.

Should Israel turn away from following the Lord to cling to the Canaanites—mingling with them in marriage and in worship—He certainly would not drive out these Canaanites but would use them as an instrument to destroy His own people (cf. Ex. 34:12–16; Deut. 7:1–6). In Joshua 32:14–16, Joshua repeated himself by highlighting the two sides of the Lord’s faithfulness. The Lord was going to be faithful in fulfilling the promises of the covenant, so that none of them would fail. But in case of rebellion, He would be faithful in plaguing them with the covenantal curses (Lev. 26; see Deut. 27–28). These words of Joshua, some of which would be repeated in chapter 24, were prophetic. The rehearsal of covenantal blessings and curses was necessary to try to avoid the people’s loss of faith (cf. Judg. 2).

24:1–28*Renewal of the Covenant

Chapter 24 is a covenant renewal ceremony. Unlike chapter 23, in which a location is not given, the covenant ceremony of chapter 24 took place at Shechem. Abram had built an altar at Shechem (Gen. 12:6–7). It was here that Jacob challenged his household to get rid of foreign gods (Gen. 35:1–5). Joshua’s renewal of the covenant in Joshua 8 also took place in the vicinity of Shechem. The covenant between God and Israel is the foundation of the book of Joshua. Chapter 24 concludes the book by emphasizing the centrality of the covenant in God’s dealings with Israel.

24:1–13. Retelling the History of Israel.

All the tribes of Israel, particularly the elders, heads, judges, and officers, were gathered for the covenant renewal ceremony. That the people presented themselves “before God” probably means that the incident took place in front of the tabernacle. It is possible that at that time—if not for that occasion—the sanctuary was at Shechem rather than Shiloh (cf. Josh. 18:1; 22:12; 24:26). In vv. 2–13 the Lord, through Joshua, retold the history of Israel, starting with the call of Abraham. These verses summarize the stories of the patriarchs (vv. 2–4), the Exodus and wandering (vv. 5–10), and the conquest and settlement in Canaan (vv. 11–13). The references to the Abrahamic covenant, the deliverance from Egypt, the crossing of the Red Sea, the desert wanderings, the Balaam episode, the crossing of the Jordan, and the terrorization of the enemy leading to the conquest and subsequent settlement in the land all combine to emphasize the sovereignty of the Lord over Israel. Israel appeared in Canaan not by chance but by divine design. (For references to the “hornet,” see Ex. 23:28 and Deut. 7:20.) If the Lord had promised to defeat the nations of Canaan before Israel (Josh. 3:10; Deut. 7:1), Joshua 24:11 indicates that He fulfilled this promise (cf. 12:7–8). The Lord is as good as His word.

24:14–15. Command to Serve the Lord.

On the basis of the Lord’s sovereignty and faithfulness (vv. 2–13), Joshua commanded Israel to fear the Lord and serve Him faithfully in sincerity and in truth and thus take away the false gods which their ancestors served on the other side of the river (i.e., the Euphrates) and in Egypt (vv. 14–15). In commanding the people not to worship the gods of the ancestors, Joshua meant that since the Lord now owned them (vv. 1–13), they were not to turn back from following Him. It is possible that some of the Israelites served other gods during their sojourn in Egypt (cf. Ex. 32; Ezek. 20). Joshua’s injunction to serve the Lord faithfully in sincerity and truth meant to completely sever any idolatrous, ancestral practices. Joshua 24:14 ends with a command to serve the Lord. But in v. 15 Joshua seems to give the option to Israel to decide whom to serve—whether the ancestral gods in Mesopotamia or the gods in the land of Canaan—if they deemed it unprofitable (lit. ra’ means “evil, bad”) to serve the Lord. The Lord detests forced or insincere worship. His salvific purpose for Israel depended on its choice to serve Him. Notice, however, that Joshua’s words in vv. 2–14 and 23:12–16 carefully narrow Israel’s choice in favor of the Lord. If Israel was required to sever their ties to the ancestral gods in Mesopotamia, how much more would they need to repudiate Canaanite gods! Verse 15 concludes with Joshua’s personal resolution: he and his family would serve the Lord. By this declaration of allegiance, he sought to challenge others to ensure that their families too remained loyal to the Lord. If the Lord is worshiped, He must be worshiped with undivided loyalty and singleness of heart.

24:16–18. Commitment to Serve the Lord.

If vv. 14–15 constitute Joshua’s command to serve the Lord, then vv. 16–18 constitute the people’s commitment to serve Him. In view of all the things He had done for them, they swore never to forsake the Lord and serve other gods. Thus, the basis on which Israel was commanded to serve the Lord (vv. 2–13) constituted the basis on which they promised to serve Him (vv. 17–18). The Lord must be worshiped in recognition of His ownership of and goodness toward His people.

24:19–24. Repeating the Commitment. The responsive speeches between Joshua and the people would serve to ensure and affirm the people's commitment to the Lord and His covenant. In vv. 19–20, Joshua tested the genuineness of their declaration of allegiance (v. 18) by insisting that they could not serve the Lord because He is holy, jealous, and would not forgive their transgressions and sins if they forsook Him and followed foreign gods. Joshua's statement does not contradict Exodus 34:6–7; it simply brings home the fact that the Lord would not let idolatry go unpunished. Israel was thus reminded to expect not only bountiful blessings from the Lord if they remained faithful to the covenant but also deleterious covenantal curses should they be unfaithful. This should motivate them to be loyal. Once Israel entered into covenant with Him, they were either for Him or against Him. They sealed their determination to follow the Lord (Josh. 24:22), and He would not share the allegiance due Him with other gods. Israel was commanded to take away (sur) the foreign gods and follow the biddings of only the Lord (v. 23; cf. v. 14). The Hebrew verb sur means "clear away," "get rid of," or "remove." It is possible that the reference to foreign gods here refers to the Canaanite gods who would soon ensnare Israel, rather than gods already in the possession of the Israelites. Verse 23 would thus be a command to get rid of the Canaanite gods in the land (cf. Deut. 31:16; Judg. 2:2). The final response of the people (Josh. 24:24) genuinely satisfied Joshua's charge to serve the Lord and obey His voice (v. 23).

24:25–28. Sealing the Covenant. Based on the people's resolution to serve the Lord (vv. 16–24), Joshua renewed the covenant with them and made a covenant transaction (khoq—"statute" or "rule," and mishpat—"judgment," "ordinance," or "decree"), which included the words of the Lord and the response of Israel. Joshua subsequently wrote the words or an account of the transaction, adding it to the "Book of the Law of God" (see 1:8; 8:31; 22:5; 23:6). A new canonical portion is produced in addition to what Moses had written. As a significant ceremony, the covenant renewal at Shechem needed to be memorialized for future generations. A large stone was set up to serve such purpose (v. 26). Through personification, the stone is said to have heard all the words the Lord spoke to the people (v. 27).

As a legal witness, the stone would remind Israel that continual possession of the land depended on their faithfulness to the Lord's covenant.

24:29–33

Three Burials

Verses 29–33 record the burials of Joshua, Eleazar, and the bones of Joseph. These burials testify to the faithfulness of the Lord in firmly establishing Israel in the land of Canaan in accordance with His promise to the fathers.

24:29–31. Joshua. Joshua was buried in his own inheritance. He had been a sharat (an "aide," "assistant," or "minister") to Moses, the "servant of the LORD" (see 1:1; Ex. 24:13). Only at death is Joshua accorded the prestigious title "servant of the LORD" (Jos. 24:29). It is a great honor to serve the Lord. Verse 31 states that Israel served the Lord throughout the days of Joshua and the elders who had witnessed the Lord's mighty acts. This verse anticipates a negative situation after the deaths of the elders, as can be seen in the book of Judges. Meanwhile, the book of Joshua closes with two more burials.

24:32. Joseph's Bones. Joseph's bones were buried in the very portion of land that Jacob had acquired from the Shechemites (Gen. 33:19). The transportation of Joseph's bones from Egypt and their subsequent burial in Canaan fulfilled his deathbed wish and his brothers' oath (Gen. 50:25; Ex. 13:19). In the division of the land, Ephraim, Joseph's legal firstborn, inherited the city of Shechem. Joseph was thus buried in his own tribal inheritance.

24:33. Eleazar. Eleazar, the high priest, was buried in a plot of land belonging to his son Phinehas in the territory of Ephraim. According to 21:9–19, the priestly sons of Aaron were given cities within the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, but not in Ephraim. The reason Phinehas received a plot in Ephraim was probably because the sanctuary was in Ephraim at that time and the high priest had to settle close to the sanctuary.

These leaders and those who followed them lived looking forward to the final fulfillment of God's promises. They saw and enjoyed the partial fulfillment of the promises but died looking forward to their full realization in a better country, the heavenly one (Heb. 11:13–16, 39–40). Promise, faith, and hope remain inseparable in the hearts of God's people.

JUDGES

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The book takes its title from its leading characters, the “judges” (Judg. 2:16–18). It describes in some detail the rule of the six major judges: Othniel (3:7–11), Ehud (3:12–30), Deborah (4:1–5:31), Gideon (6:1–8:35), Jephthah (10:6–12:7), and Samson (13:1–16:31). The six minor judges are mentioned only in passing: Shamgar (3:31), Tola, Jair (10:1–5), Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (12:8–15). These judges were more than judicial administrators; they also were divinely appointed deliverers of God’s people (2:16; 3:9, 15).

The verb “to judge” describes the activity of most of them (Othniel [3:10], Deborah [4:4], Tola [10:2], Jair [10:3], Jephthah [12:7], Ibzan [12:8], Elon [12:11], Abdon [12:13], Samson [15:20]). After a judge delivered God’s people from their oppressors, he or she ruled over them for the rest of his or her life, maintaining political order and social justice in Israel. However, it was acknowledged that God Himself was the chief judge (11:27).

The author of the book of Judges is not named in the book itself, nor is there any hint in any other part of the Bible. According to Jewish tradition, the prophet Samuel wrote 1 and 2 Samuel, Judges, and Ruth. Critical scholarship holds that the book was composed by different authors over a long period.

Date. A number of historical statements in the book provide some guidance as to the time when the book was written.

1. We find the phrase “to this day” six times (1:21, 26; 6:24; 10:4; 15:19; 18:12). Most of these refer to place-names that were still in use when the book was written; hence, they are not of much help. Judges 1:21, however, tells us that the children of Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites from Jerusalem, so the Jebusites still occupied Jerusalem in the time of the author.

This means that this text must have been written before David’s conquest of Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:6–9), shortly after he became king over all Israel in Hebron (2 Sam. 5:1–5).

2. In Judges 1:29, we read that Ephraim did not drive out the Canaanites who dwelt in Gezer. The town of Gezer, one of the cities assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21:21), lay in Ephraim’s territory, but it was still a Canaanite town. This situation continued until one of the Egyptian pharaohs—possibly Siamun (986–967 B.C.)—conquered Gezer and presented it as a wedding gift (dowry) to his daughter, the wife of Solomon (1 Kin. 9:16). Judges 1:29, therefore, could not have been written later than the early part of Solomon’s reign, which was before he married Pharaoh’s daughter.

3. The observation that there was no king in Israel at the time of the events recorded in Judges appears four times in the book (17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25). It appears to draw a contrast between the prosperous times of the monarchy (which the writer may have experienced) and the necessitous time of the judges (but see 21:23–25). If that is the case, it would fit in the early reign of Saul, before he was rejected by God, or in the time of David and the early part of Solomon.

4. The reference in 18:30–31 to the carved image that the children of Dan set up for themselves at the time that the house of God was in Shiloh (v. 31) seems to indicate that when the book was written Shiloh was no longer the religious center of Israel (see “Shiloh,” p. 920). When the ark was taken by the Philistines and Eli died (1 Sam. 4:10–18), God abandoned the sanctuary at Shiloh (Ps. 78:60). Most likely, the Philistines destroyed Shiloh because when the ark was given back, it was not returned to Shiloh but stayed in Kirjath Jearim for twenty years (1 Sam. 7:2).

In summary, the internal evidence of the book of Judges seems to indicate that it was written during the early period of Saul’s or David's reign, perhaps by Samuel, as held by Jewish tradition. Samuel consistently condemned idolatry and called upon the people to live in accordance with God's commandments (2 Sam. 7:3–6; 12:14–15, 20–25).

Backgrounds. The time of the Judges was a period comparable to the Dark Ages in church history—all people did as they pleased, according to their own subjective standards (Judg. 17:6). This period extended from the time of the death of all the elders who had seen the great miracles God had done for His people Israel (2:7) until the time of Samuel and the beginning of the monarchy, from about 1350 to 1050 B.C.

During this time, we find periods of oppression, brought on by apostasies, alternating with peaceful times under the leadership of the judges whom God raised up to deliver Israel. Because the Israelites failed to drive out all of the Canaanites from the land God had promised them, some Canaanite city-states existed whose culture was advanced over that of the Israelites, who had spent hundreds of years in slavery in Egypt. Not surprisingly, there was a tendency among the Israelites to adopt some elements of Canaanite culture and to combine the worship of Yahweh with the worship of the Canaanite deities Baal and Ashtoreth (2:13).

Internationally, the monotheistic reforms of Pharaoh Akhenaten (ca. 1374–1358 B.C.) were taking place in Egypt. The letters from Canaanite city-states to Pharaoh Akhenaten in his new capital city of Akhetaten ("The Horizon of the [sun disk] Aten") at modern tal al-Amarna contain pleas for help against the Habiru, a possible reference to some of the Hebrew tribes (see "Habiru," p. 365). Later, around 1200 B.C., a group of people living in Crete were driven out by the Greeks and attempted to invade Egypt, but Pharaoh Ramesses III (ca. 1198–1166 B.C.) drove them back. According to a credible theory, they settled along the coast in the south of Canaan and assimilated with, or perhaps annihilated or replaced, the existing Philistine culture of Abraham's day. Their continuing existence and interaction with the Israelites is an important part of the story of the book of Judges.

Chronology. The question of the chronology of the judges is related to the date of the Exodus event and the entry of Israel into Canaan forty years later. According to Scripture, Solomon began the construction of the temple in 967 B.C., 480 years after the Exodus (1 Kin. 6:1).

Solomon reigned for forty years (971–931 B.C.). Therefore, the Exodus event took place in about 1447 B.C. and the beginning of the conquest of Canaan in about 1407 B.C.

Jephthah, in Judges 11:26, reminded the king of Ammon that Israel had already dwelt in Heshbon and its villages for three hundred years. Israel had conquered Heshbon under Moses's leadership (Deut. 2:26–37) just before his death. Hence, there were about three hundred years between the time of Moses's conquest of Heshbon and the judgeship of Jephthah, the eighth of the twelve judges.

Israel was oppressed by foreign powers for various lengths of time and then freed by the judges. Most of the lengths of these periods are carefully preserved in the text. When these time periods are added together and then combined with the forty years wandering under Moses, the conquest under Joshua, and reigns of Saul and David, the total time is too long to fit into the 480 years of 1 Kings 6:1. In fact, even the judgeships add up to more than Jephthah's three hundred years. Thus, it is likely that some of these judgeships overlapped with each other and with some of the periods of oppression. For example, Samson judged Israel for twenty years in the days of the Philistines (Judg. 15:20); that is, he judged Israel for twenty years sometime during the forty years of oppression by the Philistines.

The tribes of Israel and their judges were widely scattered geographically. For example, Othniel was from Judah, Deborah from Ephraim, Samson from Dan, and so on. The biblical record shows that even in times of crisis, when a deliverer was fighting an oppressor, not all the tribes rallied to the cause. For example, when Barak fought Jabin, only the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali joined him (4:10). And when Gideon defeated the Midianites, he called on only the tribes of Asher, Manasseh, Naphtali, and Zebulun (6:35). The reason could be that not all the tribes were oppressed at any one time, and that some of the judges were local rather than national deliverers. This understanding allows for the time frame to be reduced in order to fit into the three-hundred-year period mentioned by Jephthah.

Theology and Purpose. The book of Judges describes the interaction between God and His people after they entered the land of Canaan. A new chapter in the history of the nation was being written, and what we find is disturbing. We move from some elements of social order to almost total chaos. At the center of the book is the covenant relation that God established with the twelve tribes and that would have ensured safety and security. The book is about the God of the covenant and the disruption of the covenant relationship and its results.

1. Blessings of Faithfulness. The book begins with a people who existed in union with God and with each other. Before deciding what to do after the death of Joshua, they consulted the Lord, and He identified Judah as the leading tribe (1:1–2). They were ready to finish the task of conquering the land of Canaan. Yahweh and His covenant created a deep bond of unity among the tribes, which was perhaps even stronger than blood relations. Faithfulness to the covenant relationship brought with it a peaceful social interaction among the tribes. They supported Judah's lead and moved as one person to accomplish the Lord's plan for them. God had repeatedly promised to protect and bless them (Lev. 26:3–13; Deut. 7:12–24), and the people took the divine promise seriously, knowing that the God who brought them out of Egypt would also fulfill His promises to the new generation. He was powerful enough to defeat all their enemies dwelling in the land. Therefore, they had nothing to fear from the gods of Canaan. When the Lord confronted the idols of the Canaanites, they became totally ineffective. Indeed, the union with the redeeming God manifested itself in social cohesion and oneness and in the defeat of the enemy. This book will show that Israel would continue to enjoy the blessings of the covenant as long as they remained faithful to the covenant Lord.

2. Unfaithfulness and Apostasy. The positive picture of Israel's obedience and faithfulness to the Lord in the opening verses of the book is soon undone by portrayals of marked disobedience and apostasy. The people not only forgot the Lord but worshiped and served the Baals and Asherahs (Judg. 3:7), thus blatantly rejecting the God of their fathers and of Moses and Joshua, who brought them out of Egypt. Some may have chosen to worship God using the Canaanite style of worship, thereby making the Lord (Yahweh) a Canaanite "Baal" (a term which meant "lord"). This illustrates the doleful principle that the spirit of rebellion often blinds human beings and makes them believe that they are in union with God even when their actions are totally against His will.

Others among the tribes simply decided to worship the Canaanite gods, thinking they were in charge of the fertility of the land. In sum, the covenant relationship was openly violated. When the human heart breaks away from the Lord, its true nature is manifested. There is a natural spirit of rebellion in the human heart that can be subdued only in union with the Savior (Ps. 51:5; Jer. 17:9). This corrupted condition of the human heart is repeatedly illustrated in the narratives of the book of Judges. The result was spiritual, social, and moral corruption and chaos.

The spiritual collapse brought social disruption with it. The social cohesiveness of the tribal confederation was drastically damaged. There were serious conflicts among the tribes. The first judges acted on behalf of the people against their external enemies, but some of the later judges killed their own brothers in battles that should never have taken place. Although the book begins with an emphasis on Israel as a united people who have the worship of God and trust in His promises at the center of their lives, it ends with a description of a fragmented people. All of them were doing what they considered to be good in their own eyes or opinion. The internal division was so intense that it was more damaging to the nation than the oppression inflicted on them by their common enemies. Judges clearly indicates that unfaithfulness to the Lord manifested itself in a veiled or open spirit of rebellion. This type of rebellion takes humans to unexpected depths of spiritual, social, and moral chaos.

3. Divine Wrath and Compassion. Judges makes clear that God is not indifferent to human conduct; He reacts to it through covenant blessings or curses. Israel's violation of the covenant provoked the wrath of the Lord, and consequently He sold them into the hands of their enemies (2:14). Love is God's fundamental attribute (1 John 4:8, 16), but love is not indifferent to sin and rebellion. What we call divine wrath is nothing else but God's love expressing itself in opposition to sin (see "The Wrath of God," p. 918). Every time Israel turned to idol worship, God delivered them into the hands of their enemies (Judg. 2:11–14; 3:7–8; 10:6), not simply to punish them but as an act of discipline aimed at curing them of idolatry. In the process, God revealed His power and glory over the pagan gods that Israel served by demonstrating that the idols were unable to deliver His people from oppression, suffering, and evil.

The book of Judges reveals a God full of compassion and mercy toward sinners. In the OT, divine mercy or compassion is a central theological theme. In Judges, even foreign oppression served as an instrument of God's grace to bring Israel back to Him (3:1–4). Whenever they cried out to the Lord, He heard them and sent a deliverer as a sign of His grace. In other words, what Israel experienced was not the uncontrollable power of their enemies but the response of a loving God seeking to preserve His covenant relationship with them. The hand of the Lord was actively present in the historical events that took place during the period of the Judges, and He used these events not only to discipline but also to manifest His deep love for Israel. The constant falling of Israel into idolatry was never more powerful than God's grace. God's grace always abounds over sin (Rom. 5:20).

4. Hope and Deliverance. While the word "hope" does not appear in the book of Judges, the concept is present throughout. Each time the Israelites suffered under an oppressor, they prayed to the Lord, hoping that He would hear and deliver them. And He always delivered His people. Hope here is inseparable from the conviction that God will fulfill His promise by coming as a Deliverer. The period of the Judges was depressing but not empty of hope. It showed that God was still in control and that He always preserves some individuals who remain faithful to Him (i.e., a remnant). Whenever there is a remnant, there is hope. In fact, the book anticipates the time when the true King shall arise in Israel, One who will deliver and rule in righteousness, the messianic King. Therefore, the book speaks to us who also live at a time when everyone is doing what seems good in his or her own eyes. It speaks of a hope that continues to give meaning to the life of believers who are still anticipating, longing, and praying for the coming of the King in order to experience ultimate deliverance.

COMMENTARY

1:1—3:6

INTRODUCTION

The first major section of the book of Judges tells the story of Israel's partial conquest of Canaan (1:1–26) and the unfaithfulness of Israel in leaving some nations in the land (1:27–2:5). This section also provides a theological summary of the experience of Israel during the period of the Judges after the death of Joshua, which will be developed throughout the rest of the book (2:6–3:6). While there seems to be a contrast between this story and the record of the conquest of the land of Canaan in the book of Joshua (Josh. 11:23), we must remember that the books of Joshua and Judges speak of two phases in the process of conquering the land. Under Joshua, in the first phase, the Israelites defeated the Canaanite armies without immediately occupying the whole land. The second phase of completely clearing out the inhabitants of Canaan after the land was divided was accomplished only partially by the individual tribes (cf. chap. 13). They failed to decisively follow through to completion what Joshua had begun; a failure that was regarded as a breach of the covenant they had made with God and a cause of permanent spiritual weakness (Judg. 2:1–3). A weak faith produces weak actions. Christians whose faith is weak do not always walk closely with the Lord but are content with a generally accepted standard of the Christian life and miss out on the full blessing of the gospel of Christ.

Conquest of the Land

Judges 1:1–21 recounts the success of the tribes of Judah and Simeon in conquering the southern part of Canaan. In this conquest of the hill country, Judah and Simeon were joined by the Kenites, relatives of Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, who were connected with the Midianites (v. 16; Num. 10:29). This was followed by the capture of central Canaan (Judg. 1:22–26).

1:1–21. Conquest of South Canaan. With God's help and following His directions, which were most likely given through the Urim and Thummim (v. 2), the tribes of Judah and Simeon defeated the Canaanites and Perizzites,

Chariots

Depictions of chariots have been found in Mesopotamia dating from the earliest periods. In Egypt, Joseph rode in the second chariot of the pharaoh (Gen. 41:43). The two-wheeled chariot became a war machine of great importance in the history of the ancient world. While the Iron Age in the Holy Land is generally dated from 1200 B.C. onwards, the use of iron was known in the ANE before that time (e.g., by the Hittites in the eighteenth to twelfth centuries B.C.). Their technology could easily have found its way to Canaan in the south.

a minor branch of the pre-Israelite population of Canaan, in the hill country of Judea. The mutilation of Adoni-Bezek ("Lord of Bezek") was a common fate of prisoners (v. 7) that both incapacitated them to shoot arrows and damaged their balance. Although Israel captured Jerusalem and destroyed it by fire (v. 8), it was rebuilt by the Jebusites (v. 21), who lived in it until the time of David (2 Sam. 5:6–7). Judah captured the cities in the hill country, but they were unable to drive out the inhabitants of the lowlands because they had chariots of iron (Judg. 1:19).

We can detect here a lack of faith on the part of Judah, because for God, iron chariots would not have presented a problem (cf. Josh. 11:6–9). Had He not specifically promised them success against the Canaanites (Num. 33:51–53; Deut. 9:3; 11:23) regardless of whether they had iron chariots (Josh. 17:17–18)? Judah, who had been chosen to confront the enemy first, failed to provide the example the other tribes needed for their conquest of the land. Their lack of faith led them to overestimate the difficulties, just as our lack of faith may prevent us from standing firm in the face of adverse opinions, the loss of worldly advantages or friendships, and the sacrifice of personal interests.

1:22–26. Conquest of Bethel in Central Canaan. The account of the conquest of central Canaan follows that of southern Canaan. The reference to the tribe/house of Joseph (v. 22) refers to the tribe of Ephraim and half of the tribe of Manasseh, the sons of Joseph (Gen. 41:50–52), who had received their inheritance in central Canaan (the other half of Manasseh had remained in the Transjordan; Num. 32:33). They attacked Bethel ("house of God"), where God gave to Jacob the dream of the ladder reaching into heaven (Gen. 28:10–19). It was one of the sanctuaries during the period of the Judges. After the death of Solomon and the division of the kingdom into the Southern and Northern Kingdoms, Bethel became one of the two national shrines of the Northern Kingdom (1 Kin. 12:28–29). The Israelites captured the city because God was with them (Judg. 1:22), not because of their own prowess. As in the case of Judah (vv. 2–4), the presence of the Lord was a guarantee of victory. When the spies asked a man leaving the city how to gain access to it (v. 24), they were most likely not inquiring in regard to the main city gate, which would have been visible to all, but to another entrance through which they could surprise the inhabitants and capture the city.

1:27—2:5

Unconquered Cities

The last part of chapter 1 is a record of failures on the part of the Israelites, emphasizing how remiss they were in completing the conquest of the land. The text gives two main reasons that for this state of affairs. First, the Canaanites were committed to retaining their land by fighting for it (v. 27), making it more difficult for the Israelites to possess the land. Second, the Israelites apparently concluded that they could gain some financial benefits by not exterminating them. They decided to impose a tribute on the Canaanites in exchange for keeping them alive. As a result, they did not completely drive them out or destroy them (vv. 28, 33, 35). Consequently, Israelites and Canaanites lived side by side in many parts of the land, contrary to what God had planned for His people (Deut. 20:16–17).

The Angel of the Lord

This name is never used for a human messenger or prophet but always for a celestial, supernatural being who first appeared in the Bible in the story of Hagar (Gen. 16:7–13). Although in some cases He seems to be differentiated from Yahweh (see Judg. 6:12), in a good number of cases the Angel of the Lord is identified with the Lord/Yahweh Himself. For instance, the Angel of God spoke to Jacob in a dream (Gen. 31:11) and immediately referred to Himself as "God" (Gen. 31:13). The Angel of the Lord appeared to Moses in the burning bush and identified Himself as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Ex. 3:2–6). In Judges 2:1–2, God's deliverance of Israel from Egypt is credited to the Angel of the Lord. This Angel also appeared to Gideon under the name "Angel of the LORD" (the Angel of Yahweh; 6:12, 14, 16). Interestingly, this Angel never described Himself as a messenger bringing a message to someone from the Lord. In Him, God was speaking directly to human beings; He was His own messenger. Many Christian believers have identified the Angel of the Lord as the preincarnate Christ—equal and yet distinct from God the Father. In this case, the term "Angel" refers to the function of God as His own "Messenger," and not to His nature as God.

It is obvious that the Israelites were careless in carrying out their God-given duty to cleanse the land of idolatry. The unbelief that had kept the former generation for forty years in the wilderness kept this generation from taking possession of the whole land. Similarly, we may have experienced deliverance from the dominion of Satan and the joy of salvation, yet a weak spiritual life may keep us from progressing further on the path of sanctification.

God responded to the unfaithfulness of Israel through a strong rebuke (Judg. 2:1–5). The Angel of the Lord appeared to them with two primary purposes. First, God made a covenant with the nation, and He had remained faithful to it while the Israelites violated it by making a covenant with the Canaanites. The contrast is between the faithfulness of God and the unfaithfulness of the people. Second, since the people had intentionally preserved the life of their enemy, the Lord granted His people what they had chosen to do—He would not drive the Canaanites out of the land as He had originally intended (Ex. 33:2; Deut. 11:23; Josh. 13:6). Rather, the Canaanites would constantly be irritants, scourges, and problems, and their gods would become a snare for the Israelites (Judg. 2:3; cf. Num. 33:55; Josh. 23:13).

The Angel of the Lord came from Gilgal, which means “a rolling away” because, upon entering the promised land at Gilgal, the Israelites had dedicated themselves to the Lord through circumcision and the celebration of the Passover (Josh. 5:9–10). In response to the Lord’s rebuke, the people broke out in loud weeping, which gave that place its name—Bochim (“weepers”). Here, weeping symbolizes regret and repentance.

2:6—3:6

From Faithfulness to Sin

Judges 2:6–10 is a recapitulation of events connected with Joshua’s death and briefly fills in the history from that time until the experience at Bochim, emphasizing the unfaithfulness of the people (vv. 11–23). The final passage of this introductory section to the book (3:1–6) lists the names of the Canaanite nations left in the land. The reason for their being left in the land is repeated and an additional reason is added. The Israelites’ apostasy is shown to have led to their intermarriage with the Canaanites.

2:6–10. Death of Joshua. The events at Bochim narrated in 2:1–5 happened after the death of Joshua. Verse 6 is a repetition of Joshua 24:28 and refers to Joshua sending off the people after the covenant ceremony at Shechem (Josh. 24:25–27). After narrating the first efforts of the tribes to consolidate their position in the land and the divine rebuke at Bochim, the author explains why it was necessary for God to raise up judges. In the rest of the chapter, he proceeds to show how God, through periods of oppression followed by times of deliverance, sought to turn Israel from their idolatry to obedience to His law.

The elders mentioned in Judges 2:7 were the tribal leaders also mentioned in Joshua 23:2 and 24:1. The emphasis of Judges 2:6–10 is on the importance of knowing the Lord through a personal experience. Most of these elders outlived Joshua because they were all younger than him. His and Caleb’s contemporaries all died in the desert (Num. 14:29–30). The elders had been young when they witnessed all the mighty deeds God performed during Israel’s journey from Egypt to the promised land and were well acquainted with the saving power of God in their personal experience. During their leadership, they inspired the Israelites to obey and remain loyal to Him. Once the loyal elders died, the new generation did not know the Lord. They did not remember what God had done for them in the past and did not identify themselves with the faith of their forefathers. They chose to serve the Canaanite gods. Through the work of the judges, God tried to reveal to the new generation His identity and His power to save, hoping that they would come to know and serve Him.

2:11–23. Israel’s Unfaithfulness. Choosing to ignore who the Lord was led the children of Israel to serve the Baals, which was evil in God’s sight (v. 11). Baal, in the singular, was the name of the Canaanite storm and weather god—the plural form refers to the many local manifestations of the weather god (see “Baal Worship,” p. 493). By disregarding the Lord’s requirement to destroy the pagan altars (Ex. 34:11–16) and to not make a covenant with the Canaanites, the Israelites violated the covenant and the covenant Lord abandoned them. The result was that they could no longer withstand their enemies (Judg. 2:14). The language of delivering and selling His people to His enemies makes it clear that the oppression of the people was not the result of God’s absence of power to protect them. This language places the responsibility on the covenant violators. The enemy did not take them from God’s hands by force. He simply abandoned them, and they fell into the hands of their enemies (v. 14).

Nevertheless, when the Israelites showed signs of repentance and remorse and cried to the Lord, He raised up judges who delivered them (v. 16). He might have abandoned them in justice, but God in His mercy took pity on them. The abandonment was not final, and therefore His anger was set aside. His mercy knows no limits if the human heart, moved by the Spirit, seeks for it. Unfortunately, as soon as the God-given judge was dead and the oppression of their enemies was a distant memory, the Israelites again acted like a prostitute with other gods (v. 17). Harlotry is a frequent metaphor in the Bible for spiritual apostasy (Ex. 34:15; Deut. 31:16; 1 Chr. 5:25; Jer. 3:6). In the prophetic books, God is at times depicted as the husband of Israel (Is. 54:5; Jer. 31:32; Hos. 2:2), and Israel and Judah are presented as faithless sisters who play the harlot, being unfaithful to their beloved (Ezek. 23). Yet, harlotry in Judges is not just a metaphor; the worship of heathen deities in the ANE was frequently accompanied by sexual immorality. God decided to use the people left in the land to test the fidelity of the Israelites (Judg. 2:22; 3:1, 4) and show them that the way of apostasy does not pay. God tested the Israelites to strengthen their character.

The sin of the people was in sparing the Canaanites, and their punishment was that God did not drive out the Canaanites; in a sense they were beaten with their own rod, as a child is disciplined for his or her own good (Prov. 13:24). Through this testing, God was endeavoring to bring His people back to Him. Throughout human history, God has “tested” His people in order for them to reveal the depth of their faith or to help them grow in grace and love.

3:1–6. The Nations Remaining in the Land.

While in 2:22 and 3:4 the purpose of having the Canaanite nations in the land is to test character, faith, and obedience, in 3:2 the purpose is to train or accustom them to war. Thus, the additional reason given in this passage for God not driving out the nations was to teach the new generation of Israelites how to conduct war (vv. 1–2). God is able to transform our mistakes into something good for us. Following Joshua’s conquest of Canaan, a considerable period of rest must have followed, during which the younger generations lived in relative comfort. Since Israel was to be a nation living among many others and seeking to conquer and expand, it would have to learn to war against them in order for God to fulfill His plan for all of them (Gen. 12:1–3). The Israelite hope included the expectation of a time when no one will train for war under the leadership of the Messiah (Is. 2:4).

This passage concludes by saying that the Israelites lived among the various people groups in the land (Judg. 3:5). One sad result of this situation was mixed marriages, something expressly forbidden by God (v. 6; Ex. 34:15–16; Deut. 7:3; Josh. 23:12). Marriage contracts in those days included a mutual recognition of the religions of the two parties. Thus, it was impossible for an Israelite to marry a Canaanite and maintain the purity of his or her faith. This was illustrated graphically in the life of Solomon, whose wives led him into idol worship (1 Kin. 11:4). Today, some tragic results could be avoided if Paul’s counsel in 2 Corinthians 6:14–17 against marriages between believers and unbelievers were heeded.

3:7—8:35

RULE OF THE EARLY JUDGES

The second major section of Judges introduces us to the actual narrative of the book. It describes the rule of the first four major judges in some detail (Othniel, Ehud, Deborah, and Gideon), with Shamgar mentioned only briefly. We will follow their stories, noting the repeated refrain of Israel’s return to evil (Judg. 3:7, 12; 4:1; 6:1) and how upon their repentance God in His mercy raised up a deliverer. The details vary from case to case, but the basic outline is always the same.

3:7–11

Othniel

The account of the first judge provides the formula for the repeated pattern in which the main episodes of the judges are set: the apostasy of the people, the time of their servitude under the oppressor, their cry of distress and repentance, their deliverance by the judge appointed by God, and the length of rest that followed their deliverance.

The sin of Israel is described in three ways: Israel did evil in God’s sight, they forgot the Lord, and they served the Baals (3:7). The idea that Israel was doing evil in the Lord’s estimation runs throughout the book as an indictment against the people, meaning that in the judgment of the Lord—after He examined and evaluated their lives—their religious and moral life was atrocious (2:11; 3:12; 4:1; 6:1; 10:6; 13:1). Surprisingly, the Israelites did what was right in their own eyes—that is, as they saw fit and according to their own subjective estimation (17:6; 21:25)—rather than doing what was right in the sight of the Lord—that is, according to His estimation. The opinion they had of their own behavior was radically different from God’s opinion. Indeed, they forgot the Lord (3:7). This is a willful act by which God is no longer taken into consideration in one’s life; His will is ignored. The same idea is expressed with the phrase “forsook the Lord” (10:6). Israel, the wife of the Lord, abandoned Him and served the Baals. They abandoned or forgot their God and Redeemer. Consequently, God abandoned them into the hands of their enemies. His judgment against them corresponded to the spiritual and moral crime they committed—because they abandoned Him, He also abandoned them (cf. v. 13).

Because of Israel’s apostasy, the Lord sold them into the hands of Cushan-Rishathaim, king of ’aram-naharayim (“Aram between the rivers”; i.e., the Tigris and Euphrates) or Mesopotamia (v. 8) for eight years. The identity of this king is unknown. His name, most likely corrupted by his victims, means something like “Cushan-of-double-wickedness.” The specific nature of the oppression is not mentioned, but, as indicated by the use of the verb “to serve,” it would have included paying heavy tributes that deprived the Israelites of enjoying the fruit of their work. Toward the end of their eight years of distress, the Israelites turned to Yahweh, their God, asking for help and hoping for a deliverer. Affliction often causes those who may have cared little about God to cry out to Him for help (v. 9). This is an agonizing cry emitted by a person who is in deep distress. And God in His mercy heard their cry and raised up Othniel, Caleb’s nephew (1:13; 3:9). Caleb’s daughter Achsah was given to him as wife for capturing the town of Debir (Josh. 15:15–19). The spirit of the Lord came on him (Judg. 3:10); the same is said of Gideon (6:34), Jephthah (11:29), and Samson (13:25; 14:6, 19; 15:14). These judges were empowered by God to fulfill their responsibilities; otherwise, deliverance would not have been possible.

Othniel was one of the older Israelites who had seen the works of the Lord during the conquest of Canaan. Now, endowed with the spirit of God, he became the leader who first judged Israel; that is, he reproved and reformed them, and then, under God’s command, he went out and defeated the oppressors (3:10). Humans and God worked together to overcome the enemy in a literal and spiritual battle. The worst enemy is sin in the camp; when it is conquered, the enemy on the outside is easier to deal with. For forty years, as long as Othniel lived, there was peace in the land (v. 11). It could have lasted forever had they kept close to God and done their duty.

3:12–30

Ehud

Humans tend to easily forget God’s goodness toward them. After the death of faithful Othniel, the Israelites apostatized again and returned to what is natural to humans—doing evil in God’s sight (v. 12). The Lord, who is depicted in Judges as the Sovereign Lord over the nations, strengthened Eglon king of Moab and gave him power over Israel (v. 12). In this particular case, God provided for Eglon the military superiority he needed to overcome Israel. Eglon probably credited such superiority not to God but to his ability to form a coalition with the Ammonites and the Amalekites against God’s people. But Eglon’s oppression of God’s people was not God’s last word. Deliverance would come at the appropriate time through a God-chosen instrument.

Eglon (“little bull”), the king of Moab, and Ehud the Benjamite were both used by God (Judg. 3:12, 15): one to punish Israel, the other to deliver them. Eglon took possession of the City of Palms (i.e., Jericho), which lay within the territory of the tribe of Benjamin, from which Ehud came. Jericho at that time was probably no more than an occupied oasis. The city of Jericho was destroyed by the Israelites under Joshua around 1410 B.C. (Josh. 6) and according to 1 Kings 16:34 it was not rebuilt until the time of Ahab (874–853 B.C.).

The assassination of Eglon (Judg. 3:16–26) was well planned by Ehud. He brought to Eglon the required tribute (Heb. minkhah, also used to refer to an offering to God; 13:23; Lev. 9:4) and then left. The stone images mentioned in 3:19 were idols (Heb. pesil always refers to carved pagan cult images; cf. Deut. 7:5; 2 Kin. 17:41; 2 Chr. 33:19). The reason for mentioning this place where he dismissed his helpers and returned to visit Eglon is not obvious in the text. We perhaps can infer from the story itself that the two mentions of these pagan images serve to emphasize their impotence before Ehud, God’s instrument. The gods should have protected the king, but they could not. Firstly, they could have prevented the assassination when Ehud, in front of them, dismissed his servants and returned to Eglon. And secondly, these idols could have punished Ehud when he walked by them after the assassination. The message was clear that these idols were useless and incapable of derailing God's purpose. The God of Israel was superior to them. Ehud's ostensible reason for returning to see Eglon was that he had a secret message from the Lord for the king. The "message" was simply the assassination itself, a message of judgment against Eglon and the Moabites. After Ehud led a short war, with a great slaughter of the Moabites, the land of Israel had peace and rest for eighty years (Judg. 3:30). Thus, the experience of true rest is found only in the Lord.

Shamgar

Not much is known of Shamgar, the son of Anath. He is connected to the story of Ehud by the author's comments that he came after Ehud and performed the same function of saving Israel from their enemies. Anath is the name of a Canaanite goddess, well known from the ancient tablets from Ugarit in Syria. Thus, Shamgar's mother may have been a Canaanite woman who was named after the goddess. Even if he was a Canaanite, his victory over the Philistines delivered Israel. There is no indication of how long he ruled, but the phrase "in the days of Shamgar" (5:6) suggests that it must have been for a lengthy time. His activity and influence seem to have been limited to the south of Israel, where the Philistines made repeated incursions, because the only exploit we hear about involves them. He killed six hundred Philistines with an ox goad (3:31), which is a long stick with an iron point at one end and a flat chisel-like iron at the other. It was not this unusual weapon but God's power that gave him the victory.

4:1—5:31

Deborah

At the end of chapter 3, we read that the land had peace and rest for eighty years (v. 30). We do not know when Ehud died, but a later generation no longer remembered what God had done through him. The long years of peace and prosperity should have confirmed the Israelites in the way of the Lord. Instead, it made them secure and indulgent. They did evil in the eyes of God (4:1), as their ancestors had done. The result was the Canaanite oppression (vv. 1–3) and the deliverance through Deborah (vv. 4–16). We also find a vivid description of the death of Sisera (vv. 7–24) and Deborah's song of victory (5:1–31).

4:1–3. Canaanite Oppression. The natural human tendency is to give in to evil desires that are difficult to restrain unless the heart is governed by a love for God. This time, the Lord sold the Israelites into the hand of Jabin, king of Canaan, who reigned in Hazor (4:2; see commentary on 2:11–23). The chief city in Galilee, Hazor was one of only three cities that were recorded as

Eglon's Coalition Against God's People

The Moabites were descendants of Lot (Gen. 19:30–38). They inhabited the plateau east of the Dead Sea (4,300 ft. [1,310 m] above it) between the river Arnon and the brook Zered in the south. At the time of the Exodus, they refused to allow the Israelites to pass through their territory (Judg. 11:17–18). During the period of the Judges and in the time of the monarchy, the Israelites repeatedly fought with the Moabites (3:14; 2 Sam. 8:2; 2 Kin. 3:24).

The Ammonites were also descendants of Lot (Gen. 19:30–38) and lived to the north of the Moabites between the rivers Arnon and Jabbok. At the Exodus, God did not give the land of the Ammonites to Israel (Deut. 2:19), but there was fighting repeatedly between Israel and Ammon (Judg. 3:13; 11:32; 1 Sam. 11:1–2, 11; 2 Sam. 10:6–14).

The Amalekites, a nomadic desert tribe, were descendants of Amalek, a grandson of Esau (Gen. 36:15–16). They dwelled in the area of the Negeb, south of the Dead Sea as far as Mount Sinai. The Israelites first encountered the Amalekites during their journey from Egypt to Canaan (Num. 14:25, 45; Deut. 25:17–18). They fought with Israel in the time of the Judges and later with Saul (1 Sam. 15:2–3) and David (30:11–20).

being burned by Joshua during the conquest of the promised land. The other two were Jericho and Ai (Josh. 6:24; 8:28). In time, however, Hazor was rebuilt and its king, Jabin, terrorized the Israelites in northern Canaan. This Jabin should not be confused with the Jabin of Joshua's time, a hundred years earlier (Josh. 11). Jabin was probably a popular family name like Amenhotep, Thutmose, and Ramesses in Egypt. His general, Sisera, lived in Harosheth of the Gentiles. A great number of Gentiles, it seems, had lived in this particular place, the location of which is unknown today. The fact that he had nine hundred chariots points to a place in the Valley of Jezreel rather than in the hills or mountains.

4:4–16. Deborah and Barak's Victory over Sisera. Deborah is unique among the judges not only because she was a woman but particularly for her unique role within Israel: she was a prophetess with juridical functions. There are only two other persons in the OT who were both prophets and judges: Moses (Ex. 18:16) and Samuel (1 Sam. 7:6, 15–17). This indicates that Deborah was the primary leader of Israel. As prophetess and judge, she resided in a centralized location that made it easier for Israelites all over Israel to come to her. As a prophet, she called Barak to be the military leader of the people and muster the troops (Judg. 4:6) and assured him victory. If Barak was unwilling to go on his own, it was because he understood that Deborah was, as prophetess and judge, the leader of Israel, and he wanted her by his side. She, as the leader of Israel and like Moses (see Ex. 17:8–9), was not personally involved in the fight, but her leadership in battle, based on cultural convictions, would take away the glory of the victory from Barak because a woman would defeat Sisera and another woman, Jael, would kill him.

Jael and her husband belonged to the house of Heber the Kenite, which at that time enjoyed peaceful relations with Jabin, the king of Hazor. The Kenites were a Canaanite tribe that was in some way related to the Moabites. Moses's father-in-law is called a Kenite and a Moabite (Judg. 1:16; Num. 10:29). The Kenite family joined the Israelites, and they settled in the land of Judah after the conquest. Perhaps this connection with the Israelites moved Jael to break the peace covenant with Jabin by killing Sisera in a dramatic way.

4:17–24. The Death of Sisera. Further evidence of Deborah's close connection with God is that her prophecy came true when the Israelite army defeated the armies of Jabin and when his military leader was killed by Jael. Since there were peaceful relations between the Kenites and Jabin, Sisera probably felt safe in the tent of Jael, who treated him very well at first. She seemed to have treated him like a child by giving him milk and covering him with a blanket to put him to sleep. He would not wake up from his sleep. When Barak found Sisera, he was lying dead on the floor of the tent. God uses whomever He wants to accomplish His purpose—Deborah: a woman, a judge, and a prophetess; Barak: a man who would go to war under the leadership of a woman, breaking cultural barriers; and Jael: a woman who was not an Israelite.

5:1–31. The Song of Deborah. Israel's triumph was celebrated with a victory song composed by Deborah and Barak in a standard literary form of the time. The wonderful deliverance by the hand of God from Jabin's oppression would be better and longer remembered through song than narrative prose; in this case we have both. The song divides itself into different stanzas, according to the subject matter addressed:

5:2–3 Introduction—The song begins with a general call to praise the Lord. God is praised because the leaders and the people worked together under His leadership and were victorious in battle. The unity of the people was the result of the grace of God and should have moved them to praise Him. This unity was a manifestation of God's blessing and was recognized as such.

5:4–5 The Coming of Yahweh—Deborah describes the majestic appearance of God from Edom in the east, coming to deliver His people. God manifested His presence through natural phenomena that contributed to the victory of His people. Deborah draws on the historical memory of the Exodus story, when God manifested Himself on Mount Sinai with thunder, lightning, and earthquake. With powerful poetic expressions she recounts that the rainstorm which broke over Sisera and his army was not an ordinary storm but was unleashed by Yahweh. This description of the coming of the Lord with power to deliver His people is an intrinsic element of the biblical hope and projects itself into the time of the end when deliverance from evil will be consummated.

5:6–8 Conditions Prior to the Battle—Deborah describes the sad conditions that prevailed in the country during the time of oppression before she arose as a mother in Israel. She mentions Shamgar and Jael as exceptions who left their mark during those dark days, when the highways were untraveled because there was no trade and commerce (v. 6). The fields were laid waste and the villagers (the meaning of this Hebrew word is uncertain) were inactive (v. 7). Because they worshiped pagan idols, the Lord deprived them of a peaceful life. Instead of the administration of justice in the city gates, there was war. The enemy appeared in their city gates, and the Israelites had neither arms nor the spirit to help themselves.

5:9-11 *A Call to Participate—As a good leader, Deborah praised God for the unity of the leaders and the people to fight against the enemy. Under her there were also other princes, rulers of Israel whose example influenced the people, making them willing to support her call to war. She called on those who rode on white donkeys (i.e., those of rank and authority) and those who walked along the road (i.e., the rest of the people) to offer thanks to God for this great deliverance. They were encouraged to draw water in peace and rehearse the acts of the Lord in gratefulness when they returned to their city gates to resume a normal life.

5:12-18 *The Mustering of the Tribes—The mobilization of the people began with a challenge to Israel's leaders to arise and prepare for war. The tribes from which people willingly came were Ephraim, Benjamin, Machir (the western half of Manasseh), Zebulun, and Issachar. Reuben, Gilead (the eastern half of Manasseh), Dan, and Asher are criticized for neglecting their fraternal duty. Zebulun and Naphthali receive special mention because their troops constituted the main body of Barak's army.

5:19-23 *The Battle at the Waters of Megiddo—This stanza is about the battle itself, especially about God's decisive intervention. In this poem, the battle is no longer between Barak and Sisera but between Yahweh and the kings of Canaan and between heaven and earth. The waters of Megiddo most likely refer to the River Kishon, which apparently played an important role in the battle. The God who controlled nature was not Baal but Yahweh. The stars in their courses, which the Canaanites credited with controlling the weather, were directed by Yahweh to fight against Sisera by causing a mighty storm that swept away his chariots. The Angel of the Lord said to "curse Meroz" (v. 23). Meroz was probably a city near the field of battle that refused to get involved in the battle and in the pursuit of the fleeing enemy.

5:24-27 *The Death of Sisera—The slaying of Sisera is vividly recounted. In contrast to the curse on Meroz, Jael is blessed for her deed.

Though not an Israelite, she preferred the friendship of Yahweh's people to that of their enemies. Her treachery is described in heroic terms.

5:28-30 *Sisera's Mother—At the end of the poem, there are some ironic contrasts: the anxious wait of Sisera's mother and her ladies is contrasted with Jael's victory and honor. The mother's dark forebodings are contrasted with the cheerful explanations for the delay by her wisest ladies (v. 29). Finally, there is the contrast between the expectations of the women and the cruel reality the reader already knows.

5:31 *Epilogue—Deborah concludes with a prayer for the destruction of all God's enemies and the exaltation of all His friends. The consequences of this victory were such that the land had peace and rest for forty years. In this victory over Jabin, God, as we already indicated, used different instruments. He raised Deborah, who as a judge led the people and gathered the troops. He selected Barak as the leader of the troops and also used Jael, a member of a foreign and weak tribe.

6:1-8:35 Gideon

As a result of renewed apostasy, Israel's troubles were repeated. This time they were oppressed by the Midianites (6:1-6). God rebuked His people (vv. 7-10) and sent an angel to Gideon (vv. 11-24), who destroyed Baal's altar (vv. 25-32), gathered an army (6:33-7:8), and found victory in God (7:9-8:21). Unfortunately, before he died his imperfections emerged (vv. 22-35).

6:1-6. Midianite Oppression. After forty years, the spirit of Deborah was a distant memory and the generation that had grown up during those forty years fell back into the sin of idolatry. This time God delivered them into the hands of the Midianites, who oppressed them for seven years (v. 1; cf. Lev. 26:21). Sadly, sin is always accompanied by its evil consequences. The plight of the Israelites under the Midianites and their allies, the people of the east, was worse than under their previous oppressors. The Israelites hid in dens and caves and barely had enough food to survive because of the devastation the Midianites inflicted on the Israelites by plundering their fields and storehouses and carrying off their animals. This was a military tactic that forced the Israelites to think mainly about how to obtain food and not about war. It was a way of breaking up the willingness of the people to plan and execute an act of insurrection.

6:7-10. Israel Rebuked by a Prophet. Before God sent a deliverer, He sent a prophet to reprove Israel for their sins, lead them to repentance, and get them ready for their deliverance. The unknown prophet reminded them of God's saving power as manifested in His work of delivering them from Egypt and saving them from those who oppressed them in the land of Canaan. The prophet refreshed the memory of the Israelites in order for them to trust and come to know God. Forgetting how the Lord had delivered them in the past weakened their knowledge of God, their dependence on His power, and their understanding of His great mercy, thus making them more vulnerable to idolatry. They had forgotten that God was able to fulfill His promises as manifested when He gave them the land. Now as they prepared to face the Amorites and their gods, the prophet appealed to the Israelites to trust and obey the Lord based on what He had done for them in the past. The prophet did not ignore the sin of the people; he charged them with idolatry because they worshiped the gods of the Amorites. Although this prophet did not explicitly promise a deliverer, his message from the Lord was the preamble for the coming deliverance; the Lord had not forsaken them.

6:11-24. The Angel of the Lord Visits Gideon. The person chosen to deliver Israel was Gideon, the son of Joash the Abiezrite, a descendant of Manasseh (Josh. 17:2). Joash was a worshipper of Baal. Gideon was commissioned by the Angel of Yahweh (v. 11; see "The Angel of the Lord," p. 395), identified in v. 14 with Yahweh Himself. The Angel of the Lord came to a particular tree (identified variously as a terebinth or oak) that apparently was a landmark in the local area. There are several places in Scripture where significant events are associated with trees (4:5; Gen. 18:1; Josh. 24:26; Mark 11:13-14, 20-23), but no particular reason is given for this practice. One can perhaps guess that in a land that was very hot during the summer, the shade of a tree would be an appealing place for a meeting. The Angel found Gideon threshing wheat, not on a threshing floor, which would have been the usual place, but in the winepress where no one would suspect to find wheat. Fear of the Midianites had crippled the economy and the daily lives of the Israelites.

Gideon's commissioning is similar to the call of Moses in Exodus 3. Both were hiding from the enemy, both were working for their father figures (father and father-in-law), and both received the same word of authorization (Judg. 6:14; Ex. 3:12). Like Moses, Gideon claimed that he was not qualified for the task (Judg. 6:15; Ex. 3:11); but again, like Moses, he received the assurance of divine aid and a sign affirming the call (Judg. 6:16-21; Ex. 3:12). The Lord equipped him with all the necessary qualifications for the execution of his commission. If the Lord calls someone to perform a task, He also provides the means to do it.

Israel's Oppressors During the Time of Gideon

The Midianites, seminomadic Bedouin, were the descendants of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:1-6). Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, was a Midianite priest (Ex. 2:16-21). The elders of Moab and Midian hired Balaam to curse Israel on their way to Canaan (Num. 22-24), so the Lord gave the Midianites into the hands of the Israelites, who defeated them (31:1-11). In Isaiah 9:4 and 10:26, the victory of Gideon over Midian in Judges 6-8 is cited as a precedent for the coming defeat of the enemies of the kingdom of Judah.

People of the east (cf. Gen. 25:6) were nomadic groups that migrated from the Arabian Desert, often raiding settled communities on both sides of the river Jordan. Any of the people living to the east of the Israelites could be included in this designation.

The Amorites (Amurru in extra-biblical sources) appear very early in secular history. In Scripture they denote the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan whom the Israelites were to destroy (Gen. 15:16; Deut. 20:17). In Joshua 10, five kings of the Amorites were defeated by Joshua, and one of those five was the king of Jerusalem (v. 5). Thus, Ezekiel 16:3 states that Jerusalem had an Amorite father and a Hittite mother. According to 2 Samuel 21, the remaining Amorites were the Gibeonites (v. 2), on whom Saul inflicted a great slaughter for which David later made atonement (vv. 3-14).

6:25–32. Gideon Destroys the Altar of Baal.

Before Gideon could deliver Israel from the Midianites, he had to be a reformer. That same night, God commanded Gideon to destroy the cult of Baal and restore the worship of Yahweh in Israel (vv. 25–26). Both Baal and Asherah were fertility gods worshiped through sexual union with male and female temple prostitutes. Asherah was often represented by a pole-shaped image, which, in this story, Gideon was explicitly instructed to destroy. The story points to the impotence of Baal to defend himself against the attack of a person commissioned by the Lord to destroy his altar and replace it with an altar dedicated to the Lord (vv. 31–32).

6:33—7:8. Gideon Gathers an Army.

While Gideon restored the worship of Yahweh, the Midianites and the eastern people made another raid into Israel and camped in the fertile Valley of Jezreel. We do not know whether it was the vast army of the enemy in the Valley of Jezreel or the burden of the enormous responsibility that made Gideon's faith falter, but he needed again the assurance that God was with him. His two-fold test with the fleece, progressing from the unusual (the dry ground around a wet fleece) to the inexplicable (the dry fleece on the wet ground), is a reminder that God is patient with our weak faith and that He is even willing to go along with our sometimes trivial and arbitrary "tests" in our search for assurance as we follow His call.

Gideon and his army encamped by the spring of Harod at the foot of Mount Gilead (7:1). The land of Gilead is on the eastern side of the Jordan river; however, a strong spring that was named "the well of Harod" has been found on the northern slope of Mt. Gilboa on the western side of the Jordan river, leading most Bible scholars to consider Mount Gilead to be the same as Mount Gilboa, where Saul later died at the eastern end of the Valley of Jezreel (1 Sam. 31). The army of the Midianites would have been on the north side of the range. Before Gideon was able to march out of the camp to meet the enemy, the Lord reduced the number of Israelites in two stages from 32,000 to 300. The first stage allowed those who were fearful and khared ("trembling"; Judg. 7:3) to go home. The spring seems to have taken its Hebrew name, kharod (v. 1), from this event. Perhaps their lack of faith in the Lord would have made them ineffective warriors. The true reason for reducing the size of the army was to clearly indicate that the victory would be from the Lord. The second stage in reducing the size of the army involved separating from the rest the three hundred who lapped water like dogs (v. 6). The three hundred used their hands as a dog uses its tongue to scoop up the water while they remained on their feet, perhaps watchful and prepared for any emergency, while the rest knelt down to drink; that is, they were mainly interested in their thirst. Nothing prevents the Lord from saving by "many or by few" (1 Sam. 14:6).

7:9—8:3. Gideon's Victory.

Having watched his army dwindle to almost nothing, Gideon may have had more doubts about defeating the enemy. God encouraged him to move ahead anyway, despite his doubts, for He was going to be with him. But God understood the inner feelings of Gideon and allowed, without condemnation, for events to develop that would help him overcome his fears. By arranging for Gideon to witness, through the soldiers' dreams and conversation, the fear and terror in the Midianite camp, God strengthened Gideon's faith and reassured him of victory. This is a remarkable insight into the way that God patiently waits for us, even while He urges us to take Him at His word and move ahead.

Gideon divided the army into three companies and provided them with trumpets (ram's horns) and pitchers containing unlit torches. The reason for the pitcher is not given, but it could be that its function was to increase the level of noise when broken. Apparently, none of the soldiers had a sword or at least none were provided for them. The reason for this most strange phenomenon was that the Lord Himself would fight for Israel, using the enemies' swords as they killed each other. Certainly, the military strategy was uncommon but, in this case, highly effective. The Israelites were required only to make a disturbance by shouting and breaking the pitchers and lighting the torches, giving the impression of being a huge army, but it would be the Lord who would instill fear in the enemy, defeating them from within.

Intertribal relationships were a major challenge for Israel during the time of the Judges. The Ephraimites' jealousy of Gideon's leadership and stunning success showed that they were less interested in God's miraculous deliverance than in sharing the glory and the spoils that God's deliverance brought. Fortunately, as the text indicates, they limited their reaction to a sharp rebuke rather than an actual fight, which might, in those times, have been expected. This is the first time in Judges that the threat of a civil war emerges, but it is not the last. Although invited at the last moment to help pursue the Midianites, the Ephraimites went out and assisted Gideon. It was after their involvement in the war that they argued with Gideon, whose answer is a great example of excellent leadership and self-denial and shows that envy is best handled by humility; as Scripture says, a gentle response defuses anger (Prov. 15:1).

8:4–21. Pursing the Enemy. Gideon's pursuit of the fleeing Midianites had two purposes. First, he wanted to complete the defeat of the enemy. While 120,000 had been killed, 15,000 had escaped (v. 10). Second, he was determined to avenge the murder of his brothers (v. 19). Believing that God was still on his side, he took only the three hundred men with him who had witnessed the miracle of the Midianite defeat. Having limited resources is not a problem for a God who can use the few and the many to accomplish His purposes.

The arrogance and rudeness of the men of Succoth/Sukkoth and Penuel/Peniel in refusing to provide food to Gideon may have been based on craven self-interest. Penuel (initially spelled "Peniel" in Gen. 32:31; the term means "the face of God") is an Israelite town five miles (8 km) east of Succoth along the River Jabbok. It was in this place that Jacob had his life-changing encounter with God when he wrestled with God "face to face" (Gen. 32:22–32). Because Gideon had not yet caught two of the kings of Midian, the leaders of the two towns cynically ignored God's obvious presence in Gideon's campaign and cast their lot with those they thought likely to win the contest. They chose to join the ones who would be totally defeated. Gideon showed his continuing dependence on God by withholding judgment on their arrogance until God, not his own military prowess, vindicated him in the capture of the Midianite kings.

According to Judges 8:4, Gideon's triumph over the remaining 15,000 Midianites who fled further east was again accomplished by God using only the 300 men. The strategy was similar: surprise and rout. We are not told whether Gideon's small army had to engage in physical fighting on this occasion or whether the rout occurred in the same way as the first one: confusion and self-destruction. Either way, it completely vindicated Gideon's faith, and his return to Penuel doubtlessly struck terror into the men of that town. Gideon kept his word and tore down the tower but also killed the men of the town. Israelites were now killing Israelites, suggesting that Gideon saw himself now as a military leader ready to inflict punishment as he saw fit. We are not told why the judgement was harsher than what Gideon would soon execute on the men of Succoth. It is not unreasonable to surmise that at least some of the men decided to protect the tower, and in destroying the tower Gideon had to dispose of them. The men of Succoth, on the other hand, received exactly the punishment, unusual as it was, that Gideon had promised.

The judgment on the Midianites was completed with the execution of the two kings. They had murdered Gideon's large family and would receive the just reward for their heinous act. Perhaps, in his righteous anger, Gideon wanted to further humiliate the kings at the moment of their death by having them killed by a boy. If that was his purpose, he was disappointed, and the two prisoners, to their credit, honorably reminded Gideon that conducting an execution is not a job for a boy. Gideon killed the kings and took the spoils of war.

8:22–35. Gideon's Wisdom and Weaknesses.

The words of the kings describing Gideon's appearance as that of the son of a king, as well as the recognition he had received by delivering Israel from the Midianites, may have moved some Israelite leaders to ask him to rule over them. This request possibly meant that he would become their king and establish a dynasty or hereditary kingship. Gideon's refusal was based on a theological conviction: God was the king of Israel. Gideon's refusal of the offered crown is an excellent indication of his noble intent in following the Lord and of Gideon's strength of character. It takes a strong person to resist flattery from a crowd that wishes to confer power. However, at the very moment of his greatest, God-given achievement, Gideon made what seemed a small concession to vanity by asking for some of the plunder to make an ephod, a priestly garment used to consult the Lord through the Urim and Thummim (Ex. 28:6–14). Gideon's beautiful ephod became an idol probably because it appeared as a way of access to God. While the text is vague, Gideon's desire to make an ephod led to idolatry.

Even if Gideon himself didn't take that step, his community eventually treated the ephod as an idol. Gideon's unwise action had dire consequences for the people of Israel. It became a snare to Gideon and his family (lit. "house"; Judg. 8:27). Because it caused the people to abandon the legitimate sanctuary and worship his ephod, it proved to be damaging to his family and to the nation. This illustrates what happens when a great leader uses his influence to take others down a wrong path. It should alert us to keep our eyes on the One who is above any human leader and who will never mislead us. We can only put our ultimate trust in God and not on imperfect human beings. Spiritual leaders should always abide by the will of God.

8:29–35. The Collapse of the Reformation.

After Gideon's death, the new generation who had not experienced the miraculous deliverance from the oppression by the Midianites returned to the worship of Baal, even making Baal-Berith ("Baal of the covenant") their god (8:33). By regarding Baal as a god who had made a covenant with Israel, they had substituted him for Yahweh, the real covenant God (Deut. 4:23), resulting in a false system of worship. No one can live on the religious experience of one's ancestors. Each one must have a living relationship with God. In the case of the newer generation of Israelites, they forgot not only God but also what Gideon had done for them. It is often the sad case that those who turn away from God also mistreat other human beings; their humanness is damaged because only God can renew His image in us.

9:1–57

ISRAEL'S EXPERIMENT WITH MONARCHY

Chapter 9 further develops the story of Gideon and his family. Abimelech, son of Gideon, became king after murdering his brothers (vv. 1–6). Jotham's fable doomed Abimelech and Shechem (vv. 7–21), and it was soon fulfilled (vv. 22–57).

9:1–6

Abimelech's Conspiracy

The apostasy of Israel after the death of Gideon was not punished by the invasion of some neighboring people, as previously, but by a bloody civil strife. God did not call Abimelech (sometimes transliterated as "Abimelek," meaning "my father is king") to deliver Israel from any oppression. He was Gideon's son by a concubine in Shechem, about fifty miles (80.5 km) north of Jerusalem. Shechem was the place where Abram first built an altar to Yahweh after arriving in Canaan (Gen. 12:6–7). With support from his mother's family and the leaders in Shechem and with money from the pagan temple, Abimelech conspired against Gideon's family. His appeal revolved around the natural assumption that some individual from Gideon's dynasty would rule over the people of Shechem, and since that was inevitable, it should at least be someone from the families of Shechem. Consequently, he murdered all but one of his half-brothers, Gideon's other sons. Following Abimelech's utterly wicked deed, the people of Shechem and Beth-Millo crowned him king beside the terebinth tree (thought to be an oak) at the pillar in Shechem (Judg. 9:6). The pillar most likely was the witness stone that Joshua set up in Shechem (Josh. 24:26–27).

9:7–21

Jotham's Fable

Jotham, the only survivor among the sons of Gideon, confronted the people of Shechem with the nature of their choice and warned them of their fate by telling a fable about the trees of the forest seeking to appoint a king over them. According to the parable, the trees began their search by asking other trees, based on their size, to be king over all them. They began with the olive tree and then went to the fig tree. Finally, they went to the vine. The trees' response was always the same: each of them was pleased with its God-given role in nature—something that Abimelech was not willing to be. Finally, the trees went to the thorny bush, which is commonly found on the hills of the land. The fable becomes ironical when the bramble asked the tall trees to come and find protection under its shadow—things that the thorny bramble could not provide. This bush was good only for igniting a fire that could extend over the land. It would easily destroy the trees.

Through the fable, Jotham charged the inhabitants of Shechem with not acting in good faith when choosing Abimelech as king. They were the trees of the forest in the fable, and the king was the bramble, which was a source of fire. They were not thinking about the best for Israel but for what they thought was good for them. The message of the fable was that their experiment with kingship in Israel in the person of Abimelech would fail. There would be internal dissension and self-destruction, bringing kinship to an end.

9:22–57

Abimelech's Decline and Fall

Little is said about Abimelech's reign, except that it lasted three years and that his people rebelled against him. They grew uneasy with his government and chose a man by the name of Gaal to lead the rebellion. Judges does not mention whether Gaal was an Israelite or a Canaanite, but v. 23 tells us that God stirred up animosity or ill will between the people of Shechem and Abimelech by sending them a spirit of conflict (Heb. ra'—the word often used for “evil”). This is similar to the “evil [sometimes translated as “harmful” or “distressing”] spirit from God” that came upon Saul (1 Sam. 16:15) and the “lying spirit” that the Lord put into the mouths of Ahab’s prophets (1 Kin. 22:23). In each case, when human beings turn away from God, they open themselves to the influence of the adversary, and God allows evil spirits to interfere in their lives.

As anticipated by Jotham, there was war between the inhabitants of Shechem and Abimelech. He destroyed the city and mercilessly killed common people and their leaders. The narrative depicts Abimelech as a mad, irrational man aiming at destruction, like a wildfire. His final fate occurred during his senseless attack against the town of Thebez. Millstones were made from two circular stones, usually basalt, one or two feet (30 to 60 cm) in diameter and two to four inches (5 to 10 cm) thick. An unknown woman transformed an ordinary kitchen utensil into a weapon that mortally wounded the king. At the last moment of life, Abimelech was concerned about dying with a damaged reputation based on the cultural conviction that being killed by a woman was shameful; he asked his armor-bearer to kill him. The record explicitly affirms that God’s hand was in all of these events as a specific punishment against Abimelech for the treatment of his father’s family and as a punishment of the various groups that had directly or indirectly allied themselves with him (Judg. 9:56–57).

RULE OF THE LATER JUDGES

The final section of the book of Judges deals with two major leaders—Jephthah and Samson, whose activities are recounted in some detail—and five minor judges about whose work we hear very little: Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon. The oppressors during this time period were the Ammonites and the Philistines.

10:1–5

Tola and Jair

Chapter 10 begins by describing the rise of Tola (“worm”), the son of Puah, to save Israel (v. 1).

Perhaps, similarly to Abimelech, Tola was raised up to save Israel from the corruption in Israel’s religious and social life and to provide a period of stable administration. Although he was from the tribe of Issachar, he lived in the hill country of Ephraim and judged Israel for twenty-three years.

Tola was followed by Jair (“may [God] enlighten”) of Gilead, who lived east of the Jordan River. He judged Israel during twenty-two peaceful years. His only claim to fame were his thirty sons, who ruled over thirty towns and rode on donkeys, a sign of wealth and prominence (see 5:10; 1 Sam. 25:20). Thirty sons also meant he had several wives, another sign of wealth, but not in harmony with God’s will for His people.

Jephthah

The story of Jephthah follows a vivid description of the Ammonites’ oppression of the people (10:6–16). He was appointed as the instrument of liberation (10:17–11:11) and at first tried diplomacy, but it failed (11:12–28). He made a vow, went to war, and returned victorious (12:29–40). Unfortunately, there was a conflict between him and the Ephraimites (vv. 1–7).

10:6–16. Israel Oppressed Again. Idolatry, which seemed to have been contained during the rules of Tola and Jair, flourished again after their demise. Not only did the worship of Baal and Asherah prosper, but the gods of all the surrounding nations (Syria [Aram], Sidon, Moab, Ammon, and Philistia) were venerated. Therefore, the Lord gave His people into the hands of the Ammonites and the Philistines.

It is likely that the eighteen years of oppression by the Ammonites—primarily in the Transjordan but also in the territory of Judah and Benjamin—and the forty years of the Philistine harassment west of the Jordan began at the same time. The Ammonite oppression is recounted first (chaps. 10–12), followed by the story of the Philistines and their harassment of the Israelites (chaps. 13–16).

After eighteen years of oppression, the Israelites finally realized that their misery was the result of their own sinful actions: the rejection of Yahweh and the worship of foreign gods (10:10). As in the case of the Midianite oppression, the Lord did not immediately respond positively (6:7–10). First, He issued a stern reprimand by reminding them how many times

He had rescued them in the past (10:11–12), beginning with the Exodus and ending with the unknown Maonites, possibly another name for the Midianites because they are missing in the catalogue of past deliverances. In the Greek translation of the OT, the Midianites are listed in place of the Maonites.

As in Judges 1:2, the text does not mention how this dialogue between Yahweh and the Israelites was conducted, whether through an itinerant prophet or through the tabernacle. Yet Yahweh's message was clear in both instances. Since every time He saved them, they forsook Him and went back to idol worship, now God was not interested in rescuing them (10:13). In fact, He sarcastically told them to go and cry out to the idols they had been worshiping to save them (v. 14). Yet, the Israelites did not give up. They repeated their confession of guilt and initiated a reform by cleansing the land of idols and serving the Lord (v. 16). The Lord could no longer bear Israel's misery (v. 16); that is, He accepted their repentance and helped them. Anger is not God's last word to sinners. There is always hope for sinners who turn from their sins and humbly submit themselves to the mercy of God.

10:17—11:11. Jephthah and the Gileadites. When the Ammonites mobilized for one of their annual campaigns, the Gileadites decided to make a stand at Mizpah in Gilead (the location of which is unknown). However, they discovered that they had no one to lead them. It was then that Jephthah ("he [God?] has opened [the womb?]") the Gileadite—cast out by his family because his mother was a prostitute—appears in the narrative (11:1–3). According to Deuteronomy 23:2, such persons could not enter the congregation of the Lord, probably referring to the governing assembly of the people. Rejected by his family, Jephthah lived on the edges of society in the land of Tob, probably southern Syria. Gathering like-minded people around him, he made a name for himself as a strong leader by raiding villages.

This seems to be the first time that a judge in Israel was chosen by the people and not by God (Judg. 3:9, 15; 4:4; 6:14). But Jephthah certainly had the approval of God, as indicated by the spirit of the Lord coming upon him (11:29). The story of Jephthah teaches us to be careful in how we treat those on the edges of society because they also are children of God whom He can use in moments of need. And those who are slighted and ill-treated should leave it to God to let their light shine.

11:12–28. Jephthah and the Ammonites. By misrepresenting history, the king of Ammon tried to justify his invasion of Gilead (v. 13). Jephthah corrected the king's misrepresentation by letting history speak for itself. It is notable that Jephthah, the outcast, without the advantages of cultural approbation, was able to present such an eloquent appeal to the history of his people. In a way that the feckless leaders in Gilead apparently could not do, Jephthah inspired his community with a declaration of their identity as God's people. He knew who he was and who his people were. This is a lesson for us today. God's people must know that they are His people, and that requires a solid understanding of how God has led them and taught them in past history. Jephthah appealed to Yahweh to render judgment between the Israelite and the Ammonite peoples. Certainly, Jephthah preferred a peaceful resolution, but God provided judgment another way.

Because the king of Ammon was not interested in a settlement, war seemed inevitable (v. 28). The reference to Moab and the god Chemosh (vv. 24–25) seems to indicate that in the time of Jephthah, the Ammonites had occupied the land of Moab, south of the Arnon river, before marching against Israel. Jephthah, therefore, spoke to the king of Ammon as the successor of

The Philistines

According to Scripture, the Philistines (the meaning of the name is uncertain) originally came from Caphtor, or Crete (Jer. 47:4; Amos 9:7), and were descendants of Ham from the same line as the Egyptians (Gen. 10:6, 14). They first appear in Scripture during the patriarchal period (see Gen. 21:32; 26:1). They were later blended with a group of people that migrated from the Aegean to various places in the eastern Mediterranean in the thirteenth century. Known in history as the Sea Peoples, these migrants caused the downfall of the Hittite Empire but were repulsed by the armies of Ramesses III when they attempted to invade Egypt. Denied entrance to Egypt, they settled on the southern coast of the Holy Land, where they assimilated with the local population, retaining the name (Philistines) of the locals, and were a threat to the Israelites until the time of David, when he made them his subjects (1 Chr. 18:1–2).

the king of Moab. The three hundred years (v. 26) represent the time from Israel's conquest of Heshbon under Moses (Num. 21:25–26) until the time of Jephthah.

11:29–40. Jephthah's Vow and Victory. In spite of Jephthah's attempt to come to a peaceful resolution of the conflict, the king of the Ammonites chose to fight. Before going to war, Jephthah made a vow to Yahweh, promising to offer as a burnt offering to Him whatever would come through the doors of his house to meet him upon his return (v. 31) if the Lord would give the Ammonites into his hands. Did Jephthah plan to sacrifice a human being? (See "Jephthah's Vow," p. 408). In those days, animals and human beings lived together in one house. In hindsight, we know that this vow was wrong, but for him it was an expression of his dependence on and faith in God. He knew he was utterly dependent on Yahweh, as the God of Israel's history, for his victory over the Ammonites. It is this faith that caused him to be mentioned in the list of the faithful in Hebrews 11:32.

12:1–7. Jephthah's Conflict with Ephraim. Jealousy and pride are a dangerous combination. In 8:1, the Ephraimites, the largest of the tribes in the north, were upset with Gideon because he had not called them to battle the Midianites. In chapter 12, they were angry with Jephthah, threatening to burn down his house because he had not called them to fight against the Ammonites, so they claimed (v. 1). This was a powerful challenge to Jephthah's leadership.

Jephthah's Vow

Much has been written about Jephthah's sacrifice. The two major positions are that (a) he did literally sacrifice his daughter as a burnt offering or (b) he did not sacrifice her but dedicated her to service in the sanctuary of the Lord as a perpetual virgin.

1. She Was a Sacrifice. These are some of the arguments for the first position: (1) Jephthah vowed to offer a burnt offering (Heb. 'olah), and the text clearly says that he did to her as he had vowed (Judg. 11:39). (2) There is no indication in the text that she was dedicated to the service of the Lord as was Samuel (1 Sam. 1:28). (3) Why would a custom be established to bewail her fate if she was going to serve the Lord? To belong to the Lord was a position of honor, not a fate to be lamented. (4) Jephthah's and her grief indicate that she met a pitiable fate, not a position of honor. (5) This has been the position of most church fathers and commentators throughout history.

2. She was Not a Sacrifice. These are some of the arguments for the second position: (1) Scripture expressly forbids human sacrifice (Lev. 18:21; 20:2–5; Deut. 12:31). Jephthah must have been acquainted with these laws of Moses. (2) The Hebrew conjunction waw in Judges 11:31 ("and") should be taken as a disjunctive particle and translated as "or." The text would then read, "it shall be the LORD's, or I will offer it up as a burnt offering." (3) The text does not say he sacrificed her, but that he did to her according to his vow (v. 39). (4) She wept over her unmarried state, not about being condemned to die (vv. 37–38). (5) That he literally sacrificed her does not harmonize with what we know from other texts about Jephthah. The Bible portrays him as a man of high principles. Samuel accords him a place of honor (1 Sam. 12:11) and Hebrews 11:32 lists him among the heroes of faith.

3. Lessons to Learn. Throughout this story, God is silent. We know God gave Jephthah His Spirit and the victory over the Ammonites, but did He accept the child sacrifice, if such it was? While the first view has the strong support of the text, the second view remains a possibility. Whatever the case, some important lessons can be learned from this story. First, even the greatest heroes of faith may have weak moments, as did Jephthah prior to going into battle. We look forward to the moment when sinful human nature will be transformed at the coming of our Lord. Second, our vows to God should not be bargains to purchase the favor of God because His favor cannot be purchased with good works, money, or special vows. Third, we should make sure that our vows correspond to God's revealed will, and once we make them, we should keep them. Vows should be carefully thought through and not made rashly.

He rejected their complaint. First, he had to act at once because they were attacked, and second, he did call them but received no help. Chapter 11 neither confirms nor denies that he sent for the Ephraimites. And third, it was the Lord who gave him the victory over the Ammonites (12:3). Therefore, there was no need to proudly feel that his prowess had defeated the enemy; it was the Lord's doing. Why should they feel slighted because the Lord used him to His glory?

It may seem inconceivable to us that a civil war that resulted in the death of forty-two thousand Ephraimites was provoked simply by their leaders' petty jealousy of Jephthah. Some of those deaths certainly occurred in the actual fighting, and some occurred when Ephraimites were caught and executed in their attempt to escape back across the Jordan. The text makes it clear that the Gileadites were inspired in the slaughter by the arrogant bigotry of the Ephraimites, who viewed the Gileadites as inferiors. Differences in pronunciation are known to have also existed along the Nile so that the Egyptians in the delta pronounced words slightly differently than those along the Nile River Valley, causing those who lived upriver to mock the delta dwellers. This account confirms (vv. 6–7) that pronunciation was a basis for prejudice in other parts of the ancient world. The word shibboleth means “torrent” or “stream.” Scripture makes no overt judgment against the Gileadites for the clever dialect trap they set to capture and execute escaping Ephraimites. But this sad and completely unnecessary civil war is a reminder of the damage caused by letting jealousy divide families and churches, and it is an admonition regarding the consequences of setting little “tests” to identify the “other” and exact retribution. The civil war was a clear sign that Israel was losing the sense of oneness and was in the process of collapsing from within. The back-and-forth from serving God to abandoning Him was beginning to have a major impact on the people and would climax with a final civil war (chap. 20).

Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon

Three of the six minor judges followed Jephthah. Ibzan came from Bethlehem. Scholars suspect that this was the Bethlehem in Zebulun (Josh. 19:15), not the Bethlehem in Judah (Judg. 17:7) where Jesus was later born. This suspicion is based on the tribal identity of the next judge (Elon) and the fact that Zebulun was a prominent tribe at this time. This identification, however, is not certain. Ibzan judged Israel for seven years and was remembered for his large family of sons and daughters (12:8–10).

His successor, Elon, who judged Israel for ten years, came from Zebulun. The location of the town of Aijalon (v. 12), where he was buried, is unknown. However, the city is to be distinguished from the Aijalon mentioned in Joshua 10:12, where the sun stood still, and from the Aijalon in Joshua 19:42, which was in the south, in the territory of Dan.

Pirathon, the town of Abdon (Judg. 12:13), who judged Israel eight years, was in the hill country of Ephraim, the heartland of northern Israel. The mountains/hill country of the Amalekites (v. 15) probably refers to an Amalekite settlement in this place before Israel entered Canaan. Abdon also had forty sons and thirty grandsons. The fact that nothing important is referred to during the rule of these three judges may indicate a happy state of affairs, without apostasies, but as we see in the next chapter, that did not last long.

13:1—16:31

Samson

Samson is an exceptional figure in the OT. Two things stand out in regard to Samson's life. First, he was the only judge who was chosen by God before he was born to be a judge. Second, by divine fiat he was born a Nazirite, set apart for God, like John the Baptist (Luke 1:15). In contrast to Barak, Gideon, and Jephthah, Samson never went into battle at the head of an Israelite army. His lot was to fight the Philistines alone. Therefore, his battles look like personal quarrels and acts of revenge, but he was led by the spirit of the Lord and did what the judges were called to do—fight the oppressor. Although the Philistines continued to oppress Israel after Samson's death, he began to deliver Israel from the power (lit. “hand”) of the Philistines (Judg. 13:5).

13:1–25. Birth of Samson. The background to the story of Samson is the oppression by the Philistines because the children of Israel had again done what was evil in the Lord's sight (v. 1). This time no cry was heard for deliverance, but God in His mercy raised up a deliverer for them. Twice the Angel of the Lord (see 2:1–5) appeared to Manoah's wife and not to Manoah. Since she would have to live with a particular attention to lifestyle choices during pregnancy and would be the primary caregiver to the child after he was born, God spoke directly to her, as He had to Hagar (Gen. 16:17–14). God gave her the instructions directly—directions that He would not fully repeat to Manoah, even though He would appear to Manoah in answer to his prayer (Judg. 13:8–14). God told Manoah's wife that her barrenness would come to an end and that her son would be a Nazirite from birth (cf. Luke 1:13–17, 26–38).

When she told her husband what had happened, she called the Angel a “man of God” (‘elohim; v. 6). The same expression appears elsewhere in Scripture to describe Moses and Samuel (Deut. 33:1; 1 Sam. 9:6). Yet, she also said that His appearance was like that of an angel of God (Judg. 13:6), perhaps realizing that this was not just another human being. When asked for His name, the Angel of the Lord responded evasively with “pīl’i,” which can be understood in two ways: (1) the name “Wonderful,” as in Isaiah 9:6, or (2) an expression of His nature, which is beyond human comprehension (cf. Ps. 139:6). There are secret things that do not belong to us (Deut. 29:29).

Manoah's reaction was natural for sinful beings. Ever since the Garden of Eden, sinners have been terrified in the presence of God (Is. 6:5). The final verses of chapter 13 describe the fulfillment of God's promise: the barren womb is revived and a son is born. Where there was sadness, there is now joy. Where there was despair, there is now thankfulness, evidence that with God no situation is hopeless, not in Israel nor in our lives today.

The name Samson derives from the Hebrew word shemesh (“sun”). Thus “sunny” or “child of the sun” are possible translations, expressing the hope of the parents for his life. How different it turned out to be once his childhood was over. In fact, his career revolved around two Philistine women: the woman of Timnah, whom he married (chaps. 14–15), and then Delilah, with whom he had an affair (chap. 16). Both betrayed him to his enemies by revealing his secrets. Sandwiched between the two stories is a brief encounter with a third woman (vv. 1–3). And yet, during the twenty years he judged Israel, Samson was a hero whom the Lord blessed and used to punish Israel's oppressors.

14:1–20. Samson's Wedding. Samson's marriage to the Philistine girl is a typical case of passion dominating reason. To his parents' serious objection, he simply said that she pleased him (lit. “she is right in my own eyes”; 14:3). He was not willing to do what was right in God's eyes and in that sense his life illustrated the condition of the Israelites. Despite the fact that God had specifically forbidden marriages with the inhabitants of Canaan (Deut. 7:3–4), she pleased him well and that, for him, was more important. No matter that as a Nazirite he had to remain ceremonially clean; reason and the fear of God were set aside and passion and stubborn determination controlled him. It is not difficult for humans even today to go down the same road, ruining their service for God and their lives.

Verse 4 raises an important question. Did the spirit of God purposely guide him into this marriage or did God use Samson's mistake to confront Israel's enemies in a way that was different from what He had done through previous judges and their armies? James 1:13 states that God does not tempt anyone to do evil; He simply allows human beings to do evil actions. In other words, He does not instigate them. Nevertheless, in Hebrew thinking what God allows is credited to Him; it is as if He has done it (Is. 45:7). Hence, it is said that He hardened Pharaoh's heart (Ex. 7:3), yet at the same time we are told that Pharaoh hardened his own heart (8:15, 32). The same applies to Samson's activities. God allowed him to follow his own passions but used the occasion to achieve something good for Israel.

The episode with the lion served as a sign for Samson that the Lord was with him and would enable him to defeat the Philistines (Judg. 14:6). At the wedding, Samson proposed a riddle and a wager (v. 12). It was not uncommon in ancient times to ask difficult questions or propose riddles at entertainments or weddings. However, it was somewhat reckless of Samson to make a game about possibly giving away the secret to the strength that God had given him; he should have better kept it a secret. In v. 15, the Hebrew text says that the Philistines threatened his bride on the seventh day (as appearing in some translations), but this does not fit with the three days mentioned in v. 14. Other translations follow the Septuagint and the Syriac translation that read “on the fourth day.” The Hebrew words for “seventh” (shebi'i) and “fourth” (rebi'i) differ only by one Hebrew consonant (sh to r), suggesting a copying error. Furthermore, Samson's confession is easier to understand if she badgered him for several days and not only on the seventh day. In fact, v. 17 indicates that she had wept all seven days of the feast. This would mean she was unhappy from the start that he had not told her the secret.

Samson's reaction to the betrayal of his wife is the first of his spirit-directed actions against the Philistines. This unusual affair provided an obvious lesson to the Philistines that Samson was no ordinary Israelite and an obvious lesson to Samson that his romance with the Philistine woman had been a very bad idea. From God's point of view, the immediate breakup of Samson's marriage was in Samson's best interest. True friendship could not exist between the Israelites and Philistines. Marriages between believers and unbelievers are rarely successful.

15:1–8. Growing Conflict with the Philistines.

The two incidents narrated in this passage illustrate how the relationship between Samson and the Philistines quickly deteriorated on account of his marriage to a Philistine woman. In the first one, he announced that this time what he would do to the Philistines would be well deserved. According to him, the fact that his wife was given to someone else justified his act of retaliation, which consisted of burning the grain fields, vineyards, and olive trees of the Philistines. Using foxes sounds cruel; but for Samson, seemingly oblivious to such a concern, the foxes served to do much damage in a short period of time. The second incident was motivated by the execution of Samson's wife and father-in-law once the Philistines understood why Samson had destroyed their fields. As revenge, Samson attacked the Philistines, slaughtering many of them, and promised after this last attack to stop his rampage against them.

15:9–20. Victory at Ramath Lehi. The circle of violence continued, and this time the Philistines prepared to go against the tribe of Judah. What seems to be surprising is the fact that the Israelites were not willing to attack their oppressors. They had resigned themselves to their condition to the point that they were willing to betray Samson. At no point in the Samson narrative is it said that the Israelites prayed to the Lord to deliver them from the oppression of the Philistines. God of His own initiative raised Samson to begin delivering Israel from them (13:5). It was therefore almost natural for the Israelites to tell the Philistines that what Samson was doing was his own business; he did not have their support. Nevertheless, the Lord used Samson's arrest to inflict a significant defeat on the Philistines. His victory was credited to the spirit of the Lord, which fell on him with great power.

Samson's song of victory (15:16) contains a wordplay. In Hebrew, the words "donkey" and "heap" are homonyms (they have the same spelling). Hence some translate the line as "with a donkey's jawbone I have made donkeys out of them." Another possible translation is "with the jawbone of a donkey, heaps upon heaps," referring to the many people he killed.

God performed a miracle and created a spring in that place which still existed in the time of the author of the book. Samson called that place En Hakkore, meaning "caller's spring" (v. 19). The epilogue in v. 20 highlights the fact that, after his great victory, Samson was finally identified as judge in Israel, a position to which God had called him and which he held for twenty years.

16:1–3. Samson and the Prostitute. In Hebrews 11:32, Samson is a man of faith; in the book of Judges, we primarily see his other side—Samson, a man of strong passions. At the beginning of his judgeship, Samson went to Timnah and saw a woman (16:1). He desired her and made her his wife, at least for a short time. Toward the end of his judgeship, he went to Gaza and saw a prostitute and slept with her (v. 1). Like David, Samson's sin began in his eyes, his look gave birth to his desire, and his desire brought forth the sinful act. Indeed, the human heart is deceitful above all things and desperately sick and wicked (Jer. 17:9), and Satan knows our weaknesses better than we do. There may be a connection between Samson's action and the spiritual condition of the people. The man chosen by God to be His instrument engaged in literal harlotry while the people of God engaged in spiritual harlotry. Samson embodied the despicable condition of God's people.

By giving in to his sinful passions, Samson placed his life in danger. We do not know whether somebody tipped him off or whether his guilty conscience was the cause, but he left at midnight and no one dared approach him. He tore the gate out by its foundations and carried it about 40 miles (64.4 km) to a hill facing Hebron (Judg. 16:4), the leading city of Judah at that time, where he left it as a tangible war trophy. This was a superhuman feat, considering that the gate must have weighed several hundred pounds. Furthermore, Gaza was close to the Mediterranean coast while Hebron was more than 3,000 feet (914.4 m) above sea level in the Judean mountains. By removing the gate of the city, Samson was sending a message to the Philistines. When facing him, the Philistines were as vulnerable as a city without a gate.

16:4–31. Samson and Delilah. Not long after the Gaza episode, Samson found another Philistine woman in the Valley of Sorek (v. 4), about 13 miles (21 km) southwest of Jerusalem. It was the border between the territories of the Philistines and the Israelites. More than once, the love of women had resulted in physical and spiritual danger for Samson. Once the relationship between Samson and Delilah became known, the rulers of the Philistines offered Delilah 5,500 pieces (shekels) of silver if she could find out the secret of his strength and how he could be overcome. This was an enormous amount of silver when we consider that David bought the threshing floor and the oxen of Araunah for fifty shekels (2 Sam. 24:24) and that the wages offered to the Levite were only ten shekels a year (Judg. 17:10).

The story unfolds in four episodes. Three times Samson played a hazardous game of brinkmanship with her but refused to give up his secret (16:6–9, 10–14). The fourth time, worn out by her constant demand for mutual trust, he revealed to her that he was a Nazirite and that the secret was his long hair (vv. 16–17). He was quickly captured by the Philistines, and the eyes that saw the woman (14:1) and the prostitute (16:1) were blinded and could see no more. What is amazing is that in the first three episodes the spirit of God did not leave him. Only when he revealed the secret of his power and his head was shaved—after the Nazirite vow was totally broken—did the spirit of God depart from him. The condition of Samson was now like the condition of the oppressed people of Israel. The Lord departed from him, and he was to be oppressed by the Philistines. The fact that God bears His wayward children long is a great comfort to Christians today and should lead all to repentance (Rom. 2:4).

The Philistines took Samson to Gaza and set him to work grinding grain in prison like an animal. Weak, blind, imprisoned, degraded to the most menial service, Samson found his way back to God. As a sign that God had not completely forsaken him, his hair grew again and with it his strength gradually returned. God restored him so he could at last do what he was destined to do—to begin to deliver Israel from the Philistines.

At a feast in honor of Dagon, the grain god, all the lords of the Philistines were assembled in the temple of Dagon, rejoicing in the capture of Samson. He was hauled out of prison to entertain them (16:25). We are not told what kind of entertainment he performed. The Hebrew word used here means to “laugh,” “joke,” or “amuse.” Just seeing him blind and bound like an animal may have amused them. Standing between two main pillars that supported the roof of the temple crowded with people, Samson prayed to Yahweh to strengthen him one more time so he could have revenge against the Philistines (v. 28). According to most translations, Samson’s prayer was for one act of vengeance (or vengeance “at once” or “with one blow”) for his “two eyes” being blinded. But it is also possible to read the Hebrew text as saying, “for one of my two eyes,” as if vengeance for two eyes would have demanded more of God. The Lord in His great mercy heard him, and Samson, by the power of God, pulled the temple down on his enemies. The strength that he had lost through sin, he recovered through prayer. He killed more people in his death than during his life (v. 30). Thus, God defeated the Philistines and their god in a humiliating manner through a seemingly powerless man. Despite his many weaknesses, Samson finally gave his life in the fulfillment of his divine calling. He died for the well-being of others.

According to v. 31, Samson in the end received the respect of his father’s house and an honorable burial in the tomb of his father. He had judged Israel twenty years. He began his work as a judge with his victory at Ramath Lehi (15:14–17) and ended it with his victory and death in Gaza, twenty years later.

Throughout the history of the Judges, we see human depravity at work in the repeated apostasy of the Israelites but particularly in the life of Samson, the last judge. In response, God displayed His wrath against sin and iniquity through pagan nations whom He used to discipline the children of Israel. And when they repented, confessed, and cried out for a deliverer, hoping that God would hear their cry once more, Yahweh, in His mercy, sent a spirit-endowed judge to deliver them from their oppressors. So today, God is ready and willing to come to the aid of any of His children who are “oppressed” by Satan or their own sinful nature and who reach out to Him for help. God’s grace and mercy are always available to repentant sinners.

RELIGIOUS AND MORAL DEGENERATION OF ISRAEL

With Samson’s death, the record of the Israelite judges comes to an end. Nothing is said about two other judges, Eli and Samuel. Instead, the last five chapters of the book present two stories. Both stories feature a Levite: the first one traveled from Bethlehem to the hill country of Ephraim to find a place to live (chaps. 17–18);

the second one traveled from the hill country of Ephraim to Bethlehem to bring back his concubine, who had left him and had gone back to her father's house (chaps. 19–21). Both stories shed light on the religious and moral standards during the period of the Judges. In these chapters, there are no foreign oppressors or liberating heroes. We are taken into the daily life of the Israelites in the land of Canaan, and the conclusion is that they were hardly better than the former inhabitants of the land. What we see is a society in spiritual, social, and moral chaos. The picture of a united Israel found in the first two chapters of the book is gone, and now everyone is unquestionably doing whatever seems right according to subjective perceptions (17:6; 21:25). There was no centralized worship at the Israelite sanctuary or a centralized system of governance. Everyone was on his or her own.

17:1–18:31

Micah and His Idol

The first story is about a man, his mother, and a Levite (17:1–13). These were visited by a group of Danites (18:1–13), resulting in a conflict that closes the story (vv. 14–31).

17:1–13. Micah's Idolatry. The story could be called the Canaanite naturalization of Yahweh; that is to say, the Israelites had transformed Yahweh into a Canaanite god by worshiping Him in a Canaanite way. The discussion about what to do with the silver that was stolen, returned, and consecrated moved to using it to make an idol that represented the Lord. The ease with which the narrative shifts to idolatry is amazing in that none of the protagonists took a moment to examine the implications of their decision. Worshiping Yahweh à la Canaanite fashion seemed to have been a very natural thing to do.

There is some question as to whether there were one or two idols. Some translations render the phrase to mean one carved “image overlaid with silver.” The Hebrew verbs seem to indicate that it may have been only one. It has been suggested that the idol consisted of two parts (e.g., a wooden idol enclosed in a casing of silver). When the idol was finished, Micah (“who is like Yahweh?”) put it in a shrine in his house together with an ephod (see 8:22–28) and some household gods (Heb. terapim); that is, small images of human shape believed to represent the gods and to be endowed with divine attributes. Micah consecrated one of his sons to serve as priest (17:5). In doing this, he used the standard expression for the consecration of priests, “fill the hand,” probably with an offering (see Ex. 28:41; 29:9). We do not know exactly when this event took place. In the next chapter, the Danites are in search of a home, and this may suggest that the event took place in the early period of the Judges when the tribes were still finding their places in the country. However, the level of social and spiritual corruption in Israel described in chapters 17–21 points to a later period of the Judges. Micah and his mother thought they were serving and worshiping Yahweh (17:3), when in reality they had transgressed the second commandment, which forbade the making of idols. Throughout history, people have adapted God to their own ideas in an attempt to manage Him as they pleased.

Since the Levites had not been given any tribal territory, only cities, they lived among the other tribes (Num. 35:2; Josh. 21:3). A young Levite who had been living with the tribe of Judah came to a group of houses in the hill country of Ephraim, one of which belonged to Micah. When Micah learned that the young man was a Levite, he invited him to stay with him and become his priest. Micah, who was not a priest, consecrated the Levite by “filling his hands” (Judg. 17:12), contrary to God's instructions that only Aaron's descendants should be priests (Ex. 29:9). The Levites were to be assistants of the priests (Num. 8:19–22). Micah seemed to have only a dim understanding of God's will. He practiced a syncretistic religion, mixing the worship of Yahweh with the worship of the local gods. This type of spiritual and moral compromise continues to be a threat for believers today who try to live the Christian life in a culture that does not support Christian values.

18:1–13. The Danites' Search for an Inheritance. The statement concerning the lack of a king in Israel (v. 1) prepares the way for the illicit deeds of the Danites. The tribe of Dan had been allotted their inheritance between the territories of Judah and Ephraim, from the western border of the Benjamites to the Mediterranean Sea (Josh. 19:40–46). It included fertile land in the valleys and the coastal plain. However, the Danites were not able to occupy all the land allotted to them because the Amorites drove them back into the hill country (Judg. 1:34). Therefore, they sent five spies north to find some additional land for their families.

The five spies arrived at the house of Micah and lodged there long enough to realize that there was a Levite residing in the house who also officiated as a priest. At this point in the narrative, the spies simply gather information that would later determine the future of the shrine in the house of Micah. Again, the perverted religious practices of Micah and the Levite were not considered by them to be unfaithfulness to the Lord, suggesting that such practices were common throughout the land of Israel. It is intriguing that the spies asked the Levite to consult God with respect to the success of their journey. Nothing is said about how the Levite consulted the Lord. In fact, one gets the impression that he immediately uttered an oracle before the scouts, and they interpreted it to be a positive one. The phrase used by the Levite is ambiguous. He literally said, “Go in peace!” (a common expression and wish) and stated that the way in which they would go would be before or in front of the Lord. This could be interpreted to mean that God was carefully watching what they are doing in a positive way (to bless them) or in a negative way (to condemn them). The Levite did not risk his life. In any case, the rest of the narrative shows that the Danites were successful not because the Lord was necessarily with them but because of their military superiority. After spying on the people living in Laish, they knew that it would be easy to possess that beautiful land that would play an important role in the Northern Kingdom.

18:14–26. The Danites Rob Micah’s House.

The five spies had told their brethren what they would find in Micah’s house. And while the six hundred men stood at the gate to the compound, the five spies stole the contents of the shrine and persuaded the Levite to come with them. Micah, it seems, was not at home at that time. If the Danites had taken the idols and destroyed them and punished the Levite, they would have acted in accordance with God’s will, but by taking the idols for their own use, they participated in the apostasy, showing that they feared neither God nor men. They left, putting their families and goods in front of them, in case they were pursued. Not long after their departure, Micah came home and found he had been robbed. He who robbed his mother was now robbed. He gathered his neighbors together and caught up with the Danites. The Danites cared little about how Micah felt; operating according to the principle of “might makes right,” they chased him away with a threat (v. 25). If the loss of his idols had driven him back to rely only on Yahweh, he would have received great benefit from it, but we hear nothing more about him. The idol that supposedly represented the Lord was in fact like the Canaanite idols, unable to defend itself.

18:27–31. The Danites Settle in Laish. Based on the report given by the five spies, the Danites continued their journey north and came to Laish, which they attacked, destroyed, and burned (v. 27). This was a luxurious land with great vegetation and abundant water flowing from Mount Hermon. Out of the ashes of Laish rose a new city, which they named Dan, after the first head of the tribe, and which would become one of the centers of idolatry in the Northern Kingdom of Israel. It became the northernmost city in Israel. “From Dan to Beersheba” became a common idiom for all of Israel (see Judg. 20:1; 1 Sam. 3:20; 2 Sam. 3:10).

The last two verses of this chapter record the idolatry of the Danites. Jonathan, which was probably the name of Micah’s Levite, who was further identified as the son of Gershom, and his sons were set up as priests. It is possible that this is Gershom the son of Moses. Originally, the Hebrew text of the OT did not have vowels. The name in the text for the father of Gershom is m-sh-h (the consonants for Moses—mosheh). The consonantal difference between Moses and Manasseh is the consonant n. In some manuscripts, one finds written above the name a small nun (n) that would read m-n-sh-h (the consonants for Manasseh). Rabbinic explanations justify the change as an attempt to avoid tarnishing the memory of Moses. If the original text read “Moses,” as it appears, it is sadly possible that Jonathan was a descendent of Moses’s son.

The phrase referring to the priests that were in Dan until the captivity of the land (18:30) is problematic. If this is referring to the captivity under Tiglath-Pileser in 732 B.C., we have to assume that neither Samuel nor David nor Solomon stopped the idol worship in Dan. Yet, 1 Samuel 7:3–4 indicates that under Samuel’s reform the Israelites discarded other gods and served only the Lord (v. 4). Furthermore, when Jeroboam set up the golden calves at Dan, he appointed priests from among all kinds of people, not only the Levites (1 Kin. 12:31) because all the Levites and priests had left the Northern Kingdom and moved south to Judah (2 Chr. 11:13–14). Thus, the descendants of Gershom, the Levite, could not have served until the Assyrian captivity in the city of Dan.

Rather, the statement that Micah’s idol was in Dan all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh (Judg. 18:31) suggests that this captivity of the land (v. 30) took place earlier in connection with the Philistines, possibly in the time of Eli (1 Sam. 4:1–11) or during the reign of Saul's son, Ishbosheth, who reigned over Israel from Mahanaim, which was east of the Jordan. The Philistines presumably controlled some portions of the Northern Kingdom, including Dan (2 Sam. 2:8–10). Archaeological evidence suggests that the temple at Dan was destroyed about 1050 B.C., around the time the ark of the covenant was captured by the Philistines (1 Sam. 4).

19:1–21:25

The Levite and His Concubine

The story of the Levite and his concubine, illustrating the moral chaos during the period of the Judges, begins and ends with the statement that there was no king in Israel (Judg. 19:1; 21:25). The absence of a king does not necessarily mean there must be chaos in the land; the comment about everyone doing as desired in the last part of v. 25, however, does. One wonders whether the absence of a king may be referring to the people's unwillingness to recognize God as their king. We are not told when this story took place, but the reference to Phinehas, the grandson of Aaron (20:28), and the fact that the tribal league was still functioning and able to take combined action points to an early date.

19:1–21. The Levite Searches for His Concubine. A Levite from Ephraim took a concubine (a second-rank wife) from Bethlehem. Most versions say that she committed adultery against him (19:2) and went back to her father's house. The penalty for adultery was death (Lev. 20:10), but nothing in the text indicates that she faced death. Some wonder if there is another explanation. A few ancient versions have "his concubine became angry with him, and she went away from him to her father's house." As Israelite law did not provide for divorce by the wife, leaving the husband was considered an act of adultery. A heated argument between them could explain why the Levite sought reconciliation. Perhaps tempers had cooled.

His journey seemed to be crowned with success. He was lavishly entertained by his father-in-law, and his concubine seemed to have agreed to go back with him. They left on the fifth day of his visit, but because they left in the afternoon, they did not get as far as he had hoped. They were forced to seek shelter in Gibeah of Benjamin (Judg. 19:15), where nobody took them in except an old man from the mountains of Ephraim who lived in Gibeah (identified with modern Tel el-Ful, about 3 miles [4.8 km] north of Jerusalem). The hospitality of this man was a ray of hope in the midst of a narrative where people care only for themselves.

19:22–30. Gibeah's Crime. During the night, the men of the city surrounded the house and demanded that the traveler be surrendered to them for homosexual abuse. There are a number of parallels to Genesis 19, but this story has a different outcome. The men are called "sons of belial" in Hebrew (Judg. 19:22)—variously translated as "wicked," "perverted," or "worthless." In the OT, the word "belial" ("not worthy" or "worthless") occurs twenty-seven times and always refers to people of bad character (see Deut. 13:13; 1 Sam. 2:12; 1 Kin. 21:10).

Hospitality played an important part in the ANE society. By it a stranger found rest, food, shelter, and asylum. The old man in Gibeah took the law of hospitality so seriously that he was willing to surrender his virgin daughter and the Levite's concubine instead of his guest, who had a sacred right to his hospitality. However horrified the modern reader may be, we need to remember that the old man was acting within the confines of his culture. Women were generally only lightly esteemed in the ancient world. It was common to sacrifice a woman's honor to save the life of a man (Gen. 12:10–16; 20:2; 26:6–9). World history shows that women have been greatly abused, and similar psychological, physical, and sexual abuse continues to be a reality in many places today. The voice of the church should be one of the first voices to speak against such evil cultural practices anyplace in the world.

This story illustrates how quickly and how low some of the people in Israel had fallen morally since the death of Joshua. Sodom was reenacted, and ever since Sodom has been reenacted many times (Rom. 1:26–27), particularly in the acceptance of homosexual practices and behavior. The reaction of the Levite to the brutal rape and murder of his concubine was overdramatic. In the narrative he was not totally innocent, for he treated the woman poorly. He handed her to the men to be raped and early in the morning, when he was leaving, found her lying down by the threshold of the door of the house and treated her with disrespect. One wonders whether she was still alive. Cutting her body into twelve parts and sending them to the twelve tribes of Israel constituted a call to the people to come together for war. Saul did something similar, but he instead cut up a pair of oxen into twelve pieces and sent them to the tribes (1 Sam. 11:7).

20:1–48. War with Benjamin. All the tribes, except Benjamin, assembled in Mizpah (meaning “watchtower”), possibly modern Tel en-Nasbeh, 6 miles (9.6 km) north of Jerusalem, to decide what to do with Gibeah. The fact that the inter-tribal organization was still functioning normally points to an early date for these events. In addition to the tribal leaders and elders, 400,000 foot soldiers were present. The Levite recounted his story, stating that the rulers of Gibeah came against him. Most translations render the term ba'al here as “men,” but this word can and often does mean “ruler.” Thus, some translations have “leaders” or “leading citizens” (v. 5); as noted above, in 19:22 they are called (lit.) “sons of Belial.” To further enhance his story, the Levite said they wanted to kill him. Considering what happened to the concubine, he may not have been far off the mark.

The response of the assembly was unanimous. They vowed not to go home until Gibeah was punished. There is a textual difficulty in v. 9 because part of the Hebrew text seems to be missing. According to most translations, the text dealing with their decision says only that they will attack Gibeah “by lot.” This probably means that ten percent of the soldiers had to get supplies and the rest would move against Gibeah. Lots would choose who performed which task. Some translations understand this differently. They convey the idea that they would go up against the city “in the order decided by casting lots,” or that they would “march up against it as the lot determines.” Whatever the case, in complete unity they prepared for war against their own people and were willing to destroy one of their own tribes, something that none of the heathen oppressors ever attempted to do.

Through the Urim and Thumim they had asked the Lord twice before without receiving the assurance that He would give them the victory. The third time, however, they received the promise of victory. It is not clear in the text why the other tribes were defeated twice after the Lord had, on both occasions, sanctioned the battle against Benjamin (vv. 18, 23). Was it only that the Lord wanted to teach them a lesson not to trust in their superior numbers and self-confidence? From time to time, we all have to learn humility through life’s lessons. But perhaps the Lord wanted them to realize that the sin of Gibeah and the Levite’s behavior were only symptoms of the overall low state of morals among them and that, therefore, they all bore responsibility for what had happened. Instead of rushing to battle and being more interested in vengeance than justice, it would probably have been better to humble themselves before God, acknowledge their share of guilt in this matter, and lament over the terrible state of wickedness amongst them. Thus, they would have been better prepared and more in harmony with God’s will to punish the evildoers. As Christians, we need to watch and pray to be kept from an unholy zeal in the Lord’s work. Power and knowledge have to be accompanied by divine wisdom and good judgment in order to be properly used. Only God can provide us with what we need. We need to walk humbly before the Lord, constantly depending on the atonement He provided for the forgiveness of our sins.

21:1–25. Restoration of the Tribe of Benjamin. The last episode in this story of horror shows how the Israelites, after their bloody rampage through the cities of Benjamin, came to their senses and realized that they had gone too far. In their misplaced zeal for vengeance, they had nearly wiped out a whole tribe. Now they sought ways to circumvent their rash decision not to give their daughters as wives to the Benjamites (v. 1). Without wives, the six hundred men at the rock of Rimmon were destined for extinction and with them the whole tribe of Benjamin. Instead of asking God for forgiveness for their rash vow, they continued in their hypocrisy and wiped out the inhabitants of Jabesh Gilead, save for four hundred virgins, because the people of Jabesh Gilead had not come up to the Lord at the assembly in Mizpah (v. 8). The Gileadites were descended from Manasseh, the nephew of Benjamin; thus, there was a blood bond with the descendants of Benjamin.

Following the capture of the four hundred virgins, a delegation was sent to the six hundred men at the rock of Rimmon to invite them back and make peace with them, which they did (v. 14). But because four hundred virgins were not enough for six hundred Benjamite men, the leaders of Israel came up with another plan; they advised the Benjamites to snatch the daughters of Shiloh when they came out to dance at a particular festival (v. 21). This was probably a harvest festival. All this was done to avoid the guilt of perjury by equally detestable actions. However, the arrangement worked, and the Benjamites with their new wives were able to return to a normal life and to begin restoring their devastated cities. That the elders of Israel could advise acts of treachery and violence out of a sense of duty is indicative of their spiritual blindness and shows the effects of an erroneous conscience.

The book closes with the reflection of the author that the absence of a king was largely responsible for the chaotic conditions in Israel in the time of the Judges. The breakdown in God's purposes for Israel illustrates graphically the depravity of human beings, God's wrath against sin, and His mercy and longsuffering with repentant sinners. On the one hand, it is a sad picture of how low God's children can fall; on the other hand, it highlights God's love for even the most depraved of His creatures. It does not surprise us that, for the biblical writer, the solution to the condition of Israel during the period of the Judges was a coming king. Later, kings would arise in Israel, some to instill the fear of Yahweh and others to lead the people away from Him. Yet, the ultimate solution has always been the coming of a messianic King who will establish peace, justice, and righteousness in the land. For the Christian, this Messiah has come in the person of Jesus Christ. He is the only One who can truly liberate us from the oppressive power of sin and from the daily temptation of doing what is right in our own eyes. The partial victories of the judges over the enemies of Israel are almost meaningless compared to what Christ accomplished on the cross and to what will take place at the future consummation of such a victory. The book closes in expectation, waiting for the king.

RUTH

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The book of Ruth, like various biblical books, does not mention its author. Jewish tradition attributes it to Samuel.

Date. The first verse links the narrative to the time of the Judges, Israel's premonarch era when divinely summoned "judges" delivered Yahweh's people from foreign oppressors. This time frame is supported by Boaz being born of Rahab, who received the spies in Joshua's time (Josh. 2; Matt. 1:5). The record of David's lineage, including Boaz and Ruth (4:17–22), could only have been written after David had become important enough to make such details meaningful to a reader or hearer. Thus, if the entire book was written at one time, then it could not have been written earlier than David's anointing (2 Sam. 16) during the reign of Saul.

Backgrounds. The experience of Israel described in the book of Judges provides the background for the story of Naomi and Ruth. The mention of a famine in Bethlehem, normally a fruitful land, suggests that Israel had again departed from Yahweh (see Lev. 26:18–20). But the narrative is not primarily interested in apostasy, since the book indicates that many Israelites were committed to the Lord. It is a beautiful story of profound loving loyalty to God as reflected in loyalty to other human beings. It is an account that explains how Moab (and Canaan, through Boaz's mother, Rahab) became a part of David's family line. On one occasion, David left his parents in Moab for safekeeping (1 Sam. 22:3–4). As a result, this book also shows that not all Moabites were evil.

Literary Features. The book of Ruth is a literary masterpiece. We find references to legal practices (4:1–12), a poem (1:16–17), and a genealogy

(4:18–22). However, the book is fundamentally a narrative characterized by dialogues.

Theology and Purpose. Ruth is a dramatic narrative through which deep theological issues are addressed. The beginning and ending of the story indicate that it deals with the preservation of life, the divine activity in preserving it, and the role of the redeemer (Heb. go'el).

1. Life and Death. As the book opens, the threat of death is immediately introduced. There was a famine in the land of Bethlehem. Confronted with this danger, people searched for a way to survive. The story is about a family's concern for life and the possibility of their total extinction. The actions of practically all characters in the story revolved around the question of survival. In the absence of food in Bethlehem, Elimelech and his family went to Moab to preserve their lives. But Moab could not preserve life. In fact, there the family faced the destructive power of death and meaninglessness, even the apparent absence of the Lord from their lives. At first things seemed to go well. Then the father of the family died, leaving his two sons and wife in a strange land. Things appeared to improve again when the two sons married, thus increasing the potential for preserving the family.

Unfortunately for his two sons, the family did not grow. Their wives bore no children. The threat of extinction for this family reached a point of no return when the two sons of Naomi died. Suddenly time stopped; there was no future for her. She was ready to return to Bethlehem, not to search for life but to quietly die, leaving behind no trace of the existence of her family.

When the narrative is placed within its canonical context, we realize that this family belonged to the genealogical line from which the Messiah, typified by David, would come to preserve human life on this earth. Through a seemingly lifeless family, the Lord would eventually bring eternal life to humanity.

2. God and Life. The God of Naomi was beyond her comprehension. In the first part of the story, He seemed to be absent and she felt the pain of His absence. When death occurs, we may experience His silence, but it is not His absence. There are no miracles in the narrative because, like in the book of Esther, God was working from within history and through the characters of the story. He is a gracious and faithful God. The Hebrew term khesed is used several times in the story to designate an essential characteristic of God. It refers to His gracious, merciful, and faithful commitment to humans. This divine grace was accessible to Israelites and non-Israelites (1:8; 2:20). It is a divine concern for the needs of humans that leads people to show khesed ("mercy," "kindness," "loving loyalty") to others, as Naomi was about to discover.

Discouraged and frustrated with life, Naomi asked her daughters-in-law to abandon her. If God had already abandoned her, there was nothing they could do to change her fate. She had no future. It was at this point in the story that divine grace and love (khesed) flowed from God to Naomi through Orpah and Ruth. In the midst of her pain, the Lord was showing His loving loyalty and kindness through other human beings. Their unwillingness to abandon her indicates that God was still with her. The dramatic commitment of Ruth, not only to Naomi but to Naomi's people and her God, is the most powerful manifestation of divine compassion in the narrative. Through this decision, the potential for the divine preservation of life would become a reality in spite of Naomi's hopelessness.

Divine khesed is the force that drives the plot of the story. It takes the reader from death to life. Although the story begins with death experienced in such a dramatic way that hope dies, it ends with the blossoming of a new life that would preserve the family line from which David would come. The Lord was not allowing death to alter His plan for His people. Life overcomes death and fills the human heart with joy and hope.

3. Redemption. In the narrative, God preserved life through a redeemer. It was through His providential leading that a redeemer was found who was willing to preserve the genealogical line from which the Messiah would come. Naomi knew about a relative of her husband who was still alive and could become her redeemer. Apparently she did not know how to locate him, because when Ruth went out to glean in the fields, it was by chance—a happenstance—that she gleaned in the field of Boaz, Elimelech's relative (2:3). Behind this historical "accident," we find the hand of the Lord leading the narrative to a resolution and to the preservation of the life of this family. Boaz, the redeemer, had the material wealth the two women lacked. He also had a wealth of character and integrity that would be used by the Lord to accomplish His purposes. In this divine plan there was no room for a selfish redeemer. The irresponsible redeemer soon disappeared from the narrative, leaving no trace of his life behind him.

The work of the redeemer was not motivated by selfishness, nor was it the result of an outburst of irrational emotion. Boaz's self-appointment as redeemer took place in the court of law, by the city gate, and before witnesses (Ruth 4:5-11; Deut. 25:5-10; cf. Rev. 5:9-10). The city acknowledged that he had the legal right to redeem, and he joyfully did so. From this point on, the story's emotional tone radically changed because a redeemer had been found. The Lord created for Naomi and Ruth a wonderful future well beyond what they would have anticipated. Through them the true Redeemer would come to redeem the human family.

COMMENTARY

1:1-22

From Moab to Bethlehem

The narrative begins in Bethlehem (1:1), moves to Moab where its plot is significantly developed (vv. 1-18), and closes with the return of Naomi and Ruth to Bethlehem (vv. 19-22).

1:1-5. Elimelech's Family in Moab. The story is about the family of Elimelech and Naomi. They had two sons, Mahlon and Chilion, and were identified as Ephrathites, meaning they were from the region around Bethlehem called Ephrath (Gen. 35:16-19; 48:7). The clan name might derive from Ephrath, the wife of Caleb, whose descendants are described as settling in Bethlehem (1 Chr. 2:19, 50-51; 4:4). The narrator is thus connecting Elimelech's family to its founders, making the subsequent tragedy more poignant. The name Elimelech ("my God [Yahweh] is king" or "God is king") suggests parental religious convictions. Naomi's name could mean "my sweetness" or "sweet, pleasant one," indicative of a parent's joy over a baby girl.

The book of Ruth opens and closes in Bethlehem, a very fertile area about six miles south of Jerusalem. As the book opens, there was no food in the “house of bread” (Bethlehem). In their search for safety and sustenance, Elimelech’s family traveled to Moab, east of the Dead Sea, suggesting that this famine was localized in Israel. The Moabites originated in the incestuous relationship of Lot with his eldest daughter (Gen. 19:30–38) and were often enemies of the Israelites. Elimelech’s family sought refuge among a people who had been hostile to Israel, which might also suggest their dire condition, accentuating the kindness extended to Ruth by Naomi, Boaz, and the people of Bethlehem.

Mahlon and Chilion are first presented as “his two sons.” After Elimelech dies, the text indicates that Naomi was left with her sons (v. 3), a poignant allusion to the calamity. These two sons married Moabite women (v. 4). After about ten years, the two sons of Naomi also died. The writer notes that the woman was left without her two sons and her husband (v. 5), underscoring Naomi’s total loss. In the absence of hope, she simply said that the hand of the Lord had turned against her (v. 13). Her age and poverty eclipsed any hope of marrying again and having more children (vv. 11–13). Naomi and her two daughters-in-law faced a bleak future.

1:6–18. Naomi’s Plans. Never intending Moab to be a permanent home, Naomi made plans to return to Israel. She was returning because she heard that the Lord was giving attention to His people’s needs by providing them with food (lit. “bread”; v. 6). The “house of bread” now had bread. She had gone to Moab with much but was leaving empty.

With nothing to offer her two young daughters-in-law, Naomi first urged each one to return to her own mother’s home (vv. 8–10). References to the mother’s house occur rarely in the OT (Gen. 24:28, 67; cf. Song 3:4; 8:2). She prayed for a happy future for both of them, a future that the Lord was not providing through her. Naomi expressed concern only for the welfare of her daughters-in-law. “Go, return”/“go back” (the Hebrew has double imperatives) suggests urgency, freeing her daughters-in-law from any further responsibility.

Her tenderness is expressed by her prayer that Yahweh would grant them the same khesed (“kindness/mercy”) they had given to her and her family (v. 8b). Though in deep sorrow, her faith in Yahweh was apparent as she commended her Moabite daughters-in-law to Him and His kindness (v. 8). Naomi believed that God’s providential care extended beyond Israel. The Moabites were distant relatives through

Lot (Gen. 19:36–37). Although as a nation they worshiped false gods, Naomi’s words and the fact that Mahlon and Chilion had found acceptable wives among the Moabites may indicate that there was some openness to the God of Abraham. The concept that God was not just a God for the Hebrews but for all nations is seen elsewhere in the OT (Gen. 18:18; 22:18; 26:4; Is. 56:7; Zech. 14:16). In the NT, this concept becomes vital to understanding the scope of the Gospel Commission and ultimate restoration at the end of time (Matt. 28:19; Acts 10:34, 45; 11:18; Rom. 16:26; Rev. 15:4).

Then there were kisses and tears. The Hebrew idiom literally translated “to lift up the voice and weep” (e.g., “weep loudly”) occurs often in contexts of lamentation and mourning, suggesting loud sobbing and, in this context, evidence of affectionate bonds (v. 14). Naomi’s daughters-in-law did not want to leave her, exhibiting a warm and loving attachment. The long dialogue points to the significance of the scene (vv. 8–17). With tearful responses, the two younger widows declared their intention to stay with Naomi and her people (v. 10).

In the second interchange (vv. 11–14), Naomi spoke tenderly to her “daughters,” telling them to return home (v. 11) as she was too old to marry again (v. 12). Even if she would marry and bear sons, it would be too much of a sacrifice for her daughters-in-law to wait until those sons were grown up. The dialogue aims at persuasion. Naomi closed by wailing that the hand of the Lord had gone against her (v. 13). She was experiencing the apparent absence of God, overlooking for a moment that the love of her two daughters-in-law was an expression of God’s loving mercy toward her. Again there were kisses and tears. This time the weeping led to Orpah’s farewell kiss. She returned to Moab, doing what Naomi suggested and bearing Naomi’s blessing of Yahweh. Orpah exits from the narrative.

In the third interchange (vv. 15–18), Naomi turned to Ruth and encouraged her to go back as Orpah did—to her people and her gods (v. 15). The biblical text does not criticize Orpah’s decision, nor does it contrast her negatively with Ruth. Orpah has been commended for her loving kindness and entrusted to the blessing of the Lord. But her decision highlights Ruth’s sacrifice in her decision to “cling to” an aged, widowed mother-in-law. The Hebrew word dabaq (“cling,” “cleave”; v. 14), suggests loyalty or deep affection (Ruth 2:23; cf. Gen. 2:24; 2 Sam. 20:2).

Naomi finally stopped protesting as Ruth reaffirmed her intention, expressed in one of the most sublime statements in Scripture. This is the first time we hear Ruth's voice. Before her three-part commitment to Naomi, her people, and her God, she insisted that Naomi not attempt to dissuade her and invoked Yahweh as witness (v. 16). Her devotion would extend beyond Naomi's life ("where you die, I will die"). Renouncing burial in her homeland, Ruth determined to permanently live out the rest of her life in a foreign country: "Your people will be my people, and your God my God" (v. 16). Rejecting the gods of Moab, Ruth declared Yahweh to be her God, using His covenantal name. She was not seeking a husband but was seeking to serve the true God. This was affirmed with a solemn irreversible oath of her lifelong commitment to her mother-in-law, in which she called a curse from God upon herself if she failed to keep her promise (v. 17).

This decision is unparalleled in Scripture. The exchange between the three women (vv. 8–17) began with the use of Yahweh's name in a blessing from Naomi and ended with Ruth's absolute commitment to Him. Naomi had left Bethlehem with a husband and two sons, but returned with a committed daughter-in-law, whom the women of Bethlehem recognized as being better to her "than seven sons" (4:15).

1:19–22. Arriving in Bethlehem. Omitting any travel details, the journey to Bethlehem is briefly mentioned (v. 19). The narrative then shifts to a scene of happy celebration. The Bethlehemites responded joyously to Naomi's unexpected return. She described her distress with powerful emotions and insisted that they call her Mara ("bitter"). She referred to God with both His covenantal names, yahweh and shadday. Like Job, she questioned God's inscrutable justice because, in her mind, the Almighty had made her bitter (in words very similar to Job 27:2). Naomi—along with Job, the psalmists, and Jeremiah—was honest when suffering. And God accepted her complaints. She rejected the compliments because she had left "full," but now she said that the Almighty (shadday) had afflicted (lit. "to cause distress," "inflict misery," "do harm") her. Her life was always in the hand of the Lord, even during difficult moments.

The narrative is briefly summarized (v. 22), providing a helpful base for the next section. For the first time in the narrative, Naomi's daughter-in-law is identified by her name and ethnic heritage. She is described as one returning from the country of Moab, even though it was her country (1:7, 16, 22; 2:6). The narrative closes with a time frame as they arrived in Bethlehem at the beginning of the barley harvest (v. 22). They arrived when grain was gathered (March or April), barley being the first crop (Ex. 9:31–32; 2 Sam. 21:9). The beginning and end of the chapter have corresponding elements which envelop the narrative. Verse 1 anchors timing and location; v. 22 closes with corresponding details. The chapter begins with famine and departure and then ends with harvest and return.

A Meeting in the Field

This segment of the narrative consists mainly of five dialogues. It opens (v. 2) and closes (vv. 19–22) with conversations between Naomi and Ruth. Boaz talked to his servants (vv. 4–7), with Ruth (vv. 8–14), and again with his servants (vv. 15–16). During the dialogue, the character of those involved was manifested. Ruth's Moabite origin was mentioned several times, and the connection between Boaz and Naomi was restated. Both Ruth and Boaz displayed extraordinary lovingkindness (khesed). Ruth risked ostracism and physical harm as a Moabitess to provide for Naomi. Boaz showed great generosity toward both widows. Boaz's concern for Ruth's well-being, mentioned four times (vv. 8, 15, 16, 22), suggests the possibility of verbal and physical abuse, which occurred in some places and among some people in Israel during the period of the Judges (see Judg. 19; 21).

2:1–7. The Plan of Ruth. Since Boaz plays an important role in the narrative, he is introduced first. He was a relative of Elimelech, deceased husband of Naomi (v. 1). This detail would provide the legal right for Boaz to marry Ruth. He was a wealthy and influential citizen in Bethlehem, a godly man of gracious generosity and uprightness. Ruth unselfishly volunteered to find food by gleaning in the field (v. 2). Although Naomi's son had died, Ruth still honored her mother-in-law, showing courage three times (1:22; 2:2, 21) when her gender, race, and social status put her in danger. Mosaic law commanded compassion for aliens, orphans, and widows, requiring harvesters to deliberately leave grain in the fields for them to glean (Lev. 19:9–10; 23:22; Deut. 24:19). The field scene, like many in the book, includes three conversations involving Boaz and the harvesters or Ruth (vv. 4–16). Ruth went to glean in the field belonging to Boaz, Elimelech's relative (v. 3). The narrative indicates that this "happencance" (Heb. miqreh; v. 3) was under the guidance of the Lord.

2:8–16. Boaz Meets Ruth. Boaz came to the field and greeted the reapers by saying, “The LORD be with you” (v. 4). He was a devout religious person who showed respect to his employees. He also noticed a stranger in his field. After inquiring, he was informed that this person was Ruth, a young Moabite woman (v. 6). She had asked for permission to glean after the reapers and had been working diligently since early in the morning. Male harvesters likely would have noticed her as well, suggesting her vulnerability.

Boaz graciously addressed Ruth as “daughter” (v. 8), suggesting that Boaz was older than Ruth. His offer of help and protection to the Moabiteess revealed the absence of racial prejudice (his mother being Rahab, a Canaanite). He instructed his employees to be respectful of her and allowed her to glean among the regular sheaves where gleaners were not permitted—a generous gesture exceeding Israelite law. Ruth was also offered the water that Boaz provided for regular employees (v. 9). She responded with few words, respectful of her social status. She recognized the social disparity between them and bowed before him as a sign of respect, asking why he was so kind as to notice her, a foreigner (v. 10). Boaz knew the story about Ruth and Naomi and the lovingkindness (khesed) Ruth had manifested toward her mother-in-law. He referred to everything she had done for Naomi, also mentioning the fact that Ruth had left her father, mother, and land of her birth. Thus, like Abram and Sarah (Gen. 12:1–5), Ruth also abandoned the security of her homeland, choosing the life of an alien in order to follow Naomi and her God.

Boaz’s request to the Lord to protect Ruth uses the metaphor of a mother bird protecting her young. God is referred to as the One under whose “wings” Ruth had come for refuge (v. 12; see also Deut. 32:11–12; cf. Matt. 23:37). Boaz blessed her—asking the Lord to reward her work—without knowing that he would be God’s instrument in the realization of the blessing (v. 12). Boaz also invited Ruth to lunch. A land owner eating with his workers was notable, but Boaz’s generosity and compassion toward this poor Moabite widow was specifically noticeable. Qali (“parched,” “roasted” grain; v. 14) was a staple food at the time, and Boaz presented Ruth with a surplus amount.

After a generous meal, Ruth got up to glean again. Boaz now emphatically ordered his employees to let her glean among the bundles (or sheaves), to deliberately leave some extra for her, and to not humiliate or rebuke her (vv. 15–16).

The lovingkindness of Ruth moved others to show kindness to her. In his treatment of Ruth, Boaz displayed divine generosity and care for others.

The narrative summarizes Ruth’s long day of work. She gleaned in the field until evening and then beat out what amounted to an “ephah” of barley (v. 17; see below, “Ephah”). Beating out the grain would separate the husks from kernels, eliminating extra weight when carrying the kernels home.

2:17–23. Ruth Informs Naomi. When Ruth returned to Naomi, she informed her mother-in-law that the man she worked with that day was named Boaz (v. 19). Naomi spontaneously pronounced a blessing, mentioning that he was their close relative: a go’el (“redeemer”). Naomi knew that Israelite family law invested near relatives with certain duties, particularly the obligation of an unmarried brother-in-law (Heb. yabam) to marry his brother’s widow to prevent the name of a deceased man from dying out (Deut. 25:5–10). Although the situation of Naomi and Ruth did not correspond fully, it reflected the general intent of the “levirate” (from the Latin for brother-in-law, levir) system. That said, Obed is never in Scripture called the son of anyone other than Boaz (Ruth 4:21; 1 Chron. 2:12; Matt. 1:5; Luke 3:32).

The term go’el occurs for the first time in the narrative (v. 20) and becomes a key word connected to Boaz. Naomi again mentioned the lovingkindness (khesed) of God, manifested in Ruth “accidentally” arriving at Boaz’s field (vv. 20–21). Ruth followed the counsel of both Boaz (v. 8) and Naomi (v. 22) throughout both harvests of barley and wheat, a period of seven to eight weeks (late April to June). The harvest

Ephah

The word “ephah,” probably meaning “basket” or a basket’s capacity, is borrowed from Egypt (Zech. 5:5–11). The exact weight of an ephah is debated—in any case, it was a heavy load. In the OT, it was a standard dry grain measure (Ex. 16:36; Lev. 19:36; Amos 8:5). Gideon prepared bread for the angel of Yahweh using an ephah of flour (Judg. 6:19), and Jesse sent his son David with an ephah to his elder brothers (1 Sam. 17:17). For Ruth to harvest an ephah in one day suggests long hours of diligent work, assisted by Boaz’s generosity.

time provided the opportunity for Boaz and Ruth to see each other over several weeks (v. 23). The end of the grain harvest suggests that Ruth and Boaz would not see each other anymore. But the main plot of the story has not yet reached its resolution, since Ruth was still dwelling in the house of Naomi.

On the Threshing Floor

Significant space is given to a narrative that took place during one night, indicating that the story is reaching a resolution. Naomi gave detailed instructions to Ruth (vv. 1–4), which she followed when she and Boaz met again (vv. 6–13). Ruth then returned to Naomi and reported what happened (vv. 16–17). A new future was rising before them. Their lives were about to change in significant ways.

3:1–6. The Plan of Naomi. Seeking a better future for Ruth, Naomi directed her on a mission (vv. 1–4), addressing her again as “daughter.” Ruth had previously pledged to care for Naomi; now Naomi wanted to find security for her. Realizing that she would not be able to provide for Ruth much longer, she desired to provide Ruth with the security that marriage could bring. Her rhetorical question about Boaz (v. 2) again highlighted their kinship, a key element of her plan.

Boaz apparently had not indicated any interest in Ruth. Perhaps Ruth still wore the garments of widowhood and Boaz did not want to interfere with mourning her husband’s death. Naomi decided to tweak the situation with an audacious plan. As the grain harvest finished

(2:23), Naomi knew that Boaz would be on the threshing floor.

Ruth was instructed to bathe, anoint herself, put on her best clothes (v. 3), and go to the threshing floor. This does not need to imply that Ruth was staging a seductive situation. She was going out at night and was to dress appropriately, needing clothing for warmth at the threshing floor where Boaz spent the night guarding harvested grain. Naomi told Ruth not to make herself known until Boaz had gone to sleep (v. 3). Boaz would likely be in a contented mood and thus more likely to acquiesce to the request.

While Boaz was sleeping, Ruth was to uncover his feet and lie down. This expression has caused much discussion. The Hebrew terms for “feet” (margelah) and “lie down” (shakab) can be taken literally. As such, the phrase “uncover his feet” means to expose them to the night’s cooler temperatures so as to awaken him. Some have pointed out that both of these terms are also associated with the genitals and sexual activity respectively. Notice, for example, how regel (a word closely related to margelah; Deut. 28:57; 2 Kin. 18:27; Ezek. 16:25) and shakab (e.g., Gen. 30:16; 39:12; Ex. 22:16) are used. The narrative indicates that “feet” is used in a literal sense (v. 14) because it clearly speaks about the place or area where his feet are lying (margelah designates the place of the feet of a person who is lying down).

Since Ruth was known to be virtuous (v. 11) and this story was obviously shared without embarrassment, there is no reason to understand the narrative as describing immoral behavior. Naomi mentioned nothing about seduction, speaking only of her concern to provide security for Ruth. Neither does she say anything about Ruth lying next to Boaz. Ruth was simply to lie down and wait for Boaz to wake up and tell her what to do (v. 4).

Threshing Grain

After the grain was harvested, it was bundled in the field and carried manually or by cart to the threshing floor (Amos 2:13) to be beaten or trampled under animal hooves (Mic. 4:13). Sometimes the grain was crushed under the wheel of a cart to remove husks from the kernels (Is. 28:28). Threshed grain was tossed into the air, kernels separated from the husks (Amos 9:9), wind dispersed the chaff (Hos. 13:3), and kernels fell to the ground. It was then sifted and collected in piles (Matt. 3:12). The straw was used to feed animals. Threshing floors were strategically placed to take advantage of breeze patterns.

3:7–13. Ruth and Boaz. Boaz had enjoyed his dinner and was in good spirits. The Hebrew literally says “his heart was cheerful” (v. 7). The idiom expresses the contentment and well-being accompanying a pleasant experience. When Boaz awoke suddenly in the middle of the night and learned of Ruth’s identity, she took the initiative and (through symbolic language) proposed marriage in accordance with the levirate system.

Ruth invited Boaz to cover her, symbolically confirming his obligation to her. Whether this was a covering of a garment or a metaphor of being taken under his wing, the concept was clearly one of protection and redemption, foreshadowing the ultimate redemption provided by Christ (Matt. 23:37; Rom. 3:24). God uses the same phrase in Ezekiel 16:8 for His relationship with Israel. Boaz was required to do so because he was a close relative (go'el). Ruth obviously understood the duties of the go'el and that Boaz should fulfill them. It is at this point that the nobility of Boaz is revealed. Rather than taking advantage of the situation, he praised Ruth for her family loyalty and bold action. Earlier, Boaz had praised Ruth's care for her mother-in-law (2:11) and now he praised her as a noble, virtuous woman (vv. 10–11). She had shown even more kindness than at first (v. 10). Perhaps she had been shy or nervous, for Boaz told Ruth to not be afraid, promising to fulfill her petition and noting that everyone in Bethlehem knew she was a noble woman (v. 11).

Boaz acknowledged a complication in honoring her request, reassuring her that he would work things out. A closer kinsman in the family line complicated the situation, perhaps explaining why Boaz had not exercised his go'el duties previously. He also lauded Ruth for not pursuing younger men, either poor or rich (v. 10), suggesting that Ruth might have had other marriage suitors. Ruth was a young woman and could have attracted younger men. Instead she was devoted to Naomi and this impressed Boaz. Boaz commended Ruth for being a woman “of noble character”/“a virtuous woman” (v. 11). This matched Ruth's character with the description of Boaz in chapter 2.

Boaz advised Ruth to remain for the rest of the night (v. 13), using the identical word she had used in 1:16 when she promised to lodge wherever Naomi did. To “lodge” has no sexual overtones in the Hebrew Bible. It was too late to leave the threshing floor in the middle of the night, but she guarded her (and his) reputation by not being recognized or seen leaving. Any negative innuendo could hamper legal transactions at the city gate in the morning.

3:14–18. Ruth Returns to Naomi. When Boaz assured Ruth that he would do what he could, he used the word go'el four times—sealing his determination in a strong oath with an emphatic pronoun (lit. “[by] the life of Yahweh”). Boaz would settle the matter through proper procedure, not denying another man's right to act responsibly. Blessings formed an envelope around the speech of Boaz. He sent Ruth home with threshed grain, loading one of her garments, perhaps some kind of outer mantle.

Ruth presented Naomi with the unusually large amount of threshed grain from Boaz, mentioning his statement that the narrator did not record earlier—that Ruth should not go home to her mother-in-law empty-handed. These are Ruth's last recorded words in the book (v. 17). Naomi, who declared herself “empty” when returning from Moab (1:21), was empty no longer. She had suffered two tragedies of emptiness: famine and childlessness. The generosity of Boaz replaced famine with food, and his go'el promise suggested that her childlessness might soon end. The narrative next moves toward the climax.

At the City Gate

The question as to whether there was a go'el for Elimelech was already settled in chapter 3. Now the question is whether the close relative would perform the duty of the go'el. The chapter opens with Boaz going to the city gate that morning (v. 1) and closes with him taking the responsibility of a go'el, bringing hope to the poor widows and sustaining the posterity of Elimelech through Obed, whom Naomi treated as her own son (v. 17).

4:1–4. The Nameless Redeemer. Civil and legal matters were handled at the city gate (Deut. 21:19; 22:15; 25:7). Ready for business, Boaz beckoned Elimelech's close relative without naming him. Ironically, the man who refused to preserve the name of his deceased kin was not named (vv. 6, 8).

The elders of the town joined the two men. These elders governed the community's civil and legal affairs (Deut. 25:7–8; Judg. 8:14, 16; 1 Sam. 11:3). Perhaps Boaz, a wealthy land owner, was one of the elders. Verses 3–10 record the legal proceeding, with one explanatory verse (v. 7). In the legal proceedings, Elimelech was called “our brother”/“our relative” (v. 3). Clan property was never to be taken permanently from the family. In Leviticus, the go'el was to solve property issues (25:23–25). Since Naomi possessed land, a go'el could redeem her property. Perhaps someone had annexed Elimelech's land while she was in Moab. Boaz spoke on behalf of Naomi, using proper legal terminology. The legal rights of the other kinsman were recognized as Boaz informed him in the presence of the elders (4:4). Acknowledging kinship order in the family, he wanted to know the other kinsman's intention (cf. Jer. 32:7–9). The other kinsman replied that he would redeem the property. Boaz added the pivotal stipulation (4:5), informing the other kinsman that Ruth would come with Elimelech's property because he had no sons—only two widows remained. Naomi's widowhood is not mentioned, probably because her advanced age prevented her from bearing children.

Boaz argued that Elimelech's family line was precarious; Naomi was past child-bearing age and her two sons had died. Ruth was her daughter-in-law. The kinsman marrying Ruth would guard Elimelech's name by fathering an heir through her. The main issue was not simply to retain the land or to care for Ruth but to ensure that Elimelech's family line would survive. The other kinsman declined the go'el duties. He changed his mind, perhaps previously calculating that the widow associated with the land was aged Naomi, who would pose no complication. His own land holdings would increase, and being loyal to the family name would enhance his reputation. Future profits from the land could offset expenses in caring for the elderly Naomi. But Ruth, a much younger widow, was able to bear a child—a rightful heir to Elimelech's property. He thereby waived his redemption rights (4:6), saying that he could not do it and that Boaz should act as redeemer instead, leaving no doubt regarding his decision.

4:5–12. Boaz the Redeemer. Without any hesitation, Boaz accepted the kinsman duties. Bethlehem's elders accepted the legality of the nearer kinsman's decision and Boaz's proposal. The biblical writer comments on a binding custom utilized with property transfers and redemptions (v. 7). The sandal symbolized the legal transfer of the right of redemption from one relative to another (see Deut. 25:5–10). Boaz then exercised the redemption right he had just acquired (v. 9). He spoke to the elders and to everyone listening to the proceedings. "You are witnesses today" was apparently an OT "notarizing" action (see Josh. 24:22; 1 Sam. 12:5; Is. 43:9–10, 12; 44:8). Boaz specified the issues involved in the transaction, including everything which belonged to Elimelech, Chilion, and Mahlon. He then added that Ruth had been married to Mahlon, perhaps necessary for the formal, legal declaration. This is the only time that the narrative mentions which son of Elimelech Ruth had married.

After the transfer of responsibilities, Boaz enumerated the specific details of what had happened. His speech was framed with identical phrases, "You are witnesses today" and "today," highlighting his promptness in fulfilling his promises to Ruth (3:13) and honoring Naomi's confidence in him (3:17). This family's tragic situation ended as Boaz stated emphatically that he had acquired Ruth the Moabite, Mahlon's widow, as his wife. The marriage itself would occur later (v. 13). The elders and the people at the gate responded by saying, "We are witnesses" (v. 11). With the transaction complete, a blessing was pronounced on Boaz and Ruth that Yahweh would establish a place for Ruth among Rachel and Leah, the foundational matriarchs of Israel. Like Rachel and Leah, Ruth would become an ancestress of the covenant line (vv. 11–12).

The witnesses also mentioned Judah's prominent family line, comparing Ruth with Tamar. Both were foreigners who perpetuated Judah's family line when threatened with extinction. Comparing Tamar and Ruth does not disparage their characters or ethnicity but equates the levirate nature of their situations. The blessings knit together several themes—as Rachel and Leah built up the house of Israel, so Ruth might build up the house of Boaz (see Deut. 25:9; see also 1 Sam. 2:35; 1 Kin. 1:38; 1 Chr. 17:10). The blessing of fertility was emphasized by referring to Ruth as a "young woman" (v. 12). The closing line invoked Yahweh's blessing upon her descendants (lit. "seed"; Gen. 12:7; 13:15; 2 Sam. 7:12) whom the Lord would give her. Yahweh is exalted as the true source of offspring.

4:13–22. A Genealogy. Having married Ruth, Boaz consummated the marriage. Employing a unique grammatical construction, the narrator shows that Yahweh "enabled her to conceive"/"gave her conception." Yahweh's action opens and closes the book (1:6; 4:13). While married to Mahlon, Ruth was not able to bear a child. Now Yahweh blessed her, and she gave birth to a son to preserve the family line. In the final scene, the women of Bethlehem prayed for the baby, bursting into praise to Yahweh for His kindness and goodness (vv. 14–15).

When the book opened, Naomi spoke of her life as being emptied, but after the birth of Obed she was full of joy. Ruth was declared to be better to Naomi than seven sons. A Moabite foreigner revealed true khesed in Bethlehem. In a sense, death was overcome. Baby Obed would be a restorer/renewer of life for Naomi (v. 15a), assuring that the family line would continue. He would also nourish and sustain her in her old age, a reversing Naomi's suffering from serious famine earlier and providing in some sense a joyous antidote for her childlessness (1:11–13, 20–21). Naomi's bitter outburst closed chapter 1; these exuberant comments bring reversal. The inclusio, opening in 1:5 where Naomi is bereft of her two sons, closes with baby Obed in Naomi's bosom and reversing her tragic emptiness (v. 16). Surprisingly, the women give the child his name (v. 17), which means "servant." It could be that the women were confirming the name chosen by his parents, underscoring a jubilant moment.

Although nothing more is known about Obed, his birth is significant because his grandson would be David. God built the royal line through a Moabite widow. The genealogical heading (v. 18) referring to Perez is followed by nine entries in the "A-generated-B" pattern, the form appearing several times in Genesis. The genealogy in Ruth traces David's descent from Perez, the son of another foreign widow, Tamar. The promise of blessing to all people through Abraham finds partial fulfillment in the story of Ruth (Gen. 12:1–3). This promise pushes history forward and fills it with expectation and hope.

1 SAMUEL

INTRODUCTION

Title. The two books known today as First and Second Samuel were originally considered one book in the Hebrew Bible, called the “book of Samuel.” The division into two books in modern translations was due to the combined length of fifty-five chapters. Following the pattern of some biblical books that end with the death of the main character (Gen. 50, Deut. 34, Josh. 24, etc.), the division between the two books of Samuel was made with King Saul at the point of death.

The practice of dividing Samuel’s book into two volumes originates with the Septuagint (LXX), the earliest translation of the Hebrew Bible into Greek. In this ancient version, 1 Samuel is called “First Kingdoms” (Basileion Alpha). The division into two books has been followed by later translations of the Bible. The opening chapters of 1 Samuel set the prophetic tone by telling the story of Samuel’s birth and his early ministry for the Lord at the sanctuary in Shiloh.

Date and Authorship. Although the book does not explicitly name its author, the title of 1 Samuel reflects the dominant role the prophet Samuel played in the first volume. Samuel was the last of the charismatic judges in Israel prior to the rise of kings. He also functioned as prophet and priest. In such a capacity, this leader anointed Saul and David, Israel’s first two kings, whose personal lives and activities occupy the major part of the narrative. Jewish tradition assigns authorship of the first volume to Samuel and the second volume to Nathan and Gad. This seems to find some support in 1 Chronicles 29:29, which states that information concerning David’s reign could be found in books by Samuel, Nathan the prophet, and Gad the seer. If this hypothesis regarding authorship is correct, the final book of Samuel was probably produced shortly before or soon after the death of David. They cover the history of Israel from about 1100 B.C. to 971 B.C.

Linguistic and literary/critical approaches to the Bible have proposed a number of theories for the book’s anonymous composition. Many of those theories have proven to be too hypothetical to be taken seriously. Clearly, a periodic updating of the language of 1 Samuel is evidenced in 1 Samuel 27:6, which states that time has elapsed since the recorded narrative occurred. At the same time, the author(s) of the books of Samuel explicitly claim to have used authentic source documents (2 Sam. 1:18) mentioned elsewhere in the Bible. In this commentary, biblical passages are treated as they stand. Their unity, as well as their historical and literary quality, is highly affirmed. Ultimately, the authority of the Bible rests on its divine origin.

Backgrounds. First Samuel is the sequel to the book of Judges. Together with 2 Samuel, it presents the story of Israel’s first two kings, Saul and David. First Samuel begins by presenting the delicate transition of leadership in Israel from tribal judges to the first widely accepted monarch, King Saul. In fact, the author of the book of Judges repeatedly attributed the prevailing chaos and anarchy in the land to the absence of a king who could give the people a sense of national identity and security (Judg. 17:6; 18:1; 21:25). The transfer of power could be peaceful (from Eli to Samuel), problematic (from Samuel to Saul), or even difficult and openly hostile (from Saul to David).

Theology and Purpose. Due to its location within the canon, the books of Samuel are popularly viewed as primarily “historical” in character. However, they belong to a section of the Hebrew Bible known as “Early/Former Prophets.” The books of Samuel offer us a significant amount of theological themes for analysis, making it difficult to choose one as central.

Among the most important themes is the topic of divine leadership versus human interference.

1. Leadership in Transition. In the books of Samuel, we are confronted with one of the most serious crises in the history of the people of Israel. It was an attempt to redefine the nature of the relationship between God and Israel. The leaders were rejecting an old administrative structure and style—namely, theocracy—in order to introduce a new one, a monarchy with a human king. The relationship between God and Israel was properly defined and established at Mount Sinai. There Israel had an awesome encounter with God. This encounter transformed the twelve tribes into “a kingdom of priests” among the nations, a “holy nation” to the Lord (Ex. 19:6). God was recognized and accepted by the people as their only true King (Ex. 19:8; 15:18), dwelling among them while blessing, instructing, and protecting them. Thus, the theocracy was born.

The new model was, in many respects, incompatible with Israel’s faith. The new system, if accepted, had to be transformed or reformulated in order for it to properly fit into the Israelite faith. The books of Samuel describe the process by which God was transforming, reformulating, and redefining kingship as known in the ANE, and Israel’s demand for an earthly king was a threat to His leadership.

The books of Samuel open during the old system of judges but close with a new system in place. The first book introduces Samuel, the last judge of Israel. He is the link between the old system and the new one. He was located at a critical juncture in the history of the nation and was indispensable for a proper theological, historical, and spiritual transition. Samuel was a true giant among the prophets of the OT.

2. Redefining Human Kingship. Samuel begins redefining the nature of kingship in Israel based on God’s instructions given in Deuteronomy 17:14–20. The king was to be an Israelite and was not to imitate the absolute monarchs of the surrounding nations by accumulating emblems of power and worldly grandeur. Instead, he was told to focus on the reading and practice of the Torah, God’s revelation of truth and justice. Moreover, the king was to think of himself as a fellow Israelite brother. According to the Bible, kings in Israel were not allowed to do as they pleased. They were subject to a higher power and to the rule of law and morality, which was upheld by the prophets. In other words, they were to function as vassals of the true King of Israel, the Lord.

The success of the redefinition of kingship would depend to some extent on the attitude and self-perception of the early kings of Israel. The appointments of Saul and his successor were of critical importance. Herein lies the reason for the significant amount of space dedicated to the lives of Saul and David in the book. The contrasts between the two are very marked and deal with their own understanding of their role as king. It is soon apparent that Saul wanted to be king and not so much a vassal of the Lord. He acted on his own, independent of God, and the result is his rejection. God was redefining the nature of kingship in Israel, and Saul was not the model. The true model was David. He thought and acted as a vassal of the Lord—the servant of the Lord, under whose authority he functioned. He became the ideal king who was used to evaluate the performance of all later kings. He would also become a type of the future Messiah, Christ Jesus. In Christ, the divine King and the earthly king become one to rule over a kingdom that will last forever.

3. God’s Presence and Purpose in History. The books of Samuel are not just historical but also prophetic in nature, teaching that the Lord cared for the people of Israel in spite of their repeated failures. The sanctuary with the ark of the covenant in the midst of the community was a constant reminder of God’s abiding presence among His people. But His presence should not be taken for granted. The destruction of the sanctuary at Shiloh happened because of sin and rebellion (Ps. 78:60). Later prophets taught the people not to place their trust in the physical presence of the temple but instead to place their hope in the living God, obeying the covenant stipulations and showing mercy and justice to others (Jer. 7:4–7).

In spite of the constant failures of the nation’s leaders, the Lord never completely abandoned His people. Even when human leaders fell short of the divine ideal, God promised that the coming Messiah from the house of David would fulfill His promises. Biblical narratives make it clear that God’s providence directed the course of both Israel’s history and that of the nations, infusing them with everlasting hope.

Literary Features. Historical narrative is certainly dominant, but it is not the only literary form used in 1 Samuel. Songs and lists are scattered throughout the book. Conversations are usually brief and include only what is essential for the reader to know. Three characters stand prominently in the stories: Samuel, the godly prophet; Saul, Israel's first king; and David, son of Jesse, the young king-elect.

The personal life of each leader is portrayed realistically, filled with their passions and aspirations. Both negative and positive qualities are placed side by side in the text. Samuel, for example, is depicted as a deeply spiritual person, whose sons unfortunately fell short of their father's outstanding example. King Saul, on the other hand, was a brave warrior who failed to heed the divine instruction given through the prophet. Young David was a very talented person with a deep sense of justice, yet he had difficulties managing his passions as well as his family's affairs. In terms of content, the book deals with the ministry of Samuel (chaps. 1–8), the reign of Saul (chaps. 9–15), and the relationship between Saul and David (chaps. 16–31).

COMMENTARY

1:1—8:22

THE MINISTRY OF SAMUEL

The opening chapters of the book focus on Samuel's early years, and they are cast in contrast with the failures of the two sons of the high priest Eli, who would normally inherit their father's position. Samuel and the two young men were reared in the same house, yet his dedication to the Lord differed from that of these two priests, who were evil and disconnected from the Lord (2:12). Samuel grew in favor with the Lord and with the people (2:26). This section discusses the birth and call of Samuel (chaps. 1–3), struggles with the Philistines (chaps. 4–7), and the call for a king (8:1–22).

1:1—3:21

Samuel's Birth and Call

The book begins with the story of the family of Elkanah and his two wives. Elkanah belonged to a distinguished Levitical family line in Israel. Samuel was born into that family and his unusual birth led to the dedication of his life to the Lord.

1:1–7. The Family of Elkanah. Although monogamy was the ideal form of marriage in Israel, some men had more than one wife (Deut. 21:15–17). Old Testament narratives describe the dangers and evil results of this practice, as is the case in 1 Samuel. Elkanah's family lived in Ramah (1 Sam. 1:19) in the territory of Ephraim, but he belonged to the tribe of Levi (1 Chr. 6:26, 33–43). The phrase “an Ephraimite” in Elkanah's genealogy (1:1) should be understood to mean that they lived among the Ephraimites. This is further supported by the fact that Samuel wore a linen ephod (2:18) and ministered in the sanctuary.

They worshiped no other gods but the Lord of hosts, who cannot be “defied” by an enemy (1 Sam. 17:45). They lived a good life. The focus of the story is on Samuel's mother, Hannah, whose name means “grace.” Hannah's inability to have children spoiled the happiness of her marriage to Elkanah, whose name ironically means “God creates” or “God possesses.” It is likely that Elkanah married Peninnah because Hannah was barren.

To not have children in that culture was viewed as a disgrace or a sign of God's disapproval (Gen. 30:1, 22–23). Yet Scripture includes several stories about formerly childless women who, after being visited by God, gave birth to outstanding leaders such as Isaac (Gen. 21:1–8), Jacob (Gen. 25:19–26), Joseph (Gen. 30:1–4, 22–24), and Samson (Judg. 13:2–3, 24). Elkanah's double portion of gifts to Hannah was a sign of his great affection (cf. Gen. 43:34). Peninnah seemed jealous and intentionally hurt Hannah, who did not reciprocate but chose to weep in silence.

1:8–18. Hannah's Vow. Elkanah's reference to his devotion as more important than ten sons links this story with the previous book in the Bible (Ruth 4:15 refers to seven sons). Like Naomi, Hannah in her despair decided to turn to the God of Israel for help. Neither of these two ladies was disappointed in the end. Samuel's parents went on annual pilgrimages to the sanctuary at Shiloh to present themselves and their offerings before the Lord. This statement links the books of Samuel with the end of the book of Judges, where it is explained how an annual festival to the Lord was established in Israel (Judg. 21:19; cf. Ex. 23:17).

During the pilgrimages Hannah did not eat, yet she sat politely with her family until the end of the meals. There in God's presence at Shiloh, Hannah poured her heart out and asked the Lord to give her a son. She made a sacred vow (cf. Num. 30) to dedicate him to lifelong service in the sanctuary. Hannah's vow begins and ends with the mention of God's name. She also solemnly promised to raise her child as a Nazirite. The Nazirites were persons whose appearance and behavior showed a special dedication to God (see Num. 6; Judg. 13). After receiving a blessing from Eli, Hannah returned home in full confidence that the Lord had heard her supplication.

1:19–28. Samuel is Born and Dedicated.

Whenever a Bible passage states that the Lord “remembers” an individual or group, it means that He plans to bring an end to their distress (cf. Gen. 8:1; Ex. 2:24–3:10). God’s providence overrode Hannah’s inability to have children. Although Samuel’s birth was natural, it was remarkable because the divine power was at work in a special way at his conception. This is why Hannah named her son Samuel, which can mean “His name is God” or “[the one] heard by God.” Both meanings demonstrate how in biblical times names commemorated significant experiences with the living God. The verb “to ask” dominates this passage in the original Hebrew (especially vv. 26 and 27). Hannah’s experience anticipates Jesus’s words, “Ask and it will be given to you...” (Matt. 7:7).

Hannah knew that her child was a special gift from God. After she stopped nursing him, she kept her vow and dedicated him to serve the Lord at the sanctuary in Shiloh under Eli’s care. This was in spite of Samuel’s young age. According to the custom in those days, a special ceremony was held for the child at the age of two or three years to mark the end of the weaning period. Abraham did this for his son Isaac (Gen. 21:8).

Hannah’s act of faith received support from her husband, whose words sounded as reassuring as the blessing she had previously received from the high priest Eli (v. 17). The couple’s special offering to the Lord also included “a three-year-old bull” (v. 25), as well as a measure of flour and grape juice. Yet the best part of the offering was Samuel, their “living sacrifice,” who was dedicated to the Lord all his life (v. 28). Hannah’s dedicatory words remind us of Eli’s blessing (v. 17) and underline the complete fulfillment of the promised blessing.

2:1–10. Hannah’s Prayer. Since this prayer takes a poetic form, it has also been called a song or psalm. In fact, many prayers found in the Bible are praise hymns, just like the one composed by Daniel in Babylon (Dan. 2:20–23). Hannah’s prayer can be best described as a thanksgiving psalm of victory. Some interpreters call Hannah’s prayer the “Magnificat” of the Old Testament” due to its similarity with Mary’s song of praise found in Luke 1.

This prayer celebrates God’s righteousness and sovereignty as it brings down the proud and lifts up the humble. It praises God because He is powerful enough to reverse the fortunes of human beings. In a situation filled with hostility and despair, the Lord has provided a way out. He who is perfectly holy has exalted Hannah’s horn, a common biblical symbol of power (see Ps. 92:10). The word “horn” in the original Hebrew is found at the beginning and end of this prayer, forming brackets around it. The reference to God guarding the feet of His children is a metaphor of divine providence (v. 9).

The Lord also upsets human schemes and causes reversals in individual lives and societies. Poor and rich, weak and mighty, living and dead are all subject to the One who is all powerful. To bring up from the grave (Heb. she’ol; v. 6) means to deliver from the power of death (see Ps. 30:3–4). God alone controls the rise and fall of nations on the face of all the earth. Divine security and stability are comparable to a rock, a metaphor for God’s never-failing support and protection.

As Hannah said, God is all-knowing and examines the actions of human beings (cf. Prov. 24:12). Her prayer begins with a personal experience, but it ends with a far and wide proclamation of God’s goodness and power. He has promised to take an active role in the events of human history in order to save the righteous and punish the wicked. Even the remotest people on earth (v. 10) would see God’s involvement in the events of history through His appointed agent, who would be anointed to fulfill His great plan of salvation. God’s “anointed one” is mashiakh in Hebrew, the word from which “Messiah” is derived. Here the term refers to the future king of Israel, who would be chosen by God. The psalm looks forward to the reign of David, the man after God’s own heart, but it equally anticipates the future Son of David, the Savior of the world. His life and work will bring about God’s ultimate victory over cosmic evil.

2:12–17. The Wicked Sons of Eli. It is tragic that the two priests who ministered before the Lord did not acknowledge His holy presence in the sanctuary. Their high calling should have been to exalt the holiness of God before all who came to worship. They had been called to be a light to Israel, but these two sons of Eli practiced evil and wickedness in God’s very presence in the sanctuary.

Priests in Israel were entitled to a portion of the animal offering only after the fat had been burned as a sacrifice to the Lord. But the sons of Eli put themselves in first place and their servant threatened to use force to take whatever the priests wanted, showing contempt for God and His holy place. Individuals in leadership positions who dare to abuse their privileged status and take advantage of others cannot escape divine retribution.

2:18–21. Samuel's Childhood Ministry. The sons of Eli set a very negative example for young Samuel, who ministered before the Lord under Eli's supervision. But Samuel's character shows the opposite of what he saw in the behavior of Hophni and Phinehas. His spiritual ascent is contrasted with the moral descent of the house of Eli. In the same sanctuary of God where an obedient person prospers, the proud and the arrogant are condemned.

The narrative demonstrates the radical change in the life of Hannah and her husband as they went to the sanctuary every year. Yes, they went full of joy and gratitude to worship the Lord but also to visit their son who was already ministering before the Lord. He was the concrete expression of an answered prayer, growing now before the Lord to become one of the most important leaders of God's people. This time Hannah did not ask for a child, but Eli blessed her, asking the Lord to give her more children. He appropriated her prayer, perhaps with a poignant recognition and regret for his own failings.

The contrast between Samuel, a growing boy of integrity and promise, and Eli's own decadent sons was readily apparent. The blessing was more than a simple pronouncement of gracious words and hopes. It conveyed the direct and rewarding interaction by God in the lives of the faithful parents, as evidenced by the children born to them year by year. Thus, the divine blessing Eli was prompted to give carried an implied rebuke for his own inexcusable failings to confront the problems in his own family. Eli is presented to us as a pathetic figure, one who knew what was right and perhaps earnestly wished things to be different, but who lacked the will to act and weakly settled for events to play out with terrible consequences.

2:22–36. Prophecy Against Eli's Household. Ironically, the Tent of Meeting between the holy God and His worshiping people (Ex. 29–40) became a meeting point between corrupt priests and women who served at the entrance of the tabernacle (cf. Ex. 38:8). The morally weak father could only rebuke his sons (1 Sam. 2:24) instead of finding courage to remove them from the priestly office.

The two men had gone so far in their sins that they were affecting the spiritual lives of others. They represented God in the eyes of the people. As such there was no remedy for their transgressions, and nothing less than death was their deserved punishment (cf. Lev. 10:1–3); God had pronounced a death penalty against them. They sinned greatly against both God and their fellow Israelites by defeating the very purpose for which the Lord had appointed them to the priestly ministry (Deut. 33:8–10). As for young Samuel, he grew in good reputation with God and other people, as the boy Jesus would do many years later (cf. Luke 2:52).

Eli's desperate warnings to his sons were reinforced by a prophetic voice. A man of God not only rebuked the sins committed in Eli's household but also predicted the end to his priestly dynasty. Of particular note was the prediction that Eli's male descendants would die young. The presence of old persons in one's household was a visible sign of God's blessings in biblical times. The Hebrew word for "house" can refer to family or dynasty, and it occurs no less than ten times in this passage. The harsh verdict pronounced here applied primarily to the death of Eli's sons, who both died a violent death in a single day (1 Sam. 4:11), showing that they did not represent God, for He was not with them in battle. That same verdict applies later to the sad story of the massacre of the priests of Nob (chap. 22).

The text does not reveal who was appointed by God to take the place of Eli and his family. The later biblical narrative informs us that the line of Zadok, the priest who replaced Eli's descendant Abiathar, served the Lord faithfully during the time of God's "anointed" leader (v. 36), King David (2 Sam. 8:17; 1 Kin. 2:26–27). The words referring to God's anointed in vv. 10 and 35 bracket a passage in which the story of Samuel's ascent and the descent of the sons of Eli is located. Moreover, the same Hebrew word ('aman; "to be reliable, faithful") can refer to both the priest and his house. As for Samuel, he was destined to become a faithful prophet of the Lord, which is the topic of the next passage.

3:1–21. Samuel's First Prophecy. Chapter 3 presents the story of Samuel's call to prophetic ministry. The revelation that God gave to Samuel marked him as a prophet. Samuel was not the only person in the Bible who was qualified to minister as both priest and prophet. Some later prophets like Jeremiah and Ezekiel, though born into priestly families, were called by God to prophetic ministry. The Levites were not given a territory to live in but rather were spread throughout the tribes. Phinehas, grandson of Aaron, was given territory in the mountains of Ephraim (Josh. 24:33), although Samuel's family came through the line of Korah and not Aaron (1 Chr. 6:33–38). It seems then that a few Levite families lived in that area.

God's call to Samuel came in the context of the young man's faithful ministry under the officiating high priest, who affectionately called him "my son." The golden lamp of God located in the Holy Place provided light from evening till morning (Ex. 27:20–21; Lev. 24:1–4). Together with God's ark, the lamp symbolized God's presence in the tabernacle. The mention of the Lord's voice (Ex. 25:22; Num. 7:89), combined with the words "the LORD came and stood" (1 Sam. 3:10), is reminiscent of Moses's experience with God on Mount Sinai (Ex. 33:20–34:8). Yet the divine voice was not recognized by young Samuel or the aged priest. Revelation through a prophetic word was rare at that time and never before had Samuel received a direct revelation from God. Following the third call, Eli instructed Samuel on how he should answer the Lord. Being in a state of awe, Samuel omitted the word "Lord." By asking that important question, Samuel was becoming a servant of the Lord.

This chapter also reports another message of calamity that was to come on Eli's family. The tragic judgment was inevitable because the sins of the people had reached a full measure (cf. Gen. 15:16; 2 Chr. 36:16). These words only confirmed that which the man of God had predicted before (1 Sam. 2:27–36). In agreement with Hebrew thought, God first informed Samuel of what would happen and then gave the reason why. Eli's sons were committing a grave sacrilege against God. Tingling of both ears (3:11) is a figure of speech that describes the shock felt by all who heard the report about the disaster (2 Kin. 21:12; Jer. 19:3). Although Eli had rebuked his sons (1 Sam. 2:23–25), he was not able to restrain them.

The revelation sent by God did not make Samuel arrogant. He continued his daily duties as before, much like David, who went back to his flock after being anointed as the next king. Samuel also kept quiet about the message he had received in order to spare Eli from grief. An affectionate relationship had formed between the two, and the words "my son" could indicate Eli's informal adoption of Samuel. The old priest made Samuel swear that he would tell him the whole truth. The oath formula referring to God's punishment (v. 17; cf. Ruth 1:17) omits an explicit mention of harmful consequences involved.

Publicly, Samuel was recognized as a faithful and trustworthy prophet of God. He paid careful attention to God's messages and faithfully delivered them to the people, even a message of rebuke concerning Eli's family, even though Eli was like a father to him. True prophets delivered messages of hope and rebuke. Moreover, the words that God spoke through them did come to pass (Deut. 18:22), and this was true of Samuel. From then on, the word of the Lord and prophetic visions would no longer be rare (cf. v. 1) at the sanctuary in Shiloh or in all of Israel.

Battles with the Philistines

As was the case in the book of Judges, 1 Samuel reports that God's punishment for Israel's sins came in the form of foreign oppression. The first to be judged was Eli's family, followed by the whole nation when the Philistines captured the sacred ark of the covenant. Although Samuel is not mentioned in 4:1—7:1, everything revolves around his ministry and the coming challenge to the theocracy by the people. First, the prophecy of the unknown prophet and Samuel was now fulfilled with the death of Eli's sons and his own death. The capture of the ark would demonstrate that the Lord was able to overcome His enemies without the presence of a human king. The narrative is a display of God's sovereignty, although it would first appear that He was defeated by the Philistines. He defeated them in their own territories, in the presence of their own gods, and He was the one who returned the ark to Israel. Two important affirmations of Samuel are offered here to the reader. One is the fulfillment of his prophetic voice, demonstrating that he was a prophet of the Lord. The other points to the future when Samuel would tell the people that they did not need a king because the Lord had already demonstrated that He could defeat their enemies (the story of the ark's capture).

4:1–11. The Ark of God Captured. The next three chapters of 1 Samuel focus on the ark of the covenant, as if to reinforce the sad condition of the priesthood but particularly to highlight God's sovereignty. The author also gives a report about the death of several members of Eli's family in a single day, as foretold by a man of God (1 Sam. 2:34) and by Samuel (3:11–14). This certainly is a very dark chapter in the book, comparable with chapter 31, which reports the death of Saul and Jonathan. The first part of the chapter tells about the Philistine victory over Israel, while the second describes the impact of the defeat on Eli's family.

The Philistines at this time were a mix of people by the same name who had lived along the coast of the Holy Land during the time of Abraham. They were probably migrants from the Greek island of Crete (biblical Caphtor, according to the prophets; Jer. 47:4; Amos 9:7). These long time enemies of Israel were descendants of Ham (Gen. 10:6, 14). They settled the southeastern coast of the Mediterranean and formed a confederation of five cities (pentapolis): Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gaza, Ekron, and Gath. For a long time, they were at war with the Israelites and controlled them militarily. The first reported battle took place at Ebenezer, which means "the stone of Help(er)" (cf. 1 Sam. 7:12). The battle's outcome made a major impact on Israel's worship, resulting in the celebration of God's abiding presence in the midst of His people.

By the order of the elders, who were replacing the aged priest Eli, the ark was brought onto the battlefield. This was done with the hope that the ark's presence would ensure the Israelite victory as it did at the conquest of Jericho (Josh. 6). The ark was a wooden chest containing the two stone tablets that represented the covenant between the Lord and Israel (Deut. 9:11; 10:5).

Israel treated the ark as almost an idol instead of opening their hearts to the living "LORD of hosts." The Philistine knowledge of Israel's religion was very limited and even incorrect. They thought that the Hebrews worshiped idols because the Hebrews brought a sacred object to the battlefield (v. 8). The Philistines had heard about the ten plagues the Lord had sent against Egypt (Josh. 2:10–11), but they thought those events had taken place in the wilderness.

In the parlance of the ANE at that time, the term "Hebrews" was a common designation for the people of Israel. The first person recorded in the Bible to be called a Hebrew was Abram (Gen. 14:13). It is uncertain where the name came from, but most likely it was the plural form of a term used to identify the descendants of Eber (Gen. 11:16–17). Eber, the great grandson of Shem, died just 16 years before Abraham (see "A Chronology Following the Internal Timeline of the Bible," p. 111).

When the Israelites uttered a loud shout (vv. 5–6), its effect was felt far and wide. In response to it, the Philistine cry was prompted by a great fear, yet they were still able to gather courage to fight with full strength as "men" (v. 9). In a military context the word "man/men" stands for strength and courage (1 Kin. 2:2). But not only were the Hebrews utterly defeated, the holy ark was captured by the enemy as a symbol of a defeated God. The statues of gods were customarily carried away by the conquering army as war trophies. All the Israelites could do was run for their lives and grieve over their great loss.

4:12–18. Death of Eli. A soldier from the tribe of Benjamin brought the bad news about the defeat. External signs of mourning included rending of clothes and throwing dirt or ashes on the head (2 Sam. 1:2). The report he gave to Eli increased in intensity (1 Sam. 4:17) and climaxed with the capture of the ark, news which the old priest had greatly feared (v. 13). The impact of losing the ark and his sons in battle led to Eli's death. His leadership had lasted four decades, just like the careers of some of Israel's famous earlier judges (Othniel and Gideon; Judg. 3:11; 8:28) and future kings (David and Solomon; 1 Chr. 29:27; 2 Chr. 9:30). The deaths of Eli and his sons on the same day brought the end to this priestly line, as predicted by a man of God (1 Sam. 2:27–36) and by Samuel (3:15–14).

4:19–22. Ichabod. The last in the series of disasters on that fateful day was the death of Phinehas's wife during her childbirth. We do not know much about Eli's daughters-in-law, but it is clear from the narrative that although Eli's sons were married, they still committed immoral acts (2:22). Overcome with pain, Phinehas's wife managed to name her child before dying (cf. Rachel; Gen. 35:18). Names often commemorated important events that took place at the child's birth. The name Ichabod, which means "no [more] glory," was to remind all Israelites of the tragic loss of the sacred ark. The word "glory" is here a substitute name for the ark of the covenant.

5:1–12. The Philistines and the Ark. The defeat of the Israelites implied that the stronger people prevailed over the gods of the weaker one. This is why war trophies, such as images of gods (idols), sacred articles, and pieces of armament such as swords, were deposited as trophies in the temples (21:9; 31:10; Dan. 1:2). The capture of the ark of the covenant by the Philistines teaches us that the Lord is stronger than any other being. Far from being defeated by the Philistines, the God of Israel still ruled over people and their gods, since both proved powerless in His very presence. The narrative prepares the way for the opposition of God and Samuel to the establishment of a monarchy in Israel. This may be the reason why the text refers to God's "hand," symbolizing His active role in the events reported. This word is found at least seven times in chapters 5 and 6.

The ark of God was captured and carried by the Philistines to the temple in Ashdod, a town located near the coast and a member of the five-city confederation ruled by the Philistine "lords." In addition to Ashdod, two more cities (Gath and Ekron) are mentioned in this chapter. The five principal cities of Philistia are listed in 1 Samuel 6:17. Dagon was a god of fertility and the chief god to the Philistines. Another temple to the same deity was located in Gaza, but Samson had destroyed it earlier (Judg. 16:30).

In the morning, Dagon was found prostrate before the sacred ark as a sign of reverence and total submission. This position showed the Lord's superior power over other gods. But Dagon was not the only target of the Lord's hand or the manifestation of His power. Many of the people were struck by a plague of tumors, reminiscent of bubonic plague, that was most likely spread by mice (mentioned in the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible). The plague was life threatening (cf. covenant curses in Deut. 28).

This story may remind us of the Lord's plagues on the gods of Egypt (Ex. 12:12) and the readiness of the Egyptian magicians to admit that "the finger of God" was at work and nothing could match such a power (Ex. 8:19). The cry of the Philistines "went up to heaven" (v. 12), meaning it was heard by the merciful Lord. The next chapter tells about the resolution of this problem.

6:1—7:1. The Ark Returned to Israel. In Ekron, one of the five main cities in Philistia, the religious leaders responded to pressure from the Lord and decided to return the ark to the territory of Israel. The second half of this chapter tells how the people of Beth Shemesh reacted when the ark reached their city. Since handling the ark correctly was a serious matter, the plan for its safe return to Israel came from the Philistine priests, assisted by diviners, whose function was similar to that of prophets. These two classes of religious personnel made important decisions for rituals and the future. This is why they were consulted regarding the details about where and how the ark should be returned. It needed to be sent back with a guilt offering that would acknowledge the superior power of Israel's God and recognize the wrong done by the Philistines.

In v. 3 of the Greek translation (Septuagint) and a manuscript from Qumran, the text reads "and atonement will be made for you," in contrast with the Hebrew text, which refers to a "trespass"/"guilt" offering required for a sacrilege. The number of golden tumors and golden rats matched the number of the cities affected by the plagues. The Philistines believed that when the symbolic objects departed from their territory their troubles would go also. The rats did the opposite of the activities attributed to Dagon, the god of fertility—they devoured the food that people believed their god provided. From a modern medical perspective, the rats were most likely responsible for carrying the disease.

The Bible often connects giving glory to God with making confession of a sin (Josh. 7:19; cf. Rev. 14:7). Some Philistines were unwilling to part with the holy ark, which they believed possessed magical power. The priests and diviners reminded the people of the plagues, which had brought great destruction on Egypt, and called on them to learn lessons from past history. It is remarkable to see how much respect the Philistine priests and diviners had for the God of Israel.

At this time, sacred objects were kept in special chests. The cart carrying the ark and the chest should be pulled by cows. In this story, the cows lowed continuously as they went because they were steered to go in a direction opposite to their instincts. This was done without human agency. It is implied that God's angels were leading the cows in the direction of the land of Israel. The phenomenon was witnessed by the rulers and the people from each of the five city-states of Philistia.

The name Beth Shemesh means the house/temple of the sun-god Shamash. It was the nearest Israelite town located on the border with the Philistine territory. It also was a town in Israel where priests lived (Josh. 21:13–16). When the people saw the ark, they offered thanksgiving sacrifices to God, whose power and grace were at work in bringing the sacred ark home. The handling of the ark was the work of the male descendants of Levi (i.e., the Levites; Deut. 10:8). No other persons were allowed to perform this duty (Num. 4:19–20).

It appears that the ark became as dangerous to the Israelites as it had been to the Philistines. The people who looked into the ark committed the sin of irreverent curiosity and many died as a result.

The people's reaction was similar to that of the Philistines when they were struck earlier by the plague of tumors. There was much they did not understand about how God's holy presence was manifested in the ark and how to stand before Him. In the end, the ark was sent to Kirjath Jearim, a city located west of Jerusalem. It could not be returned to Shiloh because the sanctuary had been abandoned by the Lord and most probably was destroyed by the Philistines (see Jer. 7:12–15; cf. Ps. 78:60–61; see "Shiloh," p. 920). The new home of the sacred object was that of a priestly family, with whom it resided until the days of King David (2 Sam. 6).

7:2–17. Samuel Judges Israel. The death of the irreverent persons reported in the previous chapter caused the people to be fearful and the ark to remain in one place for decades. While many of Israel's earlier judges had functioned, perhaps primarily, as military leaders, Samuel's primary role was spiritual and administrative. As judge, priest, and prophet, he was faithful in his ministry to God and to the people of Israel.

Israel was oppressed by enemies during most of Samuel's time as judge. The precondition to peace and freedom was rejection of idols, just as in the times of the patriarchs (Gen. 35:2–4), Joshua (24:16–23), and the Judges (10:16). The text refers to "Ashtoreths" (Heb. 'ashtarot), images of the Canaanite goddess of love and fertility. Her Babylonian name was Ishtar. It also mentions habbe'alim, which were images of the storm god Baal, sometimes called Haddad. Samuel urged the people to turn away from idols and to serve God wholeheartedly. The heart was considered the thinking organ in biblical times and here it stands for one's whole being.

In this period of Israel's history, Mizpah was the place for national assemblies (1 Sam. 10:17; Judg. 20:1). The city was situated north of Jerusalem in the territory of Benjamin, whose people were famous warriors. Samuel was a leader known as a man of prayer, and he was urged by the people to never stop praying for them. Biblical prophets were known as persons who prayed on behalf of others (Gen. 20:7; Ex. 32:31–32; Jer. 15:1; Amos 7:2). Even in the later books of the Bible, Samuel is remembered as a man of prayer (Ps. 99:6; Jer. 15:1). The ritual of pouring out water before the Lord is attested only here in the Bible. Taken in context, it could be a ritual expression of the pouring out of one's life in prayer to God for spiritual cleansing (cf. 1 Sam. 1:15).

The second half of chapter 7 echoes the pattern known from the book of Judges about Israel's sin, repentance, and then salvation. Judgment on Israel's sins would usually come in the form of a foreign invasion. Verses 7 and 8 describe Philistine aggression and Israel's fear. The people turned to Samuel for help; he then offered prayer and a sacrifice to the Lord. As in the times of the patriarchs, the prophet selected a place and built an altar to offer sacrifices to the Lord, which has implications if the sanctuary was not destroyed in Shiloh.

Through the forces of nature, such as thunder and lightning, God caused panic among the Philistines and thus helped Israel (cf. Judg. 5:20–21). Such a reaction by the Lord reflects the divine covenant promises (Ex. 23:22). A stone named Ebenezer was erected to serve as a memorial of deliverance. Stone or rock is a common metaphor for God in the Bible. The place where Israel had earlier been defeated (1 Sam. 4:1) became the place of victory.

This victory, though small, was important. Unfortunately, it put only a temporary stop to the Philistine oppression. The Israelites also lived in peace with the Amorites. Their name literally meant "westerners" and was used in Mesopotamia to describe the people who lived on the western side of the river Euphrates. The Amorites at this time lived in the cities and towns of the Israelites.

Samuel's base was now his hometown of Ramah (1:19), the base from which he made yearly rounds to administer justice in towns of the heartland. He was born in this place and lived there until placed in service at Shiloh. Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah (v. 16) were important centers in central Israel. The name Bethel means "house of God," and the place was located north of Jerusalem. The patriarchal stories describe how this town held religious significance from early times. Abram worshiped there, while Jacob later changed its name from Luz to Bethel (Gen. 28:19). Samuel's regular trips and the building of altars remind one of Abram's journeys through the land of promise (Gen. 12). Throughout his life, the prophet Samuel was a man of prayer, following in the footsteps of his mother. His close communion with God was the ultimate source of power for his outstanding political and religious career.

8:1–22. Israel Demands a King. From the beginning, the idea of an earthly monarch posed a huge problem for the prophetic view of Israel's government. The establishment of the monarchy necessitated many changes at both national and local levels. The divine kingship, known as theocracy, would be at odds with human kingship. The disadvantages of Israel's monarchy easily outweighed its advantages.

Disappointed with the behavior of Eli's two sons and the character of Samuel's sons, the elders asked for a new form of leadership that would conform with the customs of the surrounding nations (Deut. 17:14). It is ironic that Samuel's sons were judges entrusted with the execution of justice in Israel (Ex. 23:8), yet they perverted justice. At this time, positions of power were often assigned based on hereditary rights. This ensured stability in society. The downside of this custom was it sometimes created a platform for nepotism and corruption.

There were other reasons for the elders' request. One concern was the ever-present threat posed by the Philistines, the enemy whose military actions appeared to put Israel's very existence at risk. According to Samuel's view, the people asked for a king because they lacked faith in God and had lost sight of His power as manifested in the story of the ark. They were rejecting Him as King (8:7). This is why the prophet was so reluctant to listen to them. He knew very well that a strong centralized government could lead to abuse of power.

God respects the freedom He granted to humans, so He was willing to yield to the people's desire for a king. This was the same Lord who had saved them from oppressive slavery in Egypt and whom the people had proclaimed as their only King (Ex. 15:18; Judg. 8:23). For centuries, He had fought Israel's battles and given them many victories. This is why, prior to the institution of monarchy, Israel was a theocracy, meaning that God was their King. Gideon, one of the judges, knew this very well. When asked to be king, he refused and told them that the Lord ruled over His people (Judg. 8:23). Now the people were rejecting God as their King. In spite of this, the Lord was ready to take an active part in the selection of their earthly king.

Samuel informed the people that the future king would behave like the kings of the surrounding nations. His actions would be in conformity with the standard practices of ANE monarchs. Judging by their speech, the elders expected to get something from their future king. Yet Samuel described the king as one who would take from them and not give. Like the Lord, the future king would receive ten percent of all the material increase in the land (Lev. 27:30–32).

The king would take the best fields and estates for himself (1 Kin. 21). He would also collect heavy taxes. He would take young men and women into the army and press them into forced labor. Some would become his army commanders and administrative officers in the likeness of Egypt. Biblical mention of chariots and horses is often negative because they reminded people of Egypt's opposition to God during Israel's Exodus (Deut. 17:16). All this would clash with the personal freedom of individuals and families in Israelite society. The cry to God against foreign oppressors would soon be replaced with cries about their king's exploitations.

Samuel's prophecy about the oppression and hardships that would come with a monarch would be most obviously fulfilled by the fourth-generation monarch. While the scriptural record does not emphasize these kinds of hardships during the reigns of Saul and David, we get a glimpse of such kingly excesses in the reign of Solomon (1 Kin. 4:7, 22–23, 26–28; 5:13–17; 11:3). Those excesses are explicitly highlighted in the story of the protests of the people at the beginning of Rehoboam's reign (1 Kin. 12:4). Even as God acquiesced to their demands for a monarchy, He descriptively warned His people of the very things that ultimately would undermine that monarchy and result in civil war and a divided kingdom.

Sometimes God allows people to make choices contrary to His warnings and then suffer the consequences of those choices. The people and their elders rejected not only Samuel as their leader but also God Himself. Samuel was so upset that he sent the elders home without an answer. The people's desire to be like the other nations represented a flat denial of God's call of the patriarchs and also of Israel's unique status in the world.

9:1—15:35

THE REIGN OF SAUL

This narrative covers the appointment of Saul as king (9:1–12:25) and his kingship (13:1–35), which bridges the gap between the time of the judges (Samuel being the last) and the anointing of David. The reign of Israel's first king had a promising beginning, but Saul turned out to be a very different leader from Samuel in his lack of obedience to the Lord. This resulted in God's rejection of Saul and the end of his dynasty, similar to the outcome of the priestly line of Eli.

9:1—12:25*Saul Becomes King

The fact that at least five chapters in 1 Samuel (8–12) are devoted to the establishment of Israel's kingship shows how important this event was in Israel's history. The narrative in chapters 9–12 is dominated by two leaders, the prophet Samuel and King Saul.

9:1–26. Saul Chosen to Be King. The story in this chapter describes the circumstances under which the aged Samuel and the young Saul met, most likely for the first time. It is the story of a young man who searched for lost donkeys and found a kingdom. Donkeys were beasts of burden used for short distance transportation, while camels were used for long caravan trips, especially across deserts.

The text makes it clear that Saul, whose name means “asked of the Lord,” was not seeking to become someone of high importance. In this sense, Saul's beginnings were like David's. If it were not for God's providence, Saul would have never become king in Israel. In this way, the reader is shown that the choice of Saul to be Israel's first king was God's will. As Hannah had said in her prayer, God raises the humble to the throne of honor and glory among princes (2:8). Kish, Saul's father, was a man of standing in Benjamin. This was a small tribe (cf. Judg. 20) that was sandwiched between Ephraim in the north and Judah in the south. The men of Benjamin were known to be excellent warriors. Saul was a very handsome man, partly due to his unusual height.

The author narrates the details of Saul's search in order to show how God Himself directed the course of events in Saul's life. A lengthy search for lost donkeys was followed by an unusual persistence of the servant who “happened” to have some money that could be used as a gift for the prophet, as was customary in Bible times (1 Kin. 14:3; 2 Kin. 8:8–9; Ezek. 13:19). The servant insisted that Saul ask the man of God for help in their search for the lost donkeys. The title “man of God” (1 Sam. 9:6) was used to refer to a spiritual leader of the people. A prophet was one whom God used to bring messages to His people. A seer was a person who received visions from God. God used His “seer” to find the person He chose to be anointed as king.

None of the things reported in this story happened by accident. When Samuel returned to Ramah (vv. 16–17), the Lord told him about Saul. The aged prophet was told by God to anoint the young man to become a “commander,” “ruler,” or “prince” (Heb. nagid) over Israel and subject to the supreme authority of the Lord, Israel's true King. In the context of the anointing of Saul, the word “king” is not used, only the title “prince.” The king of Israel would be a vassal under the true King of Israel. When speaking of Israel, God used the affectionate term, “My people.” The language used by God to describe His people's distress under the oppression by their future kings reminds one of Israel's outcry in Egypt (Ex. 3:9).

The old prophet and the young man met at the city gate, which was an important place used for business transactions in the town. Saul's modesty reminds the Bible reader of Gideon's response to the heavenly messenger (Judg. 6:15). Yet Samuel's duty was to treat Saul as the guest of honor. First, he gave the young man a seat in a prominent position at the table. Samuel then gave him the best portion of the food. Later, the prophet emptied a flask of fragrant olive oil on Saul's head.

Israel's “desire” (1 Sam. 9:20) was to have a king, and God's answer was the choice of Saul. “The desire of nations,” on the other hand, has always been to have a universal king of peace, and God's choice is Jesus the Messiah (Hag. 2:7; see “The Desire of All Nations,” p. 1136). The task before Saul was to deliver Israel from the Philistines (1 Sam. 9:16), but the task of Jesus is to save His people from their sins (Matt. 1:21). Saul was to rule over one nation, whereas Christ is King of kings and Lord of lords. His kingdom has no boundaries, nor will it ever end.

9:27—10:16. Saul Anointed King. Due to the Philistine threat and possible jealousy from some ambitious persons in Israel, Saul's anointing was done in secret. This would also be true of Samuel's future anointing of David (1 Sam. 16:1–13). So Israel's first two kings were both secretly anointed by Samuel. The ceremony consisted of pouring fragrant oil on the head of the person designated to be king or priest (Ex. 30:22–33). The anointed person was set apart for a special task before God. Because of this custom, Israel's king became known as the Lord's “anointed” or messiah (Heb. mashakh). In this way, the anointing pointed to the future Messiah, who would be set apart by God to save His people from their sins.

The future king was anointed by the prophet and expected to follow his instructions. The text says that Samuel also kissed Saul as a sign of affection between the old prophet and the young man. Like Moses going down to Egypt, Saul was in need of assurance that the Lord would be with him. Just as God had given Moses three signs, which pointed to His power (Ex. 3), so now Samuel gave Saul three signs to assure him that he was chosen by the Lord to be king and lead God's people.

The first sign was the good news that the lost donkeys had been found (v. 20). God assured Saul that He would care for his needs. The second sign was connected with God's appearance to Jacob at Bethel, where He assured the patriarch of the divine plan for his life. In that same place, Saul was given two loaves of bread that were intended for the sanctuary of Bethel. This demonstrated that his future office was sacred in God's eyes.

The last sign was related to a group of "prophets." At this time, they belonged to small communities of individuals who together sought mutual spiritual support. These communities later flourished during the time of the Greater Prophetic Movement started by Elijah and Elisha (1 Kin. 20:35). The group was led by the leader, called "father" in this text (10:12; cf. 2 Kin. 2:12). Accompanied by various musical instruments, they praised God as they were moved by the Spirit. One important consequence of these signs was that Saul was changed. He became a different person, filled with God's Spirit, thus confirming his appointment as king.

Saul's hometown was Gibeah, which means "hill." It was located in the territory of Benjamin, north of Jerusalem, and became known as Gibeah of God, Gibeah of Saul, and Gibeah of Benjamin. The presence of a Philistine post in that town attested to the Philistine military superiority over Israel at that time. After Saul became king, he made Gibeah the capital city of Israel. As Saul returned to his hometown, some people were curious to know more about his whereabouts. So far only he and Samuel knew about his anointing to be Israel's first king. This secret was kept even from close relatives.

10:17–27. Saul Proclaimed King. The national assemblies of Israel were held in the city of Mizpah, which had become an important spiritual center after Israel's victory over the Philistines (7:15–16). In his speech to that city, Samuel reminded the people that the Lord was the only Warrior against Egypt during their Exodus. This was the reason why He was Israel's true King (Ex. 15:18). Samuel did not have any problem with Saul as a person and thought that Saul was the best candidate for this lofty position. The prophet's issue was with Israel for seeking an earthly king in the likeness of the nations.

The right person was chosen through the casting of lots. This was done by the use of two special stones, called the Urim and Thummim, located on the high priest's breastplate. Lots were cast to single out the tribe, clan, family, and finally the individual (Josh. 7:14). When Saul was selected and called by God, he appeared timid. Samuel's introduction of Saul to the assembly was welcomed by the people. The shout "Long live the king" was part of the coronation ceremony (1 Kin. 1:25, 39; 2 Kin. 11:12).

After the royal acclamation, Samuel reiterated the regulations of kingship (cf. 8:11) and wrote them in a book for future generations. The detailed instructions were probably an expansion of the instructions found in Deuteronomy 17:14–20. A few persons, described as "rebels" or "scoundrels" ("sons of worthlessness" in Hebrew), looked down on Saul and seemed not ready to recognize him as their king (v. 27). They refused to call him king, but rather called him "this person." Saul was aware of their resistance, and at this stage in his life, he was able to hold his temper. In his later career, he seemed incapable of controlling his anger.

11:1–15. Saul Saves Jabesh Gilead. This story shows Saul's excellent ability to take charge of the top leadership position to help his fellow Israelites. Israel's first king is described in terms of the judges who ruled before. The Holy Spirit came upon Saul as in times past with Gideon (Judg. 6:34), Jephthah (Judg. 11:29), and Samson (Judg. 14:6; 15:14). The chapter begins and ends with the report of events that took place east of the Jordan. Sandwiched between these two references is a story about Saul in his hometown of Gibeah, west of the Jordan.

Josephus Flavius and a manuscript from Qumran (4QSam<sup>a</sup>) both supply noncanonical background information to this story. They tell how the Ammonite king Nahash oppressed the people from the tribes of Gad and Reuben. This cruel ruler plucked out his subjects' right eyes, a deeply humiliating act (Judg. 16:21). Seven thousand people were able to escape and make their way to Jabesh Gilead. The name Nahash in Hebrew means "a serpent." His people, the Ammonites, were the descendants of Lot (Gen. 19:28); their small state lay northeast of the Dead Sea. Since two and a half of Israel's tribes had settled east of the Jordan (Judg. 10:6–11:33), they had clashes with the Ammonites, who lived east of Israel.

Jabesh Gilead was a town located east of the Jordan. People who lived in that town were related to the tribe of Benjamin (Judg. 21:14), in whose territory Gibeah was located. The leaders of Jabesh seemed to have forgotten God's saving power when they doubted whether anyone would help them (1 Sam. 11:3). It is also surprising that they did not ask Saul for help. Though anointed as king, Saul's kingship had not yet been inaugurated, and he resumed his ordinary farming activities. On a previous occasion, Saul had been moved by the Spirit and prophesied (10:10). Here, he forcefully recruited people by using the threats rooted in a covenant-making ceremony (cf. Jer. 34:18).

The unity of Israel's kingdom was always a very delicate matter. It was strongest during David's and Solomon's reigns. When united, Israel's army was stronger than the Ammonites. In their second message to the enemy, the people of Jabesh said, literally in the Hebrew, "we will go out to you" (v. 3). This could be interpreted in two different ways: "we will surrender to you" or "we will come out to fight." This war was not intended to add foreign territory to Israel but to fight against oppression and injustice.

The surprise attack was carried out before dawn, at the time when sleep was deepest. Like Gideon's soldiers, Saul's army attacked from three different directions (cf. Judg. 7). In the end, the credit for victory was given to the Lord, Israel's great Deliverer. Following the victory over the Ammonites, a ceremony was held in Gilgal, a town east of Jericho where the Israelites had earlier celebrated the Passover under Joshua (Josh. 5). During this ceremony, Saul was publically recognized as king over the whole nation. This great celebration included a peace offering and great rejoicing. In biblical times, the greater the sacrifice, the greater was the rejoicing. This occasion was perfect for a renewal of the covenant and for Saul's inauguration. Samuel's farewell speech is found in the next chapter.

12:1–25. Samuel's Address at Saul's Coronation. Samuel opened his speech by declaring that he did not use his power for personal gain (see Num. 16:15) and did not take anything from the people. This stands in contrast to Samuel's sons, Joel and Abijah, who had been appointed as judges yet practiced corruption. It also applied to the future king who, according to the prophet's words, would take from his subjects one thing after another (1 Sam. 8:11–18). The old prophet also reiterated his position toward the people's request for a king. Since he did not abuse his office and the Lord had always saved them, he could see no reason for Israel's request for a king.

Samuel mentioned some of the important judges (v. 11), such as Gideon (also called Jerubbaal; cf. Judg. 7:1) and Jephthah. The third name is bedan in Hebrew. It could be "Barak" (Judg. 4–5), while it has been suggested that "Samuel" should be read as "Samson" due to the similarity of consonants in the original text. During Saul's inauguration, Samuel invited the people to fear and show respect for the Lord. The future of Israel did not depend so much on the king's ability as it did on the Lord's power and the nation's loyalty to Him.

In closing his speech, Samuel prayed to God for a miraculous manifestation of divine power. In the land of Israel, it rains only from late autumn to early spring. Rain in summer is extremely rare. This miracle performed by God through his prophet demonstrated the power of prayer and the Lord's commitment never to abandon Israel. After all, they were His people, and all the nations around them knew this (see Ex. 32:12; Num. 14:15–16). Samuel would continue to pray for them and teach them God's way.

13:1—15:35

Saul's Wars and Conflicts

Saul's reign was characterized by military conflict with the Philistines. The beginning of this king's reign was very successful. Yet the author also records the divine displeasure every time Saul failed to obey God.

13:1–15. Saul's Unlawful Sacrifice. This story contrasts Saul's great fear of the Philistines with Jonathan's courage, summed up in his declaration that the Lord is able to save "by many or by few" (14:6). In the original Hebrew, the first half of v. 1 is incomplete because the first number has accidentally dropped out ("Saul was ___ years old when he began to reign, and he reigned over Israel [forty] two years"). The statement follows the usual biblical formula for a king's age (2 Sam. 2:10; 1 Kin. 14:21; 22:42), but it does not give the age of Saul. Based on the evidence from Acts 13:21, it is probable that Saul reigned over Israel for about forty years. This is far more likely than to say that Saul reigned over Israel for only two years.

It was customary for a king to set up a standing army. Saul did this very thing in anticipation of a war against the Philistines who had gathered in Michmash, located between Bethel and Gibeah. Israel's new king feared the well-organized Philistine army. Yet his son Jonathan, the crown prince, who is mentioned here for the first time, had no fear. He took action against the enemy and triggered the revolt. The ram's horn (shopar) was sounded in order to mobilize all Israelite men above twenty years. This brave act on Jonathan's part is credited to his father the king. Israel faced an army much larger and far better equipped for the battle. Some manuscripts say that "thirty thousand chariots" (v. 5) came against them. This could be a scribal error since the difference between the Hebrew words for "three" and "thirty" is rather small. Other manuscripts say "three thousand," which seems more likely.

Samuel had told Saul to wait for him to offer a sacrifice and give some specific instructions for the battle (10:8), and Saul waited for seven days in Gilgal. Because of Samuel's delay, and seeing his army diminish, Saul proceeded to offer a sacrifice. Saul was Israel's political leader, not its religious/priestly leader, and he disobeyed the instructions when he offered the sacrifice. The prophet rebuked him for this. By providing a long answer to a short question, Saul tried to defend himself. The king's disobedience would have serious consequences. He would lose his kingdom in favor of a person whose heart God loved, which alluded to the anointing of David reported later in the book. By disobeying Samuel, Saul rejected God's own instructions. There is a wordplay in v. 14—because Saul failed to heed God's command, the Lord would issue a command about a new leader. In this story Saul was again called a "prince" (nagid), which means that he was subject to the authority of Israel's supreme King.

13:16–23. No Weapons for the Army. After Samuel's departure, Saul moved his army from Gilgal to Gibeah in order to move geographically closer to his son Jonathan. The goal of this move was to form a single army in Geba, the place separated by a valley from Michmash, where the Philistine army was positioned. The enemy's raiders went out regularly and inflicted much damage on the population. By grouping together, Israel's army became more united, while the Philistine army became more and more divided.

The Philistines held the monopoly in that area on iron tools and weapons, so the Israelites lacked the necessary instruments of war. The Israelites also depended on their enemies for the expensive maintenance of their agricultural tools. The high price is expressed by the Hebrew word pim, which occurs only here in the Bible and refers to two-thirds of a shekel. Due to the lack of proper armament, most Israelite soldiers fought with bows, arrows, and slingshots.

14:1–23. Jonathan Defeats the Philistines.

Chapter 14 presents a story from Saul's career characterized by a mixture of military successes and personal conflicts with other Israelites, including his eldest son Jonathan. The remarkable details found in the narrative, such as the names of the two rocks, Bozez and Seneh (v. 4), place this story in a geographic location the ancient readers would have immediately recognized.

In spite of the fact that the Hebrews used inferior weapons and were fewer in number, Jonathan bravely attacked the Philistine soldiers, whom he identified in a derogatory way as the "uncircumcised" (v. 4). Although the practice of circumcision was not limited to the land of Israel, in this context the term used by Jonathan describes the Philistines, who were not a part of the Abrahamic covenant (cf. Gen. 34:14). Jonathan's courageous action, combined with a supernatural intervention from God in the earthquake, demonstrates that Jonathan was someone who was in close connection with the Lord. His prediction is given in the past tense to stress its certainty: the coming victory is as good as done.

Saul seized the opportunity to start the battle against his bitter enemies. He was accompanied by the priest Ahijah from Shiloh, who, according to some ancient versions, brought the ephod, a garment used by priests for consulting the Lord. Probably the decisions were made based on the "yes" or "no" answers from the use of two stones, Urim for "yes" and Thummim for "no." However, the Hebrew text does not read "ephod," but "ark of the God," and it is better to retain this reading. The ark was a symbol of God's presence among His army. It was brought from Kiriath Jearim for this military event and later returned there.

Saul's soldiers were joined by the Hebrews who were serving in the Philistine army, along with those who had been in hiding (14:21; 13:6). The battle resulted in a great victory for Israel that only Jonathan had expected. The text makes it clear that this success should be credited to the Lord. Later the soldiers pointed to the role that Jonathan played in this battle.

14:24–46. Saul's Rash Oath. In his pride, Saul made a series of impulsive vows that exposed his people and his oldest son to danger. The Bible presents stories such as Jephthah's vow to show how making rash promises can afflict close family members (Judg. 11:30–31). Swearing in the Lord's name is particularly binding (Deut. 23:22–23). It appears that Jonathan had a great concern for the well-being and safety of the soldiers, and in this he was different from Saul. Jonathan's attitude served him well because when his father's irrational behavior threatened his life, the soldiers refused to carry out the execution that came from Saul's impulsive order. After all, Jonathan had only tasted a bit of wild honey, so why such a harsh punishment? What was this in comparison with the great victory granted by the Lord through the bravery of the crown prince?

Exhausted and hungry, the soldiers ate meat with blood in it (vv. 32–33). Eating meat with blood was forbidden in Israel because blood symbolizes life as belonging to God (Gen. 9:4; Lev. 19:26; Deut. 12:23). Saul took action and attempted to solve the problem he had created. When an animal was slaughtered on a stone, the blood could be drained out of its flesh before it was cooked and eaten. But despite his efforts at conformity to God's instructions, it was becoming clear that under Saul's command, the connection between the Lord and Israel's king was growing weaker. Saul would consult the Lord most of the time when he was urged by others to do so (e.g., v. 36), and sometimes the Lord did not answer him. The reason for this must have been his half-hearted devotion to God. Even when people responded to him with silence, he did not realize that the problem was with him and not with others.

14:47—15:9. Saul's Continuing Wars.

Throughout Saul's reign, there were battles with surrounding nations, especially the Philistines. Moab, Ammon, and Edom were Israel's three neighbors on the eastern side of the Jordan. All three people groups were related to Israel through the patriarchs. Mention is specifically made of a battle against Amalek. The importance of obedience to God is the topic, which dominates the story of God's rejection of Saul as king. Chapter 15 opens with Samuel's firm statement to Saul about the importance of following God's instructions. The people of Amalek were nomadic raiders and bitter enemies of Israel to the south. Samuel called them "wicked" and "sinners" (v. 18). Their attacks against Israel came at the most critical moments of Israel's survival in the wilderness and were aimed at the total destruction of God's people (Ex. 17:8–16; Deut. 25:17–19). This attitude was in sharp contrast with the Kenites, who showed kindness to Israel, especially through Moses's father-in-law. The command here is in the form of a ban (Heb. kherem, "to exterminate") to be carried out on the main Amalekite settlement (v. 5). All the spoils of war were to be dedicated to the Lord.

Saul's decision to spare King Agag and the best part of the spoils stood in direct and flagrant defiance to God's clear command. In the book of Esther, the enemy of the Jewish people was called Haman the Agagite (Esth. 3:1), whose ancestry was Amalekite. Saul may have intended to use Agag as a negotiating tool with the rest of the Amalekite people. But Agag's punishment was intended to correspond with the crimes he had committed (1 Sam. 15:33). While the author states twice that the Lord was sorry for having chosen Saul to be king over Israel (vv. 11, 35), Saul's self-centeredness led him to build a monument to honor himself at Carmel (v. 12).

15:10–35. Saul Rejected as King. When questioned by Samuel, Saul put the blame for disobedience to God on his soldiers' greed, though later he included himself ("we" in v. 15) in his report. He would not admit that he had done anything wrong. For Saul, the end justified the means, and he claimed to want the best animals to offer as sacrifice to the Lord.

Samuel's words from vv. 22–23 read as poetry. In God's eyes, to do what is right is more important than rituals. Obedience takes precedence over the best sacrifices. This same teaching would be proclaimed down through centuries by prophets like Amos, Isaiah, Micah, and Jeremiah. Rebellion and arrogance, on the other hand, are forms of idolatry. Such sins cannot be removed through the performance of religious rites but require true repentance in order for God's forgiving grace to reach us. The Lord grieves when people make wrong choices.

Saul was afraid of the consequences of his disobedience, particularly of his public humiliation, and asked Samuel for forgiveness. He was forgiven, yet his rejection as leader of Israel still stood. He was reaping what he had sown. Saul had rejected God's command, so the Lord rejected him as king. When this happened, Samuel wept bitterly and stopped supporting Saul as king (vv. 7–11). The Lord's previous rejection of Saul had to do with his dynastic succession (13:8–24). In this case, the rejection applies to Saul himself. The way was now prepared for God's choice of David reported in the chapter that follows.

16:1—31:13

SAUL AND DAVID

The second half of 1 Samuel narrates the interaction between Saul and David. It tells about the rise of David (16:1—17:58), David joining Saul's family (18:1—20:42), Saul's antagonism against David (21:1—26:25), David in Philistia (27:1—30:31), and the deaths of Saul and Jonathan (31:1—13). Samuel, who years before had anointed Saul to be Israel's first king, was now commissioned by the Lord to anoint David to replace Saul. Needless to say, Saul became increasingly jealous of David, who was very gifted and also a man after God's own heart.

16:1—17:58

The Rise of David

The choice of David as future king of Israel follows the biblical pattern of electing the younger child over the elder. Although not related, this was also the case with Abel, Isaac, Jacob, Rachel, Joseph, Ephraim, Moses, etc. Outside the Bible, the custom was to favor the eldest child or son in the family. The reason given for the reversal in the story of David's anointing is that the Lord looks at the heart of a person.

16:1–13. David Anointed King. The Lord told Samuel to go to the house of Jesse. In order to disguise his true mission, the prophet used the pretext of offering a sacrifice in Bethlehem, the town located just south of Jerusalem. In this way he could not be accused of attempting a conspiracy against Saul. Discretion may have been particularly necessary because the road from Ramah to Bethlehem took Samuel through Saul's city of Gibeah. When Samuel arrives in Jesse's house, an element of suspense is introduced in the narrative as one son after the other is rejected. David's name shows up at the last moment when the prophet, not God, seemed to have run out of options. The unanticipated had happened and God's choice surprised all. Eliab's appearance reminds one of Saul, whose height was unusual (9:2; 10:23). Another biblical text lists the names of Jesse's seven sons and two daughters as follows: Eliab, Abinadab, Shimea, Nethanel, Raddai, Ozem, and David, and the daughters, Zeruiah and Abigail (1 Chr. 2:13–15).

David's occupation as shepherd prepared him to lead God's people (Ps. 78:70–71), as was also the case with Moses (Ex. 3:1). Some ANE kings called themselves shepherds of their people. The author makes it clear that David was the Lord's choice as the next king. He was filled with the power of God's Spirit (1 Sam. 16:13), which came on him as it did on Saul after his anointing (10:6). After Samuel's anointing of David, the old prophet fades away from the book. His privilege was to anoint Saul, Israel's first king, and now he had anointed David, Israel's greatest king and the ancestor of the Messiah. The remaining narrative will focus on the relationship between Saul and David until the day Saul takes his own life. In choosing David, God was about to reshape the concept of the monarchy according to His will.

16:14–23. A Distressing Spirit Troubles Saul.

Since Saul had repeatedly disobeyed the Lord's voice, God's Spirit withdrew from him, and in its place an evil spirit began to disturb him. The Bible teaches that evil spirits are subject to God's control (1 Kin. 22:19–23). God's Spirit came on David, while Saul began experiencing serious mental disorders under the influence of an evil spirit. Faced with a permanent threat from the militarily superior Philistines and without God's protection, Saul became increasingly fearful and depressed. His attendants searched for a musician to sooth the king's trouble, based on a widespread belief that musical therapy could help relieve mental distress. They found David, and this is how he entered into the service of the king.

Since the Lord was with David, two of his talents gave him direct access to the court. In addition to being a skilled musician, David, whose experience consisted of fighting off wildlife up to that point, would become an able warrior. In some biblical passages, he is described as a sweet singer in Israel who composed psalms (2 Sam. 23:1; Amos 6:5). The author shows that David, from the beginning of his service, was well disposed and loyal to the king. This is why Saul liked him and began treating him as his own son. Moreover, David's father, Jesse, sent gifts to the king as a pledge of support, loyalty, and also as a means to secure the king's favor toward David. Later on, when David married Saul's daughter Michal, he became a member of the royal family. All of this was possible because of divine providence in the life of the young shepherd who was destined to become the next king of Israel.

17:1–58. David and Goliath. This famous biblical story portrays the triumph of a shepherd boy's faith over the physical strength of a giant who trusted in his arms and his idols. The setting of this event is the war that followed the Philistine invasion of a portion of Israel's territory. The two armies were stationed west of Bethlehem, near Philistine territory. Duels between two opposing champions prior to a full-scale battle were customary in ancient times (see 2 Sam. 2:14–16). The detailed description of Goliath's armor explains why the Israelites were so terrified.

About forty days later, David was sent by his father to bring food provisions to his older brothers, who had been drafted into Saul's army. Jesse also sent a gift to the army commander. The Valley of Elah was not far from the town of Bethlehem. When David saw Goliath and heard him speak, the young shepherd reacted to his words that brought dishonor to God's name. The surprise in the story comes from the fact that David was the youngest and least esteemed child in Jesse's family, yet he became a hero. Others referred to his youth (1 Sam. 17:33), pointing out that he was not of fighting age (which was twenty; Num. 1:3, 20).

David did not fight for his own popularity or gain but solely for God's glory. His dialogue with Saul shows his strong faith in the living God. While the king of Israel put stress on the importance of weapons, David focused on trust in God, who gives victory. Saul's unusual height in Israel was not enough to give him courage to fight this giant. Much like the rest of Israel's fighting men, he was afraid to fight Goliath (v. 11). The people of Israel, together with their leader, seemed to have forgotten God's covenant promise that He would fight their battles (Deut. 20:1–4).

In David's view, Goliath's challenge suggested that his god was superior to the God of Israel. The duel between two unequal soldiers shows the contrasts between an experienced military champion and an experienced champion of faith in the true God. Moreover, this was a clash of instruments of death versus confidence in the Lord of life. Curses by lifeless idols in order to demoralize and intimidate are contrasted with a statement about the living God. The whole world needs to know the saving power of the Lord, who determines the outcome of battles.

David was very confident that God would use his skill with a sling rather than depending on conventional fighting tactics and armor with which David was unfamiliar. The giant underestimated God's chosen instrument and with self-sufficiency went after David, not anticipating that the little shepherd-king would defeat him. David's victory over the giant was complete and became the catalyst of a great victory for the Israelite army.

After the battle, the king inquired of Abner, his chief army commander, about David's family, which apparently did not have a high social standing in Israel. This shows that David's service at the court was not yet permanent (16:17–23). While his musical talents had been known to the king, this time Saul also learned of David's military skills. Because Saul had promised to give his daughter in marriage to the soldier who would defeat Goliath (17:25), he was now obliged to reward David with the fulfillment of his pledge. Understandably, Saul wanted more information about the family standing of his future son-in-law. Now David had officially reached the royal palace—his future home.

18:1—20:42

David, Jonathan, and Saul

Saul's eldest son, Jonathan, who was the crown prince, became David's best friend. The two young men never viewed each other as a rival for the throne. Jonathan, his father's legitimate successor, with time would recognize David as the future king of Israel (1 Sam. 23:16–18).

18:1–16. Saul Resents David. Chapter 18 combines two different topics about David and Saul. David's success is mentioned three times in the text (vv. 5, 14, 30), and the people's love for David, contrasted with Saul's jealousy of him, is also mentioned three times in the chapter (vv. 12, 14–15, 28–29). David was successful because the Lord was with him, as He had been with Joseph in Egypt (Gen. 39:2). It became clear to more and more people that he would become Israel's next king.

David's victory over Goliath brought him much admiration from all the people and especially from Saul's family members. Jonathan made a formal pledge of loyalty to David, which included gifts of great value. When David assumed a high military rank in Saul's army, women in Israel would frequently welcome him after his battles with a song praising the accomplishments of both David and Saul. This way of celebrating victories was an established practice in those times (Judg. 11:34; 2 Sam. 1:20). The author of Exodus describes a similar way by which the Israelites celebrated the Lord's victory over the Egyptians in the Song of the Sea (Ex. 15:20–21).

Saul also liked David, but at the same time he was jealous of the young man's outstanding success. Because the song of the women was based on a numerical progression from thousand to ten thousand (cf. Deut. 32:30; Ps. 91:7; Mic. 6:7), Saul took this to mean that David was more popular. Yet the intention of the words shouted by women was to emphasize the magnitude of the victory and not necessarily to compare and contrast the two military leaders. Even so, the king's interpretation of the words made him very angry, and he began to fear for his throne. On occasion, Saul tried to kill David by throwing a spear at him. When that did not work, Saul schemed to harm him indirectly by appointing David to be in charge of very dangerous military operations so that an enemy would kill him.

18:17–30. David Marries Michal. While Saul's hostility increased, David was not hostile toward him or his family but instead showed great humility. In fact, he was so modest that he seemed willing to give up his claim to marry Saul's oldest daughter. Saul took advantage of that modesty, reneged on his promise, and gave that daughter to another man. This worked to David's favor because Michal, the younger royal princess, was in love with David.

Saul doubtless hoped that a marriage to Michal would make David more subject to his control or that an additional dowry requirement might be imposed, the fulfillment of which might result in David's death (v. 25). Michal is the only woman in the OT about whom it is said directly that she loved a man.

Although David had earned the full right to marry a daughter of the king (17:25), Saul imposed additional conditions for such a marriage. He sent word to David, who was poor and could not afford to pay the bride-price, that he should kill a hundred Philistines and deliver their foreskins to the king. David not only did as Saul demanded, but he doubled the prescribed bride-price. Saul's scheme failed in that David's victory over the Philistines showed again that he was a very capable military leader. In the end, David was fully qualified to become the king's son-in-law. Unfortunately, these successes made Saul even more afraid of David, whom he now considered to be his greatest rival.

19:1–24. Saul Persecutes David. The chapter describes Saul's increasing hatred toward David, based on his own low self-perception, as shown when Samuel found him. He openly showed that he wanted David dead on three different occasions. Under this duress, David found a temporary refuge in the company of the prophet Samuel, who lived in Ramah. Although David's family lived in the south, he fled to the north for safety. He felt that he needed support from the man who had anointed him to be the future king of Israel (chap. 16). The two men stayed in Naioth, which probably means "a camp" or "a habitation." Both were saved from bloodthirsty Saul by a manifestation of God's grace.

We are informed about Saul's ecstatic experience without details. Many people in Bible times believed that a trancelike state made a person receptive to divine revelations. Beyond the borders of Israel, ecstatic experiences were closely connected with prophesying. Saul's act of prophesying did not result in prophetic messages from the Lord but in a display or sign of God's power. Saul spent all day and night lying "naked," or without the outer garment, in front of Samuel. The Lord had humiliated him. Laying aside the royal regalia confirmed God's rejection of Saul as Israel's king.

20:1–42. Jonathan's Loyalty to David. This chapter is composed of four episodes (vv. 1–23; 24–26; 27–34; 35–42), with the first and last occurring in the open field where the young men could talk in private (Gen. 31:4). King Saul's son Jonathan was David's best friend and is one of the most positive characters in the Bible. He was loyal to David, even though he knew that David's success came at his expense. He also recognized that he would never be king of Israel because the Lord had chosen David to replace his father. David, on the other hand, respected Saul and had difficulty understanding why the king hated him.

The two young men made a pledge before the Lord by saying, "as the Lord lives." They promised to protect each other's lives and families (1 Sam. 20:12–17). The pledge was significant because its purpose was to prevent any possible future rivalry between the house of Saul and the house of David. It was not uncommon in ancient times for a new king to kill the family members of his predecessor (1 Kin. 15:29; 16:11).

The extended conversation between David and Jonathan in vv. 1–16 raises some interesting questions and presents a glimpse of Jonathan's character. He is shown as a goodhearted young man who seemed incapable of believing anything bad about anyone. He was loyal both to David and to his father. Earlier, Saul had been willing to kill Jonathan himself over the trifling matter of the honeycomb (13:44). Later (19:1-5), Saul had been explicit in his desire that Jonathan kill David. Yet in this conversation in the field, Jonathan seemed to have forgotten all this, or perhaps believed that with the passage of time Saul's attitude and unpredictable personality had changed. He was a man whose apparent innocence of heart made him either unable, or at least unwilling, to recognize what appears to us as the obvious conflict between his honor of and love for David and his filial duty to his father. He was not cynical or suspicious in nature, and Scripture doubtlessly does not want us to miss the significance of this honorable and stark contrast to his father.

David was absent from the Festival of the New Moon (cf. Num. 28:11-15; Is. 1:13) without a prior excuse from the king. Ritual impurity would prevent a person from participating in a festive meal. David's excuse shows that he was humble and submissive, yet his absence raised suspicion and enraged Saul. Because Jonathan tried to defend David, Saul accused his son of treason and wanted to harm him. With contempt Saul avoided saying "David," but instead referred to "the son of Jesse" and insulted Jonathan in the presence of family members and friends.

At the festival, Jonathan's eyes were fully opened to his father's true character and shameful treatment of David, and he made good on his loyalty to David by helping him escape. The narrative of this chapter is all about Jonathan and his remarkable, self-sacrificing commitment to justice, honor, and God's way of doing things, even at the expense of his own worldly advantage. By ensuring David's escape, the prince knew that he would never be king. A tragic and honorable figure in Scripture, Jonathan came to his end by loyally dying beside his ungrateful father.

Saul Persecutes David

Jonathan had accepted the fact that David would succeed his father as king (1 Sam. 20:31), but Saul could not agree to this and instead looked for ways to kill David. He intended to do this despite the fact that he had no proof of any wrongdoings on David's part. Saul's paranoia may have been motivated by the fear that David would kill him and take the throne by force, something that David was not planning to do.

21:1-9. David and the Holy Bread. There are two stories in this short chapter and they both show David's desperate situation stemming from a great fear. After the Philistines destroyed Shiloh and captured the ark, Israel's sanctuary moved to the town of Nob. David went there and lied to the chief priest in order to get some food and the sword of Goliath. The chief priest was Ahimelech, a descendant of Eli, who had been the priest at Shiloh and Samuel's mentor. Ahimelech was the leader of eighty-five priests (22:18). He gave to David, who was a highly ranked commander in Saul's army, the holy bread that was reserved for the priests (Lev. 24:5-9). David's lie to the priest resulted in a tragedy and the loss of many innocent lives (1 Sam. 22:18-19). He later readily acknowledged that he had been wrong (22:22). As with many problematic episodes in 1 Samuel, the biblical writer lets the story stand without any evaluation of David's actions and reports what seem to be the negative consequences that followed.

21:10-15. David Flees to Gath. Searching for safety, David attempted to find refuge as a mercenary soldier in the city of Gath, which belonged to the Philistines. Gath was the home city of Goliath, the giant he had killed. David hoped that he would not be recognized by the population. But his plan failed. Even the song sung by the Israelite women had reached Philistia. When King Achish of Gath learned this was the same soldier who had previously fought against the Philistines, David played a madman in order to save his life. Had he told the truth, some think the Philistines would have still welcomed him because they were at war with Saul, who was pursuing him. The heading of Psalm 34 connects that psalm with this story about David.

22:1-5. David's Four Hundred Men. After he escaped from the city of Gath, David hid in the barren region of Adullam, located at the border with Philistia not far from Gath. Here he was joined by a number of social outcasts who were outlaws like himself. David cared for the safety of his family and made arrangements for their stay across the Jordan in the land of Moab, the original home of Ruth, one of his great-grandmothers (Ruth 4:18-22). At that time the Moabites, like the Philistines, were Saul's enemies (cf. 1 Sam. 14:47). This passage and the story of Ruth provide two exceptions to hostile relationships between Israel and Moab. While his family found safety in Moab, David stayed in the forests of Judah at the advice of the prophet Gad.

Since David came from Bethlehem in Judah, he felt safer among his countrymen. Saul's supporters were the people from his tribe of Benjamin (v. 7). The author makes it clear that David's situation was extremely difficult, but God was still with him.

22:6–23. Saul Murders the Priests. In the narrative presented here we see the fullest, most hideous outworking of Saul's character and personality. The opening verses show him in the midst of his raging paranoia, charging his closest associates and defenders with treason. In framing his question to them in terms of being rewarded materially for their loyalty, he unwittingly based his right to rule not on principle or his God-ordained authority but on whether he could provide better material rewards than David. Such is the last desperate measure of a leader who has completely lost his way. Doeg the Edomite apparently took the hint. It is not unreasonable to believe that his treachery against the priests was based on his expectation that he would be richly rewarded in the manner that Saul had just implied.

The chief priest's reply to Saul's accusation (v. 13) of treason indicates both his simple honesty and naiveté about the malevolence of Saul. The priest flatly rejected the king's characterization of David as an enemy and sealed his own fate by candidly acknowledging that he had other ministry interactions with David, on the assumption that David was the king's friend. The priest's openness on this point leads the reader to accept his protest that he knew nothing about Saul's suspicion of David. In a way, David had protected the priest on this point by not being open about his own situation. And Doeg, who had witnessed the interaction between the priest and David, must have known of the priest's innocence. Yet he was the one who personally carried out Saul's outrageous order, which Saul's own soldiers refused to follow. Such was the degeneracy of Saul's leadership that it would find service in men like Doeg. The suspicion that the priests were conspiring with David against him was too much for Saul.

Innocent of the conspiracy charge as the priests of Nob certainly were, their death was a tragic way of partially fulfilling a prediction concerning Eli's family given in chapters 2–3 in the book. From 2 Kings 2:27, it is clear that Ahimelech was of the house of Eli, since Abiathar, Ahimelech's son, was of the house of Eli, and his removal was also a fulfillment of the prophecy. Saul was responsible for this atrocious criminal act. Careful readers have noted the ironic depravity into which Saul had sunk. His downfall began when he had failed to completely destroy the Amalekites (15:3). Now, what he had failed to do to mortal enemies at the instruction of God he apparently condoned doing to his own people through the actions of Doeg. Saul activated the law of extermination and enforced it in a way that God would have never done. The king was now acting on his own, motivated by irrational paranoia.

23:1–13. David saves the city of Keilah. Dangerous life situations taught David to depend on the Lord for safety, especially as he tried to escape from Saul. The town of Keilah was located northwest of Hebron, near the Philistine border, and this position made it vulnerable to the attacks. The Philistine raiders came with their cattle at the end of the harvest to plunder the crops and carry them to their cities. They particularly targeted the unprotected threshing floors, which lay outside the city walls.

The people of Keilah preferred to ask David instead of Saul for help. Perhaps the massacre at Nob influenced this decision. In his attempts to save this town from the Philistine invaders, David turned to Abiathar the priest (22:20), who carried with him the sacred priestly vestment with the two stones Urim and Thummim for consulting the Lord. This is another example of David's total dependence on the Lord early in his life. A positive answer from the Lord instilled courage in David's fighting men.

Despite the fact that David helped them, the citizens of Keilah were so afraid of Saul that they were ready to hand David over. He learned about this after consulting the priest. Staying in touch with the Lord again helped David to know what to do next. As for the Lord, He did not forget His servant but blessed him with an increasing number of soldiers.

23:14–29. David in Wilderness Strongholds. From Keilah, David fled further southward to the wilderness of Ziph. In that sparsely inhabited region, he hid in the small outposts built by herdsmen and villagers as signaling stations. Jonathan seemed to have had no problems locating David. This was most likely the last meeting of the two men. The passage presents the last words of Jonathan recorded in the Bible.

Supplying food to David's company of 600 men was a major challenge. This is most likely why the people from this region informed Saul of David's whereabouts. They feared for their own food supplies, and like the people of Keilah, they remembered Saul's massacre at Nob and feared him. Saul gladly welcomed their readiness to hand David over and pronounced blessings on the leaders of the town. David was forced to move immediately further south, along the Dead Sea. His capture was almost certain, but in the last moment God intervened.

It was providential that due to an immediate threat from the Philistines, Saul was distracted and forced to give up his pursuit of David. God's direct intervention saved David's life, so the place became known as sela' hammakhleqot, meaning "the Rock of Escape." In the Bible, names were customarily given to persons and places to commemorate unusual life experiences with God. From sela' hammakhleqot, David moved to the oasis of En Gedi, renowned for its springs and vineyards (Song 1:14). In this way, David and his men were assured of a dependable water supply.

24:1–22. David Spares Saul. This chapter is divided into three parts. First, there is the story of how David had an opportunity to kill Saul, but refrained from doing so. This is followed by David's speech and then Saul's speech. The Hebrew word for hand (yad), which symbolizes power, occurs a number of times in this narrative (e.g., vv. 6, 11). The incident in the cave shows David's respect for proper authority, even while cutting Saul's robe demonstrated his willingness to take risks in trying to restore the relationship. At the same time, whether David intended it or not, it would have reminded Saul of the symbolism Samuel had used to show that the kingdom had been cut from Saul (15:27–28; 1 Kin. 11:29–32). David still considered Saul to be the Lord's anointed (2 Sam. 1:16) and was determined to remain loyal to him. Assassinations would lead only to more bloodshed. David respected Saul as Israel's legitimate king, perhaps hoping that when he became king, others would show the same respect toward him.

While Saul's kingdom was fast drawing to an end, David's reign would endure. Though Saul wept and temporarily gave up the pursuit, David did not fully trust him and remained in the wilderness strongholds. At least Saul should have clearly seen that David was not interested in taking the kingdom from him through a military coup.

25:1–44. David and the Wife of Nabal. The long story narrated in the middle of the chapter is bracketed by David's two losses. Samuel died, a great loss of moral support, and Michal, the wife who loved him, was given to another man (v. 44). Wedged in between is the story of David's conflict with Nabal, which ended in David's marriage to Abigail.

The mention of Samuel's death appears as another marker of Saul's downward spiral. Samuel had been Saul's original promoter, and now he was gone. At the same time, Samuel's death certainly must have been a blow to David, who depended on Samuel as a symbol of God's direction in his life. Both men, enemies as they were, had reason to feel the loss of Samuel. With the death of Samuel the historical transition from the theocracy to the monarchy was final; the last judge had died. The only problem left was that Saul had not been willing to be God's vassal and the Lord was still shaping David to become His ideal king.

Meanwhile, David and his men protected the flocks of a man whose name or more likely nickname was Nabal. This Hebrew name means "a fool" or a person who is morally and spiritually deficient (v. 25). The first thing the reader learns about this man is that he was very wealthy. This is stated in the narrative even before his name is disclosed, suggesting that fools could be quite capable when it comes to material wealth. The time of shearing the sheep was a festive occasion, when wealthy people loved to show their generosity to other community members (2 Sam. 13:23). Since none of Nabal's animals was missing in the attacks by wild beasts or raiders, David sent greetings of peace with a request to return kindness by providing some food for David's group, thus giving him the opportunity to be generous. To show his humility, David described himself to Nabal as "your son David" (1 Sam. 25:8). Ten of David's men were sent with an expectation that there would be a generous gift.

Nabal was probably loyal to Saul, so he responded to David's polite message with contempt and threats. Isaiah 32:6 defines "a fool" (Heb. nabal) as someone selfish who keeps the hungry unsatisfied and withholds water from the thirsty. Abigail, on the other hand, showed clear signs of wisdom.

In spite of her high social status, Abigail addressed David as "my lord" (vv. 24–31) while describing herself as his servant. She took all the blame upon herself and agreed with David about Nabal's poor character, while at the same time pleading for mercy at David's feet (cf. Esth. 8:3). David's life, she says, although threatened by his enemies, would be bound "in the bundle of the living" with the Lord—which probably means that it has been recorded or sealed in God's book of life—while the lives of his enemies would be removed from there. Unnecessary bloodshed would bring only harm to David's future career. After Nabal's sudden and timely death, David took this wise woman of high status as a wife. To further demonstrate her humility, Abigail declared herself ready to wash the feet of David's servants. An amazing feature of this story is that David was willing to listen to and accept the advice of a woman who was pleading with him on behalf of a man who had insulted him. Seeking counsel from others and particularly from the Lord characterized David's leadership, with a few important exceptions.

In the meantime, Saul's daughter Michal, who was David's legal wife, had been given to another man. This suggests that Saul wanted to hurt David and tried his best to keep him away from the throne for as long as possible. David had another wife from Judah, and together with his marriage to Abigail, these connections strengthened his position in the south. David's kinship ensured the support of the elders and communities in central and southern Judah. This territory would become his future power base.

26:1–25. David Spares Saul a Second Time.

This is the second story of David's kindness in sparing Saul's life. It has both similarities and differences with the first story in chapter 24. Both stories show that benevolence was a constant trait of David's character. For the second time, the people of Ziph informed Saul (23:19) about David's movements and urged him to pursue David in their territory. David had already spared Saul's life, yet in spite of it, Saul again decided to pursue the one whom he considered as competitor to the throne. Due to his paranoia, Saul did not appear to understand that David was not seeking to take the throne from him by force. He was waiting for the Lord to hand it to him at the appropriate moment.

The king came into the remote region from his residence in Gibeath, surrounded by a great number of his troops. Under cover of night, David slipped into Saul's camp accompanied by his nephew Abishai, the son of David's sister Zeruiah and the brother of Joab. The two men discovered the place where the king slept, protected by his general, Abner, who was also Saul's cousin. Abishai urged David to kill Saul, but David refused and rebuked the young man by saying that he would not lift his hand against the Lord's anointed. David took only Saul's spear and water jug. The spear represented a symbol of Saul's kingship because he seldom separated himself from it (18:10; 19:10; 2 Sam. 1:6), and it could have been used by David to kill him. Instead David spared Saul's life.

David's act of mercy in again preserving the king's life impressed Saul so much that once again he predicted the Lord would protect David from all danger and make him triumph in the end. Indeed one could say that the words spoken here by Saul regarding his own folly (v. 21) summarized his life, while the words spoken much later by the Apostle Paul, "I have kept the faith" (2 Tim. 4:7), could summarize David's life of faith.

27:1—30:31

David in Philistia

Following Saul's persecution of David in the Wilderness of Ziph, it became clear that David could no longer trust the king's promises. So he decided to again seek refuge in Philistia (cf. 21:11–16). This was the most difficult period in David's life, more difficult than when he faced the giant Goliath in the Valley of Elah. This time he had to convince his enemies that Saul and his soldiers were his worst enemies, although he had no intention of fighting them. How could he fight the army of the nation whose king he would soon become?

27:1—28:2. David Allied with the Philistines.

David now commanded an army of 600 men and was received favorably by Achish, king of Gath, the hometown of Goliath. David became his vassal and received an estate in return for his services and loyalty. During this time, David's soldiers were stationed in Ziklag, on the border with Israel. David would stay in this city until the death of Saul. His army regularly raided the enemies of Judah and Philistia who lived in the area. Some of the names of the tribes that are given in the text are Geshurites, Girzites, and Amalekites. Achish thought that David's army was attacking the towns in the Negev, which is in southern Israel. He could see the spoils brought back by the soldiers but could not tell where they came from.

These raids helped David in a variety of ways: to secure provisions for the survival of his army, escape dangers from Saul, eliminate some of Israel's enemies, and secure his position among the leaders of the clans of Judah. The author only reports David's acts of deception and cruelty. He does not condone them nor try to justify them. The lesson to draw from this passage is similar to the lesson found in the story of Abram in Egypt in Genesis 12. Even when God's servants lack trust in God and use questionable means of survival, God is still with them and working to transform them. The Lord used David to protect the people of Judah from bitter enemies who often raided their towns and villages.

28:3–25. Saul Consults a Medium. While God consistently answered David's questions, Saul's line of communication with the Lord grew weaker and was eventually broken. Saul had shut off the sources of divine revelations, and now he was desperate to learn God's will. But who could he turn to for help? He had killed God's priests, and the divine Warrior was no longer present by his side. Samuel was dead, while the priestly ephod was with David's priest, Abiathar. It is possible that Saul's priest had fabricated an ephod in place of the original one.

In great fear, Saul turned to a spiritual medium. This was despite the fact that he had previously condemned such practices (1 Chr.

10:13–14; cf. Lev. 19:31; Deut. 18:9–14). So the king who had banned mediums now consulted one himself. There is little doubt that this was the lowest point in Saul's life, which would lead to his defeat and death. While going to the witch in En Dor, Saul traveled at night and in disguise to conceal his identity. Later in the story, the woman did discover his true identity. En Dor was located about six miles (10 km) from Shunem. The woman must have established a reputation as one who could successfully consult the spirits of ancestors. Her ritual pit was believed to be a magical portal through which ghosts could pass to communicate with the living (see below, "Saul, the Medium, and the Spirit of Samuel").

The message given to Saul was the same he had repeatedly heard from Samuel while the prophet was still living. In summary, Saul was told that his disobedience to God had led to his downfall and David would succeed him as king (15:26–28). The only new element was that he would die in the impending battle against the

Saul, the Medium, and the Spirit of Samuel

The narrative recorded in 1 Samuel 28:3–19 is the only place in the Bible where we find a detailed account about a consultation with a medium and the appearance of a spirit of the dead. Such activity is proscribed in the strongest terms in Deuteronomy 18:9–14. We need to look at the story carefully to identify what it is, and is not, saying.

1. A Medium. The necromancer is called "a woman who is a medium" (1 Sam. 28:7); that is, she had the ability to communicate with the dead, seeking oracles from them. This type of person was called "one who calls up the dead" (Deut. 18:11). Apparently, they were possessed by the spirit they consulted and functioned as a medium (see Lev. 20:27: "A man or a woman in whom there is a spirit..." [literal translation]). In a sense, this was a counterfeit of the gift of prophecy.

2. The Spirit. The Hebrew word translated "spirit" in the narrative is 'ob, not ruakh ("spirit"), which is the one used to refer to the spirit of God, and designates the necromancer (1 Sam. 28:3) as well as the spirit of the dead itself (Lev. 20:27). It is believed by some that originally it could have meant "pit, hole on the ground." Consulting the dead required that a hole be made on the ground in which food and blood were placed with the clear purpose of enticing the spirit to come up from the underworld. The underworld was also thought to be the place where demons were located (cf. Lev. 17:7). Others believe that 'ob comes from the Hebrew word 'ab ("father") and that it designates the spirits of the ancestors. Apparently the spirit spoke to or through the necromancer in undertones, whispering the oracle, chirping, and muttering (Is. 8:19).

3. Communicating with the Spirit. The spirit probably communicated with Saul through the medium, rather than directly. It should be noted that the "spirit" did not say anything new to him. It simply repeated the message given by God through Samuel. But even the prediction of the death of his children (28:19) was incorrect; not all of them died. The narrative seems to be rejecting the common idea that the spirits of the dead could function as spiritual guides for the living.

4. Identifying the Spirit. The necromancer did not really bring up the spirit of Samuel.

She was the only one who saw anything and then reported to Saul “that she saw a spirit [’elohim, ‘gods, divine beings’] rising out of the earth” (v. 13). Unable to see the spirit, Saul asked what he looked like. She answered that he was old and covered with a cloth. It was Saul who concluded that this was Samuel (v. 14). So the biblical writer does not tell us who the spirit was. It tells us only what the protagonists of the story—the medium and Saul—believed him to be.

In reviewing this passage, we should take into consideration the larger context of the story, the Bible. We know that the Lord condemned any attempt to communicate with the dead (Deut. 18:10–11). We also know that the realm of death, as a place where the spirits of the dead dwell, does not exist but that death, as the end of life, is the result of sin (Heb. 2:14). In addition, we also know that demons desire to communicate with humans and at times can possess them as their instruments (e.g., Acts 19:13–16). And finally, we are told that Satan can transform himself into what seems to be an angel of light to deceive humans (2 Cor. 11:14). Based on the overall teachings of the Bible, we can conclude that it was not Samuel who spoke to Saul but some other spiritual/“divine” power not from God.

Philistines. This last statement was colored by firm determinism. The negative message brought him to a state of depression and despondency. All hope of defeating the Philistines was now lost.

Saul refused to eat, and only after strong urgings by the woman and his men did he take some food, consisting of roasted calf and unleavened bread prepared in a hurry. Saul departed from this place more frightened than when he came. Such a discouraging experience could only be the result of the deceptive work of the enemy in disguise, who was leading Saul into destruction. Thus, the objective of this experience “was not to lead Saul to repentance, but to urge him on to ruin; and this is not the work of God, but of Satan” (PP 683).

29:1–11. The Philistines Reject David. The story of David and Achish continues, presenting the solution to David’s serious problem (28:1–2). It is likely that the events reported in this chapter precede those from chapter 28, because this chapter states that the Philistines were gathered in Aphek (located just north of Mt. Carmel; v. 1) before they decided to move southeastward into the Valley of Jezreel proper (v. 11). The arrangement of the material in these chapters is more thematic than chronological.

The Philistines decided not to involve David in their battle against the people of Israel, who they consistently referred to as “Hebrews.” Instead, Achish sent him back to Ziklag. It is remarkable that in his dialogue with David, Achish demonstrated such high regard for the Lord God of David, in whose name he took an oath (v. 6). Moreover, this Philistine ruler trusted David so much and praised him for his loyalty, not knowing that David had repeatedly deceived him. Truly, Achish is portrayed in much better light than David, whom he called “an angel of God” (v. 9; cf. 2 Sam. 14:17; 19:28). Although the author does not state this explicitly, he implies that the Lord helped His anointed one in the midst of an impossible situation. Clearly, the Lord was still with David, not because of what he was doing but sometimes in spite of it.

30:1–31. David’s Conflict with the Amalekites. The last two chapters in 1 Samuel describe a battle between David and the Amalekites. A separate battle between Saul and the Philistines would tragically cost Saul his life. The Philistines assembled up north in the famous Valley of Jezreel. This location differed from that of previous battles, which took place in the south. Gath was one of the five Philistine city-states forming a confederation referred to as Pentapolis (“five cities”), and its people were expected to participate in the war. Shunem and Mount Gilboa are located on the opposite sides of this valley. It is clear that King Achish wanted David to fight on the Philistine side and even assume the role of his personal bodyguard. But it is not clear in the narrative what course of action David took in this war.

The battle between David and the Amalekites occurred soon after he returned from the battlefield. David and his men arrived just in time to pursue the Amalekites who had raided and burned the town of his residence, Ziklag. If they had returned a day or two later, it would have been too late to recover what was lost. This chapter tells how, with the Lord’s help, David’s defeat turned into a victory, in contrast to Saul’s defeat reported in the next chapter. Both battles took place at approximately the same time. In this way, the author assures the reader that David had no part in the Philistine battle and victory over Saul and his army. Helping the enemy destroy God's people would have permanently prevented him from becoming king in Israel.

The Amalekites were Israel's enemies since the time of Israel's Exodus from Egypt (Ex. 17:8–16), and they would cleverly launch their attacks in the most opportune situations. This time, they attacked Ziklag when only women and children were in the town. They must have done this in retaliation for David's raids (27:6). In the beginning of his reign, Saul disobeyed God's word that came through Samuel and failed to destroy Amalek (15:1–9). Now David had to face them again. But before he could pursue the Amalekites, David faced the prospect of his own death at the hands of his frustrated people. At that moment, he did the right thing by turning to the Lord. God assured David (through the officiating priest) of His presence and victory, which unified his soldiers. When David pursued the raiders, God would grant him a complete victory.

The march from Aphek to Ziklag could take up to three full days. One third of David's fighting men were too exhausted to go further, so they stayed behind while the others pressed on. They achieved a complete victory, effectively completing the job that Saul had failed to do (15:1–9). David warmed the hearts of his men and the elders of Judah, from Hebron down to Beersheba, by distributing gifts to everyone, including the exhausted soldiers who had stayed behind. They had guarded the baggage, allowing others to move quickly in pursuit of the Amalekites, and were entitled to some of the spoil. David refused to listen to certain troublemakers who were selfish and wanted him to treat some of his men differently than others. Instead, David made sure that all the men benefitted equally from this victory and its spoils (cf. Deut. 20:10–15). After all, the victory came from the Lord. Distribution of wealth in Bible times was a sign of power and generosity. David also rewarded the elders of Judah who had provided hospitality during the time he was pursued by Saul. The city of Hebron figures prominently in this narrative and was destined to become the first capital city of David's future kingdom.

31:1–13

Death of Saul and Jonathan

The closing chapters of 1 Samuel present a series of contrasts between Israel's first two kings, Saul and David. Both were fighting important battles against Israel's bitter enemies—Saul against the Philistines and David against Amalek. While David was successful in consulting the Lord, Saul was fearful and decided to consult a medium. David's warfare resulted in a victory over the enemy, while Saul suffered total defeat. David successfully rescued family members, while all but one of Saul's sons perished alongside him in the battle. Lastly, Saul had failed to destroy Amalek; David had accomplished this very thing and thus fulfilled the command given through Samuel.

31:1–13. The Tragic End of Saul and His Sons.

The book's last chapter reports the end of the war between Saul and the Philistines. The final battle began on the plain, giving an advantage to the Philistines, and soon the Israelites were pushed up the slopes of the hillside, where many of them died. Israel's army suffered a tragic defeat, and many were killed on Mount Gilboa, located at the southeastern end of the plain of Jezreel. The outcome of this battle appears more important to the author than any of the details. Following this victory, the Philistines invaded several Israelite towns because the people who lived near the battlefield fled to their homes.

Fearful of torture if captured alive by the enemy, Saul shamefully took his life. Elsewhere the Bible records a few other cases of suicide by individuals who did not want to be captured and tortured by the enemy (e.g., Judg. 9:54; 16:30; 2 Sam. 17:23; 1 Kin. 16:18). It is ironic that Saul, who was anointed to liberate Israel from Philistine oppression (9:16), was in essence killed by them. His dead body was publicly disgraced by the enemy in order to show their contempt for him. The head and armor of the defeated king were treasured prizes, so they were usually carried away and displayed in public by the victorious army (cf. 17:38, 54). These were sometimes placed in the temple to show the superiority of the local gods over those of the enemy. Dismembered and impaled bodies instilled terror among the local population. Three of Saul's sons also died in the battle. It appears that only the youngest son, called Ishbosheth, survived. It is ironic that David's best friend in life, Jonathan, died in the same battle and on the same day as David's worst enemy, King Saul.

The people of Jabesh Gilead had never forgotten how Saul delivered them from the Ammonite oppression (chap. 11). They travelled all night to Beth Shan to steal his body away and then gave him a decent burial. They mourned over his death for seven days, as was customary in those times (Gen. 50:10; Job 2:13). Since the bodies were in a state of decay, they were cremated while the bones were gathered and buried. In the beginning of his reign, Saul rescued these people from the enemy. Now, at the end of his reign, the same people rescued his dead body and gave him an honorable burial.

First Samuel begins with the miraculous birth of the child Samuel, but it ends with the tragic deaths of Saul and Jonathan. The book looks forward to the reign of David, the king who was not perfect but whom the Bible calls a man after God's heart. Through him the Lord would bring about a complete and permanent victory over the Philistines. This is why the book presents God as the true Leader of His people, One who was primarily interested in their hearts (16:7). The word of God states boldly that the Lord on high reigns supreme and no earthly leader is above His word. The book closes looking forward to the interaction between David and the Lord.

2 SAMUEL

INTRODUCTION

Title. Like 1 Samuel, the book of 2 Samuel was also named after the prophet who anointed Saul, and later David, to rule over Israel. Together 1 and 2 Samuel originally formed one book in the Hebrew Bible. The Greek version of the OT referred to 2 Samuel as “Second Kingdoms” (Basileion Beta). The English title comes from the Latin Liber II Samuelis. Fragments of about four different manuscripts of Samuel have been discovered among the Dead Sea Scrolls from Qumran.

Date and Authorship. For details regarding the writing of 2 Samuel, see 1 Samuel: Introduction.

Backgrounds. Second Samuel continues the story of Israel’s monarchy that was begun in 1 Samuel. According to the Bible, kingship in Israel had to be radically different from the absolute kingship prevalent in the ANE. Kings in Israel were not allowed to do whatever they wished. They were subject to a higher power and to the rule of law and morality as taught by God’s prophets. The beginning of the book depicts the transfer of royal power from the house of Saul to David. In ancient times the nonhereditary transfers of power often triggered civil wars based on intrigue, murder, and treachery.

The book highlights David’s reign, first over the territory of Judah and then over the whole nation of Israel. Israel’s second and greatest king unified the nation, conquered Israel’s enemies, and received God’s covenantal promises of an enduring dynasty and kingdom (7:15–16). David captured the city of Jerusalem and made it Israel’s capital, as well as its administrative and religious center. This city became the symbol of national unity based on trust in God. The ark of the covenant was brought to Jerusalem to publicly acknowledge God’s kingship and rule over the nation. David’s plan was to build a temple to God, but he was not allowed to because he fought many wars and shed much blood.

The author recorded the history of David’s life and kingship with all its triumphs and troubles. David’s ascension to the throne is presented, followed by his sins of adultery and murder and their devastating consequences on his family and the nation. David himself underwent great sufferings, especially in the last years of his reign. Thus the book does not conceal the dark times of David’s life. Israel’s greatest king appeared weak in dealing with his children and committed grave sins of adultery and murder. Toward the end of his reign, he tended to rely on the strength of his army more than on God. Yet the author of the book consistently observes that, in spite of his failures, David was always willing to recognize his sin and repent before the Lord. He faithfully worshiped only the Lord and inspired his people to do the same.

Theology and Purpose. See 1 Samuel: Introduction. There is no doubt that 2 Samuel offers information that contributes to a better understanding of God’s relationship with human beings. The following are among its dominant themes:

1. Divine Providence and Grace. God loved and cared for David long before he became king. Speaking through the prophet Nathan, God reminded David that He had taken him from being a shepherd of sheep to being ruler of His people Israel (7:8). God took him from where he was and then providentially led and shaped him to become the leader of His people. In the process David faced many challenges, conflicts, and suffering, but they helped to develop the character needed in order for God to use David for His glory and the benefit of His people. Solomon, the second son Bathsheba bore to him, was named by the prophet “Beloved of the Lord.” When David sinned and repented, God’s grace proved greater than his sin.

He suffered some of the consequences of his mistakes, but God always sustained him. The life of David illustrates the fact that the Lord is patient and is constantly seeking to restore us to fellowship with Him. As a result of David's wholehearted service to God, he was honored to become an ancestor of Jesus Christ, the Messiah. The NT begins Christ's genealogy with a reference to Jesus as the Son of David (Matt. 1:1). Lives placed in the hands of the Lord are in good hands.

2. God's Eternal Covenant with David. Central to the book is the covenant that God made with David (2 Sam. 7). David's life and career are contrasted with those of his predecessor, Saul. Unlike Saul, David was a successful leader in war and peace time, as well as a gifted musician. While deeply spiritual, he had a strong sense of justice. David showed himself respectful toward King Saul and his whole family, in spite of the fact that Saul wanted to kill him. Unlike King Saul, when David was rebuked by the prophet he sincerely repented. Toward the end of David's life, Israel's borders extended from Egypt to the Euphrates in fulfillment of the promises God made to the patriarchs (Gen. 15:18–21). David's reign became a standard by which the reigns of subsequent kings were measured (2 Kin. 18:3; 22:2). After his reign, God blessed Israel with the reign of his son Solomon. In spite of the later division of the kingdom, the prophets promised a future restoration under the new David, Ruler of all of God's people (Is. 9:1–7; 11:1–12; Amos 9:11–15; Zech. 9:9–13).

Such messianic passages instilled in God's people hope in the coming Messiah, the future Son of David, who was destined to rule the nations of the earth and not only Israel. In the Gospels, Jesus is often called the "Son of David." This title expressed earnest expectations that the glorious promises given in the beginning of Israel's monarchy would someday come to pass by the power of a loving and merciful God.

Literary Features. Second Samuel consists mostly of narratives, but a few songs and lists are scattered throughout the text. The long narrative section of the book is bracketed by two poetic passages, namely, the lament for Saul and Jonathan (1:17–27) and psalms of praise to God's greatness (22:1–23:7). Dispersed throughout the book are lists of David's officials, prayers, and a short lament over the death of Absalom. Finally the so-called last words of David are introduced as "the words/oracle of David son of Jesse" (23:1–7).

COMMENTARY

1:1—10:19

DAVID'S KINGDOM ESTABLISHED

In 1011 B.C. David's time in the wilderness of Judea came to an end. His most important task would be to unite a much divided nation. As Israel's king he would have to lead, unify, and inspire his people. David was successful like no other king of Israel. Under his leadership, the kingdom was consolidated, enemies were conquered, and he received promises of a lasting kingdom. David acted with wisdom and discernment under the true King of Israel. The book begins with David mourning the deaths of Saul and Jonathan (1:1–27). This is followed by David becoming king of Judah (2:1–4:12), king of Israel (5:1–6:23), the perpetuity of his dynasty (7:1–29), his military victories (8:1–18), and his dealings with Mephibosheth, the Ammonites, and the Syrians (9:1–10:19).

1:1–27

Lament over Saul and Jonathan

The author affirms that it was the Lord who made it possible for David to sit on Israel's throne. David honored the office of king as a position established solely by God. As long as Saul was alive, he refused to take the throne for himself, even though God had promised that it would come to him. Thus, the quick execution of Saul's alleged killer and David's heartfelt public mourning of Saul and Jonathan underlined his reputation as an honorable and patient leader.

1:1–16. Report of Saul's Death. The introductory words of the book, "after the death of Saul," constitute a fitting place for the division of Samuel into two parts. At about the same time that the Philistines defeated Saul, David defeated the Amalekites. Then an Amalekite dressed like a person in distress came to David in Ziklag. The dust on his head and the torn clothes suggested that he was mourning. The man reported that he had killed Saul on Mount Gilboa. In the absence of any human witnesses, he brought Saul's diadem and armlet and presented them to David. Both objects were symbols of kingship. If any part of the man's story was true, it is likely that he had been taking spoils from the fallen soldiers on the battlefield.

The account of Saul's death in this passage differs from the story in 1 Samuel 31. Some commentators propose that the Amalekite messenger told lies in order to get favors from David. However, it is possible to view the two stories as complementing each other so that the reconstructed events would have happened in this way: Saul fell upon his sword, as in the first story, but he was still alive when the Amalekite approached and, with or without Saul's request, killed the king.

David believed the story about Saul's death, but his reaction to the messenger's news was very negative. David tore his own clothes as an expression of sorrow and mourning. After a long day of mourning, he rebuked the man for raising his hand against the Lord's anointed. The guilt for the man's death was entirely his own. This swift and decisive act of David was consistent with his positive attitude toward Saul as the Lord's anointed, as he had expressed on more than one occasion (1 Sam. 24:6-7; 26:8-12). In fact, David had never treated Saul as an enemy. The execution of the Amalekite demonstrated both David's sense of justice, or righteousness, and his love for Saul and respect for the office.

1:17-27. An Elegy for Saul and Jonathan.

David's poem on the death of Saul and Jonathan was profoundly personal. It lacked religious and national elements, so no mention was made of God's name or of Israel's defeat. David expressed tribute to the fallen mighty warriors in Israel, whom he loved and respected. This elegy became a national poem as it eloquently expressed Israel's great loss of its beauty, glory, or splendor—sometimes translated as comparable to the grace and beauty of a gazelle (v. 19). The song was preserved in an ancient source (now extinct) called the Book of Jashar (cf. Josh. 10:13), where its title was "Song of the Bow." Verse 22 makes mention of Jonathan's bow, which symbolized his many victories over enemies.

The lament lists Saul's major accomplishments as king. He united the kingdom, defended Israel from the Philistines, and brought prosperity to his people. A large portion of these accomplishments is also credited to Jonathan and his bravery. Gath and Ashkelon are named as two of the five principal cities of Philistia (v. 20). The song contrasts the daughters of Philistia with the daughters of Israel. In that period, women celebrated victories with music and songs, but they also led in the singing of laments (Jer. 9:17-19). David ends his lament by devoting a whole verse to Jonathan. He describes his personal loss of one who was his best friend (1 Sam. 20). David's words, including the reference to "my brother" (2 Sam. 1:26), underline a deep fraternal love and echo covenantal terminology.

2:1-4:12

David Is Proclaimed King over Judah

Saul's death opened the way for David to assume kingship after having experienced much hardship. But before David's coronation, there were obstacles to overcome. The most serious was that Saul's defeat and death on Gilboa had resulted in national disaster and widespread chaos.

2:1-7. David Is Anointed King of Judah.

While David was still stationed in Ziklag, he sought God's guidance on how to proceed. Nothing less than a direct revelation from the Lord could help him. The answer to his question came through the stones called the Urim and Thummim (Ex. 28:30; Num. 27:21; 1 Sam. 28:6) that were kept in the pouch of the sacred ephod. David was sent to the southern city of Hebron, where the elders of Judah publicly anointed him king. His first anointing by Samuel when he was just a lad had been private. Hebron became David's capital and remained such for seven years before the conquest of Jerusalem. It was centrally located in Judah and had several springs of water. Under David's rule this city was improved and expanded.

Before his coronation David had established a solid military reputation recognized even by the Philistine lords and generals. Through his two marriages and also the distribution of gifts (1 Sam. 30:26-31), he had created strong ties with some influential families in Judah. One of his first actions as new king was to commend and bless the people of Jabesh Gilead for rescuing Saul's dead body and giving it a proper burial (2 Sam. 2:4-7; 1 Sam. 31:8-13). He promised them the same protection they had enjoyed under Saul. By doing all these things, David demonstrated to the people that he was Saul's legitimate successor. David also hoped that these men would recognize him as king. Yet in spite of this, David's authority included only the tribe of Judah, to which he belonged, and the smaller tribe of Simeon, which was likely considered part of the same kingdom.

2:8–11. Ishbosheth Is Made King of Israel.

Saul's son Ishbosheth was not killed in the battle like the other three sons. So Abner, Saul's cousin (1 Sam. 14:50) and army general, proclaimed Ishbosheth king over the tribes of Israel. Ishbosheth's name in Hebrew means "man of shame," but originally the name was Ishbaal, meaning "man of Baal." Ishbosheth's residence was in Mahanaim of Gilead on the eastern side of the Jordan, a place remembered from the story of the patriarch Jacob (Gen. 32:1–3). Since Ishbosheth was not a strong king, Abner was really in charge of the kingdom. Following the battle on Gilboa, most of Israel's territory on the western side of the Jordan was under the control of the Philistines, seriously limiting the extent of Ishbosheth's kingdom.

2:12–32. Israel and Judah Are at War.

The author makes it clear that the leaders of Judah favored David. This situation soon resulted in civil war, since Abner wanted the tribe of Judah to recognize Ishbosheth as king and bring their territory under his control. The two armies clashed at Gibeon, a town in Benjamin belonging to Saul's tribe. This town is known from the Bible by its large pool, whose existence has been confirmed by archaeological excavations. Each side selected twelve of their best soldiers, all of whom died because none could prevail over their opponents.

With no apparent winners, a full-scale battle followed in which Abner killed Asahel, Joab's brother and David's nephew. The battle ended with a temporary truce, although the conflict between the two armies continued. Asahel's dead body first lay on the battlefield, then was later buried in his family tomb. Joab never forgave Abner for this act of violence and looked for the first opportunity to avenge his brother's death.

3:1–5. Sons of David.

Although details about Abner dominate this chapter, the author shows that as time passed, David's kingship grew stronger, while Ishbosheth's power steadily declined. The fact that many children were born to David was a sure sign of the Lord's blessing (e.g., Ps. 127:3–5). Only one son from each marriage is mentioned by name. David's marriage to Maacah was a royal one, and it strengthened his alliance with the king of Geshur, who ruled east of the Sea of Galilee (2 Sam. 15:8; 1 Chr. 3:2). The writer makes no mention of Ishbosheth's family, implying he had none left.

3:6–21. Abner Joins Forces with David.

Israel's army general Abner appears to have been a very ambitious man. He suddenly made an intrusion into the harem that previously belonged to Saul, and Ishbosheth interpreted this act as a threat to his throne (2 Sam. 3:7; cf. 16:21–22; 1 Kin. 2:22). A quarrel between the two men followed this incident and ended with Abner's decision to defect to David. He promised to bring the whole kingdom of Israel with him from north to south, beginning with the tribe of Benjamin, to whom Saul and his son Ishbosheth belonged. Abner claimed that both the people and God wanted David to be king and that he would deliver the people of Israel from their enemies. This statement about David was true even during Saul's reign (1 Sam. 18:16), and it could be that Abner heard it from Saul himself.

David asked Abner to restore his legitimate wife Michal to him because she had been unlawfully taken away from him (1 Sam. 25:44). In this way David's status as Saul's son-in-law would be restored and all would see that he was the rightful successor to the throne of Israel. In other words, David's right to succeed Saul as king was closely linked with his marriage to Saul's daughter. The ANE laws included provisions indicating that a man who had been driven from home by force might claim his wife when he returned. But above all, David and Michal had been in love at the beginning of their relationship (1 Sam. 18:20). So thanks to Abner, Michal was restored to David. As was customary in those times, the alliance between David and Abner was sealed by a feast. The word "peace" is repeatedly found in this passage to show David's sincere intentions in dealing with Abner. Yet this agreement between the two of them did not last long.

3:22–30. Joab Murders Abner.

Without consulting David, Joab (David's nephew and army general) proceeded to murder Abner in a treacherous way. Unlike David, Joab did not think that Abner could be trusted. He also felt obliged to avenge his brother's death. Joab struck Abner in the belly, the same way in which Abner had struck his brother Asahel. Yet for David there was a difference between the two murders. Asahel was killed in a battle, while Abner was assassinated in times of peace. It is also likely that Joab feared Abner's power in Israel and his ambitions to take Joab's commanding position over the army.

3:31-39. David's Mourning for Abner. David was first embarrassed, then angry because of what Joab did. This infamous act could raise suspicions about the king's integrity in dealing with Abner. To distance himself from Abner's murder, David declared a national day of mourning in which Joab had to take part. When all the people heard that the king wore the garments of mourning and abstained from food to grieve over Abner's death, they concluded that their king was innocent of bloodshed and their respect for him increased. It is important to understand that Abner died in the process of making David king over all Israel. David's resentment for Joab's murder of Abner lasted for a number of years (1 Kin. 2:5-6). He was aware that Joab was helped in the plot by his brother Abishai, who was also a military man. For the time being, David could only entrust the punishment of his two nephews into the Lord's hands (2 Sam. 3:29).

4:1-12. Ishbosheth Is Murdered. This short chapter narrates the death of Ishbosheth and David's reaction to the news. His response was the same as to Saul's and Abner's deaths. By telling this story, the narrator shows that David was not involved in the death of Saul's family members. After Abner's defection to David, the popular support for Saul's son began to dwindle. This situation eventually led to Ishbosheth's murder and decapitation at the hands of his two army captains. This took place during the king's midday rest ("siesta"). No reason is given for this sudden act of violence, although the two captains probably hoped that David would reward them for such an act. The two men belonged to the tribe of Benjamin, to which Saul and Ishbosheth also belonged.

Ishbosheth left no surviving son to succeed him. His death meant that David no longer had serious rivals for the throne. Jonathan's son Mephibosheth was crippled and unfit to be king, so he posed no threat to David. Ishbosheth's assassins presented the head of their king to David to prove their involvement in the assassination. They explained their act of murder as the Lord's vengeance on Saul's house. Even though Ishbosheth's death advanced David's kingdom, he once again publicly distanced himself from it. Instead of rewarding the two generals, he executed them, and their bodies were dismembered. To dismember the bodies of the assassins was an act of extreme disgrace for the victim and shame for the family. Moreover, David spoke well of Ishbosheth by calling him an innocent, righteous person (v. 11). Thus was David cleared of any suspicions of complicity. These actions were consistent with his promise to Saul that he would show mercy on his posterity. A guiding principle in David's life and reign was that violence leads to more bloodshed, in line with Jesus' teaching that all who live by the sword will die by it as well (Matt. 26:52).

David Is Made King over All Israel

Chapter 5 of 2 Samuel presents three of David's great achievements during his reign. First, there was a nationwide recognition that he was the king of all Israel (5:1-5). Second, David conquered the city of Jerusalem (5:6-16). And third, he accomplished the decisive and final victory over the Philistines (5:17-25).

5:1-5. David Reigns over All Israel. Not long after the death of Saul's last surviving son, Ishbosheth, the tribal elders of Israel took the initiative to join Judah in making David their king. In the Lord's presence, all the people of Israel and Judah, from Dan to Beersheba, anointed him to be their "shepherd" and "king" (v. 2) in Hebron, the first capital city of David's kingdom. This was David's third and final anointing as king. In Hebron and later in Jerusalem David would reign for a total of forty years (1011-971 B.C.). His long reign stands in contrast to Ishbosheth's reign that lasted for only two years.

5:6-16. Conquest of Jerusalem. The strategic position of Jerusalem (earlier called Salem and Jebus) in the center of the land was much more suitable to David's needs than Hebron in southern Judah. Jerusalem's name means "city of peace" and it would link the territory of Judah with the northern tribes of Israel. But the city was still in the hands of the Jebusites, who were descendants of Canaan (Gen. 10:16). In earlier times the tribes of Judah and Benjamin had captured it (Judg. 1:8) but failed to completely settle it (Judg. 1:21).

The Jebusites' boastful words show overconfidence in their control of the fortress. Their statement implied that even a blind and lame army could defend it from David's attack. Yet when David and his army marched against the fortress (acropolis) of Zion, they were able to capture it. This is the first mention in the Bible of the name Zion (2 Sam. 5:7), which later became synonymous with the name Jerusalem.

The city's main water supply came from a spring located outside the city walls. Instead of launching a direct attack, David's soldiers entered the city through a secret water tunnel and thus surprised the enemy.

After the conquest, Jerusalem became the city of David. From this time on, it was Israel's capital and the location of David's palace. The cordial message sent by Hiram, king of Tyre, representing the most important Phoenician city, showed the extent of respect that David enjoyed internationally. It also demonstrated that the Lord's blessings on His chosen people and their leader were now evident for all to see. Artists from Phoenicia came to build a palace for David made of cedar wood, which was a choice building material used for building royal palaces and temples in ancient times. The royal palace provided more room for David's large family, including new wives and concubines from Jerusalem.

5:17-25. The Philistines Are Defeated.

David's throne was now well established and the Lord gave him important victories over Israel's bitter enemies, the Philistines. Two decisive battles took place in the Valley of Rephaim, located southwest of Jerusalem. Recognizing himself as God's vassal, David consulted the Lord before going to war, something that Saul had repeatedly neglected to do. In this way Israel's second king succeeded in doing what the first one had often failed to accomplish. The Philistines were finally driven out of Israel's territory and never again posed a serious threat to the people of Israel.

The new name Baal Perazim ("Lord of the breaking through") was given to the place of victory to ascribe this important success to God, who came to fight with the armies of heaven. During this battle David succeeded in capturing the idols the Philistines had brought along to ensure their victory, then left behind in their panic. An army would abandon its idols on the battlefield only under the most critical circumstances. The Philistine gesture marked a reversal of their capture of the ark of the covenant at the battle of Ebenezer (1 Sam. 4:11).

6:1-23. Ark of God Is Brought to Jerusalem.

The narrative in this chapter is dominated by the sacred ark of God that David brought to Israel's new capital city. The ark had been stored for a considerable time in the house of Abinadab (1 Sam. 7:1-2) in Kiriath Jearim/Baalath (1 Chr. 13:6). David wanted to bring this object that symbolized God's presence into Jerusalem.

Only then could the nation be truly unified in the religious and political sense. Caring for the ark was another great accomplishment of David's reign. With the arrival of the holy ark, Jerusalem became a holy city and Israel's religious center. A large military parade was a part of the program. This testified to the importance of this event, which celebrated the glory of God sitting on His heavenly throne and commanding the armies of heaven. The appropriate music was also played for the occasion. Since the ark was particularly holy, only the priests and Levites who were descendants of Aaron were commissioned to handle it. It was not to be touched by any other individual (Ex. 25:12-15; Num. 4:15; Deut. 10:8). Instead of carrying it on poles, the two sons of Abinadab set the ark on a new cart like the Philistines did (1 Sam. 6:7) and guided it to the new destination.

When the ark shifted, Abinadab's son Uzzah reached out to steady it and was struck dead. The only reason for the punishment given in the text is that Uzzah committed an irreverent error. This is the only occurrence of the Hebrew word for irreverence in the OT. The place was named "Perez Uzzah" (v. 8), which means "outbreak of wrath against Uzzah." On an earlier occasion, some people from Beth Shemesh had suffered because of irreverent handling of the ark (1 Sam. 6:19).

King David was greatly distressed because Uzzah was punished only for wanting to make sure that the ark would not slip. For three months the ark was kept in the house of Obed-Edom the Gittite. This man may have been a member of the company of David's personal bodyguards who came with him from Gath. David now learned that the presence of the ark could be a blessing if handled with care by the priests and the Levites (Num. 7:9; 1 Chr. 15:2). So again the ark was on its way to Jerusalem.

The ark entered the capital city carried by the priests. There was a big celebration, and David offered a sacrifice to the Lord. He was not acting in a priestly role but as an ordinary worshiper because he did not belong to the tribe of Levi. In addition, countless burnt offerings were offered and completely consumed on the altar. Fellowship offerings were part of a communal meal during important celebrations such as coronations or temple dedications. In this case the Lord's enthronement in Jerusalem was the reason for celebration. The ceremony also reaffirmed David's election to kingship. The ark remained in a special tent (cf. Josh. 18:1) until the reign of Solomon, when the temple was built in Jerusalem (1 Kin. 6).

Being in a festive mood, the king distributed food and gifts to the people and chose to humble himself in the Lord's presence. Instead of being dressed in his kingly robe, he wore a priestly garment used for consulting the Lord and joyfully "danced" to the sound of the music (v. 14). The Hebrew term translated with "dance" appears only here in the OT. Comparative data from other Semitic languages suggest that its use reflects the ritual procession that accompanied the return of the ark, including the six-pace advance followed by a sacrifice (2 Sam. 6:13). This is not comparable to the modern concept of dancing, but was part of the larger ritual construct expressing reverence, joy, and the recognition that the object symbolizing God's presence was finally "coming home."

The chapter ends on another sad note, this time involving a quarrel between David and Michal, who despised David's way of rejoicing before the Lord. This caused a lasting breach between the two. In the beginning of their relationship, Michal loved David and was his only spouse, but now she was only one among his many wives and concubines. Michal never bore any children to David. Thus, no royal child was qualified to bridge the divide between the house of Saul and the house of David.

Promise of a Lasting Dynasty

According to this narrative, God objected to David's plan to build Him a house (temple), and instead promised to build David a lasting house (dynasty). There was a considerable time gap between the events described in chapter 6 and this chapter. The events recorded in this chapter belonged to a later period of David's reign. The two topics presented here—Israel's sanctuary and David's kingship—are vital for the entire OT.

7:1-17. God's Covenant with David. At this point in David's life the Lord had blessed him with prosperity and peace from all sides, including the hostile Philistines. God's covenant with David is presented in the context of the king's concern for the Lord's reputation. The king resided comfortably in his palace because the Lord had given him rest. In turn, David planned to provide rest for his God. David was bothered by the thought that the King of kings, whom he worshiped, instead of dwelling in an impressive temple structure, resided in a portable wilderness tent known as the sanctuary. But before David began with his plans for a temple construction, he made sure that his desire was in accordance with God's will.

The narrative in this whole section makes interesting use of the word "house," which in the original Hebrew is used here no less than fifteen times. David was relaxing in his "house" or "palace" and desired to build a decent "house" or a resting place for the Lord. Instead, God promised to build a "house" for David as a lasting dynasty. In a sense, space and location met time. God's intention for David was to provide a secure future, ultimately leading to the arrival of the other "Son of David," whose kingship would be truly "forever" and whose salvation would guarantee eternity. Instead of answering David through a priest, the Lord used the prophet Nathan to reveal His will to His servant. Although prophets spoke for God, they were not devoid of their individuality. Some of their personal opinions and feelings could differ from God's intentions. Nathan's personal opinion was that David should build a temple, but the Lord objected. This case reminds one of Samuel, who opposed the idea of setting up earthly kings over Israel, while the Lord consented to the people's demand (1 Sam. 8:6-7). In Nathan's case, the difference between the prophet's personal opinion and a divine revelation is marked by the fact that the next message he gave to David was from "the LORD" (2 Sam. 7:5), indicating the expressed will of God.

God revealed His plans for David through Nathan. He would make David's name great, just as He did for Abram by saying, "I will make you a great nation; I will bless you and make your name great; and you shall be a blessing" (Gen. 12:2). David indeed became Israel's greatest king. At the end of his life, he would peacefully die and be respectfully buried in his family tomb. God Himself would act as father to David's son. Divine parenthood implies care, protection, and even discipline when necessary, yet not rejection. God also indicated that the temple would be built not by David but by one of his sons (Solomon). The reason given involved David's tremendous military success. Too much bloodshed had disqualified him as the builder of God's temple. This privilege would be Solomon's (1 Kin. 5:3-5; 1 Chr. 22:8-10).

The story suggests that God is not primarily interested in the building of elaborate and luxurious temples. Instead, God is more interested in people, especially those who will accomplish His plans for the salvation of humanity. Throughout salvation history the permanence of the Davidic covenant strengthened the messianic hope. Whenever David's descendants failed, the hope of the people was directed toward the future David, also called the Son of David. In announcing the birth of Jesus Christ, the angel Gabriel referred to Him as the great Son of God—the Most High—and as having the throne of His “father David” with an everlasting kingdom (Luke 1:32–33).

7:18–29. David's Thanksgiving to God. David now humbled himself before God as Moses (Ex. 3:11) and Gideon (Judg. 6:15) had done. In response to the divine promises about a lasting covenant, he offered a thanksgiving prayer while standing beside the ark that represented the divine presence on earth. He praised the Lord's greatness and grace, far exceeding anything a human being can offer. Truly, God's ways are seen as incomparably higher when placed next to human standards.

In the Bible the uniqueness of God is one of the most important themes and provided a reason for the uniqueness of the nation of Israel. David thanked God for the promise of a lasting dynasty and recognized that the impact of His promises would be felt not only by the people of Israel but also by the nations of the world. This was God's intention from the beginning (Gen. 12:1–3). The divine assurances given here would bring comfort and hope to many faithful people.

Victories over Israel's Enemies

Chapter 8 shows how some of the divine promises (cf. chap. 7) made to David were realized through his victories. The order of the events reported here is topical rather than chronological, so many of the victories recorded in the chapter took place before the events of chapter 7. David's conquests extended the territory of Israel from the border of Egypt in the southwest to the Euphrates in the northeast, a fulfillment of God's promises to Abram (Gen. 15:18–21).

8:1–14. David's Further Conquests. David's rule was very successful in the military and administrative areas. Israel's power and influence extended in all directions. In the west he conquered Philistia, which included the city of Gath according to the parallel text from 1 Chronicles 18:1. This time the Philistines were not only expelled from Israel's territory (2 Sam. 5:25) but also subjugated in their land. In the east David conquered Moab, the land inhabited by relatives of the Hebrews through Abraham's nephew Lot. The friendly relationship between David and the Moabites must have been spoiled by their treachery, so David treated them harshly after the battle. The author gives no other reason for David's cruel treatment of the conquered population. A later Jewish tradition claims that the king of Moab had killed David's parents, who were refugees in his country (cf. 1 Sam. 22:4).

In the north David's kingdom extended to the cities of Damascus and Zobah, which were inhabited by the Arameans, also known as Syrians. They were related to the Israelites through the patriarchs, such as Jacob. Several Aramean city-states from the north of Israel stretching as far as the Euphrates were paying tribute to David. King Hadadezer ruled over Zobah and proved hostile toward David. The military ambitions of this king also targeted Assyrian territories. In contrast to this ruler, King Toi (or Tou) acknowledged David's superiority and sent him a present. In the south David controlled the land of the Edomites.

The concluding statement asserts that God gave victories to David wherever he went. He hamstrung the horses of the enemies, thus making them unfit for battle, because at that time Israel did not use war chariots. Garrisons were put in place to maintain control over the conquered regions. The consecration of spoils from wars, consisting mostly of silver and gold or objects coated in gold, showed that David ascribed all his victories to God.

8:15–18. David's Administration. The end of this chapter tells of David's domestic organization. The king himself was the chief executor of justice in Israel (1 Kin. 10:9; Jer. 22:2–3). Joab's name heads the list of the administrators because he was the army general and also the son of David's sister Zeruiah. David's personal bodyguards included hired soldiers led by Beniah. This commander later played an important role in Solomon's accession as king (1 Kin. 1). While the Kerethites originated from the island of Crete, the Perethites (or Pelathites) were associated with the Philistines (Ezek. 25:16; Zeph. 2:5). Later in the text the reader learns about the Gittites, soldiers from the city of Gath under the command of Ittai, who was very committed to protecting David (2 Sam. 15:18–22).

Abiathar was joined by Zadok as priest, while Nathan the prophet joined Gad. Civil advisers included a recorder and a secretary. Some of David's sons and close relatives were his royal advisers and worship leaders. The original Hebrew says that they performed the duties of the "priests," which means that they served in the sanctuary (cf. Ps. 110:4).

9:1—10:19

Mephibosheth, the Ammonites, and the Syrians

Chapters 9–20 have often been called "the succession narrative," since they relate the events about David's successor to the throne (cf. 1 Kin. 1–2). In the beginning, it was not clear even to David who would be the next king, so his sons other than Solomon pursued their ambitions to seize the throne. The author also relates David's sin and punishment and thus conveys the message that kings in Israel were not above moral laws.

9:1–13. David's Kindness to Mephibosheth.

Jonathan and David were best friends, so while Jonathan was still alive David made a pledge to be kind to his descendants (1 Sam. 20:14–15). David never forgot the promises made to his friend. When he was finally well established on his throne, David desired to honor that pledge by showing loving-kindness (Heb. khesed) to Jonathan's only surviving son, who was also Saul's grandson.

The servant in Saul's household whose name was Ziba told David about Jonathan's son Mephibosheth (formerly called Mephi-baal), who was already mentioned in chapter 4. In the aftermath of the battle on Gilboa, where Saul and Jonathan died, the Philistines sacked Saul's capital at Gibeah. During this attack, members of Saul's household were frantically fleeing, thus causing the accident that left the child crippled for life. Mephibosheth fell on the ground and sustained a serious neck or spine injury that made him paraplegic.

The biblical text mentions twice that Mephibosheth had crippled feet. As such he was unfit to be king and posed no threat to David. When brought before the king, he was submissive and compared himself to "a dead dog," which was an expression of self-contempt (9:4). He greatly feared that David might consider him a potential rival to the throne and execute him. In ancient times, all rival claimants to the throne were systematically eliminated (1 Kin. 15:29). David calmed his fear and declared that Saul's property be returned to Mephibosheth, who as a son of Jonathan was also Saul's legitimate grandson. As the only surviving male member of the royal family, Mephibosheth was the rightful heir of Saul's estates.

This man lived in the town called Lo-Debar in the Transjordan territory of Gilead, which had been the power base of Saul's son Ishbosheth. As a cripple, Mephibosheth had lived in obscurity. David allowed him to move to Jerusalem and eat at the king's table. The king showed the same attitude of kindness toward Mephibosheth's son Mica, who was Jonathan's grandson. To be allowed to eat at the king's table was considered a special favor (1 Kin. 2:7; 2 Kin. 25:27–30). Out of his great love for Jonathan, David gave Mephibosheth honor and privileges like one of own his sons (2 Sam. 9:11).

10:1–19. Ammonites and Syrians Are Defeated.

After the report on David's kindness to Jonathan's son and grandson, David sought to show kindness to Hanun, who reigned over the Ammonites. This happened in response to the news about the death of the Ammonite King Nahash, who had been kind to David. David sent an official delegation from Jerusalem to Rabbah with a message of sympathy. Ammon was a small kingdom on the eastern side of the Jordan. During Saul's reign the Ammonite king was hostile toward Israel and Saul defeated him. When David was hiding from Saul, he found refuge in the territories of Philistia and Ammon. The text does not provide the details about the kind of treaty that existed between David and the Ammonites. Although David was in alliance with Nahash, the Ammonite nobles feared that as king of all Israel, David could change his attitude toward them.

David's delegation was charged with espionage and publicly humiliated by order of Hanun, Nahash's son. As a consequence, Israel's ambassadors returned looking more like a group of captives in mourning (Is. 15:2; 20:4). They were instructed to stay in Jericho until their appearance improved. To grow long hair in Israel was a sign of dignity and honor. The shaming of David's delegation by the Ammonites appeared to be an act of shaming the king of Israel. Jericho was a border town between Israel and Ammon and had been poorly populated ever since Joshua's destruction and conquest.

The Ammonite leaders hired twenty large army divisions of Aramean mercenaries and readied themselves for a battle. (The Greeks later referred to the Aramean people as "Syrians.") In military terms, these two enemy armies appeared far superior to Israel's army, which was commanded by two of David's nephews. The Ammonites focused their defense on the city gate of their capital Rabbah. The Arameans were hired soldiers, so Joab made sure they were confronted by Israel's best men. The forces of Israel defeated Hanun's army and the Aramean troops as well.

Following this defeat, Hadadezer of Damascus gathered a vast army, which included troops that came from beyond the Euphrates. Joab delivered a speech before the battle, outlining the strategic plan and exhorting the soldiers to put their trust in the God of Israel. As an experienced man of war, he entrusted the outcome of the battle into God's hands. Once again the Israelites triumphed and so David's realm expanded further to the east. The victories over the Arameans were previously mentioned in the book's summary of David's military accomplishments (8:3–8). This was David's last military campaign against a coalition of foreign armies.

In the end, many of the Aramean city-states swore their allegiance to David rather than to Hadadezer. They also pledged to stop helping the Ammonites, who continued the war against Israel until they were completely defeated and their capital city sacked. The next chapter begins with that story. Even though David did not initiate the wars against the Ammonites and Arameans (cf. Deut. 20:12), this victory assured Israel's political supremacy in the region.

DAVID'S SINS AND FAMILY PROBLEMS

The report on David's sin changes the tenor of his life story from triumphs to troubles and from promises to punishments. His adultery and subsequent murder of Bathsheba's husband (11:1—12:31) show how easy it is for humans to corrupt themselves and misuse the power God entrusted to them. The monarchy was not yet what God intended it to be and will never be until the arrival of the King, who will eventually sit on the throne of David and whose kingdom will be eternal. Although David repented of his sins, the consequences of his actions were inevitable. God does not excuse the sin of His servants. We should be careful not to use this story to lightly deal with the sins of those to whom God entrusted great responsibilities. The story carries a stern warning not to follow David's example but to learn from the family problems he faced (13:1—20:26).

11:1—12:31

David's Sin of Adultery and Murder

Chapter 11 presents the less glorious side of David's wars and victories against the neighbors from the east. The king of Israel became guilty of two serious crimes. Fortunately, after his sins David repented and asked the Lord for forgiveness.

11:1–27. David, Bathsheba, and Uriah.

David's sins of adultery and murder took place in the context of a war with the country of Ammon. Military operations normally ceased in the winter months due to rains and impassable roads. They resumed in the spring (March-May) before the harvest period when strong men were needed to work in the fields. David's earlier military successes gave him a sense of security. Thus, instead of going out to war with his army, the king remained behind. Roofs were flat in the lands of the Bible, so David relaxed on the roof of his palace and enjoyed the evening breeze. Sadly, sometimes a sense of ease and security is often the prelude to spiritual failure.

In the Hebrew, the description of David's temptation and sin is condensed and presented through a series of three action verbs: he "saw" (from the verb ra'ah) Bathsheba, enquired (from the verb darash) about her, and took (from the verb laqakh) her. All this he did despite the fact that he knew Bathsheba was a married woman. Her husband was Uriah the Hittite, originally from the ancient region of Anatolia (today's Turkey). He was a non-Hebrew soldier whose outstanding loyalty in this story stands in stark contrast with the infidelity of Israel's king. The name of Bathsheba's father, Eliam, is also given in the text as one of David's "mighty men" (2 Sam. 23:34). In short, the king was well acquainted with Bathsheba and her family.

The author makes it clear that Bathsheba's pregnancy was the result of David's adultery. When Bathsheba learned of her pregnancy, David did all he could to hide his sin because the punishment for adultery in Israel was death. So David sent for her husband Uriah the Hittite, who was on the battlefield as one of the king's best soldiers. However, Uriah refused to go home and sleep with his wife in spite of David's insistence that he do so. David sent gifts to Uriah and even made him drunk, hoping that in such a state he would sleep with Bathsheba and David's act of adultery would be covered up. But Uriah rejected all amenities that were not available to fellow soldiers who, as he reminded the king, were sleeping in tents in open fields (1 Sam. 21:4–5).

Uriah was a loyal soldier and a member of David's royal guard (2 Sam. 23:39). His exemplary behavior put the king of Israel in a very bad light. One is not surprised that his name in Hebrew means "the Lord is my light." In his desperation David devised a plot to have Uriah murdered by the hands of the enemy. Since Uriah "killed" David's hope to hide his sin, David was now determined to kill Uriah. This exceptionally honest man carried his death warrant in a letter, which he did not open. Ironically, David had a great trust in Uriah's integrity. Joab assisted the king in his secret plot against Uriah. A few other innocent soldiers also died in the schemed attack. David knew well that he was responsible for all these deaths. Yet he was calmed when he learned of Uriah's death.

With Uriah now dead, David took Bathsheba to be his wife. She mourned for her husband for at least seven days. The inspired author says that David's behavior did not go unnoticed by God. David sinned by abusing his power and position, but the Lord's authority was above that of the king. Moreover, nothing could be hidden from the One who sees everything (cf. 2 Chr. 16:9).

12:1–14. Nathan's Parable and David's Confession. The Lord seems completely absent from the story of David and Bathsheba. He is only briefly mentioned in the very last verse of chapter 11. The recurring verb in the original Hebrew version of that story is shalakh ("to send") when referring to David and other people as its subjects (vv. 1, 3, 6, 14, 27). Then about a year later, the Lord took the initiative and "sent" Nathan to confront David.

Nathan told the king a parable about a poor man's only lamb taken by a rich man for his pleasure. The rich man pitied his own lambs but showed no pity to the poor man and his family, despite the fact that the poor man's family loved the lamb and treated it as a family member. The parable built on emotions and made David burn with anger against the act of injustice. Without realizing it, David sentenced himself by swearing in the name of the Lord.

As king, David was the supreme dispenser of justice in the land (1 Sam. 15:4; 1 Kin. 3:4–28). He acted wisely in condemning the rich man, but he was not wise enough to understand that by doing so he was condemning himself. The penalty for a theft was fourfold repayment (Ex. 22:1), but David overacted and pronounced a death sentence on the criminal. The parable vividly portrayed the realities of David's sin and induced him to condemn himself.

The prophet confronted David with the words "You are the man!" (v. 7). Nathan then explained to the king his crime, which was abuse of power. He despised the commandment of the Lord that says to love one's neighbor as oneself (Lev. 19:18). David's greed was rooted in the attitude of ungratefulness to the Lord, who gave him Saul's throne and everything he had. Ironically, this included a wife by the same name as that of his predecessor, as if he truly replaced Saul. David's wife was Ahinoam from Jezreel (1 Sam. 25:43), the same name as Saul's wife, who was the daughter of Ahimaaz (1 Sam. 14:50).

Nathan also spelled out the consequences of David's sin. The punishment would be measure for measure in correspondence with the crime. Innocent Uriah had died by the sword. David's household would also experience the sword in the near future. Uriah was deprived of his wife, so David's wives would be taken from him before all Israel (cf. 2 Sam. 16:21–22). Although David's acts of violence and moral misconduct were done in secret, his humiliation would be public. Even the heavenly bodies, the sun and the moon, would witness God's justice (Eccl. 2:17; Is. 1:2).

Nathan's final prediction concerned the baby born to Bathsheba. Uriah died as an innocent man, and so would this child fathered by David. The chapters which follow show how these predictions were fulfilled in David's life. Three of his sons died violent deaths: Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah. But the first to die was the child born to Bathsheba. In spite of this, David did not take Nathan's sayings in a fatalistic way. When confronted by a clear word from the Lord, he did not try to justify his sin or to blame someone else. Instead he humbled himself before God (Ps. 69:10). In this sense his attitude was very different from Saul's (1 Sam. 13, 15). He confessed his guilt openly and felt remorse for his crime (Ps. 51).

12:15–23. Death of David's Son. David fasted and prayed earnestly for the life of the baby whom Bathsheba bore to him. As he focused on God, his physical necessities faded into the background. He was seeking God's grace as he lay prostrate before a holy God in whose presence he felt as only the dust of the earth. Sadly, the child's life was not spared. The punishment for adultery and premeditated murder was death. David admitted that he would join the child in the tomb after his death and burial. These words remind one of Jacob's lament over the loss of Joseph (cf. Gen. 37:35).

12:24–25. Solomon Is Born. After the child's death, David's mood changed. His grieving ceased and he put on what the Bible calls the "oil of gladness" (Ps. 45:7). Then he went to worship the Lord before the sacred ark. God in His mercy gave David another son, who was called by the Lord "Jedidiah" ("beloved of the Lord"). The child's other name was Solomon, a Hebrew name related to the word shalom or "peace." This promised child was destined to become an agent of peace and also the builder of the temple to the Lord's name (cf. 7:12–13). Bathsheba became David's legitimate wife, and after his death she would become the next queen mother.

12:26–31. Rabbah Is Captured. Another evidence of God's forgiveness of David's sin was Israel's victory over the Ammonites. This victory put an end to a long war between Israel and Ammon, also mentioned in chapters 10 and 11. This time David joined his army on the battlefield. Joab had taken control of the water supply of the capital city of Rabbah, and David's soldiers were soon in control of the citadel with the palace. David had used similar strategy during the conquest of Jebus, which was renamed Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:8). Joab wanted David to get the credit for the conquest of Rabbah.

The royal headdress of the Ammonite king weighed 75 pounds (34 kilos) and was made of solid gold. One of its jewels was placed on David's head, making him the ruler of this newly conquered territory. The war captives from the city were set to forced labor to repair damages caused by the war, as was customary in the ancient world. Eventually these people integrated and became citizens in Israel, working on farms or serving in the military.

13:1—20:26

The Loss of Two Royal Sons

Although the Lord forgave David's sin, there were sad consequences that almost destroyed his entire household. Absalom was David's third son (2 Sam. 3:2–3) and is the central figure in the next several chapters.

13:1–22. Amnon and Tamar. The events following the story of David and Bathsheba are described as punishments for David's sins. The story in this chapter combines the sin of lust leading to the sin of murder. David had serious problems in raising his sons, just as did Eli the priest and the prophet Samuel. His firstborn son, Amnon (3:2), was feeling a strong desire for his half sister Tamar, who was a chaste virgin and under the protection of her father David. Amnon lured her into a private room (lit. "house"; v. 8), raped her, and then cast her out. Tamar's long pleading with her brother, her alternative proposal, and her emphatic use of "no" all attest to her strong moral character.

As a princess, Tamar appealed to Amnon's honor as crown prince in Israel not to become a fool in his father's kingdom. She purposely contrasted the roles of a prince in Israel with the "fools in Israel." Her last resort was to consent to marry Amnon, but only with their father's approval. Even though marriage with a half sister was prohibited in Israel (Lev. 18:11; Deut. 27:22), Tamar tried to persuade Amnon that, if he wanted to marry her, David would allow it (v. 13; cf. Gen. 20:12). But Amnon was not interested in her proposal. He was ready to sacrifice his potential status of heir to the throne for a moment of lust. There was no true love for Tamar in his heart but only sensual desire and selfishness.

For Tamar, rape by a half brother meant that she would be despised and desolate for life. Tamar had worn a special robe described by a term used only here and in the story of Joseph, who also wore a special coat (Gen. 37:23). In Tamar's case the robe signified virginity. She tore this precious dress and placed ashes on her head to show her deep mourning (Esth. 4:3; Jer. 6:26). No longer a virgin, Tamar lost her status in her father's house. She found refuge in the house of her full brother Absalom, who named one of his daughters Tamar after her (14:27).

Amnon's character was just the opposite of Tamar's. He is presented as someone who could not control his lust. His command to get up and leave after the rape reversed the previous invitation for her to lie with him (v. 11). He appears purposely offensive when he called her "this woman" (v. 17). His guilt made him despise her afterwards. Biblical (Deut. 22:28–29) and extrabiblical (Assyrian) laws mandated that the rapist must marry the raped woman in order to provide for her needs and her status in society. But this irresponsible young man did not care about Tamar's future. David was angry, and yet he failed to punish Amnon for his wrongdoing. This passive attitude by a parent reminds one of Jacob's reaction to the rape of Dinah (Gen. 34:5).

13:23–33. Absalom Murders Amnon. Time passed, and Amnon did nothing to show regret for what he had done to his half sister. Meanwhile, Tamar's brother Absalom harbored anger that turned to hatred for his older brother. Absalom waited two years for Amnon's suspicions to abate. Finally, during a sheep-shearing festival in early summer (1 Sam. 25:4), Absalom invited the king to a celebration. He expected that David would decline the invitation but would make sure that Amnon, the crown prince, would be there to represent him.

Absalom also invited the rest of his siblings and half siblings to this celebration. At the agreed command, his servants rose up and killed Amnon to avenge his sister's rape. To make bad things worse, this tragic event was immediately followed by a false rumor that Absalom had killed all his brothers. This was not true because the other princes, fearing for their lives, fled on the mules that were used to transport royal family members (2 Sam. 18:9). Now Israel's king grieved for his eldest son.

13:34–39. Absalom Flees to Geshur. Absalom fled and found refuge with Talmai, his maternal grandfather (3:3), who was king of Geshur. This small kingdom was located across the Jordan and east of the Sea of Galilee. While David mourned for Amnon, he also missed Absalom. Three years passed before he had a change of heart and longed to be reunited with his eldest surviving son. Then Absalom showed his strong aspirations to replace David on his throne. Sadly, Absalom's character was not so different from Amnon's. In the narrative that follows, he appears equally deceitful and violent.

14:1–24. Absalom Returns to Jerusalem. Joab did all he could to convince David to allow Absalom to come back to Jerusalem. The first part of the chapter describes how a ruse was used to permit Absalom's return from exile. The second part records a lengthy dialogue, after which David consented to meet his son. The major player in the story was Joab.

Being a close relative of David, Joab tried to persuade David to forgive Absalom and let Joab bring him back to the royal court. It is likely that Joab was also concerned for the future of the kingdom, since this prince was a potential successor to the throne. When everything else failed Joab used a ruse in the interests of all Israel. He was helped in the scheme by a clever woman who used a trick and flattery to win David's heart.

Joab sent for a wise woman of Tekoa (cf. 2 Sam. 20:16–19) to go and speak to the king. Wisdom in the Bible is personified as a lady, and the word for "wisdom" is of feminine gender. This woman appropriately demonstrated that she possessed wisdom. The woman pretended to be a desperate widow in mourning who needed the king to help her in his role as chief judge (cf. 2 Sam. 8:15). She was very respectful toward the king and fell prostrate before him. She was also very articulate and used flattery, twice comparing David to an angel of God (cf. 1 Sam. 29:9). She sought the king's mercy on her only surviving son, who had murdered his brother. The conversation between the woman and David is one of the longest reported in the Bible. It was full of wisdom, rhetorical devices, metaphors, and similes.

Without her only surviving son, the woman would be left without support in her old age and also without an heir (Deut. 25:6; Ruth 4:10). So David ruled that her son should be spared because his act of murder was unintentional (Deut. 19:4–6). David agreed with the point of her story that the well-being of a whole family was more important than the punishment of an individual member. He guaranteed the young man's safety and sealed it with an oath in the Lord's name.

The woman now challenged the king to reconsider the banishment of his son Absalom. When the king's verdict was applied to Absalom's case, the well-being of the nation seemed more important than the prolonged exile of the crown prince. Her punch line was clear: death is irreversible, so Absalom's death will not bring Amnon back to life. Divine mercy will rather preserve the sinner's life than take it.

After the woman's appeal, Joab entered the stage. He was polite and submissive, fearing he might be punished for using deception. As the army general, he knew that if David died while Absalom was in exile, political chaos would prevail in the kingdom. The tribes from the north were not always fully committed to their union with the south, as would be evidenced by the rebellion of Sheba (2 Sam. 20). David understood the point of the story and sent Joab to bring Absalom back to Jerusalem, although refusing to fully restore him. According to the author, no conversation took place between father and son.

14:25–33. David Forgives Absalom. It is not clear from the text whether the king ever forgave Absalom completely. David made a mistake in that he allowed Absalom to return to Jerusalem while he refused to restore him to his position as crown prince. Had Absalom remained in exile, he could have done little to harm the king. Had David restored him, Absalom might have wished the king no harm. By failing to take a side between these two possibilities, David angered Absalom deeply, and this anger turned into a determination to conspire against his father.

Like Saul, Absalom was a very good-looking man. His growing and weighing of hair showed him to be self-centered and narcissistic. At times he also acted like a spoiled child. Although Joab was good to him, Absalom used violent means to compel him to intervene with the king. Moreover, Absalom never felt remorse about his murder. On the contrary, he considered himself free of guilt because killing his brother was an act of vengeance. It appears that his reconciliation with the king was enforced and did not last long.

15:1-12. Absalom's Treason. After his return to Jerusalem, Absalom spent several years preparing a rebellion against his father's rule. He used his good looks and charisma to mount an insurrection that almost resulted in a collapse of his father's kingdom. This time the pressure came from the divisions within the royal family and proved to be more devastating than any of the external threats to David's rule. If Absalom had possessed a different character, he might have been an excellent successor to King David's throne.

Absalom began to play the role of king by showing off before people with his chariots and horses in the style of an Egyptian ruler surrounded by his bodyguards (1 Kin. 10:28-29). He also tried to undermine the people's confidence in the king by casting doubts on David's ability to manage the government. He did this at the city gate, where most business and legal transactions took place (Ruth 4:1). As crown prince he desired to show how he could be a much better arbiter of justice than his father. Administering justice was one of the king's main functions (cf. 12:1-6; 1 Kin. 3:16-28; 2 Kin. 8:1-15), especially in times of peace.

Absalom exploited his father's weakness in failing to appoint regional and local judges, especially outside of Jerusalem. He was very skilled at building support for himself and achieved a large-scale conspiracy without any rumors reaching the royal palace. He also played a "common man" by not allowing people to bow to him but instead giving them a kiss of solidarity and kinship (v. 5; Gen. 33:4; Ex. 18:7). In this way, he "stole the hearts" of the people (15:6) and then proceeded to steal the kingdom.

At the appointed time, Absalom asked David for permission to leave Jerusalem so he could attend a sacrificial meal. This type of occasion with many guests could be an important part of the royal inaugural ceremony. The meal would also create an alliance between Absalom and the invited guests. Being unaware of his son's true intentions, David sent him with the words "Go in peace" (v. 9), though it is clear that Absalom was going to war. In Hebron, David's former capital city, the ram's horn (Heb. shopar) was blown and Absalom was proclaimed king. The choice of Hebron was a very clever move, because that was where his father's reign began and continued for seven years.

Hebron was located about twenty miles (30 km) south of Jerusalem. It is very likely that David's later decision to make Jerusalem Israel's capital made some of his kinsmen unhappy. Absalom was born in Hebron, and he exploited this feeling of discontentment. Like David when pursued by Saul, Absalom gained a great number of supporters in that region of Judah. This gave his rebellion greater legitimacy. Within a short time Absalom had significant support from influential people from north and south. Even Ahithophel, the chief royal adviser and Bathsheba's grandfather (11:3; cf. 23:34), joined the rebellion.

15:13-37. David Escapes from Jerusalem.

As the support for Absalom steadily grew, David was forced to act. Fortunately, many of his trusted servants remained loyal to him. In order to spare Jerusalem a siege and destruction, the king decided to leave the city and raise an army against Absalom. Accompanied by his personal regiment (cf. 2 Sam. 8:16-18), he escaped across the Kidron Valley in the direction of the Mount of Olives and on toward the desert. He encamped on the western side of the Jordan.

Ittai, the commander of six hundred Philistine soldiers from Gath, was with David. The loyalty of David's personal regiment, as voiced by this captain, played a key role in David's ultimate victory. This non-Hebrew made a double oath in the name of the Lord and thus reinforced his troops' declaration of unlimited loyalty to the legitimate king of the land. Ittai's expression of personal loyalty to David implied a long-standing friendship that transcended monetary gains. The Philistine soldiers apparently lived in Israel with their families, since the text makes mention of their little ones (v. 22).

David left Jerusalem in a state of mourning and shame. As such he humbled himself before the Lord. Along the way there was an open-air altar where people worshiped God. His prayer for help was answered, and Hushai suddenly appeared (vv. 30–32). This wise man was a member of the royal council and personal adviser to the king. David sent him back to counter the wisdom of Ahithophel, whose support for Absalom caused David much anxiety. In the end, Hushai was successful in neutralizing Ahithophel's advice to Absalom.

The two high priests, Zadok and Abiathar, were also sent back to Jerusalem with the ark of God to serve as David's informers. But David left the royal harem behind. He strongly believed that the Lord would open the way for him to return, rejoin the remaining members of the family, and worship again in Jerusalem. This is probably why he sent the ark back. He did not believe that its presence could magically bring him victory. David knew that God's favor is not dependent on the veneration of religious objects. Regardless of where the king might go, God still remained the ruler of the nation.

16:1–4. Mephibosheth's Servant. The outcome of this struggle between Absalom and David would help decide which of the two men would get the support of Saul's family. Some of the incidents recorded in this chapter seem to imply that a number of Saul's relatives sided with Absalom. Ziba, who was Saul's servant and the manager of Mephibosheth's estate, came to support David and brought food supplies for the king and his entourage. His gesture of bringing a gift was similar to but smaller in size than Abigail's (1 Sam. 25). Ziba maliciously defamed his master, Mephibosheth, in order to better himself before the king (2 Sam. 19:24–28). David believed what Ziba said and granted Saul's property to Ziba, the same property he had previously given to Mephibosheth, Saul's grandson who was crippled in both feet (9:13). Ziba's accusation may have been fabricated because it is difficult to see how David's conflict with his son could result in Mephibosheth's gaining the kingdom. In this case, David made a rash decision, which later he would have to revoke (19:29).

16:5–14. Shimei Curses David. When the king crossed into the territory of Benjamin and was passing by an enclave of Saul's loyalists, a man who was a member of Saul's extended family was openly hostile. He cursed David by calling him a man of blood, a murderer, or a bloodthirsty man (v. 7). These offensive words falsely imply that David was guilty of murdering Abner and Ishbosheth in order to grab Saul's throne. This charge likely expressed the enmity that some surviving relatives of Saul felt toward David. However, the stories recorded in the initial chapters of 2 Samuel deny this accusation.

Shimei declared that David's present afflictions were the Lord's punishment. Some of the king's companions suggested that this contemptible person should be executed. David refused and instead entrusted vengeance to the Lord. Ultimately, God's justice and mercy alone determine people's fate. What the king's own son Absalom was doing to him was much worse than the Benjamite's abuse. David knew that discipline is always unpleasant as it is happening but that it later yields peace and righteousness (Heb. 12:11). While his group was waiting near the Jordan, the subject of the narrative shifts to the events in Jerusalem.

16:15–23. Advice of Ahithophel. Immediately after his unopposed entry to Jerusalem, Absalom consulted his advisors. Hushai was already in Jerusalem and did his best to win Absalom's favor. He greeted Absalom with "Long live the king!" (16:16), although readers know who was the legitimate king in Israel. A careful reading of Hushai's words shows that all of his statements were equivocal. The ambiguous language such as the titles "king" and "chosen one" could be applied to either David or Absalom. He purposely omitted personal names in favor of titles. In Hushai's mind, David was still the king supported by God and the people. Absalom assumed that Hushai referred to him as Israel's king.

The outcome of the contest between the two counselors, Ahithophel and Hushai, would determine the outcome of the pending battle between David and Absalom. The rebellious crown prince believed in Hushai, but Ahithophel's advice still mattered the most to him. So he welcomed the idea of a symbolic takeover of the kingdom by sleeping with his father's concubines (cf. 1 Kin. 2:17–25). Hushai wisely kept quiet over this advice given by Ahithophel. He knew that Absalom's immoral act would reverse the public support of his cause. Hushai's purpose was to deceive Absalom and thus help David's cause (2 Sam. 15:34).

On the same palace roof where David had secretly lusted after Bathsheba, Absalom committed public acts of immorality. There was no doubt that when David heard about this shameful act he was reminded of the prophecy concerning the results of his own sin of adultery (12:11-12). In biblical times the royal harem was considered the exclusive property of the reigning king. Any attempts to obtain women from there was seen as a sign of rebellion (3:6-11; 1 Kin. 2:20-21). The loss of the harem to another king was a sign of being deposed. By giving this advice to Absalom, Ahithophel's intention was to create a lasting breach between father and son.

17:1-14. Hushai's Success. The contest between Absalom's two counselors is paramount to the author because it would ultimately decide the outcome of the war between David and Absalom. Ahithophel's earlier advice concerned the moral aspect of the rebellion, while the second part involved the military. As the chief royal adviser, he counseled that Absalom should attack David while his troops were still in disarray. There is no doubt that this was the most logical thing to do. Speed and surprise would work against David's men, while Absalom's side would suffer very few casualties. Ahithophel concluded by reasoning that once David was dead, executed by his own hand, all Israel would support Absalom.

Absalom and all members of his entourage accepted Ahithophel's plan. Yet this time, most likely due to divine providence, Absalom also wanted to know Hushai's opinion. He was not aware that this wise man secretly worked for David (2 Sam. 15:32-36). Hushai's task was a formidable one. All odds seemed to be against him on several accounts. First, Ahithophel's advice made perfect sense. Second, it was an established fact that the opponent's suggestions were highly esteemed by Absalom and the elders. Third, Hushai was suspected of allegiance to David. In spite of all these obstacles, Hushai proved to be a brave man who eloquently expressed his opinion.

Hushai countered Ahithophel's strategy by proposing an alternative plan. He argued that Ahithophel's tactic of a quick attack would fail because of David's rich experience in warfare. All Israel from north to south knew how capable David was in hiding, so it would be impossible to find him. Hushai assured Absalom that in a short time his army would be much bigger than David's, and thus he could count on a complete victory, even if he did rush into a full-scale battle.

Hushai intended to buy time for David with this advice. If Absalom delayed his attack, the king would have enough time to cross the Jordan into safety. Ahithophel's advice was logically the best, but in the use of rhetorical devices such as metaphor, hyperbole, and persuasion, Hushai's speech excelled. He wisely played on Absalom's fear by reminding Absalom that his father had the heart of a lion and was as fierce as a "bear robbed of her cubs" (17:8).

While Ahithophel's self-centered speech abounded with "I" statements, Hushai's speech gave prominence to Absalom's leadership. Hushai skillfully built his case on Absalom's pride and painted a colorful picture of a new leader in command of an army without number. The prince's imagination was captivated, and he decided to heed Hushai's directives rather than Ahithophel's. So Absalom postponed his attack and this gave the opportunity for David to distance himself further from Jerusalem.

The biblical writer makes it plain that this course of events was the work of the Lord, who was answering David's earnest prayers. God had a plan to frustrate the good advice of Ahithophel, a wise man by human standards, but one acting as an enemy of the Lord's anointed servant. Fully aware of the disastrous consequences of Absalom's move and fearing a future execution by David, Ahithophel decided to take his own life.

The triumph of Hushai's advice paved the way for David's future victory. Since this is the turning point in the narrative, from now on all developments would go in David's favor. This is confirmed by the following detail: in the same place where Shimei previously cursed the king, a woman now helped David's agents (vv. 18-20), as Rahab had once helped Joshua's spies (Josh. 2:3-7).

17:15-29. Hushai Warns David. Jonathan and Ahimaaz, the sons of Zadok and Abiathar, relayed Absalom's strategy to David. Based on this news, the king established his base across the Jordan in Mahanaim, which was previously Ishbosheth's refuge and capital city (2 Sam. 2:9). David appeared to have many supporters in this area. From the historical perspective, Mahanaim was the location where Jacob had experienced the protection of the armies of the Lord and named the place "two camps" (Heb. makhanayim). Jacob's small camp here on earth was strengthened by the presence of a powerful heavenly camp that was sent by God to defend His servant (Gen. 32:1).

Following the departure of Absalom's chief adviser, Ahithophel, Absalom appointed Amasa to be his army general. This man was a relative of Joab, as well as David's nephew and Absalom's cousin. But as commander he did not have the skill and experience of Joab. In the meantime, David's friends Shobi, Makir, and Barzillai refreshed the king's exhausted army and displayed their firm belief in David's kingship. Along with other members of the royal houses of Saul and Ammon, they brought gifts to show their great support for David's cause. This was the third time in David's life and career that supportive people brought gifts and words of encouragement (Abigail in 1 Sam. 25:18 and Ziba in 2 Sam. 16:2).

18:1–18. Absalom's Defeat and Death. In the decisive battle between Absalom's army and David's men, Absalom was defeated and killed. This story provides us with a view of David as a father rather than as a king. At the urging of his soldiers, David remained behind the battle lines. His troops did all they could to make sure the life of the king was not endangered. They understood that David was the rebels' only target and his death would decide the battle. Ahithophel had rightly argued that David's death would result in Absalom's cheap and easy victory (17:1–4). In contrast with David's men, who were so protective of their king, Absalom's soldiers let their leader join the battle in which he would lose his life.

David dispatched his troops in three fighting units under the command of Ittai and his two nephews, Joab and Abishai. He then gave the instructions to care for Absalom's life. The decisive battle took place in the forests of Ephraim (more precisely, in Gilead), where the terrain was very precarious. More people died from the hostile environment than by the sword. Casualties on that day were great on both sides, even though David's army benefitted from the situation. Absalom, who had entered the raging battle as suggested by Hushai (17:11), was caught by the head in a tree and left hanging in midair. Various translations support the understanding that Absalom's long hair had something to do with this accident. If this is true, then the hair that had been a source of his pride became the means of his undoing.

The author says that Joab deliberately violated David's repeated instructions not to harm the prince and killed him instead. In fact, Absalom's death was so important to Joab that he offered a bonus of one year's pay to the soldier who accomplished it. He had done so much for Absalom, only to be disappointed by his ingratitude and rebellion. Joab's main concern was the safety of the kingdom and David's life. However, the king loved Absalom and did not view him as an enemy. This was in spite of the fact that Absalom wanted to kill him.

Absalom died without an heir. His three sons mentioned earlier in the narrative (14:27) must have died before him. The name of his daughter was Tamar. The manner in which Absalom was killed and buried showed the soldiers' contempt toward this rebellious prince (cf. Josh. 7:26; 8:29). The description of his death is full of symbolism as the royal mule deserted the would-be king and left him hanging in a tree as a person cursed by God (Deut. 21:23). His hasty burial under a pile of stones in the woods stood in contrast with the imposing monument he had set for himself in the King's Valley. When Absalom's life ended, the war instigated by greed and arrogance also came to an end. The blowing of the ram's horn signaled the end of the hostilities.

18:19–33. David Hears of Absalom's Death. The joy over the victory soon turned into David's sadness. The king was still in Mahanaim, across the Jordan, stationed between the two city gates, which were connected by a passageway. He was in great anguish as he awaited the news about the battle and Absalom. All hopes of his son's survival were dashed by the news brought by the two messengers. The choice of the messenger depended on the content of the news about the outcome of the battle (1 Kin. 1:42). One of the messengers, called Ahimaz, was confident that the news would be welcomed by David. But Joab, knowing that Absalom's well-being was more important to the king, sent a foreign soldier to inform David about the situation. The king grieved over the death of his son and wished he could give himself to bring him back to life. This was not the only lament of David recorded in the Bible, although this one is different. While his laments for Saul, Jonathan, and Abner were public, his mourning for Absalom was personal and private.

19:1–15. David Returns to Jerusalem. The state of the kingdom was more important to Joab than David's feelings toward Absalom. He urged David to rise up and fulfill his public duties as king. The post-war situation in the land required strong leadership. Instead of mourning the loss of a rebellious son, the king needed to greet his victorious troops. So David went to the city gate, the gathering place for the elders and other important people of a city. There he welcomed his soldiers, who had been willing to sacrifice their lives to ensure the safety of their king.

In the beginning of David's reign, the people of Judah were the first to unite under his leadership. This time the northern tribes of Israel were the first to reinstall David as their king. Consequently, David had to remind the people of Judah that he was one of their own. He tried to win their solid support for him because for a time they had supported Absalom. The reason for this switch of loyalty was probably their unhappiness with the transfer of David's capital from Hebron to Jerusalem (cf. 2 Sam. 15:7). This is why they first responded to David's call with hesitation. Afterwards, they welcomed him back based on his ability to rule and not for personal gain.

As a gesture of national reconciliation in the southern tribe of Judah, David appointed Amasa, Absalom's former army commander (17:25), to the post of his general. Amasa was David's nephew and exercised a great influence on the people of Judah. Another reason for this change was because the king considered Joab to be responsible for the deaths of Abner and Absalom. It is assumed that some of the elite and mercenary troops remained under Joab's command. David's difficult task at this point in his career was to keep the balance between generosity and forgiveness toward former rebels, while expressing deep appreciation for his loyal supporters.

19:16–39. David's Acts of Mercy and Kindness. The events recorded in this passage are a dramatic reversal of David's flight from Jerusalem recorded in 2 Samuel 16:1–14. Instead of humiliation and weeping, there was joy and celebration. Sackcloth and ashes were replaced by the oil of gladness. In the spirit of this glorious occasion the king proclaimed a day of general amnesty in Israel. He also decided to show an attitude of forgiveness toward hostile individuals, such as Shimei from the tribe of Benjamin, who cursed David on the way out of Jerusalem (16:5–13).

Mephibosheth also came out to welcome the king. His mournful appearance (2 Sam. 19:24) indicated that during the uprising he had no ambition to be king. It appeared that he spoke the truth but had been falsely accused by Ziba. David found it difficult to know which of the two men was speaking the truth. In the end the king had to change his previous rash oath to Ziba and divide Saul's former estate between Ziba and Mephibosheth. As Jonathan's son, Mephibosheth was still honored to sit at the royal table. David's treatment of his friend Barzillai's son continued David's pattern of magnanimity and generosity.

19:40—20:26. Unity and the Rebellion of Sheba. In spite of David's great efforts to keep the nation united, some divisions became evident as the men from the northern tribes were not invited to the welcoming party for the king. They were seriously offended by this omission. Complaints about favoritism and discrimination would continue to plague David's rule. They foreshadowed Sheba's revolt and the eventual breakup of the kingdom under Solomon's son Rehoboam.

Wars give rise to many problems even when they appear to have achieved their aims. Although Absalom's rebellion ended with a victory for David, the kingdom lost its sense of unity. God was faithful to David and preserved his throne, but his last years were not happy ones. This chapter presents yet another threat to David's rule and the unity of Israel's kingdom. As mentioned at the end of the previous chapter, suspicions of favoritism and discrimination gradually led to an intertribal argument and the threat of another civil war. David's quick and decisive action resulted in the rebel's death and prevented a division of the kingdom.

Sheba, from Saul's tribe of Benjamin, led an insurrection against David. He took advantage of the delicate situation that followed Absalom's rebellion, which was marked by divisions between Judah and the northern tribes. Fortunately, this conflict was a relatively minor affair and ended without a battle. During this crisis the men of Judah remained loyal to David. In the beginning of Sheba's rebellion, all eyes were on Amasa, who was now David's army general. But Amasa's reaction to the attempted coup was very slow. The king was forced to appoint his nephew Abishai to deal with the situation. Acting together with his brother Joab, he dealt swiftly with Sheba's challenge to David's rule. Joab used this opportunity to murder Amasa in a treacherous way, just like he had killed Abner. Amasa was Joab's relative, but he considered him to be his rival. While completely committed to David, Joab's character was brutal and ruthless.

Sheba retreated and took refuge in Israel's northernmost town called Abel Beth Maacah. This prompted David's soldiers to lay siege to the city walls. With this the people of Israel lost confidence in Sheba's chances to grab the throne from David. A wise woman from the town negotiated with Joab a resolution to the conflict, resulting in a minimal number of casualties. She was able to convince fellow citizens to offer Sheba's head to avoid the destruction of the town that, as a part of Israel, was the Lord's inheritance. The citizens of this peace-loving city were loyal to the king. They acted swiftly, and Sheba's death, like Absalom's, brought an end to the hostilities.

After this victory, Joab appears to have reclaimed his position of army general. David was not successful in his attempts to remove him from that position. The chapter ends with a short list of David's officials, similar to the one in 2 Samuel 8:15–18. This time the names of David's sons are omitted. Also, for the first time there is mention of revenue from forced labor (20:24). This novelty in David's rule would arouse popular opposition, especially later during the reign of Solomon. It would reach a climax in the murder of Adoram, chief of forced labor or revenue (1 Kin. 12:18). The list of David's officials was placed in this narrative to confirm the fact that political order in the kingdom was finally restored.

21:1—24:25

DAVID'S KINGDOM IS PRESERVED

The arrangement of the material found in the closing chapters of 2 Samuel is topical, rather than chronological. For example, the story from chapter 21 most likely took place before David's act of kindness to Mephibosheth as recorded in chapter 9. This last section of the book demonstrates how God preserved David's kingdom and opened prospects of a better future. The first narrative (21:1–22) looks back to the time when David's reign began, while the closing points toward the future of Israel's kingdom (23:1—24:25). In between, we find David praising God for His deliverance (22:1–51) and the king's farewell, along with a recognition of his valiant soldiers (23:1–39).

21:1–22

The Gibeonites Are Avenged

In this passage, the revenge by the people of Gibeon contrasts with the acts of charity to the dead done by David and the concubine of Saul. It is about the search for justice in order to restore peace to society.

21:1–14. David Avenges the Gibeonites. Early during David's reign there was a famine that lasted for three years (cf. 24:12–13). This famine was caused by a drought, and it forced the king to ask the Lord what caused such a calamity. Rains and droughts in Israel are explained in the Bible as God's way of blessing or punishing His people for the keeping or the breaking of their covenant (Deut. 11:13–17). The answer was that the famine was caused by King Saul's breaking of the long-standing covenant between Israel and the people of Gibeon (Josh. 9:25–27). These people lived in the land of Canaan before the conquest of the land by Israel. They occupied the area just north of Jerusalem in the territory of Benjamin. The covenant that Joshua made with them was confirmed by an oath taken in the Lord's name. The text says that Saul violated this treaty.

Saul's hostilities toward this minority in Israel is not mentioned anywhere in 1 Samuel. Moreover, it is unclear why Saul would attack a people who posed no threat to him or to the nation. He apparently planned to exterminate them completely, although his plan did not succeed. The author makes it clear that David was not responsible for Saul's mistakes or for the consequences of these mistakes. A blessing pronounced on Israel by the people of Gibeon would cancel the curse, but first justice had to be done. At the request of the Gibeonites, David turned over seven descendants of Saul's household to avenge the loss which these people had suffered from the hand of Israel's first king. But David spared Mephibosheth in agreement with the promise made to his best friend Jonathan to show kindness to his descendants.

After the execution of the seven men on a high hill, their remains were honorably buried and gathered with the ashes of the bones of Saul and Jonathan (1 Sam. 31:11–13). Some scholars have proposed that this execution was the reason for which Shimei accused David of bloodshed (2 Sam. 16:7–8). From a modern perspective, this passage is not easily understood. It should be kept in mind that the concept of community was very strong in the ancient world. This meant that both privileges and responsibilities were shared by all members of the community.

The big picture painted in this chapter illustrates both the Gibeonites' desire for justice over past wrongs and the acts of kindness shown toward the bodies of those executed. The latter were performed by Rizpah, Saul's concubine, and King David. All during the hot summer this exemplary lady guarded the seven corpses from scavengers until winter came. The rains put an end to the drought that caused the famine. The king then made sure that the members of Saul's family were accorded decent burials. In biblical times, burying the bones of the dead was considered an act of charity, especially if they were placed in the ancestors' grave (2 Sam. 7:12).
